GOODEY'S FASHIONS FOR JULY 1863.

HATS AND FACES AT A WATERING-PLACE.

TRUTHFUL AND SATIRICAL.

I am Old and Gray,

WRITTEN BY LIEUT. A. T. LEE, U. S. A

COMPOSED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE, FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK,

BY JAS. M. STEWART.

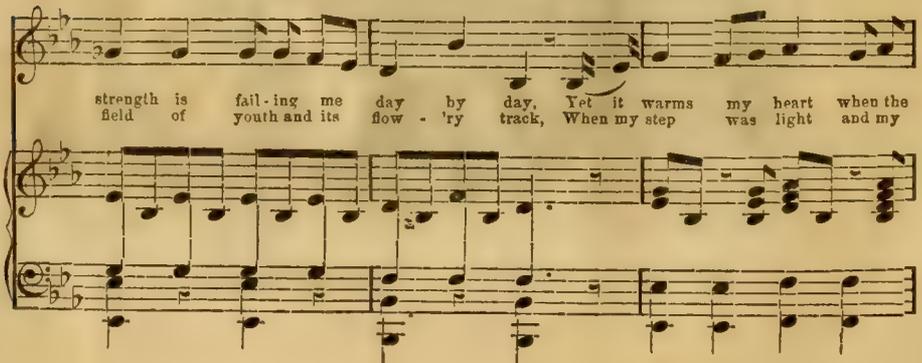

The piano introduction consists of two staves. The right hand plays a melody of eighth and sixteenth notes, while the left hand provides a harmonic accompaniment with chords and single notes.

1. I am old and gray, I am old and gray, And my

The first system of music includes a vocal line with two verses of lyrics and a piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "1. I am old and gray, I am old and gray, And my / 2. They bear me back, O they bear me back, To the".

The second system of music continues the vocal line and piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "strength is fail - ing me day - by day, Yet it warms my heart when the / field of youth and its flow - ry track, When my step was light and my".

I AM OLD AND GRAY.

sun is gone, And her robe of stars the night puts on, To heart was bold, And my first young love was not grown cold. I gaze on the glad ones who linger here, To breathe their sweet songs on my aged ear.

gaze on full many a smiling brow That sleeps in the still old church-yard now.

3.

It wrung my heart, O it wrung my heart,
To see them one by one depart,
And it cost me full many a tear of woe,
For my hopes then hung on the things below ;
But the visions of earthly joy grow dim
With the whitening hair and the failing limb.

I am old and gray, I am old and gray,
But I've strength enough left me to kneel and pray,
And morning and evening I bless the power
That woke me to light in the midnight hour
That spared me to gaze with an aged eye
On a hope that can never fade or die.

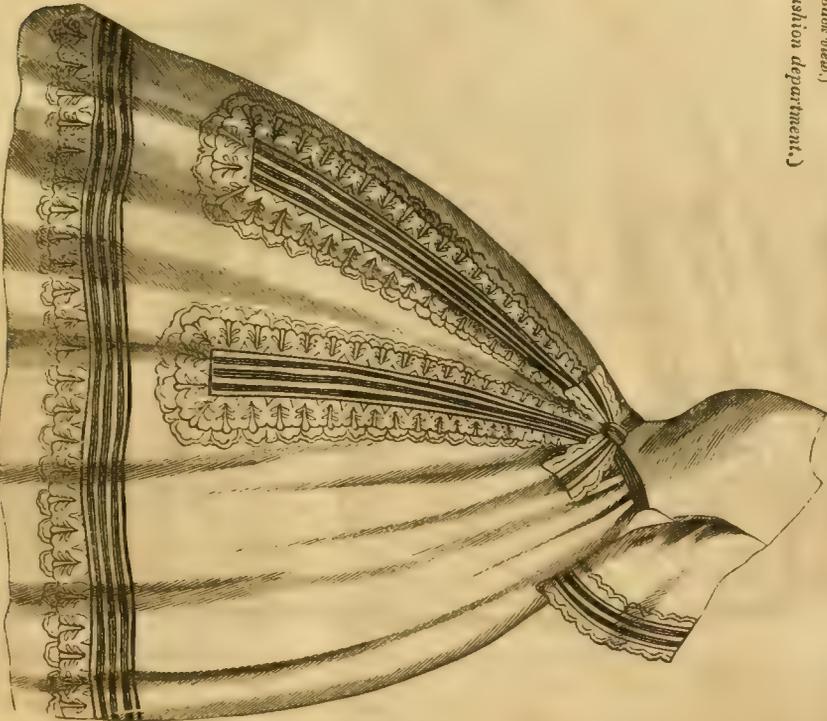

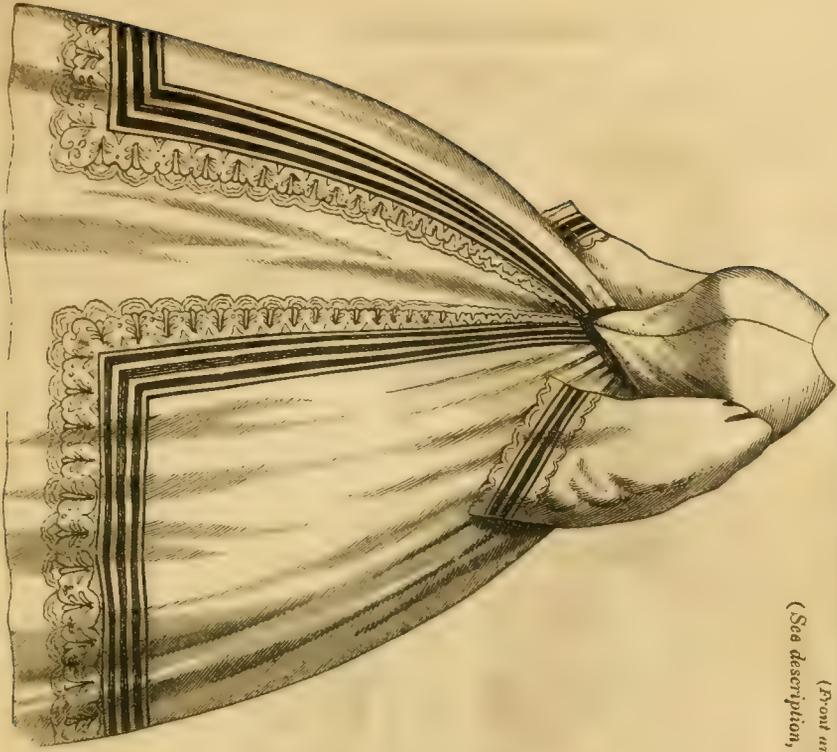

LATEST STYLE.

Dress of white grenadine, with bouquets of gay flowers thrown over it. A fluted flounce of sea-green silk is on the edge of the skirt. The tablier and corsage trimmings are also of green silk. White straw hat, trimmed with a black lace scarf and a bunch of wild flowers.

INSERTION FOR MUSLIN.

FANCY PALETOT, FOR THE COUNTRY.

It will require two and a half yards of cloth, or five yards of silk to make this paletot. Either mohair or silk braid can be used for the braiding. The two braids which form the cable should be worked at the same time, so that they may be turned over and under alternately each link. The outline only of the anchors should be braided, the inner part being formed of velvet or cloth.

EMBROIDERY.

MORNING ROBE.

Trimmed down the front with a graduated piece, scalloped on each edge, and finished with a row of insertion and magic ruffling, neatly fluted. The sleeves and sash are trimmed in the same style.

COIFFURE FOR A YOUNG LADY.

(Front and Back view.)

COIFFURE ALEXANDRA.

The hair is cut short in the front, and curled, the little curls being arranged over frizzettes to give the coiffure the shape indicated in the illustration. The rest of the hair is parted down the centre, tied on each side behind the ear, and then arranged in as many curls as it is possible so to do. Single roses and leaves are dotted here and there among the curls in front, and an ornamental comb, with a flower on each side, finishes the headdress behind.

COMB WITH HAIR ATTACHED, FOR COIFFURE ALEXANDRA.

This small illustration shows the comb with hair attached, which may be purchased, ready arranged, to match the natural hair. This has merely to be stuck in the small knot behind, and the back of the hair is dressed in less than a minute.

THE ANDALUSIAN.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

Among the pardessus of the season we think none surpass the beauty of this charming variety; the gilet gives a dash of piquancy that adds greatly to its attraction. The stuff of which it is made is taffeta, with drop buttons falling from macarons, and adorned with the universally popular braid-wrought embroidery.

GARDEN STRUCTURES.—TRELLISES.

WHETHER a garden be large or small, there are few instances in which it may not be improved by means of some sort of rustic-work, in the way of trellised arches or fences, either for the purpose of dividing one part of the garden from another, or simply as an ornament in some suitable spot. * The simplest form of trellis is a low fence composed of hazel stakes, driven into the ground in a slanting direction, with others crossing them at right angles; and these may be joined together by tying them at the top with pieces of thin copper wire, or slightly nailing them. This sort of fence answers admirably for training nasturtiums or sweet peas, which may be sown close to it, and allowed to trail over it. Such a fence will last several years; but if it is desired to make it more durable, or carry it higher, it will be necessary to make it stronger with stout posts of the required height; these should be let into the ground about two feet at regular distances. The part that is let into the ground may be made even more durable by giving it a coat of pitch, or by holding it in a fire till the part is blackened or charred, but not burned away. This has a wonderful effect in adding durability to the wood in resisting damp, which is the first thing to be guarded against. When the posts are in their places, and firmly rammed down, it is advisable to tie them together with stakes cut to the required length, and then proceed to nail hazel rods crosswise, or in any ornamental style—and this is easily suggested on the spot; it may also be a means of testing the ingenuity of the operator, as it is never advisable to copy from others in such matters, since it ought not to be lost sight of that the surroundings, which may tally well with one style, may not suit another.

Wire trellises may be got ready made, and also wire arches of neat and often elegant patterns, which have only to be fixed in their places; and these are sometimes fixed over pathways, where climbing plants are trained over them; indeed, the chief uses of trellises and rustic-work of this kind is for the purpose of supporting climbing plants—a most important section, comprising some of the most ornamental plants in cultivation, and will be sure to add an interesting feature to any garden where a little attention is given to them, and that of a suitable kind.

Garden trellises may be made both durable and exceedingly ornamental, by using suitable material, and exercising a little taste in the arrangement of it; in doing this there may be an endless diversity of form and pattern in the disposition of the smaller pieces; and, if well done, nothing adds more to the general effect of a garden, however small; but it is a too common practice to have them of deal wood, both posts and laths cut straight and planed smooth, and generally painted green, which takes off all rusticity from their appearance, until they are completely covered with such plants as are allowed to trail over them. In these structures a certain air of rusticity should be a characteristic feature, and where a person is at all capable of doing the work, it is better to do so than to employ a carpenter who does his work by line and rule. We do not think we can do better here than to copy the following from the "Gardeners' Weekly Magazine and Floricultural Cabinet," which applies very much to the point, and expresses most of what we would say:—

"The chief requisites for the structures here figured, are generally to be found growing upon the place; and if a person can only spare the time necessary for building them, there is not otherwise any great expense incurred. When well done and judiciously placed, they add exceedingly to the interesting features of a garden. The accompanying designs are to be carried out in larch poles or oak saplings, always with the bark on; they are useful for throwing across a walk at any part where a semi-division of the ground is required—where the more highly dressed portion of the ground merges into the wilderness, the fernery, the rose-garden, etc.; or may encircle any special nook set apart for any special purpose. These sorts of things will hardly look amiss anywhere, as they would be, of course, covered with climbers—as roses, honeysuckles, jasmines, pyracantha, cotoneaster, clematis, etc.; or otherwise with ivy—a class of plants, generally speaking, too little grown. The distance from column to column may be regulated according to circumstances; as also their height; but from seven to eight feet in the width of openings, and from seven to nine feet in the height of columns, will be about the best proportions; of course using the greatest height where the columns are furthest apart, and vice versa. The principal posts should be about five to seven inches in diameter, and the filling-up stuff about two inches. The iron bows over Figs. 1 and 3 are formed of round iron rods, five-eighths of an inch in diameter. Collectors of climbing plants cannot adopt a better mode of displaying them than these trellises; when covered with species and varieties of clematis, they are most beautiful ornaments to a garden."

One of the best climbing plants for trellises is jasminum nudiflora—the yellow naked flowering jasmine; it flowers freely in the winter, and makes a fine dense foliage in the summer; it will grow in any soil or situation, and requires no extra treatment beyond what is required by ordinary climbers, that is, to be neatly trained, and never allowed to make any extra growth before tying up. Clematis flamula, or the sweet-scented virgin's flower, is another climber exceedingly well adapted to cover a trellised archway; it gives out a delicious perfume when in flower, in July and August. Cotoneaster macrophylla will also give satisfaction on account of its red berries. Many sorts of roses will also be found highly ornamental when allowed to trail over arches and trellis-work; but although, as before mentioned, climbing plants ought never to be allowed to wear any appearance of neglect, and should be fastened up in time to prevent that unsightly appearance that always accompanies tying up, after allowing them to grow as they please for too long a time, still they look none the better for being trained in too closely or with any degree of formality; a certain natural and easy look about these trellis plants will always have a most pleasing effect. It would be impossible to enumerate all the various plants suitable for the purpose of clothing garden trellises with a verdant covering; they are very numerous, comprising both annuals and perennials. Of the former, tropeolums, convolvulus, cobeia scandens, etc., may be taken as examples, they being the most common. Others die down every year, as everlasting peas, and some sort of clematis; but the best are those that live on, as the honeysuckle, the jasmine, the glycine, or wistaria; and not the least worthy of note is ivy, which makes a fine evergreen wall or fence for hiding one part of the ground from another, or covering in an unsightly corner. Speaking of this, we have seen some beautiful arches built of burrs and shells, having both variegated and plain leaved ivy trailing about them, but not enough to hide the burrs and shells, yet presenting a due proportion of each, filling up in a most effective style what would otherwise be a most unsightly corner.

THE LOVER'S PRIDE.—I believe there is no period of life so happy as that in which a thriving lover leaves his mistress after his first success. His joy is more perfect than that of the absolute moment of his own eager vow, and her half-assenting blushes. Then he is thinking mostly of her, and is to a certain degree embarrassed by the effort necessary for success. But when the promise has once been given to him, and he is able to escape into the domain of his own heart, he is as a conqueror who has mastered half a continent by his own strategy. It never occurs to him, he hardly believes that his success is no more than that which is the ordinary lot of mortal man. He never reflects that all the old married fogies whom he knows and despises, have just as much ground for pride, if such pride were enduring; that every fat, silent, dull, somnolent old lady whom he sees and quizzes, has at some period been deemed as worthy a prize as his priceless galleon; and so deemed by as bold a captor as himself. Some one has said that every young mother, when her first child is born, regards the babe as the most wonderful production of that description which the world has yet seen. And this, too, is true. But I doubt even whether that conviction is so strong as the conviction of the young successful lover, that he has achieved a triumph which should ennoble him down to late generations. As he goes along he has a contempt for other men; for they know nothing of such glory as his. As he pores over his Blackstone, he remembers that he does so, not so much that he may acquire law, as that he may acquire Fanny; and then all other porers over Blackstone are low and mean in his sight—are mercenary in their views, and unfortunate in their ideas, for they have no Fanny in view.

CARRIE HARDING.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

"WHAT are you studying so earnestly, Carrie?"

"French verbs, mother. Miss Delattre said I was backward in my verbs; and, as she is so kind as to teach me her language for nothing, the least I can do is to try to be a credit to my teacher."

"Right! you are right, Carrie. Learn all you can now, it will come of use some time, be sure of that." And the widow sighed as her eye rested on the intelligent face raised to hers, regretting the limited advantages accorded to the child.

True, she went to the public school, but there were many times when Mrs. Harding's illness kept the uncomplaining little girl in her room for weeks at a time.

Mrs. Harding was the widow of a sea-captain; and of seven children, Carrie was the only one who had survived her infancy. Carrie was, at the time my story opens, in her thirteenth year, tall, but very slender, with a pale, thin face, lighted by large brown eyes, of wonderful intelligence. Accustomed from her earliest childhood to be her mother's comfort and support, her willing little hands were fitted for many a task suited to older years. To cook their simple meals, to take care of the room, and help her mother to sew were her daily tasks; and when illness came, Carrie's busy hands finished the work her mother was unable to complete, and took it home. In the same house, where Mrs. Harding rented a room, there lived an old French lady, who earned an humble livelihood by making artificial flowers. She had lived for years in this little house, and none suspected her of being born to a higher station than the one she filled; but her history was one quite common, but not less mournful on that account. She had been a lady of rank and fortune, driven from her home by the Revolution, and obliged to turn the pretty art she had learned to decorate her own rooms and vases, into a means of gaining her daily bread. From their first meeting, there had been a cordial feeling between Mrs. Harding and Miss Delattre; and the old French lady especially loved the active, handy little Carrie. She had taught her to cut and form the many-colored muslins into flowers, and was repaid by many an hour of active assistance when a large, hurried order required constant work. Then, seeing the child's love for books and study, she began to teach her her own musical language, and felt a real pleasure in hearing the well-loved accents from the fresh girlish voice.

"There! I know it!" and Carrie laid aside her book and came close to her mother's side. "Mother, do you feel sick to-night? You are so pale, and your lips look dry and parched."

"My head aches," and Mrs. Harding leaned wearily back in her chair, letting the sewing fall from her listless fingers.

Carrie placed a soft, cool hand on her mother's forehead, whispering, in low, loving accents: "Poor mamma! dear mamma! Lie down and rest!"

"No, no! this must be done to-night," said her mother, taking up the sewing.

"I will finish it! Oh dear, I can't—it is embroidery! I must learn to embroider. Oh, mamma, how I wish I could help you!"

"You do help me, Carrie. Think how little I should get done if I had to stop to run home with work, to make the bed, dust, sweep, or do all the labor my little girl does so handily."

"I will make you a cup of tea now, and see if it will not take the pain from that poor head." And, pleased with the idea of relieving her mother, Carrie hummed a merry little tune as she proceeded with her labor of love.

The tea did not prove a sufficiently powerful remedy, and Mrs. Harding was forced to lay aside the work, and resign herself to Carrie's nursing. The next morning, rising softly and dressing herself, Carrie was preparing to get breakfast, when a moan from the bed startled her. She went towards it. Mrs. Harding lay with her eyes staring wide open, a bright color in her cheeks, her lips parted, breathing heavily.

"Mamma!" said Carrie, uneasily, for she had never seen her mother look so before.

"Go away," said her mother, turning her eyes towards her daughter, without one ray of recognition in them. "Go away!"

"Go away, mamma? Will you send away your own little Carrie?" And the child bent over her, and kissed the hot cheeks.

"I tell you go away!" cried Mrs. Harding. "I know what you want. You want to persuade Harry to go to sea again without me! Harry, don't leave me! It is so lonely when you are away! Our babies are all dead, Harry; don't leave me all alone!"

The tears started into Carrie's eyes at the mournful pathos of her mother's voice, and then she drew in her breath quickly with terror, for it was the first time she had ever seen delirium. What could ail her mother!

"Mamma, dear mother, don't you know me?" she said pleadingly.

"Hush!" said her mother, "don't you hear the waves? Under the waves! far away at sea! Dead! dead! and he could not bid me good-bye. I couldn't go! They wouldn't let him take me and the baby! Carrie! Where is my baby! Did she die too?"

"I am here, mother. Your own little Carrie!" sobbed the child.

"Don't cry," said Mrs. Harding, looking earnestly at her; "don't cry. We must all die. It's only that some are called earlier than others."

Frightened now beyond her powers of control, the child left her mother's side to seek assistance. Miss Delattre answering her loud, terrified knock, accompanied her back to the room. One glance showed her how the case was, and she calmed Carrie effectually by telling her that her mother's life perhaps depended upon careful, quiet nursing. Loving, as she did, the only parent she had ever known, Carrie controlled her grief by an effort, marvellous in one so young, and started to go for a doctor.

Miss Delattre, seeing the impropriety of leaving her friend entirely in the charge of a mere child, brought the table with her articles of toil upon it, and set down to await the arrival of Carrie with the doctor.

A few days of violent illness—bitter days, during which the poor child obtained not one glance of recognition and love, and then Carrie Harding was motherless.

"She shall come into my room. I teach her my trade. She shall live with me!" said Miss Delattre, when the question how to dispose of the child came up.

These were days and nights of bitter, mournful sorrow; but, young as she was, Carrie had been taught by a pious parent where to look for comfort, and Miss Delattre, a sincere, earnest Christian herself, enforced the early lessons; and, as the elasticity of a child's mind gradually awakened to new impressions, she became cheerful, happy once more. Not that she forgot, but she let present duties fill her time, and drew her thoughts from unavailing sorrow. Many tears were shed as she and her kind old friend talked over the loved one who was gone; but they were quiet tears, and she became resigned to the will of Providence, and calm in proportion as she felt willing to submit.

Her days passed quietly, but were not without their pleasures. Miss Delattre, who loved her intensely, took her from school, to superintend, herself, her studies. It was a pleasant sight to see the old lady, with busy fingers, shaping the leaves which the child cut and handed to her, and all the while listening to the recitations the little one was giving. As French from constant intercourse with her instructor became easier, Carrie gradually fell into the habit of using it instead of her own tongue, and reciting her lessons in history or geography in her teacher's own language.

Her mother had been dead some months, when her room was taken by a gentleman, a middle aged man, with light hair and a heavy beard, whose violin and piano preceded him, and who met the child in the entry with a grunt and a nod of approval.

She gave him a sly, but graceful salutation, her eye wandering curiously to the open piano, visible through the door.

"You knows him, ha?" said the gentleman, following the glance.

"Sir?"

"You plays him?"

"No, sir!"

"You have hear him?"

"No, sir."

"Come in, come in! I plays him for you."

Carrie followed him into the room full of curiosity, wondering what the queer looking instrument could be.

The first chord made her eyes open wide with delighted surprise. A hand organ and the human voice were the only mediums through which the child had ever heard music, and this was like opening a new world. The musician, amused and pleased by the unaffected delight betokened in the eager face and large dark eyes, played one simple air after another; when he ceased, Carrie, drawing a deep breath, and unconsciously using one of her old friend's exclamations, whispered: "C'est magnifique!"

Her own delight in the music was equalled by the expression of the musician's face. "Vous parlez Francais?" he cried.

"Oui, monsieur!" said Carrie, blushing as she spoke.

The gentleman, or, we may as well give him his name, Mr. Beauvais, began eagerly to question her about her love of music, and while he appeared amazed at her ignorance of different instruments, he was delighted by the intelligence of her answers, and, above all, by her pure Parisian accent and correct use of the language. Questions, delicately put, elicited from the little girl a simple but touching account of her mother's death and her dear friend and instructor Miss Delattre. At this point of the conversation, finding he had a countrywoman in the building, the musician, discarding all ceremony, took the hand of his little friend and started to pay his respects to Miss Delattre. The rooms being directly opposite to each other, separated only by an entry, Miss Delattre had heard much of the conversation, and rose to meet her guest as he came into the room.

He introduced himself! Mons. Beauvais, first violinist of the — theatre orchestra, and her countryman.

The three neighbors were soon fast friends. Many a meal Carrie's active little fingers prepared for Mr. Beauvais, amply repaid by the uninterrupted flow of music from his violin or piano, and through the open doors the sounds of his practising made little fingers fly speedier in the pretty task of flower making, and the little old maid's heart beat with new life and energy.

One morning Mr. Beauvais had gone to rehearse, Miss Delattre was out purchasing the materials to fill a large order for flowers, and Carrie, having put both rooms in perfect order, was wandering listlessly up and down, weary with the, to her, novel weariness of nothing to do. Her eye rested on the open piano, and, crossing the entry, she sat down before it, wishing intensely that she could draw from it the sweet sounds which Mr. Beauvais' fingers called forth. With a timid hand she touched one of the keys, then another, and having run the scale with light frightened fingers, she began slowly and laboriously to pick out note by note one of her favorite airs. Finding the task rather a hopeless one, she abandoned the effort and began to hum the air. Before the arrival of the wondrous instruments of music she had often sung softly as she moved about her work, but her wonderful reverence for them had lately kept her musical efforts silent. Now, alone, and full of earnestness to hear the air she loved, she gradually allowed her voice to rise and swell, sometimes touching one of the keys, flushing with delight if it accorded with the tones of her voice. A new idea now struck her. She could not play the air, but she could sing it, and some of her notes accorded with these white and black keys. After several trials she found she could sing and play occasionally a note without interrupting the air, and with this simple, one note accompaniment, she poured forth her pure clear voice fearlessly. No miser, over a new-found treasure, ever felt his heart beat with more rapture than this child felt at her newly discovered power. Her pale cheeks flushed crimson, her eyes were raised, and her whole figure seemed expanded with rapture, as the clear notes swelled higher and higher, filling the little room with waves of melody. At last, excited, trembling with pleasure, she bent her head over the piano, and burst into tears. An exclamation behind her made her start and spring to her feet.

Mons. Beauvais stood there, and not alone. With him was a gentleman, whom she had never seen before, whose large blue eyes rested full upon her trembling figure and flushed face, as she stood silent before him.

"Is this one of your pupils, Beauvais?" he said, putting his fingers under the child's chin, and gently raising her tearful face.

"No, sare! I never heard her sing before."

"Who taught you?" said the gentleman kindly, to Carrie.

"No one, sir. They were all out, and I tried a little. I was very careful not to strike hard, and I did not wear it out much, I hope!"

Both gentlemen laughed, and glad not to be scolded for meddling, the child glided past them into her own little room.

"Beauvais, that child's a genius!" said the stranger.

"Eh, sare! I never hears her sing before!" repeated the musician, who was in truth overwhelmed with surprise at Carrie's performance.

The conversation turned upon other topics, and having settled the business which had brought him there, to the arrangements for a serenade to be given to one of his fashionable friends, Mr. Clarence Latimer went away, and wondered who that child was with such a magnificent voice, and then forgot the whole incident.

Not so Mons. Beauvais. The idea that he had lived for six months within reach of such a voice, and never heard it, confounded him. He had liked Carrie, was pleased with her attentions to himself, and her frankly expressed delight at his music, but he had never thought of taking the same place as Miss Delattre towards their little friend. Now the case seemed entirely altered, and he at once conceived the design of instructing the child, and cultivating the musical talent with which she was evidently endowed.

Words cannot describe Carrie's ecstasy when this plan was imparted to her. Her eyes filled with tears, and throwing herself on her friend's bosom, she fairly sobbed out her thanks. From that time regular hours were set apart for music.

Six years had passed since Mrs. Harding died, when it became necessary for Carrie to leave the quiet, happy seclusion in which she had heretofore lived, and go out into the great city to earn her living. Miss Delattre had taken early in the winter a severe cold, neglect of its symptoms had increased it, rheumatism came after, and finally terminated in the loss of the use of the right hand. Now was the time for Carrie to repay the years of care which the old lady had lavished upon her, and she cheerfully took up the burden.

Making flowers she soon found would not be sufficient; it was very well while there were two persons to work at it, but, alone, she found her labors would not be sufficient to support them.

She applied at the millinery establishment for which her old friend had worked for so many years, and they readily agreed to take her as a hand.

A perfect French scholar and a fine musician, it may seem strange that she did not think of these accomplishments as a means of support; but Carrie never thought of this. For every difficulty that she conquered in music, her instructor supplied another to be surmounted, and the young girl really felt that her progress was slow, and would have urged her own incompetency, had any one suggested to her to teach the art in which she was so promising a pupil; and, as for French, so natural was it now for her to use it, that she did not think of it as an accomplishment. She would as soon have thought of priding herself upon speaking English correctly.

Mrs. Manners, the principal of the milliner's store in which Carrie now worked, placed her as saleswoman in the show room. Her childish leanness of contour had vanished with her growth, the thin face was now a beautiful oval, the pale complexion, still white and smooth, was tinged with a healthful color, and a profusion of rich brown hair shaded the broad white forehead. Tall, graceful, and beautiful, with a natural refinement, improved by her intercourse with her old French friend, Carrie was a most valuable acquisition in the show room, especially as a native modesty, fostered by her secluded life, made her unobtrusive and respectful. Her evenings were devoted to music and the society of her friend.

"Carrie, can you spare time to alter the arrangement of these flowers?" said Mrs. Manners, coming into the show room with an exquisite crape hat in her hand. "Mrs. Latimer wishes to have them higher up, and the girls are so hurried just now."

"Certainly; give it to me. How stiff they are!" And with quick, skilful fingers, Carrie took off the flowers, and began to reshape them.

"Don't! you will tear them to pieces!" cried Mrs. Manners.

"Tear them to pieces!" said Carrie, smiling. "Why, I have spent nearly all my life making flowers! There! Is not that better?"

"Beautiful! There, put them in. Here comes Mrs. Latimer, and—why, bless me, she has got our new neighbor, the rich French lady who lives around the corner. If I can secure her custom I'm a made milliner; for, I think, she wears a new bonnet every time she goes out."

Mrs. Latimer, a tall, elderly lady, entered the salesroom, accompanied by another lady about her own age, dressed with exquisite taste, and with a mild, benevolent face once seen never to be forgotten.

After duly admiring the change in her new hat, wrought by Carrie's skilful fingers, Mrs. Latimer introduced Madame de Villa, and, pleading an engagement, hurried away, leaving her friend to make her own selections. A difficulty now arose, which Carrie, occupied in another part of the room, did not at first perceive. Mrs. Manners could speak nothing but English; Madame de Villa, nothing but French. Weary at last with the fruitless effort to understand her customer, Mrs. Manners turned away, saying:—

"Dear me! how provoking to lose such a rich customer, just because I can't speak French!"

Carrie caught the words, and coming to Madame de Villa, requested her order in French. Mrs. Manners was surprised, but gratified; and through the medium of this willing interpreter, the orders were clearly delivered.

"Call at my house this afternoon, and I will give you the flowers for the bonnet," said Madame de Villa to Carrie, as she left.

"Will you go?" said Mrs. Manners. "I know it is not exactly your place, but the errand-girl would never understand her."

"Certainly, I will go," said Carrie.

When she made the promised call, Madame de Villa sent for her to come up into her dressing-room. The young girl's eyes would rove with a natural curiosity over furniture, dresses, and bijouterie, such as she had never seen before; but she listened attentively to the directions for the disposal of the flowers.

Hearing her own tongue from such a musical voice, and with such a pure accent from a beautiful girl, who, simply attired, acted as saleswoman in a store, naturally roused Madame de Villa's curiosity; and, courteously requesting Carrie to be seated, she began to question her, and in a short time drew from her her simple history.

"Why do you not teach French?" she asked. "You say you have studied the grammar thoroughly; your accent is pure and your idioms correct."

"I should not know where to apply for scholars," said Carrie. "I have no friends excepting Mons. Beauvais and Miss Delattre, and they have lived very secluded."

"Well, well, we will see!" said Madame de Villa, and Carrie, understanding that the interview was over, took her leave.

The next morning she was standing in the show-room alone, when Mrs. Latimer came in.

"Miss Harding," she said, coming abruptly to the point, "I have been talking to Madame de Villa about you, and she says you are competent to teach French. I have been looking out for a French teacher for my daughter, and having ascertained from Mrs. Manners that the story you told yesterday was true—there, don't blush, we never doubted it—I have come to engage your services. As I know that one scholar alone will not support you, I propose to get more. Come to my house on Wednesday evening next; I am going to have a party, and I will introduce you to some of my friends who have children, and we will try to make you a class. There, not a word. You are a good girl, or Mrs. Manners would never speak of you as she does. Be sure you come on Wednesday. Stay! I will send for you. What is your address?"

Carrie gave it, and Mrs. Latimer left her. Invited to a party at one of the largest houses in the city, and by one of its most elegant leaders of fashion, Carrie was half afraid she was dreaming.

As soon as she reached home, she spoke of her new opening in life to Miss Delattre, or Aunt Elise, as she always called her.

"You must go, my dear! you must go!" said the old lady, decidedly. "Open the lower drawer in that bureau, and bring me a large roll you will find there."

Carrie obeyed. When opened, the roll contained many rich dresses, relics of the little old maid's former state, but one and another was rejected. One was too dark, another faded, and all were too small, while the difference between the stature of the tall graceful girl, and her little old friend, made any alteration a hopeless task. With a sigh, the roll was placed again in the drawer.

"Oh," said Carrie, suddenly, "I know what will do. I remember a roll of white muslin father sent to mother before I was born, which she always persisted was too rich for her to wear. It is in her trunk; I will get it. I have often seen it," and Carrie turned eagerly to the trunk.

The muslin proved to be a rich India muslin heavily wrought, yellow, but otherwise in perfect order. Soap, water, and a hot sun soon bleached it white, and Carrie made it up.

The anxiously expected evening came, and, when dressed, Carrie looked like some bright spirit in the little room. For the first time in her life she wore a dress which, fitting her form perfectly, left her arms and shoulders uncovered. It fell, this snowy drapery, in full soft folds round her, and was untrimmed, save by a lace hunted up from Miss Delattre's stock, which partially shaded the round white arms. Wreathed in with her dark chestnut curls, were clusters of jessamine, made by her own skilful fingers, and her beautiful face needed no ornament of jewels to set it off. The carriage sent by Mrs. Latimer came early, and, with many good wishes from her two friends, Carrie started for the party.

The dressing room, filled with gay laughing girls, gave her an uneasy sensation; she felt so lost and lonely in this crowd of strangers, but, throwing aside her shawl, and smoothing her hair with her hands, she descended the broad staircase to find her hostess.

Many admiring eyes followed her graceful figure as she threaded her way among the crowd, but she did not know it. Mrs. Latimer received her kindly, herself astonished at the wondrous beauty of the young girl in her becoming dress, and Madame de Villa took her young protégée under her own especial charge. The blaze of light, rich dresses, and splendid apartment were like dream land to the young girl, but native ease took the place of custom, and no awkward stare or gesture marked the novice. She was still chatting with Madame de Villa, not hearing the inquiries made to Mrs. Latimer about the beautiful French girl, when the hostess came up with a face full of vexation.

"Is it not too provoking?" she said; "Mr. B. has brought his violin to play for us, and all his music is in duets. His friend Mr. L., who was to play second violin, has sent a regret, and so we lose our music."

Carrie listened, and then said timidly: "If it is not very difficult, I can play it for you."

"Play the violin!" cried the astonished lady.

"I can play a little!"

The music was brought to her, and one glance showed it to be within her power. An instrument lay upon the piano, and Carrie, taking it up, pronounced herself ready to assist Mr. B. The celebrated musician cast one half contemptuous glance at his proposed assistant, but took his violin, and, nodding to her, began to play. The contemptuous expression changed to one of quiet satisfaction as they proceeded. Perfect time, accuracy and expression characterized Carrie's performance. Unconscious that she was doing anything extraordinary, only anxious to give her hostess the pleasure of hearing the great violinist, she played her part, as it should be played, secondary to her companion. As the last note died on the air, murmurs of applause greeted them, but Carrie never dreamed that any of these were intended for her.

Mr. B., turning to her, complimented her highly upon her performance, and, taking another piece from his pile, asked her if she could play the accompaniment. It was for piano and violin, and Carrie gave a ready assent. She was even more at home here than with the violin, and the performance went off with great success.

"You sing?" said Mr. B., as she finished. He seemed to wish to engross the young girl entirely.

"Yes."

"Sing!" he said, abruptly, and Carrie complied.

There was no wish for display in all this. Remembering the intense delight she herself felt in hearing music, she hoped that, in a less degree, she was imparting the same pleasure. Her instrumental performances had been purely mechanical, but now the genius in her own soul shone forth. As she sang, the murmurs of conversation through the room were hushed, and all crowded to the piano. Clear, pure, and true came the notes, and full of power and richness rose the fresh young voice. Now, as the song required, dying away in trills, growing fainter and fainter, then coming back in prolonged full notes, filling the whole room with music. As she finished, a deep hush was over all that crowded room, for it seemed more than human, that glorious young voice. Mr.

B.'s eyes were full of tears, so powerfully had this affected him; and, still perfectly ignorant that she had done anything worthy of especial notice, the young girl glided back to her seat beside Madame de Villa.

Gentlemen were introduced to her, but after a few moments' chat, shrugged their shoulders, voted her a mere musical machine, and left her. Why? She had never been to the opera, knew none of the celebrities, and had no small talk. One only exception there was to this rule. One gentleman, Mrs. Latimer's only son, kept his place beside her. He knew her history, and instead of talking on the chit-chat of society, he began to discuss books and music. Here Carrie was in her element. Mr. Beauvais had a good library of French literature, and knowing as he did many men of letters, he had from time to time borrowed standard works in her own language for the young girl's perusal, and also to improve his own knowledge of English.

Modest and quiet, Carrie still chatted with ease and grace, and Clarence was amazed at the information her remarks displayed.

"Do you remember," he said, suddenly, "the first time you ever tried to play?"

"Yes, indeed," said Carrie, smiling; "I was caught in the act by Mr. Beauvais and another gentleman. I do not remember his face, for I was too much frightened to look up; but he had a gentle touch and a sweet voice."

"Thank you," said Clarence, laughing. "I prophesied then that you had genius, and my predictions are fulfilled."

"You! was it you?"

"I, myself," was the gay answer. "Tell me, now, how you enjoy this evening?"

"Oh, so much," said Carrie, "particularly the piano"—and she glanced at the grand piano on which her fingers had lingered with such a loving touch. "It don't jingle like ours, and the pedal does not creak."

"Rather important advantages," said Clarence. "So you enjoy the piano?"

"Indeed I do. And I like to talk to you, too," she added, frankly. "You know so much. How I should like to travel as you have done, and see all you have seen."

Clarence had too much tact to embarrass her by noticing the compliment, but he fully appreciated it.

All pleasant things must have an end, and at midnight, according to promise, Carrie went home. She bade Mrs. Latimer and Madame de Villa good-night, and glided away, leaving the gayety in full bloom. Clarence accompanied her; and asking permission to call, left her at her own door. Think how odd it seemed for such a girl as that, to live in a little room in the third story of a small house in a narrow court.

The next day Carrie took a grateful leave of her kind friend, Mrs. Manners, and entered upon her duties as a teacher. The eclat of her introduction, and the announcement of the fact that Mrs. Latimer intended to place her daughter under her instruction for both French and music, gave her a start in this line, and in a few weeks her time was entirely filled up at good prices.

She was glad to change her former life for the present one, as it gave her more time to be at home, and her Aunt Elise seemed every day to need her care more. The old lady, in her little room, watched for the bright young face, and hungered for the cheerful voice that made the music of her home. No invitation to dine or sup in the houses where she taught, could keep Carrie away at the hours when she knew Miss Delattre was waiting for her to prepare her simple meals, and no daughter's hand could have more gently and kindly fed the cripple. Her first party was the only indulgence of this kind she permitted herself to take. Many invitations were extended; but she remembered her old friend's words when she returned—

"Oh, I am so glad to see you! I have been so lonely all the evening. Mr. Beauvais was at the theatre, and it was very dull."

And Carrie, thinking only of the immense debt of gratitude she owed her old friend, resolved never to call forth the same complaint of loneliness again.

Madame de Villa was the young girl's constant friend. Books, music, paintings, all were placed within her reach, and the French lady delighted in her young protégée. One morning, calling to get a book to read in the evenings to Miss Delattre, Carrie was surprised to find Madame de Villa making preparations for a journey.

"Ah, Carrie!" she said, looking up as the young girl entered. "I was going to send for you. Sit down, and listen to me. I am going to France, going to live there, and I want you to go with me. Not," she continued, mistaking the young girl's expression of dismay, "not as a companion or a subordinate, but as my child, my adopted daughter, to whom at my death I shall will all my property. I love you, Carrie!" and she drew her into a close embrace. "I am widowed and childless; you shall be my child."

For a few moments surprise kept Carrie silent; then she said: "Oh, you are too kind, too good, but I cannot!"

"Cannot! why?"

"I cannot leave Aunt Elise. She depends upon my labors for her daily bread. Could I leave her to starve?"

"My dear child, do not accuse me of such an inhuman idea! I will leave an ample income for Miss Delattre."

"But she is a cripple; she cannot live alone."

"I will pay some one to attend to her; so make your mind easy about that."

"Pay some one! Oh, Madame de Villa, can hired hands be to her what mine are? Can paid services take the place of those dictated by love alone? She loves me, and the separation would kill her. You are kind, and I am very, very grateful; but I cannot leave Aunt Elise!"

"But, my child, I will make you rich, and you can send her superb presents. She is no relation to you—has no real claim upon you."

"No real claim upon me! She has been more than a mother to me since my own died. Parent, teacher, friend. All I am I owe to her. Could you expect me to be a grateful, dutiful child to you, if I repaid her by deserting her in her lonely, crippled old age?"

"You are right! Go back to her. I will write to you often; and remember if her death releases you, you are to be mine, my child."

A long loving conversation followed, and then Carrie returned home.

Miss Delattre was seated in her arm-chair near the window when Carrie entered, and a gush of emotion flooded the young girl's eyes as she pictured her waiting thus for one who would never come. Crossing the room softly, she knelt down beside her old friend, and looked up lovingly into her face.

"Carrie, Carrie," softly sighed Miss Delattre, stroking back the rich dark hair from the fair forehead. "I think you have been gone a great while."

"I was detained at Madame de Villa's."

"Did you get a new book?"

"No, auntie, I forgot it. Madame de Villa is going home to France. She starts for New York this afternoon."

"Going home! France, dear France!" and the invalid's fingers fluttered. "Home to France!" and then a deep silence fell on the two. Carrie, leaning her head against the arm-chair, thought over her long conversation with Madame de Villa, and the invalid went in fancy across the water to "dear France."

The next afternoon, when Miss Julia Latimer was taking her singing lesson, her brother Clarence strolled into the parlor. It was the first time Carrie had seen him since the eventful party, and she returned his graceful bow, with smiling pleasure.

"Do go away, Claire, while I take my lesson," said his sister.

"I shall not disturb you," was the reply, and he sat down near the window.

The lesson was over, but Sophie, Carrie's other scholar, was out, though expected home every minute. Julie, glad to run away, left the room, and Clarence joined Carrie at the piano. No idea of impropriety disturbed the young girl. She was waiting for a pupil. Mr. Latimer surely had a right to remain in his own parlor, and the time would be less tedious in company than alone.

"Do you still retain your love for this piano?" said Clarence.

"As the first really fine instrument I ever touched, I certainly love it," was Carrie's reply.

"I never heard you play except to accompany a duet or the voice; will you favor me now?"

"Certainly! I must wait till Sophie comes. Give me a subject?"

"A subject?"

"I had rather improvise than play from memory. Mous. Beauvais always gave me a subject at every lesson."

"She does not seem aware that there is any genius required for that," thought Clarence, amused at her simple business-like tone; aloud he said: "Take memory, Miss Harding."

"Memory, whose? mine?"

"Yes."

For an instant she was silent, then she said in a low tone: "My first recollection is my mother's lament over my father's death at sea."

Low, quivering notes softly glided into a murmuring like rippling water, growing deeper and stronger as, forgetting her listener, the young girl's imagination pictured a storm at sea. Gradually the deep sonorous chords, and rapid sweeping, like wind, among the keys, died away, and joining her voice, a wailing dirge for the lost sailor filled the room; then more slowly, solemnly rose a hymn for her mother. Gliding softly from sad strains, little scraps of the negro airs she had first learned from the hand organs followed, and then her face flushed and her eyes shone as she recalled Mons. Beauvais' first meeting with her. Looking earnestly forward, her fingers gradually drawing out sounds of unparalleled sweetness and melody, she burst suddenly into a song of praise. There were no words, yet Clarence knew she was recalling the day when she first tested her own musical powers. The rich glorious voice filled the air around him, and the joyousness of the song made him almost long to join his voice with hers, when she was recalled from her dreams, he from his ecstasy, by—

"I am ready for my lesson, Miss Harding!"

Little Sophie, Mrs. Latimer's youngest child, had, all unperceived by Carrie or Clarence, come in, taken off shawl and bonnet, and now stood ready for her lesson.

Thoughtfully, his heart full of that glorious music, Clarence left them, feeling that his sister's childish strumming would be unendurable after Carrie's performance.

That same evening, while Carrie sat at her aunt's feet reading aloud, there came a tap at the door. She opened it, to find Mr. Latimer standing there.

"May I hope I am not intruding?" he said; "you gave me permission to call, on the evening when I escorted you home from my mother's. I have been out of town, or I should have availed myself of it sooner."

"Walk in," said Carrie. "Aunt Elise, this is Mr. Latimer, the gentleman I spoke of you about."

Clarence spoke to the old lady in her own tongue, and accepted Carrie's offered seat. His call was a long one. Having lately visited France, he could give Miss Delattre intelligence of scenes and people, from whom she never expected to hear again, yet although attentive to her, his eye took in the neat arrangement of the simple furniture and the graceful figure sewing near the table.

"You will come again, come often," said Miss Delattre as he rose to go.

"Thank you for permission to do so," he said. There were few tête à tête's after this for Carrie and her old friend. Some time in the evening, if only to stay long enough to bring some flowers or a book, Clarence came in, often remaining for hours, reading aloud while Carrie sewed, or chatting with Miss Delattre of the never wearying subject—France. Coming home from long walks and patience tasking lessons, Carrie learned to listen for the well-known knock, and cheerful voice at the door, welcoming both with frank pleasure.

Coming home one day at dinner time, she was surprised at having no answer to her cheery good-day, from her aunt, and looking up saw that the old lady's head was thrown back, her mouth partly open, her eyes fixed and glassy. A loud cry of terror brought Mons. Beauvais to her side, but all help now was useless. Miss Delattre was dead.

With this grief still weighing bitterly upon her, a new trial came. Mrs. Latimer visited her, paid her bill for her daughter's tuition, withdrew them from Carrie's care, and then heaped upon the young girl's head the bitterest reproaches for her "shameless conduct with regard to Clarence."

"My conduct! My brain is confused with sorrow and surprise! What have I done?"

"It is too late to feign ignorance, Miss Harding," said Mrs. Latimer, severely. "I little thought my kindness to you would meet with such base ingratitude. Have not you and your aunt tried to inveigle my son, one of the first young men in the city, into marrying you—a music teacher?"

Carrie stood erect, with flashing eye and flushed cheek. "You mistake, madam. That your son has sought me, loves me, is true. That I return his love is also true; for, unaccustomed to let worldly calculations influence my heart, I gave him my love freely, as he offered his. He has asked me to be his bride; but"—and she drew a ring from her finger, and placed it in Mrs. Latimer's hand—"you will return this, telling him why I send it. I"—and she drew herself up proudly—"I enter no family where I am unwelcome." And she bent her head with queenly grace, and left the room, crossing the entry to remain with Mons. Beauvais till Mrs. Latimer saw fit to depart, which she did soon, glad to have got through her errand without the expected fit of tears and hysterics.

Furious with generous indignation, Clarence flew to Carrie that evening, after hearing his mother's story. She was gone. Mons. Beauvais could not or would not give any clue to her whereabouts; and, after weeks spent in fruitless search, Clarence finally relinquished the pursuit in despair.

Three years passed away. Clarence was on a visit to New York when an invitation was sent to him to join a large fancy party; the note concluded thus:—

"Amongst our other guests, my mother has invited a new belle, a French lady, heiress to an immense fortune, who is on a visit to America with her guardian. Be sure to come.

"HENRY."

The rooms were crowded when Clarence came in, and the usual mixture of costumes belonging to such a scene prevailed. His own dress of a friar was too modest to attract much notice, and he mingled in the crowd.

"Have you seen the fortune-teller?" said a pretty blonde, who accepted his arm for a promenade. "All the gentlemen are crazy about her, and she will not unmask. Ah! there she is!"

Clarence looked in the direction indicated. A tall, graceful girl was leaning against a marble pedestal, toying with some flowers upon it, and conversing with two gentlemen. She was dressed in black velvet, richly embroidered in gold. The dress, open in front, left exposed a vest of white satin buttoned with large pearl buttons, and rich lace closed with a diamond pin at the throat. Upon her head was a long, rich, black lace veil, and her mask covered all her face save her mouth, which could be seen through its lace edge, while two large dark eyes shone through the holes in the mask.

"Ah," said one of the gentlemen, looking up, "there! comes Clarence Latimer. Now, Lady Sorceress, for a new trait of skill."

The lady did not answer, her graceful head being bent low over the flowers.

"Come, Claire, and have your fortune told," said both gentlemen, in gay tones.

Clarence bowed to the stately lady, who turned her eyes full upon his face.

"You have known trouble," she said, in a deep voice; "the lines on your face tell that."

"Trouble!" said one of the gentlemen, gayly. "I think your skill is failing you. Why, Clarence Latimer is the envy of half his friends."

"Yet he has known trouble through poverty and obscurity."

"It is clear you have mistaken the person," continued the young man, son of the hostess for the evening.

"No, I do not mistake!" was the answer.

"It was not his own poverty, but that of one—"

"Hush! hush!" said Clarence, in a low tone; "do not name her here."

"Then you have not forgotten her?" said the lady, in the same low voice. The rest of the group left the two together.

"Forgotten! Never!"

"I can give you tidings of her."

"You can?" said the young man, eagerly. "Where is she? Is she near, or far away? Alas! I fear poor and friendless now!"

"Not so. Through the death and liberal will of one who adopted her after her aged friend's death, she is now in the highest society in Paris, and rich enough to"—and her voice took a tone of bitter irony—"satisfy even your mother."

"Lost! lost!" said Clarence, in a low, sad tone. "Had she been in trouble, seas could not have divided us; but now she might justly despise me if I sought her."

"Not so! I know her well: she cannot forget, cannot cease to love one who won her heart when her friends were few, and who would have married her despite her station. But she is proud; she cannot seek one whose family cast her off."

"Gently," said Clarence, "gently! My mother is dead."

"Are you confessing to this reverend friar?" said a gay voice behind the two.

"Not yet," said the sorceress, taking Clarence's arm. "Will you promenade with me, Mr. Latimer?" She gently led him to the conservatory. Then, when they were alone, Clarence said in an agitated voice:—

"Tell me, who are you?"

"Mademoiselle de Villa, the adopted child and heiress of your mother's old friend, but"—and she took off her mask—"better known to you as Carrie Harding."

So Clarence, of all the suitors to the French heiress was the successful one, though all the disappointed ones declared they could not make it out "why he was introduced at Mrs. Mason's fancy ball just one week before he was married."

THE MARVELS AND MYSTERIES OF A SEED.

HAVE you ever considered how wonderful a thing the seed of a plant is? It is the miracle of miracles. God said, "Let there be 'plants yielding seed,'" and it is further added, each one "after his kind."

The great naturalist, Cuvier, thought that the germs of all past, present, and future generations of seeds were contained one within the other, as if packed in a succession of boxes. Other learned men have explained this mystery in a different way. But what signify all their explanations? Let them explain it as they will, the wonder remains the same, and we must still look upon the reproduction of the seed as a continual miracle.

Is there upon earth a machine, is there a palace, is there even a city, which contains so much that is wonderful as is inclosed in a single seed—one grain of corn, one little brown apple-seed, one small seed of a tree—picked up, perhaps, by a bird for her little ones—the smallest seed of a poppy or a bluebell, or even one of the seeds that float about in the air invisible to our eyes! There is a world of marvels and brilliant beauties hidden in each of these tiny seeds. Consider their immense number, the perfect separation of the different kinds, their power of life and resurrection, and their wonderful fruitfulness!

Consider, first, their number. About a hundred and fifty years ago, the celebrated Linnæus, "the father of Botany," reckoned about 8,000 different kinds of plants; and he then thought that the whole number existing could not much exceed 10,000. But, a hundred years after him, M. de Candolle, of Geneva, described 40,000 kinds of plants; and at a later period he counted 60,000, then 80,000, and he supposed it possible that the number might even amount to 100,000.

Well, let us ask, have these 100,000 kinds of plants ever failed to bear the right seed? Have they ever deceived us? Has a seed of wheat ever yielded barley, or a seed of a poppy grown up into a sunflower? Has a sycamore-tree ever sprung from an acorn, or a beech-tree from a chestnut? A little bird may carry away the small seed of a sycamore in its beak to feed its nestlings, and, on the way, may drop it on the ground. The tiny seed may spring up and grow where it fell, unnoticed, and sixty years after it may become a magnificent tree, under the shade of which the flocks of the valleys and their shepherds may rest.

Consider next the wonderful power of life and resurrection bestowed on the seeds of plants, so that they may be preserved from year to year, and even from century to century.

Let a child put a few seeds in a drawer, and shut them up, and sixty years afterward, when his hair is white and his step tottering, let him take one of these seeds and sow it in the ground, and, soon after, he will see it spring up into new life, and become a young, fresh, and beautiful plant.

M. Jouannet relates that in the year 1835 several old Celtic tombs were discovered near Bergorac. Under the head of each of the dead bodies there was found a small square stone or brick, with a hole in it, containing a few seeds, which had been placed there beside the dead by the heathen friends who had buried them, perhaps 1,500 or 1,700 years before. These seeds were carefully sowed by those who found them—and what, think you, was seen to spring up from this dust of the dead?—beautiful sunflowers, blue corn-flowers, and clover, bearing blossoms as bright and sweet as those woven into wreaths by merry children playing in the fields.

Some years ago a vase, hermetically sealed, was found in a mummy-pit in Egypt, by Wilkinson, who sent it to the British Museum. The librarian there having unfortunately broken it, discovered in it a few grains of wheat and one or two peas, old, wrinkled, and as hard as stone. The peas were planted carefully under glass on the 4th of June, 1844, and, at the end of thirty days, these old seeds were seen to spring up into new life. They had been buried probably about 3,000 years ago (perhaps in the time of Moses), and had slept all that long time, apparently dead, yet still living, in the dust of the tomb.

Is not the springing of the seed an emblem of the resurrection of the dead? Accordingly it is mentioned by the Apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. xv., where, from the springing of the seed, he explains the doctrine of the resurrection unto life.

THE RAIN.

BY EARNEST BEALLE.

MERRILY, mournfully, pattering still,
 Falling like dew on the flowers,
 Singing, and sighing, and moaning at will,
 Falleth the rain all the hours;
 Dancing so merrily over the eaves,
 Falling like music's refrain,
 Hiding its gems in the heart of the leaves,
 Merrily falleth the rain.

Falling and falling cheerily still,
 It kisses the lilies' white breast;
 Over the meadows it wanders at will,
 Lulling the blue-bells to rest.
 Merrily, cheerily falleth the rain
 Over the country and town,
 Like the soft murmur of music's refrain,
 The fairy-like rain cometh down.

The rain, the rain, the beautiful rain,
 Sadly and sweetly it falls,
 To the souls of the dead, where the grass groweth green,
 In sweet spirit voices it calls;
 It makes, with its murmurs of beautiful grief,
 The flowers to blow o'er each head,
 And by its sweet treasures of rose-bud and leaf
 Makes lovely the homes of the dead.

The rain, the rain, the beautiful rain,
 The merrily, mournfully falling,
 The echo of footsteps that fall not again,
 Strange voices to earth ever calling;
 The whisper of magic that maketh the buds
 In beauty and frailty to glow,
 The message of mercy to man from his God,
 Proclaiming "All peace be below."

THE CHILD'S DREAM.

BY S. E. H.

"MAMMA, I've had a sweet, sweet dream:
 I thought the spring was come,
 And, standing by a cool bright stream,
 I heard the brown bees hum.

"The countless sands beneath my feet
 Seemed drops of yellow gold,
 And the wind that toss'd my hair was sweet
 With odors manifold.

"And oh, mamma, you cannot think
 How gay the blossoms grew!
 A host upon the river's brink
 Were clad in white and blue.

"While others stretched across the wood,
 And up the hillside wound,
 As if a bunch of rainbows had Been flung upon the ground.

"And as I watched in ecstasy
 Their bright heads toss and flare,
 A stream of sweetest melody
 Came surging through the air.

"And oh, mamma, it soared and rang,
 And seemed the sky to fill;
 An Eden seraph must have sang
 Above that flowery hill.

"And while I knelt with strange sweet awe
 I ne'er had felt before,
 These words came mingling with the song,
 And echoed down the shore:

"Sweet child! no strife, nor fear, nor care,
 Hath aught to do with thee—
 Thou art too pure to see or share
 The false world's falsity!

"And, bright-haired darling! ere the sun
 Another round shall take,
 Thou'lt stand where sorrows never come,
 Where pure hearts never break!

"And then the music, soft and low,
 Died out along the stream;
 The landscape faint and fainter grew,
 I woke—and 'twas a dream!

"But deep within my heart I know
 The angel's words were true;
 And, mother, I would joy to go
 If you were going too.

"And you will come ere many years;
 This world is fleeing fast—
 Oh, mother, why those bitter tears?
 We'll meet above at last!"

* * * * *

When twilight's clouds of purple hue
 Sailed o'er the far of sky,
 That child with dreamy eyes of blue,
 Lay sweetly down to die.

And ere with morn's first gush of song
 The eastern hills were rife,
 He stood amid that shining throng
 Beside the stream of life!

THE NIECE OF JUDGE HUMPHREYS.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

It was something very unusual, but that morning Mary Humphreys had a headache; not one of that kind which throbs with its fierce heats through the temples, and fires the brain, and tortures every nerve with its sharp baptismal of pain—nothing of that sort had ever seized on the pretty head of Mary Humphreys, but it ached, nevertheless, with a dull, slow, heavy ache, that made her long-lashed eyelids droop over a pair of eyes like amethyst, and quenched somewhat the half blossomed roses that always seemed on the point of opening wide and bright in the cheeks of this girl of whom I am to tell you.

She was an only daughter, and her father, Doctor Samuel Humphreys, was the oldest physician in Woodleaf, and belonged to one of the oldest families in the fine old town. Indeed, the Humphreys have always prided themselves on their fine old stock, and the doctor seemed to combine all the best qualities of his race. He was a man of high cultivation, of warm, broad, generous nature, of instincts and sympathies fine as a woman's; a Christian gentleman; and this Christianity, which was, with the old doctor, a living, abiding principle, permeated his whole life, and softened the laughtiness and exclusiveness which manifested itself in the other members of his family. Mary was like her father. Her mother was a woman gentle, sweet, lovable, a true home wife and mother; whose rare and delicate beauty, faded now, was a type of her character. Mary inherited her father's force, his warm, quick, impulsive nature, which her twenty-three years had not yet controlled and disciplined.

The holidays were just over, and the doctor's daughter had taken an active part in the Christmas festivals, in the dressing of the Christmas tree in the old gray stone church; and the late nights and the exciting work had at last proved too much for even Mary's elastic youth and nerves.

"You want rest, my dear, for a day—that is all; you'll be right to-morrow," said the doctor, as he looked at the drooping face of his darling, and handed her a sedative he had just mixed. "Take that instead of the sleigh-ride I intended to give you to-day."

"Oh, father, you're not going down to the Run this dreadful morning!" said Mrs. Humphreys with a deprecatory tone and face, as she came into the sitting-room, and saw her husband drawing on his gloves.

"This dreadful morning! This glorious morning, you mean, my dear, with the pines drooping, heavy with the white lilies of snow they've gathered over night; and the branches of every tree thick with crystals, that remind one of Aaron's rod which blossomed all over."

"O, Samuel, you have your old way of putting things!" said Mrs. Humphreys, with a smile which retained somewhat of the beauty of her youth.

"It's the right way, mamma," said Mary, with eyes cast, brimful of pride and tenderness, on her father, who was a man that any wife and child might be proud of.

The doctor kissed the two women, then went out, and his sleigh cut the first line in the white flannel of snow which clothed the principal street of Woodleaf that winter morning. The ride to the Run was a long one, but the doctor's patients there were a family poor and sick. That was enough. Mary Humphreys walked up and down the room awhile, looking out of the window, and marvelled at the miracle which had clothed the earth—the earth, which had waited bare and patient for it, through the slow December; and now, in the sunlight, the branches were glorified with clusters of pearl and opal, and the grove of pines on the left crowned its green plumes with snow that looked like a surf of lilies.

Mary was in a softened, susceptible mood that morning, for pain has likewise its mission, and her sweet eyes searched in the snow, and found in its whiteness and purity, wrapping up the blank, sodden, uncomely winter earth, a type of the Eternal love, and wisdom, and power from whence it came. At last the sedative soothed the pain in her head; she turned from the window, and sat down before the grate fire, and watched the bright jets of flame, and compared them to glowing leaves bursting suddenly out of the dark soil of coal beneath.

And as she sat there, in her dreamy, convalescing state of mind and body, the door opened suddenly, without even a preliminary knock, and a young man entered the room. He was dark, tall, with a fine, not handsome face, which had some subtle likeness to Mary's, a good manly face, a rapid, nervous figure; and always the bearing of a gentleman. But his face was white, now, and agitated. No one could doubt that he was laboring under deep, but well-disciplined emotion; there was something that bordered on desperation in his eyes, but a purpose, deliberately made, one that would be followed to the death, had concentrated itself about his lips.

"George, what is the matter?" stammered Mary, as she rose up, for she felt at once that her cousin brought her evil tidings.

He was the son of Judge Humphreys, her father's brother, a gentleman of the old school, with all the pride and obstinacy of the old, dead Humphreys. With a deep-seated pride in his good name and position, a man with many good qualities, but one whose purposes and convictions it was not pleasant to encounter.

The young man sat down, and looked at her a moment without answering a word. There was something in his eyes which drew out Mary's heart, and George had always been to her in place of the elder brother God took in his boyhood; for the cousin and the brother were both of one age, just four years Mary's seniors. At last the young man spoke.

"What is the matter, did you say, Mary? Perhaps I had better leave it for others to tell as I first intended. You will know soon enough."

She put her little hand on his arm in the pretty sisterly way that was like her. "It is something that concerns you—that troubles you, George; and so I had rather hear it from your lips."

He looked at her again, and she saw the desperate gleam banish from the eyes; and they flamed with something that at another time George Humphreys would have turned away his head that she should not see. "It is the same sweet, bright, pitiful face that it always was, Mary," he said; "the face that I always believed in, trusted, and loved, too, better than all faces in the world—all but one. It will be very hard, very strange to see it grow cold, and darken down on me; but it will not shake my purpose, not for a moment." And now the old gleam drank up the tears in the eyes of George Humphreys, and he ground his teeth together.

"George, George, what is the matter?" some vague fear taking hold of the doctor's daughter and chilling her from head to foot.

He did not delay his answer now. "This is the matter, Mary: My father has this morning turned me from his house forever, and forbade me to look upon his face, because I have disgraced him, and dishonored his name!" He fairly hurled out the words at her, in a stern, defiant way, that for the moment took no thought of their effect.

But the shock for the moment was too much. She leaned her head back, faint and sick. Her cousin was at her side in a moment, chafing her hands.

"Forgive me, Mary! I didn't think you would take it so."

"Wait a moment—I am better now. What have you done, George?" She asked the question without faltering, looking him steadily in the face, and yet the heart of Mary Humphreys stood still as she awaited the answer, for a terrible fear had taken possession of her.

It came prompt and fearless. "Nothing, Mary, that I am ashamed of before God or man."

"Thank God!" said Mary Humphreys, and she burst into tears. Her worst fears were relieved now. Nothing would seem very terrible after that.

"You do not fear that, Mary?"

"I did, George, for a minute; forgive me."

She saw what was coming next cost him a terrible struggle. "But there has harm, disgrace come to Elizabeth. Oh, Mary, you used to love her—you were schoolmates together—you will not forsake her now, now that the world will!"

"What has happened to Elizabeth, George?" And again there was bewilderment and terror in the sweet eyes of Mary Humphreys. In the next hour she had learned the whole truth. It was fearful enough; and yet Mary thanked God in her heart that the sin was not on the souls of those she loved. George Humphreys had been for a year betrothed to Elizabeth Seaton. She was the daughter of a wealthy banker in New York, a schoolmate and friend of Mary's, whom the young lawyer had first met on a visit to the doctor's.

Elizabeth Seaton was a girl-woman, fit to be the elect and dearest friend of Mary Humphreys; a sweet, generous, noble woman, with a face, not handsome, but at times beautiful, always delicate, sweet, intelligent.

The families on both sides had been gratified with the engagement. The Seatons occupied a high social position in the city, and were wealthy and honorable. And Judge Humphreys was a man who valued these things; and George was his only son, of whom any parent might be proud.

The matter was all settled; the wedding was to transpire the following May, when lo! Mr. Seaton, the president of the old saving bank, was found to have embezzled large sums from the bank, where he had occupied for more than two years a position of the highest trust. The discovery was made suddenly, and fairly stunned those who had known the man longest and most intimately. But, alas! no man can sin to himself. With what bewilderment and anguish, bitterer than death, the blow fell upon Gerald Seaton's wife and daughter cannot be imagined, much less told. The defaulter managed to make his escape from the country, just in time to avoid apprehension.

The first knowledge of these appalling facts reached George Humphreys through the letter of his betrothed: It fell like a thunderbolt on the heart of the young man. Elizabeth Seaton, in the midst of her humility and anguish was too honorable to conceal anything. She disclosed the whole truth, holding back nothing for her own sake or her father's, and offering no extenuation for his crime beyond that which all his friends did, that he had been beguiled into heavy and ruinous speculations; and that he had hoped, as many a man so vainly does, to save himself from failure, by employing the bank funds, and restoring what he had taken before the embezzlement should be detected. He did not mean that it should be robbery.

And then Elizabeth Seaton did just what any one, knowing the real essence of this girl's character, would be certain she would have done. She absolutely released her betrothed from his engagement. She and her mother were about to hide their sorrow and shame in some obscure village, where the small fortune which Mrs. Seaton held in her own right would support them.

George Humphreys was a man of the finest honor; moreover, he loved Elizabeth Seaton with that love which neither misfortune nor disgrace could shake; and the idea of forsaking her, in this hour of her great affliction, was one that his honor would have spurned as it would the suggestion of a crime, had not his heart, too, wrung with pity and tenderness, for he longed to bear all the storm which had fallen so suddenly into her sweet young life.

George Humphreys held long counsel with himself after reading the letter of his betrothed, and his resolution was taken. He would at once seek Elizabeth, and prevail upon her to become his wife, overruling any obstacles which her pride and delicacy might interpose at this juncture to their union. He, at least, would show to the world that he was as proud and glad to do her that greatest honor which man can bestow on woman, now that the shadow of her father's disgrace had fallen upon her, as he was when it stood fair as his own before all men. And, like a true man, George Humphreys rejoiced that his strong arm and his loving heart should shelter Elizabeth Seaton in the time of amazement and anguish.

And with this purpose deliberately settled, George Humphreys sought his father. It cost him a strong pang to tell the story to the stern, proud old man, who listened silently and with his head hidden in his hands, after the first few brief, sharp questions he had asked at the commencement. So George Humphreys was not interrupted until he had disclosed all that Elizabeth had written, and added thereto his intention of going to her at once, and having their union consummated.

There was a little silence when the ardent voice of the young man ceased; and then old Judge Humphreys lifted his face, a pale, proud face, beneath its crown of shining gray hairs. "You shall not do this thing, George. You shall not bring dishonor upon the old name of Humphreys by uniting it to the daughter of a criminal."

The young man winced under the words; for a moment his eyes blazed—it was well that no man but his father dared speak that name in his presence; but remembering whom he was addressing, he choked down the pain and the anger, enough to say in a pleading voice: "But Elizabeth is not to blame for her father's sin?"

"I grant it. I am sorry for you both from my heart. But she must bear her shame alone; no son of mine must take it on him."

So the old Judge was inexorable. Pride was the strongest, hardest part of his nature; pride in the old honorable name of his fathers, which had come down to him through many generations without stain or blemish, and this pride hardened and blinded the old man to all pity or compassion; for George was his only son, and the thought that he would marry the daughter of one whose name was now a by-word and a disgrace, was more than the old Judge could bear. Argument and entreaty availed nothing. The strong will set itself as a rock against them; and at last high words, terrible words, passed between the father and the son. George would not be moved from his purpose of at once taking to wife Elizabeth Seaton, and it ended at last in the old Judge's solemnly lifting up his hand, and declaring that the hour in which he married the daughter of "that outlaw from justice," he was no longer a son of his, and forbidding him even, as the husband of Elizabeth Seaton, to cross his father's threshold again.

So George Humphreys bowed his head and went out from his father's presence, with a face white as the dead, and a step that faltered as a little child's; but his purpose was not shaken.

An hour later, he was leaving Woodleaf, resolving to confide nothing of all which had transpired to any mortal, when the thought of his cousin Mary came over him. The shock which the young lawyer had received during this interview with his father made him feel for the time that all men were against him; but as Mary's sweet face rose before him, and the memory of the quick, tender heart beneath it, which all his boyhood intimacy with her had furnished him such proof, the soul of George Humphreys softened; and, half against his own will, he turned back, and sought his uncle's dwelling.

Mary Humphreys had listened to her cousin's story, with a face out of which all the roses were blanched. Amazement, horror, and pity shook her by turns; but the thought of all Elizabeth Seaton's anguish mastered all the others at last; for the girls had been to each other almost what sisters are, and she was sobbing like a child when her cousin finally paused.

"What are you going to do, George?" she stammered out at last.

"Mary, how can you ask? There is but one thing which it is right that I should do. It is that which I told my father."

What could Mary say? Surely in this case the higher law abrogated the lower: "A man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife."

George searched her white, agitated face, and read there his answer. "Mary, if you were in my place, you would do as I am doing," he said.

"I should do it," answered, solemnly, Mary Humphreys, and she thought of Elizabeth. "God bless you, you and Elizabeth both."

George Humphreys smiled for the first time, and the tears were in his proud eyes, as he bent down and kissed the girl. "Ah, Mary, I was not wrong in trusting you. And I shall carry that blessing in my heart, and it will keep it from growing cold when I remember my father. I must go now, or I shall miss the train."

"Wait for the next one—wait and see father!" pleaded his cousin.

"Wait, Mary, when Elizabeth sits alone in her anguish and desolation, and there is none but me to comfort her?"

And after that Mary could not say "wait." She followed her cousin to the door, and they parted here with a mute caress which said what their lips could not.

When Doctor Humphreys returned from the "Run," that noon, he heard from his daughter all that she had learned from her cousin. The doctor's sympathies and his wife's were with their nephew. "Elizabeth is not to blame for her father's sin, neither does it absolve George from his duty," was the old physician's verdict.

"But, father, she did just what I should do, if I were in her place!" exclaimed Mary; and then, as that terrible "if" flashed across her, she sprang to her father's side, gathered her arms about his neck, and was sobbing on his breast.

The old doctor divined her thought. "My precious child!" trying to soothe her, and feeling a still keener sympathy for her suffering schoolmate. "Truly, we should thank God for every day that we are kept from temptation, and delivered from evil."

"Samuel, you always had more influence with Joseph than anybody," said his wife, wiping away her tears. "Won't you see now what you can do with him for poor George's sake?"

"I shall see him this very evening; but I see, Lucy, that it will be no light thing to move him. In most matters, I might; but here his pride will be stronger than his affection, and the more so, because George is his idol; and the thought of any disgrace falling on him will steel his heart. But for the sake of the living and the dead, I will do what I can."

Doctor Humphreys was faithful to his promise. That evening Mary and her mother waited until the long hours gathered themselves into midnight for the doctor's return.

He came at last; and when they looked in his face, they knew that his mission had failed. "We must wait God's will, now," he said, in a weary way, as he drew off his overcoat.

"Didn't he melt once, father?" asked Mary, as she assisted him to put on his dressing-gown.

"Not once, daughter. I tried every appeal, I urged every motive which would be likely to reach his sense of justice, or his love; but it all availed nothing. He walked the room, white as a sheet; he told me that to save George this sorrow, he would gladly lay down his life; but when, despite his commands and entreaties, he made himself the son of a criminal flying from justice, he could be his child no longer."

"Oh, father, such pride is sin!"

"I know it; I told him so."

A little silence, and then the doctor said, looking from his wife to his daughter: "There, Lucy, Mary, go to bed at once. You both look as though you 'd been ill a week."

Mary's pillow was a sleepless one that night. She thought of Elizabeth and of her father's sin, of her inexorable uncle, and of the face of her Cousin George, and these all drove slumber from her eyes. She longed to be able to serve them in some way; she sometimes half resolved to go and plead with her uncle, with whom she was a great favorite, standing to him in place of the daughter that was not, and then remembering how her father had failed to influence him, she relinquished the plan as hopeless. At last the gray day began to break slowly the long darkness of the night, and with it a new purpose suddenly flashed among Mary's thoughts, as she lay with her face turned to the east, watching the first faint prophesy of the day, written in gray blurred lines upon the distant horizon.

In one of the drawers of the pretty dressing cabinet in Mary's chamber, was a box containing a miniature, of whose existence no one in the world but herself was now aware. The miniature was set in a case of costly veined agate, and the face was that of a little girl, which could hardly have passed out of its tenth summer—a beautiful child's face! a face that once seen could hardly be forgotten. The deep sea-blue eyes, the brown hair, touched with gold, the wide warm roses in the small oval cheeks, and the smile on the lips, red as swamp-berries in the low marshes in December, all made the sweet, wonderful child beauty of that face like a vision that is sometimes seen in dreams of the night, like some face haunting, and shining, and baffling an artist at his work of love.

This face was the face of George Humphreys' mother. It was taken just after her tenth birthday, and just too after her future husband, then a young sophomore, happening on a brief visit at her father's house, had met her for the first time, for the parents of the young student and the little girl were old friends.

Mrs. Humphreys had never discovered this picture to her husband, intending to surprise and gladden him with it some day, and then, after the birth of her daughter Mary, preserving it for the child whom it singularly resembled. But the little girl never saw as many years as her mother had, when the picture was painted; and so Mary, the doctor's daughter, was christened after her dead cousin and living aunt. And those who loved them best, always detected some subtle likeness betwixt the face that lay still and cold, under the dark plush of the summer grasses, and the face warm and bright above it.

So Mary became to her uncle and aunt almost in place of the daughter that to them was not; and one day, a little while before her aunt's sudden death, she entered her chamber in her privileged fashion, and found her busy in arranging her drawers. The child was a pet with every one in the Judge's house; and after standing and watching her aunt for awhile, she suddenly laid her hand on a small box in a corner of the drawer, and asked with the curiosity of childhood: "What is it, Aunt Mary?"

Mrs. Humphreys opened the box, and disclosed the miniature inside. "Do you know who it is, my dear?" smiled the lady, as the breathless, wondering child lifted her bewildered eyes to her face.

"It looks like the portrait of Cousin Mary in the parlor."

"So it does; but it's not she. It is your Aunt Mary as she was at your age; and looks more like you now than it does like anybody else in the world," glancing from the miniature to her niece. "Nobody, not even your uncle, knows of the existence of this picture, and you must not reveal the secret, Mary. Some time I intend to show it to him."

Mary promised, and she was a conscientious child; she kept her word faithfully.

Several years after this, when Mrs. Humphreys was gradually sinking into that decline which ended her life, she said one day to her niece, who was now blossoming into her girlhood: "Mary, I want you to take and keep sacredly, for my sake, that miniature which you have seen of me in my early childhood. It is the most precious gift which I could offer you, and you must take it in place of the Mary who went home before the rest of us, and whom it sometimes seems of late that I shall see in a little while. Some time, when I am gone, you must show it to your uncle; it will comfort him; and, Mary, if the time should ever come, when you have some petition to make of him—some especial favor which only he can grant, take this, and tell him in the name of his dear wife and child not to refuse you." And Mary had taken the gift with many tears, and locked it away from all human gaze until the time appointed.

And as she watched the gray dawn with its white fingers silently breaking down the black walls of the darkness, she felt that the time had come for her to present the gift, to make known her petition. She knew that her uncle had loved his wife with a love which bordered on idolatry, a love whose great tides of tenderness had risen high, and overflowed his proud, strong, reticent character, as the rivers swell in the spring, and overflow the banks and cover the fields.

"I will go to him this very day, and God be with me!" murmured Mary Humphreys; and she turned upon her pillow and slept, and the dawn grew into day.

"Uncle Joseph!"

The voice, sweet, soft, with a little timid plea in it, stole to the old Judge's ear, as he sat, just as the day was closing, in his office study, with his piles of papers before him; and he looked what he was, the straight, inexorable, stately, masterful old man. No matter what anguish he might suffer, what loneliness, what desolation of spirit, whatsoever he had said, that thing he would do to the death; you read this in the face, in the forehead, and in the eyes, and read it anew in the firm concentrated lips; there was no weakness, no flexibility there. But the voice, the sweet woman's voice stole softly to the old Judge sitting among his books and his papers, as another voice used to steal in at that very door, and wind itself in silvery flowing sounds through the tenderest and softest places of his heart.

"Come in, Mary," said the Judge; and his tones now were like those with which he used to answer that other voice, that he would never, never hear again, speaking at the door. She came in, with her swift step and her young bright face, in which some thought at her heart made the roses wider than usual.

"Uncle Joseph, are you glad to see me?" she said; and she put her arms about his neck.

His heart, his lonely heart, that would ache beneath the iron will that held and ruled it, was touched and comforted.

"Was I ever otherwise than glad to see you, Mary, my child?" answered the old Judge, and took the girl on his knee, and held her there, as though she had been his very own.

And Mary Humphreys smiled, and brushed with her soft, warm hand the white hair from her uncle's forehead, and then, as she looked to find courage in that face whereon the un-finching will had graven itself, her heart failed her, and her uncle felt the shiver which shook her as she sat on his knee.

"What is the matter, my child?"

"I came here, Uncle Joseph, to ask you a question, but my heart has failed me. I can't do it," stammered the girl, looking at him in fear and bewilderment.

He divined in a moment what she meant; the face settled away from its sudden tenderness into stern rigidity. Every feature and lineament was like a rock.

"Mary, it will be useless to ask that!" said Judge Humphreys.

"Then, I will not, Uncle Joseph, but somebody else will instead. See here, it is she speaks to you." And with her swift, shaking fingers, she drew out the case of dark veined agate, opened it, and there, before Joseph Humphreys, was the face of the wife of his youth, just as he had seen it the first time in his life! The sweet, breathing, living picture of the dead wife and child. The blue eyes looked out, the lips like berries smiled upon him, just as they had done those long, long gone years, over which his thoughts went swiftly as lightning now, and he saw the old avenue of chestnuts, and the great lawn, and the wide old-fashioned house, and he was chasing that face of wondrous beauty through them all, and the sweet laughter was tossed back to him on the summer winds, and then again, a little graver, the child's face had come to his side and was nestled longingly down close to his knee, and he was stroking it softly, and watching the great wonder and eagerness which filled it, and he was telling stories, strange, marvellous stories of foreign lands, as he told them in his youth, to the child who was one day to be his wife.

The old man gave a low cry as his eyes first caught the picture. He lifted it up, and gazed with that long, greedy gaze that could never have enough of it, and the tears fell like rain down his cheeks.

"Where did you get it, Mary?" he said at last, looking up, with a face that was not the face of Judge Humphreys.

"She gave it to me, Uncle Joseph, a little while before she left us. And she charged you solemnly, through me, that if on the time when I should show you that picture, I should bring to you any petition, you should listen to it, and should grant it in her name, for her sake, and for the dead child's, as though she asked it standing by your side."

"Mary, Mary, what have you come to ask me?" There was a great pain and pathos in the Judge's voice.

Then Mary Humphreys stood up, very white, and her words were slow and calm, although her loud heart seemed almost to shake her where she stood. "I came, Uncle Joseph, to ask you, in the name of your dead wife, and your boy's mother, and in the name of your love for her, not to cast him out from your heart and home forever, because he cannot do the wrong you would have him to the woman whom he loves as you loved his mother. And I ask you, and not I, but those silent lips speaking through me—'Take back our boy, Joseph, take him back with your new daughter, for my sake, to the heart and home from which you have driven him with your curses!'"

The old Judge bowed his head on the table. The night had fallen now, and drowned the room with its darkness. Mary heard the long, heavy sobs which filled the silence, and the large frame of the old man shook with them, and Mary sat down at his feet, and wept, too. At last, through the darkness she felt a hand steal and rest softly upon her head.

"Mary," said a voice which was not like the voice of Judge Humphreys—so tender and solemn was it, "I have answered the prayer which the dead has spoken through you."

That night Judge Humphreys wrote a letter. It was very brief, but few letters have ever contained so much in so few words.

Come back to your home, my son, and bring your wife Elizabeth, my daughter. You shall both be welcome, my children.

Your father, JOSEPH HUMPHREYS.

And if you had seen the face of Mary Humphreys, as she went home through the darkness, you would have wondered if you had seen the face of an angel.

The next week George and Elizabeth Humphreys returned to Woodleaf. Judge Humphreys gave the newly-wedded pair a father's welcome, and the young bride little suspected that a few days before her husband had, for her sake, been driven from that very home forever!

In less than a year, her father sank into his dishonored grave in a strange land; but it was years later, until she was a wife, happy and well beloved herself, that Mr. and Mrs. George Humphreys knew all that Mary, the niece of Judge Humphreys, had done for them.

DIFFICULTIES dissolve before a cheerful spirit like snow-drifts before the sun.

TRIFLES.

WHAT is a trifle? We search the dictionary, and find, "A thing of no moment, no value." We look abroad to the heavens, where stars

"Numerous as glitt'ring gems of morning dew, Or sparks from populous cities in a blaze," each in their sphere of use—no trifle there. Look we to nature; 'tis but a drop that wears the hardest rock, and opens the way for foaming cataracts and gushing rivers, which sweep relentlessly o'er lands and homes, bringing devastation. A grain of sand is but a small thing, yet what agony it can cause either singly, or as the dangerous bar whereon so many mariners' hopes are wrecked. The careless gardener passes the down which blows hither and thither, and only wakes to his mistake when on the following year, he tries in vain to eradicate deeply-rooted weeds, which choke his blooming flowers, and thus is it, "For there is nothing on the earth so small that it may not produce great things." And, as in nature, so with humanity, for to us "Each breath is burdened with a bidding, and every minute has its mission." We cannot say to the passing event, 'tis but a trifle, like the stone thrown in the water, causing a circle far beyond the beholder's eye. So the word which escapes the thoughtless lips may go forth winged with a power to change a life—nay, perhaps, tipped with a poison as deadly as the Indian's arrow, which the speaker forgets as soon as said, or only remembered it when too late, in a time of distress or despair; and thus the heedless ones of the earth daily repeat in society words and deeds, and calm their consciences with the thought, "'Tis but a trifle!" Half our faults arise from thoughtlessness, forgetting that

"So our little errors
Lead the soul away
From the paths of virtue,
Oft in sin to stray."

Happy the man who goeth forth knowing no trifles, "sowing the good seed beside all waters," waiting in patience for its fruits; realizing that the acorn may become the pride of the forest, and that no action is too small to influence others for good or evil; and particularly remembers, at this joyous season, that "Little deeds of kindness,

Little words of love,
Make our earth an Eden,
Like the heaven above."

ONE might as well be out of the world as be loved by nobody in it.

A SLIGHT SKETCH OF MISS JUMBLE'S CAREER.

BY HERSELF.

FANNY said to me the other day: "I wish I could write such sweet, interesting pieces as you do for Q's Magazine. I'd publish, too, and get a reputation for being literary, as you have."

"Which is not at all desirable."

"Dear me! why not?" And Fanny stared at me, her great blue eyes opening wider than ever with wonder.

"Let me tell you some of my woes, and trials, and annoyances, and then you will see for yourself that it is not so very fine to be the literary star of a small village firmament."

"Pray do; but you will be unable to change my wish. When I was a little girl, I used to think you the most wonderful person in the world, because I read your stories in print. And I'd like to be such a marvel to others."

"That is the worst part of the whole matter. Hear me. I began to write when a child of nine years, because I couldn't help it, stories, school compositions, and endless letters to all my young cousins. When I was older, and went to boarding-school, the girls would beg me to write their compositions. I did so at first, partly because it gave me a sense of superiority, and partly because I liked the work. But I not only soon grew weary of laboring in this way for others, but began to see that it was wrong, and then refused. They called me a very selfish, disobliging person. After leaving school, and when the stern realities of life looked me in the face, I kept on scribbling, and at length saw myself in print. This I took quietly, but was glad to profit by—thanks to a publisher as kind as he was liberal—to the amount of sundry convenient sums of pocket-money, not large, but very welcome. And then to hear the remarks of friends and acquaintances—"Jane Jumble was so literary they were afraid of her." It is very queer that some people will persist in calling a woman literary who has only written a few light, very light articles for the magazines. It was not long, however, before their awe subsided, and then such an ordeal as some of these same friends would subject me to, would have been funny if it had not been so vexatious.

"They started a 'literary association,' a sort of 'mutual admiration' affair, meeting once a week at each others' houses to read 'original pieces,' talk over the last romance, and have a 'little music and flirtation.' A very good thing they made of it, too, as they did not happen all of them to be geese. But it so fell out that time, and again on the very morning of the day on the evening whereof a meeting was to be held, Molly Jones, or Tilly Smith, or somebody else would rush to my house, saying: 'Oh, look here, please! The Athenians meet to-night, and there isn't a single original article. Do now, Miss Jumble, write one of your funny essays, or a poem, or a little story, or something—now do. You write so easy—it's nothing for you to throw off an article. And they are going to meet at my house, and I want a real nice lot of pieces, you know, when they come there.' It was of no avail to tell Tilly or Molly that I could write nothing good in such haste. They believed my brain was a sort of mill, and that I had only to grind with a few strokes of the pen, and a story or essay would come forth. If I went to the gathering, without a peace-offering of this description, some would look cross at me, and others bemoan and lament my dereliction in a manner that was meant to be flattering, but that proved greatly tiresome. So I would hunt up some old thing that I was ashamed of, or scratch off a few pages in such a hurry that nobody but myself could make sense of them, and read aloud to an admiring auditory. No matter what it was, it was always praised. My favorite style then was serio-comic, and I mention it as one of the trials of my 'career,' that often after an article had been read, some matter-of-fact young man in the company would ask his neighbor—"Do you suppose that 's written in earnest?"

"Once I went out West to visit some relatives whom I had never seen. They received me kindly, but very constrainedly, and for several days were shy and embarrassed. I could not understand their manner till after a week had brought about some signs of confidence; and Cousin Peggy said to me one morning, with the first genial expression of face that she had worn: 'Well, I don't see but what you can make up a bed jest as well as my girls, and wait on yerself, too. I was dretfully afraid to have you come here, for I thought ye'd be stuck up, because ye wrote for the papers.' Shade of my grandmother! Wasn't that a poser!"

Fanny thought these very trifling troubles when compared with the début of being such a "lovely writer" as myself.

"But I have not told you all yet. One summer I went to — Spa with my brother, to drink the sulphurous nectar for both our healths. I had not the least idea that anybody there knew me for the same 'Jane Jumble' that wrote for Q's Magazine, for I put my real name to my articles. But fate had decreed that I should be famous, and my identity was soon discovered. The second day after my arrival, our private parlor was unceremoniously entered by two tall young gentlemen, evidently country youths, who introduced each other, and then asked if 'this was Miss Jumble?'

"Yes, that is my name, gentlemen," said I, rather bewildered by their abrupt entrance, and thinking them farmers' sons with butter and cheese to sell.

"Well," said the foremost, sitting down in a gawky way, 'we heard you was the one that wrote for Q's Magazine, and we had a curiosity to see you, and so we've called.'

"That was coming to the point with refreshing frankness. They believed that no kind of talk except about 'literatoor' would be agreeable to me, and at it they went, asking my opinion of all the authors with whose names or works they happened to be acquainted, and especially of lady writers. Much amused, I turned the subject as soon as possible, by inquiring into the peculiarities of the soil in that region, and the properties of their very fragrant spa. They stared and soon went away, evidently disappointed because I looked and acted like other women."

Fanny thought it must be delightful to have strange youths hunt you up in a strange place by reason of your literary reputation having gone there in advance. I did not agree with her.

"But, Fanny, my next experience was rather more startling. In a certain large inland town where I went to rub off the rust of country life, and visit a married schoolmate, it was soon made known to me that the general impression of the reading folks there was—that I was actually the original Mrs. Partington. That was too much for me—me, who never concocted a single Partingtonian saying in my life, and who secretly prided myself on the growing dignified character of my magazine articles; and homewards in disgust I went.

"Yet this was nothing to what happened not long after, when I was staying at the famous watering-place of S——, where a lady, whose acquaintance I made in a quiet way, introduced me to all her friends in my literary character. One day, after dinner, I sat with my own party on the piazza, when this person joined us, and asked me if I would like to be introduced to a New York lady, who held a high and influential position in society. 'A very remarkable woman,' she proceeded to say; 'very fond of literary people, and she has literary soirees at her house every week. Encourages all the young writers, and does a great deal to elevate the tone of society.' Hardly waiting for an answer, she dragged me through the nearest window to a sofa just within, where sat an elderly lady of a very serene and elegant aspect, richly, but quietly dressed, diamonds on her fingers, and diamonds in the superb lace of her coiffure.

"Mrs. Van Derbunt, my dear madam, I am glad to have found you here. This is the lady I spoke of. Miss Jumble, that writes for Q's magazine. Allow me to introduce you to each other.'

"Mrs. Van Derbunt eyed me kindly and patronizingly. She must have had the names of all the writing women mixed up in a queer heap inside her dear, old, honest head. For she said to me: 'Oh! then, you're Fanny Fern, ain't you?'

"No, madam, I beg your pardon—I never saw that authoress, but am quite familiar with her writings.'

"Excuse the mistake," said my lady patroness; 'I meant to ask if you were not the author of "Say and Seal." Or her sister—I have heard there are two of them.'

"Another disclaimer from myself:—and then Mrs. Van Derbunt, being determined to settle in her mind who I could be, launched forth once more.

"I remember now all about you. I am sure I have seen your name to that long story in the Weekly Budget, 'the Red-plumed Bandit,' that is just finished. I have not read it. I get no time to read though I admire talent very much. But my son and daughter are delighted with it. You must come to the city and attend my literary reunions.'

"What do you think of that, Fanny, to be pronounced a contributor to the Weekly Budget—a writer of sensation stories? I withdrew from my officious new friend after this adventure. Such scares are rather more than human nature can bear and maintain gravity."

"There is nothing terrible in what you have told me," said Fanny. "And in the end you found a husband too, notwithstanding the men are said to be afraid of writing women. My associates tell me the gentlemen will all be afraid of me if I cultivate my taste for composition, and that I shall be an old maid. Surely they were not all afraid of you."

"Wait a moment, and hear that part of my experience. You know that, about the time of my visit at S——, that lucky man who was to be my husband came to our village to reside, a man weary of business cares, and seeking retirement. My literary fame had become an old story, and nobody thought of telling him that I was a writing woman. What-ever may have led him to become interested in me, it certainly was not my reputation as a writer. But we were engaged—when, ten days before the wedding, my cousin lent him a bound volume of Q's Magazine with some of my effusions in it. He handed me the book a few days after, saying, rather gravely: 'I like those stories of yours. They are very good. Some of the love scenes are very touching—but if I had read them before I made your acquaintance, you may be sure that I should never have had the courage to approach you.'

"It was too late to back out, therefore back out he did not. And what do you suppose he really did? In a retired farming village, a pleasant day's drive from us, live some of his kinsfolk and many warm friends. So he must e'en freight the invitations to our marriage feast with some odd numbers of Q's Magazine containing what he, in his newly found pride in my so-called talents, thought my best productions. Mark this instance of masculine vanity. The gifted author of these 'interesting articles' was to be his wife. He had secured this intellectual prize—no matter whether he knew it or not when he proposed to me. On reading these writings, they would know how to appreciate his choice. Well—and what was the result? Not one of those good people came to the wedding—a circumstance that caused in us regret and wonder. They afterwards confessed that they were afraid to come. I was 'so literary,' that the party would be of the bluest, primmest kind, they were sure, and being used to the freedom and joyousness of country gatherings, they 'couldn't stand it, they knew they couldn't.' We went among them on a round of honeymoon visits, and you would have laughed to see the astonished faces of the women, and to hear the admiring remarks of the men, when they found that I ate, and talked, and joked like other folks, knew how to keep house, could prescribe for a sick child, and give a receipt for a new kind of cake. And before I tell you any more of my experiences, let me say that they have proved congenial friends, and are as conversant with the best authors as they are skilful in farming and housekeeping. The only difficulty had been, that they had not a live author among them, and could not detach the creator of books from his works."

"It all turned out nicely, then," said Fanny: "and you have just as good a husband as if you were not literary. I am still determined to write if I can."

"But Fame, my dear Fanny, has other drawbacks, and many humiliations that I have not mentioned yet. There are people living on the same street with me who do not dream that I write, and to them I am only 'one of the neighbors.' A few days ago, my washerwoman's daughter came to me, and said: 'Noaw, mother's been out West to Uncle Smith's, and she heard how 't you wrote a story 'twas printed in a book, and she wants to borrow it.'

"Alas! thought I, and you have lived near me these six years, and never before knew that I wrote. And again, your acquaintances are always making you out to be your own heroine, and saying such absurd things to you, that it is out of the question to frame a reply. Not long ago, a sketch of mine appeared in the Trumpet, our weekly paper. Most of my neighbors take it. The object of the sketch was to depict a certain social foible, and turned on the incident of the writer having been visiting a distant town.

"That piece sounds just like you,' said Molly Jones of the olden time, now a quiet matron. 'And the other day, at the sewing society, we all said the same. But then we knew you couldn't have written it, because you hav'n't been away anywhere in more than a year.'

"Such a misconstruction is by no means distressing; but too intensely foolish not to make one feel a little wiser than one's neighbors, which is not good for me."

"And you are just as good a wife and housekeeper," said Fanny, "as if you never wrote. And I know all your household look up to you."

"Alas! no. Do you not believe that saying about no man being a hero to his valet-de-chambre? Now, there is my cook, who duly buys and reads each number of the Ladies' Parlor Friend. She holds me in no more awe for knowing that I write for its pages. In fact, I think she would respect me more if I was not a writing woman. She doesn't hesitate at all to dispute my ways of doing things. And the only fact that has made me of late rise in her estimation is this: Last summer I insisted that the green corn should be boiled before drying. She insisted just as strongly that it should be scraped from the cob and dried raw; and so she did it. The consequence is that our winter dish of 'succotash' is not fit to eat. And she has been glad to have left some corn of my own preparing the previous season. I heard her say to your mother's maid the other day that I did know something after all."

"And, after all," said Fanny, with a laugh, "just give me your receipt for making a magazine article, and I will set about concocting one without delay."

"Well, Fanny, laugh if you please: but your jesting request reminds me of another of my experiences. Many a one has come to me and begged it as an especial favor that I would tell her or him even how to go to work to write an article. What hour in the day to begin, and what to begin with; what to do with the personages of a story, if a story it was to be, or how to evolve from their misty brains a subject for an essay. There was something mechanical about the process that they could not just hit upon, unless I would be so kind as to give them a hint. Rules for composition are very proper; but where there is nothing in one's noddle to apply them to, they can be left unknown."

"So I am not to have your receipt," said Fanny. "You put me among the empty noddles."

"No, far from it. But go home and read 'Addison's Spectator,' and Washington Irving, and those delicious old tales of the days of King Arthur, and the Knights of the Round Table. Then, if you are determined on being a writing woman, stick to good, old-fashioned English. And be sure of my deepest sympathy with you in your 'career.'"

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Pearl the Seventh.—July.

Now the long, fervid summer days
Oppress the heart; the sultry rays
Of solar heat make weak the nerve,
And men from all their purpose swerve,
And only ask some quiet spot
Where, all forgetting and forgot,
They may in indolence and ease,
Beneath the cool, umbrageous trees,
Or by the limpid streamlet, lie,
And watch the white clouds in the sky,

And call them angels, on their way
To far-off realms of endless day,
With messages of love and bliss
To brighter, fairer worlds than this;
Or, listening to singing birds
Repeating tender, wooing words
In bowers hard by, they fall asleep,
And in their dreams Time's barriers leap
And reach that fair, Utopian clime,
Where—like a song of perfect rhyme
To sweetest music wedded—life,
Forever separate from strife,
From agony of hope or fear,
From bursting sigh, from falling tear,
From disappointed plans, and from
The woe that makes its victims dumb—
Moves onward in the grooves of joy
Without the taint of Time's alloy;
Where perfect happiness resides,
Where Summer as a queen abides
In a perpetual reign, and where
All beatific things and rare
Present their pleasures to the soul,
As from an overflowing bowl.

So, 'neath the fervor of July,
Its sultry heats, its torrid sky,
Man languishes with time and sense,
And lapses into indolence,
While Nature from her treasure pours
Upon the world her myriad stores
Of fruits and flowers, and strews the road
With gifts that leads to her abode.
The droning bee, amid the hay,
Fears not the reaper in its play;
The butterfly, amid the flowers,
Heeds not the child that roams the bowers;
The humming-bird upon the rose
Sits idly, careless of all foes;
And all the children of the air
The confidence of nature share.
The days go by, we scarce know why,
We scarce know how; they're born, they die,
And others come, and still we turn
And in the sky and air discern
A sense of heaviness and gloom,
Though freighted with Cathay's perfume.
Turning aside from written books,
We find our lessons in the brooks;
The leaf of the witch-hazel gleams
With the bright alphabet of dreams;
In the lake lilies' bosom lie
Stars with twin-sisters in the sky;
And the sweet violet offers up,
Within the azure of her cup,
The heavy freighted odoriferous hour,
And bids us prize the precious dower.

EXCELLENCE.—Excellence is never granted to man, but as the reward of labor. It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in habits of industry, without the pleasure of perceiving those advantages which, like the hands of a clock, whilst they make their hourly approaches to their point, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation.

CHAPTER XIV.

LEWIS HAMMOND had thrown the whole weight of his influence in the family conclave, into the Newport scale; and to this popular resort Sarah went, in July, in company with the Bensons, her mother, and Jeannie, who was made one of the party at Lewis's request and expense. The generous fellow acted in conformity with conscience and judgment in this temporary exile of his treasures; and, consistent in his purpose of rendering it a pleasure excursion to his wife, he made very light of his prospects of lonely widowhood, representing, instead, the benefit she and the babe would draw from the sea-breezes, and his enhanced enjoyment of his weekly visits, because they were so far apart. He went with them to the shore, at their general fitting, and spent two days; saw for himself that those whose comfort was nearest his heart were properly accommodated; privately feed chambermaid and waiter, with hints of future emolument to accrue to them from special regard to the wants of Mrs. Hammond and her infant, and returned to town with the unenviable consciousness of having left at least three-fourths of himself behind him.

A brisk rush of business beguiled him of the aching, hollow void for a few hours after he got back. Not even Baby Belle's accents could be heard amid that roar and whir. But at luncheon-time, while waiting for his order to be filled at a restaurant, the dreary, solitary void overtook him—a fit of unmistakable homesickness, that yet caused him to recoil at the idea of entering the deserted house up-town, when evening should oblige him to seek a lodging. How were Sarah and baby getting along without him? He was afraid that Lucy was not, in all respects, as congenial a companion as he could have wished his wife to have, and that Mrs. Hunt's undisguised worldliness, her foolish love of fashion and display, would often annoy and mortify her sensible, right-judging daughter. Benson was capital company, though—a gentleman, every inch of him! and very friendly to Sarah. But for her reserved manners he would act the part of a real brother to her; in any case, he would be kind, and see that she wanted for nothing.

Then—shot into his head by some unseen and unaccountable machinery—there darted across his mind a fragment of a conversation he had overheard, at entering his parlor, the day before the Bensons left. Philip and Lucy were standing before a miniature painting of Sarah and her child, completed and brought home a short time previous. Although seemingly intent upon the picture, their conversation must have strayed far from the starting-point, for the first sentence that reached the unintentional listener was a tart, scornful speech from Lucy, that could by no stretch of the imagination be made to apply to her sister.

"If you admire her so much, why did you not marry her when you had the opportunity? She was willing enough!"

"Take care you do not make me regret that I did not do so!" was Philip's stern rejoinder as he turned from her.

The change of position showed him that Lewis was present, and for a second his inimitable self-possession wavered. Recovering himself, he reverted to the picture, and called upon his host to decide some disputed point in its artistic execution which he and Lucy were discussing.

"Poor fellow! he has learned that all is not gold that glitters!" mused Lewis to the newspaper he was pretending to read. "Lucy had a high reputation for amiability before she was Mrs. Benson. There is no touchstone like the wedding-ring to bring out one's true qualities."

He sat with his back to the entrance of the saloon, and the table directly behind him was now taken possession of by three or four new arrivals—all gentlemen, and apparently on familiar terms with one another. They called for a bountiful lunch, including wine, and plunged into a lively, rather noisy talk. Lewis closed his ears, and applied himself in earnest to his paper. He started presently at a word he could have declared was his name. Restraining the impulse to look around and see who of the group was known to him, he yet could not help trying to determine this point by their voices. One, a thin falsetto, he fancied belonged to George Bond, who was no more of a favorite with him than was his better half with Sarah. Lewis regarded him as a conceited rattle-pate, whose sole talent lay in the art of making money—whose glory was his purse. "Why should he be talking about me here? Nonsense; I was mistaken!" and another page of the newspaper was turned.

"When I leave my wife at Newport, or anywhere else, in the particular and brotherly care of one of her former flames, publish me as a crazy fool!" said the wiry voice again, almost in the reader's ear.

"He doesn't know old stories as well as you do, perhaps," replied some one.

"I should think not! When my wife pulls the wool over my eyes in that style, horsewhip me around town, and I won't cry 'Quarter!' Sister's husband or not, I'll be hanged if I would have him in my house for two weeks, and he such a good-looking dog, too!"

He stopped, as if his neighbor had jogged him, as Lewis looked over his shoulder in the direction of the gossip. A dead and awkward silence ensued, ended at last by the pertinent observation that the "waiter was a long time bringing their lunch."

In a maze of angry doubt and incredulity as to the evidence of his senses and suspicions, Lewis finished his meal, and stalked out past the subdued and now voracious quartette, favoring them with a searching look as he went by, which they sustained with great meekness. All the afternoon a heavy load lay upon his heart—an indefinable dread he dared not analyze; a foreboding he would not face, yet could not dismiss.

"You are blue, Lewis!" said Mr. Marlow, kindly, as they started up town together. "This is the worst of having a wife and children; you miss them so terribly when they are away. But you will get used to it. Make up your mind at the eleventh hour to cross the water, and stay abroad three months. You will be surprised to find how easy your mind will become after a couple of weeks."

"I am satisfied, sir, without making personal trial of the matter, that men do become inured to misery, which seemed in the beginning to be insupportable."

Mr. Marlow laughed, and they separated.

Lewis sighed as he looked up at the blinds of his house, shut fast and grim, and still more deeply as he admitted himself to the front hall, that echoed dismally the sound of the closing door. His next movement was to walk into the parlor, throw open a shutter, and let in the evening light upon the portraits of the dear absent ones. There he stood, scanning their faces—eyes and soul full of love and longing—until the mellow glow passed away and left them in darkness.

The comfortless evening repast was over, and he betook himself to the library, Sarah's favorite room, as it was also his. Her low easy-chair stood in its usual place opposite his, at the centre-table, but her work-basket was missing; likewise the book, with its silver marker, that he was wont to see lying side by side with some volume he had selected for his own reading. But one lay there now, and there was an odd choking in his throat as he read the title on the back. He had expressed a wish for it in Sarah's hearing some days before, and her delicate forethought had left it here as a solace and keepsake, one that should, while reminding him of her, yet charm away sad feelings in her absence. Even in the exterior of the gift, she had been regardful of his taste. The binding was solid and rich; no gaudy coloring or tawdry gilt; the thick smooth paper and clear type were a luxury to touch and sight. Lewis was no sentimentalist in the ordinary acceptance of the term, yet he kissed the name his wife had traced upon the fly-leaf ere he sat down to employ the evening as she by her gift tacitly requested him to do. But it was a useless attempt. The book was not in fault, and he should have read it intently, if only because she had bestowed it: still the hand that held it sank lower and lower, until it rested upon his knee, and the reader was the thinker instead. The most prosaic of human beings have their seasons of reverie—pleasing or mournful, which are, unknown often to themselves, the poetry of their lives. Such was the drama Lewis Hammond was now rehearsing in his retrospective dreams.

The wan and weary mother, whom he remembered as always clothed in widow's weeds, and toiling in painful drudgery to maintain herself and her only boy; who had smiled and wept, rendered thanksgivings and uttered prayers for strength, alternately, as she heard Mr. Marlow's proposal to protect and help the lad through the world that had borne so hardly upon her; who had strained him to her bosom, and shed fast, hot tears of speechless anguish at their parting—a farewell that was never to be forgotten in any meeting on this side of eternity; this was the vision, hers the palladium of love, that had nerved him for the close wrestle with fortune, guarded him amid the burning ploughshares of temptation, carried him unscathed past the hundred mouths of hell, that gape upon the innocent and unwary in all large cities. Cold and unsusceptible as he was deemed in society, he kept unpolluted in his breast a fresh, living stream of genuine romantic feeling, such as we are apt to think went out of fashion—aye, and out of being—with the belted knights of yore; wealth he had vowed never to squander, never reveal, until he should pour it, without one thought of selfish reserve, upon his wife! He never hinted this to a living creature before the moment came for revealing it to the object of his choice. He was a “predestined old bachelor!” an “infidel to love and the sex,” said and believed the gay and frivolous, and he let them talk. His ideal woman, his mother's representative and successor—the beauty and crown of his existence—was too sacred for the gaze and comment of indifferent worldlings. For her he labored, and studied, and lived; confident in a fatalistic belief that, at the right moment, the dream would become a reality—the phantasm leave her cloudy height for his arms. Love so beautiful and intense as this, like snow in its purity, like fire in its fervor, cannot be won to full and eloquent utterance but by answering love—a sentiment identical in kind, if not equal in degree; and Sarah Hammond's estimate of her husband's affection was, in consequence of this want in herself, cruelly unjust in its coldness and poverty. His patience with her transient fits of gloom or waywardness in the early months of their married life; his noble forgetfulness of her faults, and grateful acknowledgment of her most trifling effort to please him; his unceasing care; his lavish bounty—all these she attributed too much to natural amiability and conscientious views of duty; too little to his warm regard for her, personally. In this persuasion she had copied his conduct in externals so far as she could; and applauding observers adjudged the mock gem to be a fair and equitable equivalent for the rare pearl she had received.

Lest this digression, into which I have been inadvertently betrayed, should mislead any with the idea that I have some design of dignifying into a hero this respectable, but very commonplace personage, return we to him as he bears eleven o'clock rung out by the monitor on the mantel, and says to himself, “Baby Belle has been asleep these three hours, and mamma, caring nothing for beaux and ball-room, is preparing to follow her.”

Beaux and ball-room! Pshaw! why should the nonsensical talk of that jackanapes, George Bond, come to his mind just then? The whole tenor of the remarks that succeeded the name he imagined was his disproved that imagination. But who had left his wife at Newport in the care of a “good-looking” brother-in-law? who had been domesticated in the family of the deluded husband for a fortnight?

Pshaw again! What concern had he with their scandalous, doubtless slanderous tattle?

“Why did you not marry her when you had the opportunity? She was willing enough!”

Could Lucy have spoken thus of her sister? Sarah was barely acquainted with Philip Benson when Lucy wedded him, having met him but once prior to the wedding-day at the house of her aunt in the country, from which place his own letter penned by her father's sick bed recalled her. How far from his thoughts then was the rapid train of consequences that followed upon this preliminary act of their intercourse!

Did that scoundrel Bond say “Hammond?” It was not a common name, and came quite distinctly to his ears in the high, unpleasant key he so disliked. A flush of honest shame arose to his forehead at this uncontrollable straying of his ideas to a topic so disagreeable, and so often rejected by his mind.

“As if—even had I been the person insulted by his pity—I would believe one syllable he said of a woman as far above him in virtue and intellect, in everything good and lovable, as the heavens are lifted above the earth! I would despise myself as much as I do him, if I could lend my ear for an instant to so degrading a whisper! I wish I had faced him and demanded the whole tale; yet no! that would have been rash and absurd. Better as it is! By to-morrow, I shall laugh at my ridiculous fancies!”

“Scratch! scratch! scratch!” The house was so still in the approaching midnight that the slight noise caused him a shock and quiver in the excited state of his nerves. The interruption was something between a scrape and a rap, three times repeated, and proceeding, apparently, from the bookcase at his right. What could it be? He had never seen or heard of a mouse on the premises, nor did the sound much resemble the nibbling of that animal. Ashamed of the momentary thrill he had experienced, he remained still and collected, awaiting its repetition.

"Scratch! scratch! rap!" It was in the bookcase—in the lower part where were drawers shut in by solid doors. These he had never explored, but knew that his wife kept pamphlets and papers in them. He opened the outer doors cautiously, and listened again, until assured by the scratching that his search was in the right direction. There were three drawers, two deep, the third and upper shallow. This he drew out and examined. It contained writing-paper and envelopes, all in good order. Nor was there any sign of the intruder amongst the loose music and periodicals in the second. The lower one was locked—no doubt accidentally, for he had never seen Sarah lock up anything except jewels and money. Their servants were honest, and she had no cause to fear investigation on his part.

Feeling, rather than arguing thus, he removed the drawer above, leaving exposed the locked one, and thrust his hand down into it. It encountered the polished surface of a small box or case, which he was in the act of drawing through the aperture left by the second drawer, when something dark and swift ran over his hand and up his sleeve. With a violent start, he dashed the casket to the floor, and another energetic fling of his arm dislodged the mouse. His first care was to pursue and kill it; his next to examine into the damage it had indirectly produced. The box—ebony, lined with sandal-wood—had fallen with such force as to loosen the spring, and lay on its side wide open; its treasures strewed over the carpet. They were neither numerous, nor in themselves valuable. A bouquet of dried flowers, enveloped in silver paper, lay nearest Lewis's hand, as he knelt to pick up the scattered articles. The paper was tied about the stalks of the flowers with black ribbon, and to this was attached a card: "Will Miss Sarah accept this trifling token of regard from one who is her staunch friend, and hopes, in time, to have a nearer claim upon her esteem?"

The hand was familiar to the reader as Philip Benson's. Why should Sarah preserve this, while the many floral tokens of his love which she had received were flung away when withered like worthless weeds? The pang of jealousy was new—sharp as the death-wrench to the heart-strings, cruel as the grave! The card was without date, or he would have read, with a different apprehension of its meaning, the harmless clause—"And hopes in time to have a nearer claim upon her esteem." There was a time, then, when, as Lucy had taunted her husband, he might have married her sister!

when Sarah loved him, and had reason to think herself beloved in return! What was this sable badge but the insignia of a bereaved heart, that mourned still in secret the faithlessness of her early love, or the adverse fate that had sundered him from her, and given him to another?

Crushing the frail, dead stems in his hand, he threw them back into the box, and took up a bit of dark gray wood, rough on one side—smoothed on the other into a rude tablet. "Philip Benson, Deal Beach. July 27th, 18—. Pensez à moi!" But ten days before he met her at the wharf in New York to take her to her sick father! but three months before she plighted her troth to him, promised to wed him, while in spirit she was still weeping tears of blood over the inconstant! for he did not forget that Philip's engagement to Lucy preceded his own to Sarah by eight or nine weeks. There were other relics in the box, a half-worn glove, retaining the shape of the manly hand it had inclosed—which, he learned afterwards, Philip had left in his chamber at the farm-house when he departed to seek gayer scenes; a white shell, upon whose rosy lining were scratched with the point of a knife the ominous initials "P. B.," and beneath them "S. B. H.," a faded rose-bud, and several printed slips, cut from the columns of newspapers. He unfolded but two of these.

One was an extract from Pennyson's "Maud"—the invitation to the garden. Breathlessly, by reason of the terrible stricture tightening around his heart, Lewis ran his eyes over the charming whimsical morceau. They rested upon and reviewed the last verse:

"She is coming—my own, my sweet!
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat;
Were it earth in an earthly bed,
My dust would hear her and beat;
Had I lain for a century dead,
Would start and tremble under her feet,
And blossom in purple and red."

He did not discriminate now between printed and written verses. These were love stanzas sent by another man to his wife, received and cherished by her, hidden away with a care that, in itself, bordered on criminality, for was not its object the deception of the injured husband? The most passionate autograph love-letter could hardly have stabbed him more keenly.

The other was Mrs. Browning's exquisite "Portrait."

And here the reader can have an explanation the tortured man could not obtain. With the acumen for which Cupid's votaries are proverbial, Philip Benson, then at the "summer heat" degree of his flame for the Saratoga belle, had recognized in this poem the most correct and beautiful description of his lady-love. Curiosity to see if the resemblance were apparent to other eyes, and a desire for sympathy tempted him to forward it to Sarah. She must perceive the likeness to her divine sister, and surmise the sentiment that had induced him to send it. A little alteration in the opening stanza was requisite to make it "a perfect fit." Thus it ran when the change was made:—

"I will paint her as I see her;
— times have the lilies blown
Since she looked upon the sun."

The poetess, guiltless of any intention to cater for the wants of grown-up lovers, had written "Ten" in the space made blank by Philip's gallantry and real ignorance of his charmer's age. For the rest, the "lily-clear face," the "forehead fair and saintly," the "trail of golden hair," the blue eyes, "like meek prayers before a shrine;" the voice that

"Murmurs lowly,
As a silver stream may run,
Which yet feels you feel the sun"

were, we may safely assert, quite as much like poor Sarah, when he sent the poem, as they were now like the portrait he would—if put upon his oath—sketch of his unidealized Lucy.

It was not unnatural then, in Lewis Hammond, to overlook, in his present state, these glaring discrepancies in the picture as applied by him. With a blanched and rigid countenance he put all the things back into the box, shut it, and restored it to its place. Then he knelt on the floor and hid his face in her chair; and there struggled out into the still air of the desecrated home-temple, made sacred by his love and her abiding, deep sobs from the strong man's stricken heart—a grief as much more fearful than that of widowerhood, as the desertion and dishonor of the loved one are worse than death.

CHAPTER XV.

It was the "grand hop" night at the headquarters of Newport fashion. Sarah, characteristically indifferent to gayeties "made to order," had determined not to appear below. The air of her room was fresh and pure, and a book, yet unread, lay under the lamp upon her table. Her sister and mother had withdrawn to dress, when Jeannie's curly head peeped in at Mrs. Hammond's door. Her features wore a most woe-begone expression.

"What has gone wrong, Jeannie?" inquired Sarah.

"Why, mamma says that I will be in her way if I go into the ball-room; and it will be so stupid to stay out the whole evening, while all the other girls can see the dancing and dresses, and hear the music. And sister Lucy says that children are 'bores' in company."

"A sad state of things, certainly! Perhaps I may persuade mother to let you go."

"Yes; but if she does, she will sit close against the wall with a lot of other fat old ladies, and they will talk over my head, and squeeze me almost to death, besides rumpling my dress; and I so want to wear my tucked pink grenadine, sister!"

"And you would like to have me go down with you; is that it?"

Jeannie's eyes beamed delightedly. "Oh, if you only would!"

Sarah looked down into the eager face and saw, in anticipation, her own little Belle imploring some boon, as important to her, as easy to be granted by another as this, and consented with a kiss.

"Run away and bring your finery here! Mother is too busy to attend to you. Mary can dress you."

The order was obeyed with lightning speed; and Sarah, still beholding in the excited child the foreshadowing of her darling's girlhood, superintended the toilet, while she made herself ready.

"What shall I wear, Jeannie?" she asked, carelessly, holding open the door of her wardrobe.

"O that lovely fawn-colored silk, please! the one with the black lace flounces! It is the prettiest color I ever saw; and I heard Mrs. Greyling tell another lady the night you wore it, when brother Lewis was here, you know, that it was one of the richest dresses in the room, modest as it looked, and that the flounces must have cost a penny!"

"Probably more!"

Sarah proceeded to array herself in the fortunate robe that had won the praise of the fashionably distinguished Mrs. Greyling. Her abundant dark hair was lighted by two coral sprigs, which formed the heads of her hair-pins, and handkerchief and gloves in hand, she was taking a last survey of Jeannie's more brilliant costume when there came a knock at the door.

"Mr. Benson!" said Mary, unclosing it.

“May I come in?” he asked.

The tidy Mary had removed all traces of the recent tiring operations from the apartment, which was a compound of parlor and dressing-room, a necessary adjunct to the small chamber and smaller nursery, leading out of it, at the side and rear.

“Mademoiselle, que vous êtes charmante! I am penetrated with profound admiration!” exclaimed the teasing brother-in-law, raising his hands in true melodramatic style.

Jeannie laughed and blushed until her cheeks matched the grenadine.

“Mrs. Hunt told me that you had changed your mind, and intended to grace the festive scene with your presence,” continued Philip, addressing Sarah. “She and Lucy are there, and the dancing has begun. I came to escort you and our fair débutante here—that is, unless some one else has offered his services and been accepted.”

“That is not likely, since Mr. Hammond left us in your care. Do not your fourfold duties oppress you?”

“Not in the least. If all of my charges were as chary of their calls upon me as you are, my time would hang heavily upon my hands. No one would imagine, from your reluctance to be waited upon, that you had been spoiled at home. If Mr. Hammond were here now, he would tell you to draw that shawl—”

“It is an opera-cloak!” interrupted Jeannie.

“A ball-cloak to-night, then, is it not? I was saying that, although the night is not cool for sea air, you had better wrap that mantle about your chest and throat as we go out.”

Just outside the door, a waiter passed them with a note in his hand. He stopped, on seeing Philip.

“Mr. Benson! I was on my way to your rooms with this, sir.”

Philip stepped back within the parlor to read it by the light. It was a line from a friend who had just arrived at another hotel, notifying him of this fact. It required no reply, and leaving it upon the table, he rejoined his companions.

“See mamma! Isn’t it just as I said?” whispered Jeannie, as she established herself beside her sister in a comfortable corner that commanded a view of the spacious hall and its gay, restless sea of figures.

Sarah smiled at discovering her mother sandwiched between two portly dowagers; one in purple, the other in lavender silk; all three bobbing and waiving in their earnest confabulations, in a style that presented a ludicrously marked resemblance to the gesticulations of a group of Muscovy ducks, on the margin of a mud-puddle, held by them in their capacity of a joint stock company.

“I see that Lucy has taken the floor,” observed Philip. “She will not thank me for any devoirs I could render her for the next three hours. If they get up anything so humdrum as quadrilles, may I ask the pleasure of your company for the set?”

“If you wish it—and my dress is not too grave in hue—”

“And too decorous in its make, you were about to add, I presume,” he finished the sentence bluntly. “It forms a refreshing contrast to the prevailing style around us.”

Lucy here flitted into sight, and her very bare arms and shoulders pointed her husband’s strictures. A stool, brought into the room for the use of some child or invalid looker-on of the festivities, now stood empty under Sarah’s chair, and Philip, espying it, seized upon and drew it forth. When seated, his mouth was nearly on a level with Sarah’s ear.

“This is pleasant!” he said. “We are quite as much isolated from the rest of mankind as if we were sitting among the heathery hillocks on Deal Beach. You do not love the visions of those tranquil, sunny days as I do. You never allude to them voluntarily. Yet you have had less to convert your dreams into every day actualities, tedious and prosaic, than I have. I stand in direful need of one of the old lectures, inculcating more charity, and less study of complex motives and biassed tendencies in the machine we call Man. Begin! I am at your mercy.”

“That is not surprising. Your husband is behind the age he lives in—and so are you. You two would make Barnum’s fortune, could he ever persuade the public of your idiosyncrasies.”

“What are you talking about?”

“Look around and through this room, and you will understand one part of my meaning. Do you remark the preponderance of married over single belles? and that the most tenderly deferential cavaliers are husbands, and not dancing with their wives? I could point out to you three men, leaders of the ton in this extremely reputable, eminently moral assembly, who, it is whispered among the knowing ones, are married, and, having left their domestic associations for a season of recreation, boldly attach themselves to certain stylish young ladies here, and challenge observation, defy public censure, by their marked and increasing devotion. I meet them strolling along the beach in the morning; riding together in the afternoon; and when not engaged in this evening exhibition of toilet and muscle, you will find them pacing the moon or star-lit piazza, or, perchance, again sentimentalizing on the shore until the witching hour draws near."

"You have no right to be surprised. You have the same thing continually before you in your city. Every fashionable hotel or boarding-house can supply you with such flirtations by the dozen. A married woman who declines the polite services of any gentleman, except her husband and near relatives, is a prude, with false scruples of propriety and delicacy. Let her legal partner complain—he is cried out upon as a despot, and you can trust the sweet angel of an abused wife to elude his vigilance—violence, she terms it—for the future, without altering her conduct in aught else. Do you see that pretty woman in blue—the one with the Madonna-like face? Her tyrant is here but once a week—from Saturday until Monday—then hies back to the business he loves as well as she does her pleasure. Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and the forenoon of Saturday, any moustachioed puppy may walk, talk, drive, and flirt with her—bask in the rays of those liquid orbs. When the rightful lord appears, she is demure as a nun, patient as a saint, dutiful as Griselda, to him and him alone. Do you begin to understand why I congratulated you upon having a husband of the olden stamp? why I do from my heart felicitate my friend Hammond upon having gained, as a helpmeet, one of that nearly obsolete species—Woman!"

Sarah's embarrassment was painful, and but indifferently concealed. She felt that it was barely excusable, in consideration of his fraternal relation to her, for Philip to speak so plainly of this social blemish; and altogether unpardonable, while he did not or could not prevent his wife's participation in the questionable gayeties he assailed so unsparingly. Reply she could not, without implicating Lucy in her reprobation, and he must perceive her difficulty. This was the trouble that lay uppermost. At her heart's core, the uneasy feeling she ever experienced in conversation with him; the stirring of the entombed love, of whose actual death she had horrible misgivings; the incongruous blending of past emotion with present duty, were now aggravated by the enforced acceptance of unmerited praise. Her woman's instinct, her experience as a wife, told her that the cause of the sinful recklessness, the contempt of the true spirit of the marriage tie was not the fruit merely of the vanity and thirst for adulation, to which it was properly attributed. With the recollection of her own life, the education she had received at home, the hateful, yet even to her independent spirit resistless decrees of society, there swelled up within her bosom something akin to Philip's bitter cynicism. Under this spur, she spoke.

"And from these signs of the times, you would argue an inherent degeneracy of womanhood—a radical change in its composition, such as some anatomists tell us has taken place in the structure of our bodies—our blood—our very teeth. A dentist, who filled a tooth for me the other day, imparted divers scientific items of information to me that may illustrate your position. 'Enamel, madam, is not what enamel was in the days of our ancestors!' he affirmed, pathetically. 'The color, the very ingredients of the bone, the calcareous base of the teeth differ sadly from the indestructible molars of fifty years ago.' At this passage of his jeremiade, he chanced to touch the nerve in the unhappy 'molar' he was excavating, and I am persuaded that I suffered as really as my grandmother would have done, had she sat in my place."

She paused, and beat time with her fingers on Jeannie's shoulder to the wild, varying waltz that swept the giddy crowd around the room in fast and flying circles.

"Your analogy asserts, then, that at heart women are alike in all ages?"

"Why not, as well as men?"

"Then why does not action remain the same, if that be true?"

"Because custom—fashion, if you prefer this name—an unaccountable, irresponsible power—owing its birth oftenest to accident or caprice, says, 'Do this!' and it is done! be it to perpetrate a cravat-bow, a marriage, or a murder!"

Another pause—in which music and dancers seemed sweeping on to sweet intoxication—so joyous in their abandon were the gushing strains; so swift the whirl of the living ring. The fingers played lightly and rapidly on Jeannie's plump shoulder—then rested on a half-beat.

"Yes!" She was looking towards the crowd, but her eye was fixed, and her accents slow and grave. "Hearts live and hearts love, while time endures. The heart selects its mate in life's spring-time, with judgment as untaught as that of the silly bird that asks no companion but the one the God of Nature has bestowed upon it. But see you not, my good brother"—she faced him, a smile wreathing her lip—a strange glitter in her eye—"see you not to what woeful disorders these untrained desires, this unsophisticated following out of unregulated affections would give rise? It would sap the foundations of caste; level all wholesome distinctions of society; consign the accomplished daughters of palatial halls—hoary with a semi-decade of years—to one-story cottages and a maid-of-all work; doom nice young men to the drudgery of business, for the remainder of their wretched lives, to maintain wives whose dowries would not keep their lily-handed lords in French kids for a year; cover managing mammas with ignominy, and hasten ambitious papas to their costly vaults in—as Dickens has it—"some genteel place of interment." Come what may of blasted hopes and wrecked hearts, the decencies of life must be observed. Every heart has its nerve—genuine, sensitive, sometimes vulgarly tenacious of life—but there are composites that will eat it out; fine, deadly wires, that can probe and torture and extract it. And when the troublesome thing is finally gotten rid of, there is an end to all obstacles to judicious courtships and eligible alliances!" She laughed scornfully, and Philip recoiled, without knowing why he did so, as he heard her.

"That is all very well, when the nature of the contract is understood on both sides," he said, gloomily. "I doubt, however, whether the beautiful economy of your system will be appreciated by those whose living hearts are bound to the bloodless plaster-casts you do describe."

"These accidents will occur in spite of caution on the part of the best managers of suitable marriages. By far the larger proportion of the shocks inflicted upon polite circles arise from this very cause. Pygmalion grows weary of wooing his statue, and wants sympathy in his disappointment and loneliness."

The dance was ended. The fantastic variations of the waltz were exchanged for a noble march—pealing through the heated rooms like a rush of the healthful sea-breeze. The spark died in Sarah's eye. Her voice took its habitual pitch.

"I have permitted myself to become excited, and, I am afraid, have said many things that I had no right to think—much less to utter. If my freedom has displeased you, I am sorry."

"The error—if error there were—was mine," rejoined Philip. "I led the conversation into the channel; you, after awhile, followed. I believe there is no danger of our misunderstanding each other."

"Darby and Joan! good children in the corner!" cried Lucy, flushed with exercise and radiant with good-humor, as she promenaded past them leaning on the arm of a young West Pointer, a native Southerner and an acquaintance of Philip's. If his wife must flirt and frolic, he was watchful that she did not compromise him by association with doubtful characters. On several occasions, the advances of gay gentlemen, whose toilets were more nearly irreproachable than their reputations, had been checked by his cool and significant resumption of the husband's post beside the belle, and if need existed, by the prompt withdrawal of the unwilling lady from the scene. The cadet laughed, and, convinced that she had said a witty thing, Lucy swam by.

"The common sense of our tropes and rhodomontades and allegories is this!" said Philip, biting his lip, and speaking in a hard tone. "The only safe ground in marriage is mutual, permanent affection. You meant to convey the idea that if each of these dressy matrons, humming around our ears, had a sincere, abiding love for her husband—and each of these gallant Benedicks the right kind of regard for his wedded Beatrice, the vocation of us corner censors would be gone?"

"Well said, Mr. Interpreter!" she responded in affected jest.

"This point settled, will you take my arm for a turn through the room before the next set is formed? They are talking of quadrilles. I shall claim your promise if a set is made up, unless you are not courageous enough to have the public sneer by dancing with your brother. Come, Jeannie, and walk with us."

Two sets of quadrilles were arranged at different ends of the saloon. Philip led Sarah through one, with Lucy—who considered it a capital joke—and the partner vis à-vis to them Jeannie, meanwhile, remaining by her mother.

The summer nights were short; and, when the dance was over, Sarah intimated to her younger sister the propriety of retiring. Mrs. Hunt's head ached, and she esteemed the sacrifice comparatively light, therefore, that she, too, had to leave the revels and accompany the child to her chamber. Sarah's apartments were on the same floor, several doors further on. Having said "Good-night" to the others, she and Philip walked slowly along the piazzas, light as day in the moonbeams, until they reached her outer room, the parlor.

"I hope you will experience no ill effects from your dissipation," said Philip, in playful irony. "In a lady of your staid habits, this disposition to gayety is alarming. Absolutely eleven o'clock! What will Hammond say when he hears the story? Good-night! Don't let your conscience keep you awake!"

Sarah opened the door softly, that she might not startle the baby-sleeper in the inner room. The lamp was shining brightly, and by it sat—her husband!

CHAPTER XVI.

Lewis had entered his wife's room within fifteen minutes after she left it. He looked so ill and weary that the girl, Mary, gave a stifled scream of fright and surprise.

"Are you sick, sir?" she asked, hastily, as he threw off his hat, and wiped his pale forehead. "Shall I tell Mrs. Hammond that you are here? She went down to the ball-room awhile ago."

"What did you say? No!" replied he, shortly.

His frown rather than his tone silenced her. He had picked up the envelope Philip had dropped on the table, and his face darkened still more. Too proud to question a servant of her mistress' actions and associates, he believed that he had gathered from this mute witness all that it was needful to know. As a privileged habitué of the cozy boudoir he had been at such pains to procure and make fit for his wife's occupancy, another had sat here and read his evening mail, while awaiting her leisure; careless of appearances, since the deceived one would not be there to notice them, had tossed this note down with as much freedom as he would have done in his own apartment.

Through the open windows poured the distant strains of the band; and, seized by a sudden thought, he caught up his hat and strode out, along piazzas and through halls, to the entrance-door of the ball saloon. As Sarah's ill-fortune ordained it, the piercing glance that ran over and beyond the crowd of spectators and dancers detected her at the instant of Philip's taking his lowly seat at her side. Jeannie's pink attire was concealed by the drapery of a lady, whose place in the set then forming was directly in front of her. Lewis saw but the two, virtually tête-à-tête; and, as he obtained fleeting glimpses of them through the shifting throng, marked Philip's energetic, yet confidential discourse, and the intencness with which she listened, until, warmed or excited by his theme, Sarah lifted her downcast eyes and spoke, with what feeling and effect her auditor's varying expression showed.

The gazer stood there like a statue, unheeding the surprised and questioning looks cast by passers-by upon his travelling-dress, streaked with dust—his sad and settled visage, so unbefitting the scene within—while Philip made the tour of the room, with Sarah upon his arm, until they took their stations for the dance; he, courteous and attentive—she, smiling and happy, more beautiful in her husband's eyes than her blonde sister opposite; and he could stay no longer. If Mary had thought him sick and cross at his former entrance, she considered him savage now, for one who was ordinarily a kind and gentle master.

"You can go to your room!" he ordered, not advised. "I will sit up for Mrs. Hammond!"

"I have slept in the nursery, sir, while you were away."

"That cannot be to-night. I will find you some other place."

He had no intention that the anticipated conversation with his wife should be overheard.

"I can stay with a friend of mine, sir, only a few doors off."

"Very well."

Quickly and quietly the nurse arranged the night-lamp and the child's food, that her mistress might have no trouble during her absence, and went out.

Baby Belle slumbered on, happily wandering through the guileless mazes of baby dream-land; one little arm, bared from the sleeve of her gown, thrown above her head—the hand of the other cradling her cheek. The father ventured to press a light kiss upon the red lips. In his desolation, he craved this trifling solace. The child's face was contorted by an expression of discomfort, and, still dreaming, she murmured, in her inarticulate language, some pettish expression of disgust.

"My very child shrinks from me! It is in the blood!" said the unhappy man, drawing back from the crib.

If his resolution had waned at sight of the sleeper, it was fixed again when he returned to his chair in the outer room. He raised his head from his folded arms when he heard Philip and Sarah approaching, but did not otherwise alter his position. The low tone of their parting words—one soon learned by the sojourners in hotels and watering-places, where thin partitions and ventilators abound—was, to him, the cautiously repressed voice of affectionate good-nights. But one clause was distinct—“What will Hammond say, when he hears the story?” They jested thus of him, then. One of them, at least, should learn ere long what he would say.

Sarah changed color with amazement and vague alarms—emotion that paralyzed her momentarily. Then, as she discerned the tokens of disorder in his dress and countenance, she hurried forward.

“What has brought you so unexpectedly? Are you sick? Has anything happened?”

He did not rise; and, resting her hand on his shoulder, she stooped for a kiss. But his stern gaze never moved from hers—anxious and inquiring—and his lips were like stone.

“Lewis, speak to me! If you have dreadful news to tell me, for pity’s sake, do not keep me in suspense!”

“I have nothing to say that will be new to you,” he said, without relaxing his hard, cold manner, “and not a great deal that ought to have been kept back from me when I wished to marry you, believing that you had a heart to give me with your hand.”

As if struck in the face, Sarah sank back into a chair, speechless and trembling.

“Yes! had you been sincere with me then, grieved and disappointed as I would have felt, I would have respected you the more, and loved you none the less for the disclosure. But when, after a year and a half of married life, I learn that the woman I have loved and trusted with my whole soul—from whom I have never concealed a thought that it could interest her to know—has all the while been playing a false part—vowing at the altar to love me and me alone, when she secretly idolized another; bearing my name, living beneath my roof, sleeping in my bosom—yet thinking of and caring for him, treasuring his keepsakes as the most precious of her possessions—is it strange that, when the tongue of a vulgar gossip proclaims my shame in my hearing, and other evidence proves what I thought was his vile slander, to be true as gospel—is it strange, I say, that I am incensed at the deception practised upon me—at the infamous outrage of my dearest hopes—my most holy feelings?”

She threw herself at his feet, clasped his knees, and implored him, chokingly, to “forgive” her. “Oh! if you knew what I have suffered!”

“What you have suffered!” He folded his arms and looked sorrowfully down at her crouching figure. “Yes! you were not by nature coarse and unfeeling! The violence you have committed upon your heart and every principle of delicacy and truth must have cost you pain. Then, you loved him!”

“Once! a long while ago!” said Sarah, hiding her face in her hands.

“Take care!” There was no softness now in his tone. “Remember that I have seen you together day by day, and that glances and actions, unnoticed at the time in my stupid blindness, recur to me now with terrible meaning. For once, speak the true voice of feeling, and own what I know already, that all the love you ever had to give belongs still to your sister’s husband!”

“I will speak the truth!” Sarah arose and stood before him—face livid and eyes burning. “I did love this man! I married you, partly to please my parents, partly because I found out that by some means my secret had fallen into unscrupulous hands, and I was mad with dread of its exposure! It seemed to me that no worse shame could come upon me than to have it trumpeted abroad that I had bestowed my love unsought, and was ready to die because it was slighted. I have learned since that it is far, far worse to live a lie—to despise myself! Oh! that I had died then!” She battled with the emotion that threatened to overwhelm her, and went on. “Once bound to you, it has been my hourly endeavor to feel and act as became the faithful wife of a kind, noble man. If, sometimes, I have erred in thought—if my feelings have failed me in the moment of trial—yet, in word and deed, in look and gesture, I have been true to you. No one have I deceived more thoroughly than Philip Benson. He never suspected my unfortunate partiality for himself; he believes me still, what I would give worlds to become in truth, your loyal, loving wife! It is well that you know the truth at last. I do not ask you how you have obtained the outlines of a disgraceful story, that I have tried a thousand times to tell you, but was prevented by the fear of losing your favor forever. This is my poor defence—not against your charges, but in palliation of the sin of which they justly accuse me. I can say nothing more. Do with me as you will!”

“It is but just to myself that you should hear the circumstances which accidentally revealed this matter to me."

He narrated the scene at the restaurant, and the discovery of the evening. He evinced neither relenting nor sympathy in the recital. Her confession had extinguished the last ray of hope, cherished, though unacknowledged by himself, that she might extenuate her error or give a more favorable construction to the evidence against her. It was not singular that, in the reaction of disappointment, he was ready to believe that he had not heard all; to imagine that he could perceive throughout her statement a disposition to screen Philip, that was, in itself, a proof of disingenuousness, if not deliberate falsehood. She denied that he had ever been aware of her attachment or had reciprocated it. What meant then those words—"hopes in time to have a nearer claim?" what those impassioned verses? what the linking of their initials within the shell? the motto on the wooden tablet? While these subtle queries were insinuated into his soul by some mocking spirit, he concluded the history of the discovery of the casket.

"I have never opened it since the night before I was married," said Sarah, with no haste of self-justification. "I put it into the drawer the day after we went to our house. It has not been unlocked from that day to this."

"Why keep it at all, unless as a memento of one still dear to you?"

"I felt as if I had buried it. I said to myself: 'If the time ever comes when I can disinter these relics and show them to my husband, without a pang or fear, as mementoes of a dead and almost forgotten folly, he shall destroy them, and I shall have gained a victory that will insure my lifelong happiness.'"

"And that time has never arrived."

She would have spoken, but her tongue proved traitorous. She crimsoned and was silent.

Lewis smiled drearily. "You see that I know you better than you do yourself. It is well, as you have said, that I know all at last. I pity you! If I could, I would release you from your bondage. As it is, I will do all that I can for this end."

"Never!" cried Sarah, shuddering. "Have you forgotten our child?"

"I have not!" His voice shook for a second. "She is all that unites us now. For the sake of her future—her good name—an open separation ought to be avoided, if possible. If it be inevitable, your conduct must not be the ostensible cause. To quiet malicious tongues, you must remain here awhile longer under your mother's care. To accomplish the same end, I must appear once more in public, and on apparently friendly terms with—your brother-in-law. When your mother returns to the city, you had best go, too, and to your own house. Your brother Robert is now sixteen years old—steady and manly enough to act as your protector. Invite him to stay with you, and also Jeannie, if you find it lonely."

"What are you saying? Where will you be that you speak of my choosing another protector?"

"A very incompetent one I have proved myself to be!" he returned, with the same sad smile. "I have not been able to shield you from invidious reports; still less to save you from yourself. I sail for Europe day after tomorrow."

"Lewis, you will not! If you ever loved me, do not desert me and our child now! I will submit to any punishment but this!" She clung anew to his knees as she poured out her prayer.

Not a month ago she had turned pale with fright at the suggestion of this voyage. It was sheer acting then! why not now?

"Objections are useless!" he said. "My arrangements are made. I have passed my word."

"But you will not leave me in anger! Say that you forgive me! that you will return soon, and this miserable night be forgotten!"

"Shall I tell you when I will return?" He raised her head, and looked straight into her eyes. "When you write to me, and tell me that you have destroyed the love-tokens in that box; when you bid me come back for your sake—not for our child's! Until then, I shall believe that my presence would be irksome to you. It is necessary for our house to have a resident partner in England. It is my expectation to fill that place for some time to come; it shall be for you to say how long."

Bowed as Sarah's spirit was beneath the burst of the long dreaded storm and her accusing conscience, her womanly pride revolted at this speech. She had humbled herself in the dust at the feet of a man whom she did not love; had borne meekly his reproaches; submitted dumbly to the degrading suspicions that far transcended her actual sin: but as the idea of her suing servilely for the love she had never yet valued; of him, indifferent and independent, awaiting afar off for her petition—hers, whom he had abandoned to the scornful sneers of the keen-witted hyenas of society; to the cross-examination of her distrustful relatives; the stings of remorse; left in one word to herself!—as this picture grew up clearly before her mind, the tide of feeling turned.

"You reject my prayers and despise my tears!" she said, proudly. "You refuse to accept of my humiliation. Yet you do not doubt me, as you would have me believe that you do! Else you would not dare to trust me—the keeper of your honor and your child's fair name—out of your sight! I throw back the charge in your teeth, and tell you that your conduct gives it the lie! I have asked you—shame on me that I did!—to continue to me the shelter of your name and presence, to shield me, a helpless woman, more unhappy than guilty, from the ban of the world, and you deny me everything but a contemptible shadow of respectability, which the veriest fool can penetrate. I would not have you suppose that your generous confidence in my integrity"—she brought out the words with scathing contempt—"will deter me from sinking to the level you are pleased to assign me. If the native dignity of my womanhood, the principles I inherit from my father, my love for my innocent babe do not hold me back from ruin, be assured that the hope of winning your approval will not. To you I make no pledges of reformation; I offer but one promise. If you choose to remain abroad until I, in spirit, kiss your feet, and pray you to receive a love such as most men are glad to win by assiduity of attention, and every pleasing art—which you would force into being by wilful and revengeful absence—you will never see your native land again until the grass grows upon my grave!" She paused for breath, and continued more slowly. "While your child lives, and I remain her guardian, I will use your means for her maintenance—will reside in your house. If she dies, or you take her from me, I will not owe you my support for a single day more!"

Lewis grew pallid to his lips; but he, too, was proud, and his stubborn will was called into bold exercise.

"Very well! It is in your choice to accede to my propositions, or not. A share in all that I have is yours; not only during the child's life, but as long as you live. Before I leave America, I shall deposit for you in your father's bank a sum, which, I hope, you will find sufficient to maintain you in comfort. Your father will be my executor in this matter. I shall not confide to him the peculiar circumstances of my departure, leaving you at liberty to act in this respect, as in everything else, according to the dictates of your will and pleasure. At the end of a certain term of years specified by law, you can, if you wish, procure a divorce on the ground of my wilful and continued desertion of you; in which case, the provision for your support will remain unchanged. As to the child—the mother's is the strongest claim. I shall never take her from you. Do not let me keep you up longer. It is late!"

With a silent inclination of the head, she withdrew, and he cast himself upon the sofa, there to lie during the few hours of the night that were yet unspent.

He had arisen, and was standing at the window when Sarah entered in the morning. But for the dark shadows under the eyes, and the tight-drawn look about the mouth, she appeared as usual; and her "Good-morning," if cold, was yet polite.

"I imagine," she said, as the gong clashed out its second call, "that you wish me to accompany you to breakfast, and to preserve my ordinary manner towards you when others are by. Am I right?"

"You are. This is all I ask. The effort will not be a tedious one. I leave here at noon."

Arm in arm they directed their steps towards the great dining-hall—to the view of the spectator as comfortable and happy a pair as any that pursued that route on that summer morning. Together they sat down at table, and Mr. Hammond ordered "his lady's" breakfast with his own. Mrs. Hunt bustled in shortly after they were seated, full of wonderment at having heard from Sarah's maid of her master's unexpected arrival; while Jeannie gave his hand a squeeze as hearty as was the welcome in her smiling face. The Bensons were always late. So much the better. There were more people present to observe the cordial meeting between the brothers-in-law, made the more conspicuous by Philip's surprise. The genuineness of his good spirits, his easy, unembarrassed manner was the best veil that could have been devised for Sarah's constraint and Lewis's counterfeit composure.

It did not escape Philip's eye that Sarah ate nothing, and spoke only to avoid the appearance of singularity, and he believed that he had discovered the origin of her trouble when Lewis communicated his purpose of foreign travel. When the burst of surprise subsided, the latter tried successfully to represent his plan as a business necessity. Lucy, who never saw an inch beyond her nose—morally and mentally speaking—except when her intuitions were quickened by self-love, was the questioner most to be dreaded.

“Why don't you go with him?” she inquired of her sister. “He should not stir one step without me, if I were in your place. Only think! you might spend six months in Paris!”

“How would Baby Belle relish a sea voyage!” returned Sarah.

“Nonsense! How supremely silly! One would suppose that she was the only member of the family whose comfort was to be consulted. Rather than expose her to the possibility of inconvenience, you will deprive yourself of profit and pleasure, and be separated from your husband for nobody knows how long. This shows how much these model married people really care for one another. When put to the test they are no better than we poor sinners, whom everybody calls flirts. Phil, are those muffins warm? This one of mine has grown cold while I was talking.”

“Yes, and are in capital order. You could have left us no more acceptable reminder of yourself than those same fine bays.”

“If you have no other engagement, suppose we have them up before the light carriage after breakfast, and take a short drive.”

“Agreed, with all my heart! unless Mrs. Hammond quarrels with me for robbing her of a portion of your last morning with her.”

“She will forgive you!” Lewis rejoined, to spare her the effort of reply.

From her window Sarah saw them whirl off along the beach in sight of the hundreds of spectators on the sands and about the hotels, and recognized the ingenuity of this scheme for proclaiming the amicable feeling between the two.

“But one more scene, and the hateful mockery is over!” thought the wife, as she heard her husband's step outside the door on his return.

She snatched a paper from the table, and seemed absorbed in its contents, not looking up at his entrance. Lewis made several turns through the room, sighed heavily, and once paused, as if about to address her, but changed his mind.

Then sounded from without the fresh, gurgling laugh of a child, and the nurse came in with the baby—rosy and bright—from her morning walk on the shore. She almost sprang from Mary's hold at sight of her father, and dismissing the woman with a word, he took his darling into his arms, and sat down behind his wife. Inflexibly sullen, Sarah tried not to listen, as she would not see them; but she heard every sound: the child's soft coo of satisfaction as she nestled in the father's bosom; the many kisses he imprinted upon her pure face and mouth—what agony Sarah well knew—the irregular respiration, sometimes repressed, until its breaking forth was like sobs; and the proud, miserable heart confessed reluctantly that, in one respect, his share of their divided lot was heavier than hers. She was not to witness his final resignation of his idol. Under color of summoning Mary, he carried the infant from the room, and came back without her.

His voice was calm, and its firmness destroyed what slender encouragement she might have drawn from the scene with his child, to hope for some modification of his resolution.

“Will you write to me, at regular intervals, to give me news of Belle?”

“Certainly, if such is your wish.”

“And yourself? you will be careful of your health, will you not? And, if I can ever serve you in any way, you will let me know?”

“It is not likely that you can; thank you.”

There was a silence of some moments. Sarah stood playing with the tassel of her morning-robe, pale and composed.

“Sarah!” Lewis took her hand. “We have both been hasty, both violent! Unfeeling as you think me, and as I may have seemed in this affair, believe me that it almost kills me to part from you so coldly. It is not like me to retract a determination, but if you will say now what you did last night—‘Do not go!’ I will stay and be as good a husband to you as I can. Shall we not forgive, and try to forget?”

The demon of resentful pride was not so easily exorcised. At a breath of repentance—a suggestion of compromise, the fell legion rallied an impregnable phalanx. She was frozen, relentless; her eyes, black and haughty, met his with an answer her tongue could not have framed in words.

“I have nothing to say!”

“‘Nothing!’ The ocean must then separate us for years—it may be forever!”

“It was your choice. I will not reverse it.”

“Not if you knew that if you let me go I would never return?”

“Not if I knew that you would never return!”

Without another word, without a farewell look, or the hand-grasp mere strangers exchange, he left her there—the stony monument of her ill-directed life and affections; the victim of a worldly mother and a backbiting tongue!

(Conclusion next month.)

THE COMEDY OF AN EVENING.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

Dramatis Personæ.

MR. LEROY, a middle-aged gentleman of fortune.
 DR. SAMPSON, brother-in-law to MR. LEROY, and living in his family.
 DR. HEMMINGWAY, friend to DR. SAMPSON.
 MR. HARVEY LAWRENCE, cousin of MRS. MEDFORD.
 MRS. MEDFORD.
 MISS THERESA LEROY, } daughters of MR. LEROY.
 MISS EMILY LEROY, }
 MISS LUZETTA LEROY, }

SCENE I.—MRS. MEDFORD'S sitting-room. MRS. MEDFORD and MR. HARVEY LAWRENCE.

Mrs. Medford. Thirty-five, and not engaged! What keeps you, Harvey, from marrying? You are handsome, wealthy, and attractive.

Mr. Lawrence (ironically). You are no flatterer, Mrs. Medford, ah?

Mrs. Medford. No, I am no flatterer. I only say what you already believe to be true. A bachelor's life is, at best, a heartless life.

Mr. Lawrence. And what do I want of a heart, pray? Don't I have aches enough already? My heart throbbed all last week, and my teeth have troubled me for a fortnight. You, no doubt, would be pleased to see me pouring out tears, and reciting verses, like a lover in the Arabian Nights; but, really, unless I can meet with your counterpart—

Mrs. Medford. Either talk sensibly, Harvey, or give up talking entirely.

Mr. Lawrence. And leave all the time to you, Mrs. Medford, in which to deliver your homilies on marriage. Were all husbands as happy as Mr. Medford, I might change my views on the subject; as it is, St. Paul, Hannah More, and myself, form an excellent trio in favor of celibacy.

Mrs. Medford. Hannah More herself came within an ace of marrying; and if you were more like St. Paul, I should have less objections to your remaining single. But, placed as you are, you are leading a heartless, selfish, dangerous life—(Mr. Lawrence smiles); for it is dangerous, Harvey. If you were poor, it would be different; but with wealth enough, and time enough, and Satan to find work for your idle hands—I tremble for you, Harvey!

pear perfectly calm, and I assure you it is entirely unnecessary.

Mrs. Medford. Just think of it, Harvey! Your mornings are all dogs and horses, your afternoons all smoke and billiards, your evenings all waltzes and wine.

Mr. Lawrence. How unjust! All yesterday I devoted to your charming self; and, to-night, I intend to spend the evening with the three Miss Leroy's, when I certainly shall not waltz, and wine is highly improbable.

Mrs. Medford. The Miss Leroy's! For once, Fortune favors me! If you ever intend to relinquish your obduracy, you will never have a better opportunity than the present. They are, at once, fascinating and intelligent. They sing like syrens.

Mr. Lawrence. And are as amiable as angels, and as beautiful as Peris—the only trouble being, there are too many of them. I'm not prepared to take three at once; and, besides, I am not sure you would better my morals by making me turn Mormon.

Mrs. Medford. But I am in earnest, Harvey. They are, really, very uncommon girls, and so different from each other that you have the widest liberty of choice. Do you know them, already?

Mr. Lawrence. Very slightly. I have met them at parties, and admire them all. They are, as you say, very unlike each other.

Mrs. Medford. Theresa now; she is exactly the person I would wish you to marry. She converses with the dignity of a queen, and would preside at your table—

Mr. Lawrence. O yes! I shall certainly marry Theresa. But Emily—what of her?

Mrs. Medford. Oh, she is as amiable as the day is long. She doesn't read much, it is true; but you have a horror of learned ladies, and perhaps you will prefer her to Theresa; but, for my part—

Mr. Lawrence. O delightful! I admire one of these waxy women, that will take your stamp, whatever it is. As for the youngest one?

Mrs. Medford. Luzette, you mean. She is a bright little butterfly, pretty and pleasant enough; but then I hadn't thought of her. Theresa seems to me more fitted than either of the others to render you happy. I hope—

Servant (at the door). Mrs. Pendleton is in the parlor.

Mrs. Medford. Don't forget my injunctions, Harvey; I am really in earnest.

Mr. Lawrence. You must give me leave to cast lots, Mrs. Medford.

[Exit MRS. MEDFORD.]

Mr. Lawrence (solus). It is as she says. I am leading a heartless, selfish, dangerous life. I am sick of it! tired to death of cigars and billiards, and balls and parties, and dancing and flirtations! Bah! those girls at Saratoga! I want to do something serious and sensible; I wish I were anything—a student of theology—a missionary to the Tulus—anything but what I am—a poor, miserable, pleasure-seeking fool! I have half a mind to follow her directions and marry Theresa Leroy. It, at least, would be what people call a sensible proceeding; she has property, she has family, she has intellect, she has good looks; she has also two sisters, possessing equal advantages with herself. One of the family must certainly furnish the future Mrs. Lawrence. Adieu to hotels and billiards! I mean to live a nobler and a better life. It will certainly be easier to do right with some good angel to point out the way.

SCENE II.—MR. LEROY'S parlor. DR. HEMMINGWAY seated.

Enter DR. SAMPSON.

Dr. Sampson. What? Hemmingway? You are a sight to do my eyes good. I've been down to your office every day, for a fortnight, and always found the door shut. How is Miss What-'s-her-name—the case of fits? Does the medicine suit her?

Dr. Hemmingway. I can scarcely say. She had a spasm yesterday, though not so violent as the day before.

Dr. Sampson. What a splendid opportunity for your investigation! I quite envy you to have her among your patients. You seem to have all the remarkable cases. Are you going to amputate young Nicholson's leg?

Dr. Hemmingway. We are hoping to avoid an operation. If we are compelled to use the knife, you must certainly be present.

Dr. Sampson. I am expecting, to-morrow, to remove the tumor, of which I told you, from the neck of an old lady sixty-nine years old. Let me call for you, may I, at nine o'clock? Most of the fraternity at our end will be there.

It will be a difficult and somewhat painful operation, though, of course, I shall use chloroform. (He holds up a bottle.)

Dr. Hemmingway. That chloroform? I thought it was a cologne bottle when I saw it in your hands. By the way, have you read Jessup's Essay on the Uses and Abuses of Chloroform?

Dr. Sampson. Yes; and the answer to it.

Dr. Hemmingway. Answer? I hav'n't seen it. My four boys must be my excuse; but you have all your spare moments; unless, indeed, they are given to your nieces, who are, I hear, the belles of the town, and the sweetest singers in the county.

Dr. Sampson. My nieces! Pshaw! They are pleasant enough in their way, but they are no society for a man of science.

Dr. Hemmingway. You are censorious. I have heard them all well spoken of; but Theresa, especially, I have always regarded as a young lady of superior mind.

Dr. Sampson. I never intimated that she had no mind. I said she had no science, and she has none. Her desire for knowledge is limited by the acquirements of those around her. If her companions knew nothing but their letters, she would never get beyond the abs in the spelling-book. She was the best scholar in the school she attended. She desired to excel, and she excelled. She is now in society; she is ambitious to please, and she pleases.

Dr. Hemmingway. A little artful, perhaps? It seems to be the special temptation of young ladies.

Dr. Sampson. A little artful? I am positively afraid of her. She is like a checker-man that has been in the king-row; she can move both ways and jump on either side. She is, however, I suppose, a good girl, and I am very much attached to her; I am to all my nieces.

Dr. Hemmingway. And Emily; does she resemble her?

Dr. Sampson. Emily? No; she is one of the yielding sort, and takes her form, like a jelly, from the mould she is put in. She has not strength enough to oppose; she would yield alike to Satan or an angel.

Dr. Hemmingway. And Luzetta?

Dr. Sampson. Oh, Letta? Bless her little heart! She is the sunshine of the house! She is truthful, and good-tempered, and conscientious; but she has about as much science as a kitten, and is as noisy as a Guinea-hen. I spent all one evening explaining to her the circulation of the blood, and the next morning she had forgotten it all, and refused to hear it over.

Dr. Hemmingway. Poor fellow! what man ever endured such afflictions? But I must not delay; I have stayed too long already. Can you not call with me now on Miss Clark, the young lady who has spasms?

Dr. Sampson. Certainly, there is nothing to detain me, but this bottle of chloroform. I was intending to take it up to the office, but as you are in haste, I will leave it here. It is a neat looking bottle, and the girls, silly butterflies, never meddle with anything pertaining to science.

SCENE III.—MRS. LEROY'S parlor. MISS THERESA seated in full dress by the table.

Miss Theresa (solo). Three of us, and all at home; it is so provoking! Two young ladies at once in a family, are only just passable; but three is beyond all endurance. In such a family, a tête-à-tête is quite out of the question, and a flirtation is simply impossible. Among so many sisters, one attracts no more attention than a single blossom of a compound flower. You are never viewed individually but collectively. I always get my invitations in this way: "Please come, Miss Theresa, or send one of your sisters." I am always known by the town's people as "one of the Leroy's." And, to-night, instead of having a clear field, in which case I should feel sure of a conquest, I must meet Mr. Lawrence in company with my two rival sisters. But Emily and Luzetta cannot have equal chances with myself. I can play a better game than both of them together; and I shall do it. Emily I will throw into the background. Luzetta is too talkative by far, when she is excited. I will humor her bent; she shall appear like a noisy child; I will be dignified, yet affable; but above all things I will be observant.

Enter EMILY and LUZETTA.

Emily. Theresa, how do I look?

Theresa. Very nicely. If I were you I would have worn that corn-colored bow.

Luzetta. That bow? It makes her look like a fright. Do I look well? I've spent time enough; I hope I do. I can't help it, Theresa; you always seem so calm, and dewy, and indifferent, as if it made no difference whether you pleased or not; but I never can be satisfied without I know that people are pleased with me, and I with them. Should you care because you talked so much when I met Mr. Lawrence before at the Gibson party? I can't help it; I've been troubled about it ever since.

Theresa. Nonsense! He liked you all the better for it. He enjoys a gay girl, I have no doubt. You must talk to-night, for I feel as though I could scarcely say a word. There is no danger of being too lively. Say what you like, and enjoy it.

Emily (languidly seating herself). What is that bottle on the table? I never saw it before.

Theresa. It is a cologne-bottle I should think. Do you wish for some? (She passes the bottle towards Emily.)

Luzetta (who is standing by her and takes the bottle). Here; give it to me. I've a penknife in my pocket to take out the cork. (She tries to remove the cork.) I never saw a cork in so tightly. (She tries again.) Oh, here it comes. Do you want some, Emily? (She takes out her own handkerchief and perfumes it.) If you do, hand me your handkerchief. I've drenched mine. (They hand their handkerchiefs, which she moistens from the bottle.) Here, Emily, let me pour some on your hair. (She pours some on Emily's hair.) And Theresa, I will anoint you with oil. (She pours some on Theresa's hair.)

Theresa (pettishly). I wish, Luzetta, you would be quiet. You are wetting my collar, and spilling it on my neck. If you want the cologne, use it yourself; and besides, I never saw any perfumery like it; it is very strange and unpleasant.

Luzetta. Well; it is not much like cologne I must confess. I hope Bridget hears the bell; it must be he. I didn't mean to vex you, Theresa. (Aside.) O dear! I wish I hadn't touched that bottle; I never saw anything like it before, and hope I never shall again. (She smells of her handkerchief, and places the bottle on a mantle in another part of the room.)

Emily. It is a gentleman's step in the entry. It must be he.

Theresa. Don't talk so loud.

Enter MR. LAWRENCE.

Mr. Lawrence. Good evening, Miss Leroy. (He shakes hands with Theresa.) Good evening, Miss Emily (he shakes hands); and Miss Luzetta (shakes hands).

Theresa. We are happy to meet you again. Pray, be seated.

Mr. Lawrence. And I to renew the acquaintances I formed at Miss Gibson's party. I remember your repartée, Miss Luzetta; and the sprig of honeysuckle you gave me, Miss Leroy, I shall keep among my treasures. (Miss Theresa bows.) Have you been well since we last met? all of you?

Luzetta (rather drowsily). Quite well—thank you; quite—well—thank—you.

Mr. Lawrence. I am happy to hear it. Mrs. Medford was speaking of you this afternoon, and said you had been devoting yourselves to music of late. It is a divine accomplishment! One can enjoy it either in society or in solitude. It seems to me far superior, as an art, to painting; does it not to you, Miss Leroy?

Theresa (very drowsily). It is very pretty—thank you—sir—very—pretty—indeed.

Mr. Lawrence. Mrs. Medford assures me I must imitate Ulysses; but I prefer to try and make friends with the syrens than to seek to avoid them. (During these remarks, the young ladies are becoming more and more unconscious, and are now lost to all around them.)

Mr. Lawrence. I hope I shall be able to practise now and then with you, before I leave. I play a little upon the flute—very little to be sure, but I am passionately fond of it. Are there many singers in the place, Miss Luzetta? (Mr. Lawrence, who has been observing them before, here perceives that they are all apparently asleep. He supposes it to be a joke.) I appreciate the wit of your idea, young ladies; and, though I am the subject of your jest, I can enjoy it with you—provided, of course, it is not continued too long. (He waits a moment.) Ah, you are unrelenting! I shall be obliged to wait for your returning smiles, and solace myself with books. What have you here? (He takes up the books on the table.) Godey's Lady's Book, Great Expectations, Bryant's Poems. (He opens the latter, and turns over the leaves.) Oh, here we have something to the point! (He reads aloud.)

"If slumber, sweet Lisena,
Hath stolen o'er thine eyes,
As night steals o'er the glory
Of Spring's transparent skies;
Wake, in thy scorn and beauty,
And listen to the strain
That murmurs my devotion,
And mourns for thy disdain."

(He pauses and looks around him.)

Indeed, Miss Luzetta, since I find you so obdurate, I must take my own way of awaking you. (He rises, and taking the hand of Luzetta, who is next him, presses it to his lips, when he perceives that her stupor is unaffected.) Can it be possible that you really are asleep? I must entreat you, young ladies, if you are in jest, to please, for my sake, discontinue it. It bears too much the semblance of reality. (He takes the lamp and holds it close to the faces of EMILY and THERESA. He puts down the lamp.) Where am I? Tell me, are you awake, or is it I who sleep? It seems as if I were wandering around in a strange dream, from which it is impossible to awaken. Have I gone really mad? Is not this the vision of a distempered brain? It is too terrible—too terrible a thought! (He walks back and forth.)

Theresa speaks. One thing is certain. If I cannot succeed in winning Mr. Lawrence, neither of my sisters ever shall. That thing is certain—that thing is certain—that thing is certain.

Mr. Lawrence. It is past comprehension. Surely, they cannot be subject to such turns. Luzetta, there, I like the best; she's laughing in her sleep.

Luzetta speaks. I want to please him of course, but I won't try; I hate trying. He shall either like me for what I am, or he sha'n't like me at all. I won't be a hypocrite.

Mr. Lawrence. That's right, Luzetta. I'll remember that when I come to choose the future Mrs. Lawrence. But, really, I must do something to get away from this absurd situation. Perhaps, however, I am mad, and yet my head seems clear. If I am mad, I may as well do one thing as another. (He seizes MISS THERESA, and begins to shake her with considerable force.) Wake, wake, for mercy's sake! wake! wake! (While he is thus engaged, MR. LEROY rushes in.)

Mr. Leroy (very angrily). Sir, what does this mean? I demand an explanation. Is this the part of a gentleman to startle us with the cries of a madman?

Mr. Lawrence (pointing around him). My only explanation, sir, is the state of these young ladies. I found them—

Mr. Leroy. Found them? You villain! Found them? Out, out of my house, before you can tell what infernal arts you have practised upon them.

Mr. Lawrence. But certainly, Mr. Leroy, I am as unable as yourself to account for their situation.

Mr. Leroy. My daughters are not idiots. Out of my house! out of my house! and thank Heaven that I have not a pistol with me. To have done this injury you must have been a fiend, and not a man.

Mr. Lawrence. But, sir—

Mr. Leroy. Leave my house.

SCENE IV.—MR. LEROY'S library. MISSES THERESA and LUZETTA seated in rocking-chairs, partially recovered, but looking very weary. MR. LEROY walking up and down the floor.

Mr. Leroy. I wish (he clutches his hands) I wish—

Enter DR. SAMPSON.

Dr. Sampson (hurriedly). What, you sick? Not much, I hope, for I can't possibly stay. Hemmingway took me off with him to see one of his patients; fits—remarkable fits. But I can't stop a moment; I only came in to ask about a bottle, that I left upon the parlor table.

Mr. Leroy. What kind of a bottle?

Dr. Sampson. A bottle of chloroform.

Luzetta (starting up). Theresa, Theresa, the mystery is explained. That bottle of cologne—

Theresa. Was a bottle of chloroform. What will Mr. Lawrence think of us? What will Mr. Lawrence say? What lunatics we must have seemed! (She covers her face with her handkerchief.)

Dr. Sampson (impatiently). What was it? What is it?

Luzetta. I can't help it. It was a splendid joke.

SCENE V.—MR. LEROY'S parlor. MR. LAWRENCE seated in an easy chair, singing, or, if preferred, reciting to himself.

Mr. Lawrence.

"I have placed a golden
Ring upon the hand,
Of the sweetest little Lady in the land.

"When the royal roses
Scent the summer air,
I shall gather white ones
For my darling's hair.

"Hasten, happy roses,
Come to me by May;
In your folded petals
Lies my wedding-day!"

Enter LUZETTA, who steals up behind him and lays her hand upon his forehead.

Luzetta. Harvey!

Mr. Lawrence. My better angel!

Luzetta. Positive good, comparative better, superlative best. I only possess the second degree of excellence.

Mr. Lawrence. You desire promotion? My best, best angel! Then do you know how much you have done for me?

Luzetta. Certainly. I made your lounging-cap and two pairs of slippers.

Mr. Lawrence. But seriously.

Luzetta. I did not speak of the watch-case, and of the red pin-flat.

Mr. Lawrence. But truly, Luzetta, do you realize how often your shadow has come between me and temptation? how the memory of your truthful face has kept me back from many a sin, and that, to-day, I am a nobler and, I trust, a better man, for having known and loved you?

Luzetta (with mock gravity). No, I did not realize it. I had no idea my goodness was so remarkable.

Mr. Lawrence (affecting a frown). You provoking image! You are, I believe, only charming when you are unconscious of your charms. Did you know that I might never have loved you had I not seen you fast asleep on the night of my memorable call? Through the dull haze of that chloroform stupor, I saw your soul gleam out like a star from a cloud, and you have been dear to me ever since.

Luzetta. What a wonderful call!

Mr. Lawrence. Yes; the idea of drawing one's happiness from absurdity; of finding the elixir of life in a chloroform bottle!

INFANTS.—This is a hard world for babies. We have had experience enough of the dear little creatures to feel keenly the hardships of their state, and to rejoice greatly in anything that promises to make it easier for them, or that may help in any measure to carry their tender and precious life safe through the perils which threaten it. For what were this world, what could it be, to us, without the purity, the innocence, the frolicsome happiness, the moral sunshine of little children? They are indeed the very best fragrance that has survived the wrecks of Paradise. And we can but pity the man who does not so regard them; nay, we more than pity him; we fear him too, even as we would

The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not mov'd by concord of sweet sound.

ACROSTIC.—TO MRS. _____.

BY LEWIS TORSON VOIGT.

As some cool fount, amid the desert sands,
Makes a green Eden in its crystal play;
And fills with rapture the faint pilgrim bands
Noon's torrid heats have parch'd; so o'er our way,
Do thy sweet charms, fair lady, winsome throw,
A spell enchanting as that streamlet's flow.

Brightly may gentle thoughts and deeds of love
Enwreath, like fragrant flowers, thy path beside;
And home-born joys around thee sweetly prove
That still on earth an Eden may abide,
Enshrined within the heart: as that glad stream
Smiles with the rainbow blooms which o'er it gleam.

HYACINTH COTTAGE.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

"ARTHUR!"

"Well, Maria?"

"You hav'n't said a word about what we talked of last evening."

This sentence was spoken a little querulously, and a shade of dissatisfaction rested on the forehead of the pretty, stylish-looking little lady who sat behind the coffee-urn. Her husband—the tall, handsome man, who had risen, and was drawing on his gloves preparatory to going down town—turned toward her with a half-annoyed, half-wearied expression, and dropped into his chair again. The nursery girl at that moment appeared, and took away the two children, Master Charlie and Miss Katy, who had shared the breakfast of hot rolls and fragrant coffee, and the parents were alone.

"You mean about taking the cottage out of town this summer, I suppose, Mrs. Woodner?" He always said "Mrs. Woodner" when displeased or grave.

"Yes," replied the lady, too eager in securing her point to seem to notice his evident dissatisfaction. "We must take it! I can't tolerate the idea of staying cooped up in town, when everybody is to leave. And it's such an opportunity! Mrs. Harrison says her husband has made a purchase of the one adjoining it. Oh, Arthur, I wish you'd buy this one!"

"That isn't to be thought of in these times," said Mr. Woodner, decidedly. "You ought to know as well as I, that, with my income and our expenses, it is impossible for me to keep up two establishments; and, if we even lease this house at Belmont for the summer, it will be a hard drain on my purse."

"Why, Mr. Woodner, you talk as though it would ruin us!" said the lady, with a little red spot on each cheek. "I'm sure your business is as profitable as Mr. Harrison's, everybody says; and we never have lived half so extravagantly. Her wardrobe is far more expensive than mine, and they have been to the seaside every summer since they were married, besides that trip to the Mountains last season. If we cannot take the cottage, say so at once; and I'll go poking off into the country, and bury myself at Wheaton!" And the little lady grew decidedly unpleasant-looking as the crimson spread from cheeks to brow.

"Maria, listen a minute," said Mr. Woodner in a calm voice. "Let us talk this matter over dispassionately. We will set aside the question of our neighbors, who should be no guides for us in our domestic affairs. I always thought it was a pleasure to you to visit your girlhood home at Wheaton, and that you enjoyed your summer stay there."

"And so I do," interrupted the lady, a little ashamed of her hastiness, "and of course I don't intend to give up my yearly visit home, only I shouldn't stop so long there if we took a house out of town. I could be a fortnight at the homestead, and then bring sisters Annie and Kate back with me to Belmont. And don't you see that it would be far better for me to be in my own house with the children; father is growing old, and they must disturb him."

"I thought your father was never weary of Charlie and Kate," said Mr. Woodner, in an astonished tone.

"Oh, children always disturb old people!" was the reply.

Mr. Woodner smiled a little incredulously at her ingenuity in presenting reasons for the carrying of her point. Only a year before, she had anticipated the pleasure the advent of the children would give Grandma and Grandpapa French at the old homestead; but that was before a band of building speculators had erected a dozen showy "Gothic" cottages, in the much-advertised, much-newspaper-puffed new town of Belmont, said cottages being set forth as "elegant, desirable suburban residences, airy, roomy, with all the modern improvements, and presenting rare inducements for genteel families going out of town for the summer."

"And then another reason, and the best of all!" continued Mrs. Woodner. "You know that when I have been at father's, you always had to sleep in town, and was lonesome; but now you can come out every night. Mr. Harrison is going to!" and she clinched the sentence triumphantly.

"Twenty miles out, and twenty in—and I don't love the steam cars well enough to spend nearly two hours every day in them," said Mr. Woodner. "Harrison must find greater comfort in the puff of a locomotive than I do."

"Why, they're all coming out every night; not only Mr. Harrison, but Mr. Davenport and Mr. Blake, and others. You wouldn't be alone, Arthur!"

"Misery loves company to be sure!" he replied, shrugging his shoulders at her suggestion.

"What bugbears you do conjure up, Arthur!" exclaimed Mrs. Woodner, testily. "How many times I've heard you say you'd give anything for a little rural home of your own, after the day's bustle in the city!"

"And so I should, Maria, if it were really a home," he replied. "But a man may sigh for what is neither expedient nor practicable. We are comfortable here; the house is large, high, and airy, and on a good street; and so long as I am in business we must make our home in the city. If I ever am rich enough to retire, then we will own a house in some fine old country town, where we may have society, and build up new interests around us. We cannot serve two masters—nor keep up two houses," he added.

Mrs. Woodner's face fell. This sentence seemed to dash to earth the darling project of her heart. "Then I am to be disappointed, I suppose!" she said in a voice that quivered a little.

But, talk as he might, Mr. Woodner had only been making a decision. Although he doubted the wisdom of the step his wife was so intent upon taking, he had determined to permit her to proceed. He was neither an unkind nor captious husband.

"Maria, I am not going to disappoint you," he said. "We will take this cottage for the summer; lease it, for as I said, I am not able to buy; and, if I were, I don't think any of these cheap-built affairs would suit me. So you may make your arrangements as soon as you like. You can probably send out some of the furniture from here, enough to make us comfortable; it would be needless to furnish it new for one season."

"Oh, that's a kind, good Arthur!" exclaimed the little wife, now all smiles and sunshine, springing to his side and hastily bestowing a shower of kisses on his cheeks. "I knew you would let me have the cottage! I told Mrs. Harrison we ought to afford it as well as they. You're a dear, good soul, if you do get such queer notions into your head sometimes about living within our income and economy! And now I shall go to work with a will to get away from this horrid, dusty old Boston! And of course I shall be very economical, and send out lots of things from here—mattresses, crockery, and furniture. But there'll be some things we shall need, only a few, you know; you'll let me get those, won't you, Arthur?"

"Certainly, anything reasonable; only remember, Maria, that we shan't require our menage very elaborately furnished for three months," was the answer. "And don't get what we can dispense with."

"Oh, Mrs. Harrison will tell me just what I want! I will send Bridget right in to ask if she can go down town with me this very day. It's best to commence early."

"Better trust to your own good sense, and go alone!" said Mr. Woodner, quite vexed at this lady's influence over his wife.

"Why, how you do dislike Mrs. Harrison, Arthur! You are so prejudiced! I'm sure her husband always admires to have me accompany her out shopping!"

"I suppose because he is in hopes you sometimes prove a check upon her extravagance and thoughtlessness," was Mr. Woodner's comment.

"I'm sure I don't think her extravagant. People ought to live up to the times if they can afford to, and they can, if anybody. But I shall be very economical about furnishing the cottage, I assure you, Arthur. I shall send out everything available from here, as I said; only getting a few light things that we can't do without—such as straw mattings, for you know we shouldn't want to take out our heavy Brussels carpets, one or two of those pretty garden chairs, and a bamboo lounge for the piazza—and, oh, Arthur! why can't you hire a good cottage piano, for ours is too large to be moved easily, and you will enjoy music so after coming from the noisy, dusty city."

Mr. Woodner smiled. A vision of the daily twenty miles ride by steam cars rose before him, leaving little leisure for anything afterwards but rest and sleep; but he only replied: "I'll see! But I must be at the store, it is late!" And, after the customary parting kiss, he again drew on his gloves, took his hat, and left the house for down town.

After Mr. Woodner emerged from his dwelling and gained the brick parc, a shade of depression deepened over his face, and his eye grew moody. Many thoughts were at work in his brain.

"It isn't the expense of this house for the summer," he mentally murmured, "but it's Maria's growing love of display and restlessness—never satisfied, never calculating in her expenditures—that troubles me; and that woman's influence over her." (By "that woman," he meant Mrs. Harrison.) "How changed she is since the early years of our marriage! Then, our house here was the height of her desires; now, though I refurnished last year, by another I suppose there 'll be more new things, to keep up with the times. Then, two or three months of the hot weather at the pleasant old country-house at home was enjoyment; now, it's one of these sham-built martin's nests Slab & Lathe have put up, with 'Gothic' fixings round the roof and portico. I'll wager that the first July thunder-shower will make a sieve of it! But 'Mrs. Harrison takes a cottage at Belmont,' it sounds well; and so Maria must. Well, I'll leave her have her 'bent' this time; see if she don't see the folly of it!"

Mr. Woodner walked the length of a block after closing up his mental argument with this peroration; then, turning the corner of the street that brought him into one of the city's great thoroughfares, he held up his hand as the customary signal to the horse-car that now came in sight. The harsh tinkle of its ceaseless bell did not disturb the tenor of his brain wanderings; for, as he stepped from the sidewalk to take his seat in the vehicle, he set out anew in this wise:

"I suppose they 'll be 'bamboo-lounge' hunting all day together! I wish I'd limited Maria; that woman 'll lead her into every conceivable piece of extravagance and folly!"

His train of meditation was here again interrupted by the dissonant tintinabulation of the car-bell; and then, with the passenger who entered next, came the stereotyped barefooted, ragged, old-faced, small newsboy, who, a moment before, had been exercising his little lungs along the pave, by informing all within sound of his shrill voice that the damp sheet on his arm contained "the latest strategies of General M'Clellan, and news from the Army of the Potomac."

A moment more, and two bright nickel cents had found their way to the newsboy's dingy palm; and our down town merchant was plunged deep into the "Latest by Telegraph" of the morning journal, forgetful, for the time being, of rural cottages, breakfast conversation, or his little wife's ambitious plans.

Meantime, that little lady had received, via Bridget, her neighbor's message that "Mrs. Harrison would indade be plazed to go out with Mrs. Woodner." And, after bestowing a hasty visit to Master Charlie and little Katy, she left the nursery to expedite her toilet for the day's shopping. An hour and a half later saw the two ladies seated in the horse-car, animated and pleased with the thought of the agreeable duties before them.

The last of June came; and the Woodners were fairly established at "Hyacinth Cottage," for so the rural home at Belmont had been christened, patterning after Mrs. Harrison, who had bestowed upon her own summer retreat the poetical cognomen of "Lilac Hill," from the fact that several young specimens of that rare (?) shrub had been disposed along the gradually ascending avenue that led to the house.

From the last week in May, when Mr. Woodner had taken the lease of the cottage, and his busy wife had commenced her "arrangements," there had been no quiet in the formerly well-kept, orderly city home on H—— Street. As the first act in the programme, Mrs. Woodner had dispatched Charlie and Katy, with the nursery-maid, to the Wheaton farm-house, quite forgetful of the fact that "old people are always disturbed by children," sending word to her young sisters to hold themselves in readiness to spend half the summer with her at Belmont "after she was settled;" then followed such a dismantling of chambers, sitting-room, dining-room, and closets, that the husband who returned at evening from the store found a literal reign of "chaos and old night;" and one day imparted to his wife his decision to "go to Parker's till affairs were regulated."

"And I didn't oppose Arthur one bit," said Mrs. Woodner to her confidential friend, Mrs. Harrison. "It is such a trouble to get up dinners now, when we want half the crockery packed to take out to Belmont, that I did feel relieved when he proposed it. I wouldn't have believed that I should have so much to do! If I could have done just as I pleased, I'd have had the cottage entirely new furnished, and not sent out a thing; but Arthur never'd have consented to that; and, as it is, I don't know but he'll think I've been rather extravagant. Dear me! you've no idea how he talks 'economy' and 'war times!' What a relief it must be not to hear that word 'economy' for a month! Your husband doesn't preach like Arthur, I do believe, Mrs. Harrison!"

"Oh, la, my dear, there's nothing like getting used to it! Harrison, if you will believe it, actually said he couldn't afford a single additional item of expense this year, and talked of 'retrenchment' instead; but I was determined to carry my point, and wouldn't listen to 'a lease,' but made him buy the house at Belmont. These men—it's a habit they have of denying us any little thing we may ask. I tell Harrison it's as natural for him to say 'Can't afford it' to me as 'tis to eat his breakfast; but I'm pretty well used to it now; and so I made him buy the cottage.'

Mrs. Harrison did not know that the genteel little place at Belmont was not, in reality, her husband's "possession," since the conditions of the purchase were saddled by a "mortgage back," which nearly covered the property. But her injudicious, unwifely system of "teazing," to "gain her point," had wrought its legitimate effect; her husband—a kind-hearted, but weak-minded man—had not the courage to stand out against her; and so acts of folly and extravagance followed upon each other, and they drifted on.

The last day of June came; Mrs. Woodner had paid a flying visit of a week to the old homestead; brought back the children and nurse Ann to Belmont, where she had given orders for the cook, and Bridget the chamber girl, to proceed before her; and now all was in readiness to receive the pater familias. Mrs. Harrison was established at "Lilac Hill," the Davenports at "Laburnum Villa," the Blakes at "Sycamore Lodge," and one or two other city families at their "Country residence," the "genteel," desirable cottages erected by the firm of Slab & Lathe, Architects, aforementioned. This little community at Belmont was quite an affair of city neighbors come to their "country seats" for the summer; and Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Woodner congratulated themselves upon the "select society" Belmont would afford them.

It was at the close of a pleasant day that Mr. Woodner left the Belmont station and walked over to his cottage. It had been intensely hot in town, one of those scorching days when all the heats of summer seem concentrated in the air and reflected back from the tall brick walls; and he wore his thinnest linen duster and lightest straw hat.

"A full half mile, if it's a step, to the house!" he soliloquized, as he walked along with a somewhat lagging pace. "I declare, I did not think it half so far! A pretty walk this, every night after being all fagged out in town, and in this new road, too, where the soil shifts like quicksand under your feet! 'Hyacinth Cottage' is a humbug!" and he trudged along wearily through the shifting, red, sandy soil of "Oak Avenue," the new road from the depot.

It was quite sunset when he turned up to Hyacinth Cottage, lifted the latch of the rustic wicker-gate, and set foot on the fancifullypaved walk bordered by box which he had "ordered," at so much per foot, from a nursery. Mrs. Woodner was awaiting her husband on the piazza; and she made a pretty picture—tastefully dressed in a flowing, airy muslin, which became her still girlish figure, and standing under a jessamine trained over the trellis at the door. Mr. Woodner cast a brief glance over the cottage, the peaked roof, dormer windows, with their abundant Gothic adornments of pendent carved wood, the various lattices, and the columns that supported the piazza, then called out—"Well, I suppose this is 'home' till next October, Maria?"

"Yes; and don't you think it's delightful, Arthur?" replied his wife, animatedly. Mrs. Harrison has run over to-day, and says they've got settled nicely, too."

"That woman first here!" muttered the husband sotto voce, as he sank wearily on the light bamboo lounge on the piazza under the low parlor window, fanning his heated forehead with the brim of his hat.

"But come—you are tired, Arthur; and tea is waiting!" said his wife. "The children have just gone up stairs—such a cunning little room as they have! You must go up after tea, and over the house," and she led the way to the dining-room along the hall.

"A country tea! Plenty of sweet milk, strawberries and cream, golden butter, and so forth, I suppose, Maria?" said Mr. Woodner, entering the apartment which seemed strangely small and cramped after that of their large and comfortable city house, and he seated himself at table.

"Well, I'm sorry that we've been quite unfortunate for a few days, Arthur," replied Mrs. Woodner with some embarrassment. "The butter isn't so good as we ought to have had; I engaged to take it of a farmer who called, but it isn't sweet; and milk, I fear, we shall find it difficult to get regularly; they send it into the city, they say. I always thought everybody could get plenty of everything in the country. I'm sure I must have milk for the children!"

"Tea without milk, and rancid butter! This is one of the conveniences of being in the country!" said Mr. Woodner. "Well, I shall send out a firken of prime butter to-morrow, and hunt up a man who will supply us with plenty of milk and eggs. Why, what ails the biscuits, Maria? Jane never baked these!" and he broke one hard, clammy edible which he took from the plate before him.

"Yes, they are Jane's, but the blame isn't hers. It is the range; it don't draw well or bake at all. Jane has been scolding about it for three days, and says she had rather lose her place than her reputation as a cook. She ruins everything."

"A defect in the chimney, I suppose, is the reason it don't draw. The chimneys in these modern cottages are n't much bigger than a stove-pipe. I'll have a mason sent out to-morrow. A glass of ice water, my dear! I am very thirsty to-night."

"We have no ice; they don't bring it to Belmont, but you will find the water pretty cold, I think," and Mrs. Woodner filled a goblet, which she passed him.

"About the temperature of our Cochtuate, I should say," he replied after one sip, when he quickly sat down the glass; "but what a peculiar taste, Maria!" and he wiped his lips with his napkin.

"I know it. Disagreeable, I thought; but Mrs. Harrison says it's just like the Congress water at Saratoga Springs, and it's because it comes through a ledge or mineral soil, or something. We sha'n't taste it when it's been boiled."

"Possibly! But boiling or boiled water is not very palatable, my dear!" replied Mr. Woodner, with a wry face and a queer smile, returning to his milkless tea again. "Mrs. Harrison may drink her Congress water. It isn't quite to my taste."

After the tea was over, Mrs. Woodner took a kerosene lamp and preceded her husband "over the house." First, they visited the parlors, two small square rooms, communicating by an arched doorway; showily papered, and poorly painted. Low, "French" windows opened on the piazza; in stepping through one of which Mr. Woodner's head came in contact with the sash with some violence.

"An imitation of city parlors in the tenth degree!" he said, rubbing his head. "Why, a man can't stand upright in this little box!"

"You're very tall, you know," said his wife, excusingly.

"So I am. I never realized the fact before!" was the rueful reply, saturating his handkerchief from a cologne stand on the table, and bathing the abrasion on his forehead. "You've got the cottage piano, I see, Maria. But these chairs, and this table, and tête-à-tête, where 'd they come from? Not from home, surely!"

"No; the truth was, Arthur, after I'd been out here to see the cottage with Mrs. Harrison, we came to the conclusion that very little of our heavy parlor furniture at home would be adapted to a house so much smaller; so we purchased these cheap at Veneer & Co's. You hav'n't had the bill sent in yet, I suppose. He said we should not deface them at all this summer; and, if we didn't want the house another season, they'd sell for almost as much as we paid at the auction-rooms. But perhaps it is possible we may come here again, you know, Arthur?"

Mrs. Woodner's tone was a little hurried and embarrassed as she said this; she began to realize that she had exceeded her warrant, led on by Mrs. Harrison. "The curtains, tabourets, pictures—everything else, came from home, you see, Arthur."

"What else did you buy at Veneer's, Mrs. Woodner?" asked her husband, as he followed her into the hall and up stairs. His tone was full of displeasure.

"Only a couple of chamber sets. Ours were too large to put into these smaller rooms, you know, husband. We really needed these."

"And the straw mattings throughout the house—those are all new?" he asked. "And the rustic furniture for the piazza and garden?"

"O yes, I forgot that! Three garden chairs and two bamboo-lounges; and then—then—I got a smaller extension-table than ours. That was too large for this dining-room, you must see, Arthur!" And her voice grew a little sharp through its embarrassment, as though she was determined not to acknowledge her folly in her "bargains."

Mr. Woodner made no reply. He was displeased that she had not consulted him. "That woman" had been the means of this; and he inly anathematized Mrs. Harrison none too mildly.

"Which is your nursery, Mrs. Woodner?" he asked, after turning from the little seven-by-nine box, crowded with a staring, new, painted chamber set, which apartment his wife had informed him was their chamber.

"Here it is," and she paused at an open door, between which and the one window sat poor perspiring Ann, vainly endeavoring to catch a breath of air as she essayed to rock Miss Katy to sleep.

"Oh, but isn't it blissed hot weather, Mistor Woodner!" Ann exclaimed, looking up as he paused in the doorway and scanned the little room, crowded with the bed, Master Charlie's crib, and a few toilet conveniences. "And wasn't ye after being scorched to death in the city to day?"

"No, Ann; a hot day, to be sure; but 'twas cooler there than here!" he answered, as he turned away from the stifling prison.

"Sure an' how can the mather say so?" soliloquized Ann, after he had departed. "When it's hot as the breath ov Purgatory here, in the green and blissed country, I thought they must be dead intirely in the town. Now hush, Miss Katy! Will ye niver be after shuttin' yer swate blue eyes the whole livelong evenin'?" And, with a fresh lurch of the low rocker and another copious start of perspiration, honest Ann swayed the poor heated, fretted child in her stout red arms, and started anew upon the seventh verse of a love-ditty in her native Celtic tongue.

"And now your bath-room, Maria?" was the next query, as Mr. Woodner left the nursery.

There was a little hesitancy of manner, and then she said in a vexed tone: "That is a luxury I miss, Arthur! I quite forgot to notice the want of it when I looked at the house: it is a shame that a new house should be built without one: but Mrs. Harrison says we can have a tub set in that unoccupied chamber over the wood-shed. They're going to at their cottage."

"I thought the advertisements stated 'all the modern improvements,'" said Mr. Woodner, sarcastically, as he led the way down stairs. "But I hope we have a cellar; else, in the absence of ice, we shall be in a nice quandary where to keep our food and stores."

"O yes; there is a cellar!" was the triumphant reply; but as yet, Mrs. Woodner was quite ignorant that said cellar—whose regions Jane only had explored—was scarcely larger than a coal-bin, and damp and mouldy; and that "Hyacinth Cottage" was built over a stagnant, marshy soil, redolent of miasmas and typhus.

"And this is the back yard?" continued the lessee of the summer residence, emerging into those precincts from the passage beyond the kitchen and wood-shed. "These water cisterns may be convenient for Bridget on wash-days, but, to my fancy, they are strongly suggestive of mosquitos. I must have bars at all the windows. What are those—old willows down yonder?" and he pointed away across a lonely, desolate, low marsh to a sickly row of pale-green, gnarled bushes bordering a brook that flowed sluggishly onward.

"Yes, I suppose so," Mrs. Woodner answered.

"Hum! the 'fine belts of woodland and open country views' the advertisements of Belmont property speak of, I suppose," was the somewhat satirical comment. "Come, let us go in, now; it seems uncommonly damp here after so hot a day. I hope it's a healthy location, Maria?"

"Oh, it must be; so delightfully cool!" was her quick answer.

"Outside the house, you mean; it's stifling enough within," muttered Mr. Woodner, as they re-entered the parlors. "But let us have a little music—'Old Hundred,' anything, only one tune, and then I'll go to bed, for I feel wretchedly tired after such a tedious day;" and he lifted the lid of the cottage piano.

Mrs. Woodner played one or two pieces with much grace, for she possessed considerable musical talent; and her husband listened from his position on a lounge he had drawn up close by the window to get a breath of the evening air. Presently, in the midst of a strain from Norma, slap, slap together came his hands, creating a little discord and much commotion as he jumped from the lounge.

"Confound it, Maria, not only mosquitos, but beetle-bugs!" he exclaimed, as one flying visitor settled on his head, whence he brushed it with frantic eagerness. "It's the light that brings them. We shall have no peace to-night, I see, unless we close the windows; and, in that case, we run the risk of stifling. What is it Willis says about going to sleep in the country, and waking with a bug in your ear? But hark! there's Katy! How feverish and restless she looked to-night!" and the child's voice sounded out in a loud, fretful cry.

"I do hope Katy isn't going to be sick!" said Mrs. Woodner, anxiously, dropping the lid of the piano, preparatory to going up stairs.

"It must be that she's played too hard to-day."

"More likely it's the heat, and that stifling little chamber!" was Mr. Woodner's ejaculation to himself, as he lowered the "French" windows, to the exclusion of the great, brown, shining insects that now bumped and whizzed vainly against the panes. "The children will miss their nice airy nursery at home, and the bath-room, and a hundred conveniences it's impossible to get here, in this little coop yecept 'Hyacinth Cottage.' But no matter; we'll sweat the summer through because it's 'genteel,' and Mrs. Harrison has laid down her dictum. That woman! I only hope she's enjoying a hot-air bath in her little, pent-up 'Lilac Hill Cottage' to-night."

"Sure, ma'am, it's the bloody murtherin' muskatoes that plague the childer so!" exclaimed poor Ann as her mistress made her appearance, and found that worthy daughter of Erin battling a whole army of those winged pests with a large feather-duster, while the window stood wide open, and a glaring kerosene lamp burned brightly on the table between the bed and Master Charley's crib. "Ah, but wasn't I prayin' this blissid minnit for Saint Patrick to fly into the winder, and then fly out agin wid ivery singin' divil ov 'em!"

"Put out the light, Ann, after you have driven out all you can; and then drop your window curtain. Mr. Woodner is going to send out some mosquito-bars to-morrow. I never imagined we should be so infested by these torments," said the lady; and, after soothing little restless, heated Katy, she left the chamber.

"There, now! Kape whist, and out wid ye, ye murtherin' divils!" said Ann, after several wide brushings and plungings with her weapon of clearance. "Sure, an' the misthress called ye right 'pesterin' torments,' comin' here to bite the swate, slapin' childer! There! Saint Patrick be off wid ye now, while honest folks are afther gettin' a wink ov sleep; for it's clane tired out I am intirely!" and the poor girl began to make preparations for sharing her little charge's slumbers. Scarcely three minutes after, she lifted her head from the pillow to cry out, "Arrah now! is it back agin' ye are, ye murtherin' thieves? Sure, but it's aisier slapin' in ould Ireland! An' it's there I wish I was this blissid minit, and not in this buggy Ameriky!"

An hour later, silence had spread her mantle over Hyacinth Cottage; silence, save the shrill, small "winding horn" of the insects that roamed the "stilly night;" but sleep had not yet brought her blessed dew to seal the eyelids of all beneath that roof.

"Maria," said Mr. Woodner, turning restlessly on his pillow, "I advise that you cage and train one of the biggest of these mosquitos, in case you want a carrier dove to bear any little neighborly dispatches to Mrs. Harrison."

Three months had passed at Belmont; and the little community had perspired, fretted, and pined away the heated term in their "genteel," "desirable," country residences. Isolated as they were, yet the roar of the breakers of the fashionable world came dimly to their ears. Perhaps all had not enjoyed their retirement as much as they had anticipated; perhaps Mrs. Harrison had felt a longing to join the party of friends who whirled off to Niagara or to the White Mountains; she confessed as much, in imparting to Mrs. Woodner her resolution to "stay it out at Lilac Hill, though she did believe Harrison never came home unless he brought news of somebody's going somewhere;" and perhaps the latter lady had not found her summer retreat that beau ideal of rural felicity which she had conjured.

Hyacinth Cottage had held numerous guests during those three months from the last of June to the close of September. Mrs. Woodner's two young sisters had spent some weeks with her at her urgent solicitation, though it must be confessed that they had left a far pleasanter country home behind, in the pleasant old town of Wheaton; and then many city acquaintances, to whom the lady had spoken patronizingly of "our house out town," had not hesitated to test her hospitality. Once, Mr. Woodner had expressed the wish that "the dining-room was bigger than a band box," in order that he might invite half-a-dozen gentlemen cronies out to dinner; but he contented himself with transferring the locale of his good intentions to Parker's, at whose "mahogany" they enjoyed a feast of good things, while Hyacinth Cottage was left to the undisputed possession of lady and children visitors.

"It seems to me that you are wearing yourself out with so much company, Maria," said Mr. Woodner, one evening, after the last retreating ebb of a tide of visitors which had set in a fortnight before from the city—the last having that day departed.

"I have had considerable lately, though not half as much as Mrs. Harrison. Mrs. Lawrence and Mrs. Oakley, with their five children and two servants, have just left her. But she enjoys it; and tells me that I feel too much care when people are here, that I don't know how to take things easy."

"I sincerely hope you never will learn to take some things as 'easy' as that woman does! And perhaps her mood of repose won't last always!" he impetuously returned, "Poor Harrison!"

"Why, what can you mean, Arthur?" asked Mrs. Woodner. "Is anything going to happen? You speak strangely. Is Mr. Harrison involved in any unfortunate business speculations?"

"Time will tell!" was the evasive answer; then, hastily changing the subject, he began imparting some bit of news he had heard that day in town, and finally drew forth the evening paper, from which he commenced reading aloud the latest war-tidings, while Mrs. Woodner listened between the intricacies of her crochet-work.

The last of September arrived; and the Davenports and the Blakes had given up their cottages, and returned to town. Mrs. Woodner began to revolve the same subject in her own mind ; and when, one day, Mrs. Harrison came over to make known her decision to "break up" within the next fortnight, she immediately resolved to follow. That evening she communicated this resolve to her husband.

"Well, for my part, I shall be glad to get home again," was his pleased reply. "It's getting to be too much like work, to be at the station for the first train, now the days are growing shorter. But you look anxious to-night. How is Katy? The child isn't well—I'm convinced of that; she's been pining all summer."

"That's what worries me, Arthur," replied his wife, nervously. "Katy's been fretting and moaning all day; and to-night she's hot and flushed. I'm afraid she's going to have some of the diseases children are subject to—scarlatina, perhaps."

Mr. Woodner started up from the tea-table where this conversation had taken place, and went up stairs hastily. Charlie slept in his crib; he, too, had not gained either in size or plumpness, as he always had during his previous summer visits at his grandfather's in the healthy country mansion at Wheaton; but in little Katy, always a delicate child, the change was most apparent. She moaned and tossed on the pillow, beside which faithful Ann sat, soothing her; her little face was pallid, save two bright red spots that burned on her cheeks; and her skin was dry and hot to the touch.

"I have had her in my arms all day," said Mrs. Woodner, who had followed her husband. "Have hardly given her up to Ann a minute. Isn't she really sick, Arthur?" And she nervously watched his anxious face as he leaned over the pillow. "Oh, I wish I had sent into town this morning for Doctor Sibley; he understands the children so well—and there isn't a good physician anywhere round here."

"Katy certainly is feverish, and I wish Doctor Sibley was here," was the father's reply as he felt the hot, dry skin of the child, and the hard, bounding pulse. "I shall not leave her to-night; but you look quite worn out, and must go to bed immediately, Maria. To-morrow I will have the doctor out by the early afternoon train."

"Oh, if it should be scarlatina, Arthur! I always dread that so!" was the anxious exclamation. "And Katy is such a delicate child, it would go hard with her!"

"Do not be unnecessarily alarmed, Maria!" her husband replied, soothingly. "It may be nothing more than a cold, which renders her feverish. But you must get some sleep; and, Ann, you look tired, too; you had better go out and get a breath of the evening air, and then sleep up stairs to-night. I will take care of Katy."

The night passed; and Mr. Woodner did not close his eyes beside the sick child. With the early morning train, he sought the city; and returned in the afternoon with the family physician, in whom both himself and wife reposed implicit confidence. When Doctor Sibley turned from the little crib, which had been removed to Mrs. Woodner's room, and beside which the mother had anxiously watched all day, a grave look was on his face.

"Is she very sick, doctor?" asked the mother. "And oh, don't tell me that it's scarlatina! I dread that so!"

"No, it's not that; but a fever as much to be feared—typhus!" was the physician's thoughtful reply. "I will not deceive you; your child is very sick; but we will hope for the best."

"Oh, my darling Katy! do not let her die, doctor!" pleaded Mrs. Woodner, in great agitation. "'Typhus!' how do you think she took it, doctor? I have been so careful of her. No one has been here to give it. If we were in town, now, I shouldn't wonder so much; but Ann has taken her out every day, and she has had the country air all summer."

"Fevers of this class are often the result of our surroundings. Are you quite sure you have selected a healthy summer residence, Mrs. Woodner? I could not help observing a heavy mist that hung over the low grounds in the rear of your cottage, as I came up from the station. And you are not looking as well yourself as when I saw you last in town, Mrs. Woodner."

"Hyacinth Cottage is built over a bog-hole; and the water we have been drinking all summer, doctor, would nauseate your stomach!" bluntly replied Mr. Woodner. "And we have been stifled in these little chambers. No wonder Katy is sick! I'm surprised that we all are not. We were talking of going back to town next week; but now, I suppose poor little Katy must stay here, and take her chance of recovery. What a pity we hadn't got away, doctor!"

"Yes, it is a pity; but the child is too sick to be removed at present. I have no doubt but this location is very unhealthy; hav'n't, much faith in these modern cottages for summer retreats; you really would have had much purer air in your large house near the Park, it seems to me, Mr. Woodner. But do not be over alarmed about your child ; I will do my best for her ; and that is all any of us can do, you know," he said, sympathizingly.

"But Katy is so frail—so delicate, doctor!" said the mother.

"That very circumstance may be in her favor, Mrs. Woodner ; for often a fever goes harder with a very vigorous person than a less healthy one. Now, your boy is more robust : I should fear more for him, with typhus. And, by the way, you had better send him away at once from this region of danger."

"Ann shall take him to Wheaton to-morrow. I wish I had gone there this summer. The children were never healthier than when there. Oh, doctor, if I were well out of Belmont, I never would desire to set foot in it again. If Katy lives, I shall only be too happy to leave it."

As this confession fell from the sorrow-stricken mother's lips, Mr. Woodner could not help wishing that Mrs. Harrison were present ; and, looking upon his darling child, tossing to and fro upon her little pillow, his feelings toward "that woman," who had been the prime cause of their coming to this unhealthy region, were none too pleasant.

"Doctor, what do you think of Katy?" he asked, as he followed the physician to the gate, when he was leaving to take the train back to the city. "If we should lose her, I never should forgive myself for letting Maria come here."

"As I said, she is very sick ; but I hope to be the instrument of saving her for you. Keep calm, Mr. Woodner ; I will be out again in a day or two : meantime, follow my directions. Good-night!" And Doctor Sibley left him. "There is miasma in every breath. I would as soon bring a family to the midst of the Dismal Swamp as to this marshy spot," said the physician, as he walked rapidly along. "I see how it is—hot and burning at mid-day, and damp and chilly at night ; and the vapors curling up from that sluggish creek that cuts the lowlands. These building speculators—they ought to be hung, every one of them, to put up a line of showy cottages in this region, and then dupe the people from comfortable city homes where the air is a hundred times purer. I am surprised that a man of Arthur Woodner's sense should have fallen into the trap. But the illness of his child will be a lesson to him."

As Doctor Sibley indulged in these reflections until he gained the Belmont station, some friendly voice ought to have whispered into his ear that Mr. Woodner should not have borne the blame which ought, by right, to have settled heavily on the heads of his wife and Mrs. Harrison.

Three weeks dragged by, on leaden wings to the afflicted parents ; and then, to their great joy, little Katy was pronounced convalescent. Pale, weak, and emaciated, she lay in her little crib, over which the mother had hung tenderly, and beside which the father had passed many days, feeling too anxious to be away in town. Doctor Sibley, meanwhile, had been faithful and unremitting ; and it was with genuine pleasure that he received the grateful thanks of the parents when he spoke confidently of his little patient's recovery.

"And, now, my last piece of advice is, that you break up here and return to town just as soon as possible ; taking care that little Katy gets no cold to bring on a relapse. Your own health demands it, Mrs. Woodner ; for the sake of your husband and children, I don't want to have you on my hands next," said the kind physician, as he paid his last visit to the cottage.

Mrs. Woodner drew a long breath of relief, and the tears stood in her eyes. "To think dear Katy is spared to us, Arthur!" she said, thankfully, to her husband. "I cannot get away from here soon enough. I shall tell Jane and Bridget to commence packing up to-morrow. We will have the new furniture sent off to the auction-rooms : I never want to see anything that shall remind me of this summer at Belmont. To-morrow, when you are in town, you had better go up to the house, and see that it is properly aired for our coming. And oh, how glad I shall be to have Charlie at home again ! Sister Annie writes that the little fellow is plump and rosy, and has had such splendid times at 'grandpapa's,' now they are gathering the fruit in. How happy we shall all be when we get home again ! If ever I again leave our nice house in Boston during the summer season, it shall only be to spend the hottest weather at father's."

"Then you've had enough of 'Hyacinth Cottage,' Maria?" said her husband, quizzically, though inly delighted as much as herself at their proposed speedy fitting.

"Don't mention it to me again, Arthur!" she answered, quickly, with a vexed tone, but a little laugh. "'Hyacinths !' I never saw a single specimen of that flower here. I'd better name it 'Dandelion Cottage,' for they were plenty. Mrs. Harrison's 'lilacs' did bloom ; but that shrub grows everywhere ; but the Blakes were as foolish as I, for there was only one old, dying sycamore—'buttonwood' they call it out here—that grew within half a mile of their house."

"I pity Harrison, with his cottage on his hands; but probably she won't want to come here next summer, now some of her neighbors, over whom she used to have such influence, have decided not to accompany her!" Mr. Woodner did not hesitate to say "used to have," for he felt quite sure, now, that the influence "that woman" had formerly wielded over his wife was lessened. And, if this result had been accomplished, "Hyacinth Cottage" had not been such a costly lesson after all.

The following day, Mr. Woodner went into town, transacted his business at the counting-room, dined at Parker's—then, with elate heart and eager step, turned his way to the old familiar house on H—— Street. Opening its doors, and walking through lonely halls and apartments that would soon ring again with the sound of welcome household voices, he felt a keen thrill of pleasure at his heart. But, as he left the house and walked down the street the length of a few blocks, he suddenly cast his eye up at the handsome stone front on whose silver door-plate was engraved "George Harrison." Mrs. Harrison had left "Lilac Hill," full three weeks before, for her town home; but to-day the house on H—— Street was strangely dull-looking—the curtains down, and no callers had left their cards for forty-eight hours at the door.

"Poor Harrison! I thought it would come to this, with that woman's extravagances and want of sympathy with his business cares and perplexities!" sighed Mr. Woodner as he walked past.

When he crossed the threshold of the cottage at Belmont that evening, his wife's first exclamation was: "Why, Arthur, how sober you look! Has anything happened?"

"Yes, Maria—what I have feared for some time, though it shocked me when I heard of it to-day on 'Change—the firm of Harrison & Co. has gone down."

"Failed, Arthur? You don't mean it! What will poor Mrs. Harrison do?"

"Do what she ought to have done years ago—learn to think; to see the folly of her idle, fashionable, extravagant life; to adapt herself, in future, if poor Harrison should ever rise above it, to her limited income; to do what she seemed bent on not doing for the past few years, though she must have known the need of retrenchment—to live economically. I can't pity that woman so much as I ought to, perhaps, Maria!"

"Retrenchment! Economy!" the very words her husband used to say to her," repeated Mrs. Woodner, in a low tone, when she was alone. "Poor soul! I'm so sorry for her! But how thankful I ought to be that Arthur's business stands so firm, when many others are broken up these dreadful war times! Let him talk 'economy' as much as he pleases in the future, I shall be convinced that he is the best judge!" And, with a blush of shame, she remembered the many occasions when she had contested his better judgment, and, like Mrs. Harrison, "gained her point" through "much importunity." And, as she turned away from little Katy, whom she resigned to Bridget while she went down to take her place at the tea-table, Mrs. Woodner gave another deep and heartfelt sigh for poor Mrs. Harrison.

A week more saw the Woodners comfortably established in their city home again; while the deserted "summer residence" at Belmont was resigned to silence, and the cottage-furniture turned over to an auction-room. The still pale, but fast-recovering little Katy was assigned the coziest corner in the large, cheerful, well-ventilated nursery; and when Charlie, accompanied by nurse Ann and Aunt Annie, made his appearance from Wheaton, the little convalescent's delight knew no bounds. "Brudder Charlie" was ever ready to play with her and amuse her; she pined no longer, but gained rapidly day by day. "Sure, but it's blissid good to say Miss Kathy gettin' so well an' strong, afther the dreadful faiver!" said Ann—"an' it's good, too, to be back agin in ould Bostin, away from the singin' bugs and 'skaters! Ah! and wouldn't Saint Patrick be afther havin' plenty ov worruk to do, if he lived in Ameriky?"

Another summer has passed since Mrs. Woodner learned her lesson, that a "genteel, desirable summer residence" may not always be a comfortable or healthy one; and she was well content to spend its months in the large, airy mansion whose roof had sheltered her girlhood, and where blossoming clover roses, new-mown hay, plenty of sweet milk, and "good country fare" deepened the bloom of health upon her own cheeks and her children's.

As for her husband, whenever that gentleman wishes to satirize any plan whereby genuine comfort is likely to be sacrificed to outward show, he gently refers to "Hyacinth Cottage."

PRACTICAL LESSONS IN DRAWING.

THIRD LESSON.

You must now turn your attention to the drawing of curved lines. Unless you can draw a curved line accurately in any direction, you can never hope to delineate the human figure or animals in a proper manner; for the outlines of both the animal and vegetable kingdoms are made up of curved lines of every variety. It is needless to give a long list of examples; the student will easily observe them in the objects around him, from the horse to the cat or diminutive mouse; or from the gay butterfly that soars above him, to the caterpillar from which it has been transformed; or from the lofty oak to the humble acorn.

Commence practising the formation of curved lines by drawing several like a, Fig. 10, and then, when you are able to do so accurately and easily, draw parallel lines with greater curve, as b, Fig. 10. When you can enlarge these copies upon a blackboard, with a piece of chalk, or reduce them with a pencil upon paper, then you may venture to draw a circle like c, Fig. 10.

To draw a circle.—Commence by making a faint dot upon the paper to mark the centre; then place another dot on either side of it, and at equal distances, and continue placing dots at equal distances all round the central one, until a circle of dots is formed; you must then join all the dots with a steady and slow sweep of the hand, beginning at the top of the circle, and drawing from left to right, and right round from the point at which you started. Practise this several times, as it will give you precision, and enable you to observe the relative distance of the outer part of the circle from the centre. Do not attempt to use compasses to draw a circle.

When you have drawn a few dozen circles by the aid of the dots, draw some without making any marks upon the paper or board; sometimes drawing from left to right, and at other times from right to left.

Draw one circle within another, so that their margins shall be parallel, as in the portion of the one shown in b, Fig. 10.

Draw a semicircle (as f, in Fig. 10), and then practise forming d and e in the same figure, until you can join lines neatly, sometimes commencing from the lower part of the figures, and at other times from the upper part.

Divide circles into sections, so as to exhibit the half, a quarter, a third, or other divisions of a circle.

Draw squares, polygons, and triangles within circles, and then construct a circle within a square.

ceed to draw the three following outlines, which you will no doubt do correctly and readily, from the practice you have already had in the curved lines. Be careful, in copying a and c, to make the left-hand lines darker than those to the right, while b has lines of each breadth. It is well to use the pencil marked HB for this purpose, the different thicknesses of the line being produced by the degrees of pressure employed.

In drawing lines, the hand should rest upon the last two fingers. If the lines are short the motion of the hand should not extend beyond the wrist joint; but if the lines are long, then the hand will glide over the paper easily, if it is carefully balanced and rests upon these fingers, while the motion of the hand proceeds from the elbow or from the shoulder.

As you have already practised curved lines and circles, you will no doubt be able to copy this example, which is the outline of the volute of an Ionic capital from the Erectheum, at Athens. It is needless to describe how it should be drawn, because, if you have attended to the rules already given, you will be able to know how to proceed at once. Copy this example over and over again, enlarging and diminishing the copy, until your eye has become familiar with the figure; then endeavor to form its outline without having the example before you. When you have accomplished your task, you will be better prepared to copy the next example.

This drawing is a combination of curved and straight lines, so arranged that they form the outline of the base of a column; and by copying this example frequently, you will acquire a very good idea of proportion. If you had not exercised yourself in drawing straight and curved lines, you could not have drawn this figure. You may, therefore, look upon straight and curved lines as the letters or alphabet of drawing.

PLATO.—Several anecdotes of Plato are preserved, which reflect honor on his moral principles and character. Having raised his hand to correct a servant when in anger, he kept his arm fixed in that posture for a considerable time. To a friend coming in, and inquiring the reason of his singular conduct, he replied, "I am punishing a passionate man!" At another time, he said to one of his servants, "I would chastise you if I were not angry." When told that his enemies were circulating reports to his disadvantage, he remarked, "I will so live that no one will believe them." A friend observing his studious habits, even in extreme years, inquired how long he intended to be a scholar.—"As long," said he, "as I have need to grow wiser and better."

A LITTLE explained, a little endured, a little passed over as a foible, and lo, the rugged atoms will fit like smooth mosaic.

MY SISTER-IN-LAW.

BY C. J. M.

I KNOW not how to paint her, so good and fair was she:
Her eyes were like the ring-dove's, so pure their brilliancy;
Her voice was low and liquid, her hair was soft and brown,
And her cheeks were like the roses that bloom in Summer's crown.

But not for all her beauty my sister did I prize—
'Twas for the love that looked on me from out her gentle eyes;
'Twas for the soul's sweet graces that beamed upon her face,
And all the truth and goodness that in her heart found place.

'Twas not in days of childhood we learned to love so well;
Her home a city's crowded mart, mine in a northern dell;
And not until a husband's love my happy life had crowned,
Did I find the name of sister so very dear a sound.

For years our skies were cloudless, our paths were strewn with flowers,
But at length we saw the shadows from out the coming hours;
Ah, then life's thorns so pierced our hearts beside our mother's tomb,
We felt no more the sunshine, we saw no more the bloom.

Time laid his hand upon our grief—once more the skies grew bright,
When o'er my sister's home there fell the darkness of the night;
In the midst of anxious watchings the angel Death came down
And bore away her fairest to beautify his crown.

And though I loved her dearly when sorrow was unknown,
For all her days of anguish she had far dearer grown,
I said, "If prayers can shield her from aught of grief or ill,
Can bring her any gladness, God knows mine surely will."

Alas, 'twas not in power of love to save her life from care,
God lays on each the burdens he wishes them to bear;
She had her joys and sorrows as those of mortal birth,
But bore them all so meekly she seem'd not of earth.

And now that God hath called her unto her heavenly rest,
Why should we mourn and murmur? He knoweth what is best;
Oh give us, God, the eye of faith, that henceforth we may see
The one whom thou hast torn from us, forever, Lord, with thee.

WHOEVER is honorable and candid, honest and courteous, is a true gentleman, whether learned or unlearned, rich or poor.

LITTLE GIRL'S CROCHET UNDER PETTICOAT.

Materials.—Half pound of white double Berlin wool ; half ounce of scarlet ditto ; a long crochet needle.

A NICE warm petticoat of this description is indeed a comfortable garment for little girls to wear under their crinolines, over the usual flannel petticoat, and mothers will do well to employ their leisure time in making a little article like this for their children, to protect, in a slight degree, their little legs from exposure to cold. The stitch that it may be done in may be left, to a certain extent, to the taste of the worker ; but we will give the full description of the petticoat from which our illustration was made, which was very pretty and comfortable-looking. For a child from six to seven years of age, the garment should be one and a half yards wide and thirteen inches long. The ground-work is in Gobelin stitch, and the borders, of which there are three, are in Wave stitch. Descriptions of these two stitches have been given in previous numbers. In white wool, a chain of two hundred and ten stitches should be made, and on this a row of ordinary double crochet worked. Then commence the Wave stitch and work seven double rows, then three double rows of Gobelin stitch, five double rows in Wave stitch, three in Gobelin stitch, three in Wave stitch, thirty-seven in Gobelin stitch—so finishing the petticoat. Care must be taken to keep the work straight at the edges by always inserting the needle through the last loop in each row. The garment is joined behind, leaving an opening for the placket-hole, which should be worked round with double crochet. The small border at the edge in scarlet wool is done in the following manner: one double crochet, * three long, one double in the first of these long, one treble in the same long, one double in the two following stitches of foundation; now repeat from *. A treble needleful of red wool should be run in the first row of Wave stitch, just below the Gobelin stitch, to give the three stripes seen in the illustration. The top of the petticoat is pleated and put into a band, which should be done in tightly-worked double crochet. The garment is pleated up to the desired size, and secured by a row of tightly-worked double crochet, always inserting the needle through the double or treble portions of the pleats at the same time. Eight rows have then to be worked very closely, leaving a space in the working to form the button-hole. A button is sewed on the other side, so that the band fastens neatly.

BRAIDING PATTERN FOR A LADY'S CRAVAT.

SOFA OR ELBOW CUSHION.

Materials.—Four pieces of blue French merino; four pieces of scarlet ditto; one skein of white purse silk; one skein of black ditto; one skein of bright amber ditto; one skein of scarlet ditto.

We have given a certain arrangement for color, as by so doing the description of the work is rendered more comprehensible. But there are many more contrasts which would be equally pretty: such as scarlet and white, blue and white, black and scarlet, etc. etc. As many ladies will have by them some odd pieces of merino which might be advantageously used for a cushion of this description, we would recommend them, if they may wish to make a showy, and at the same time inexpensive present, to work one of these pretty little articles. Cut out four pieces of blue and four pieces of scarlet merino, and allow enough for trimmings, and be particular that one side of each piece is cut the salvage way of the material.

Then embroider the blue pieces in the following manner: Centre of pine white silk, pine amber silk, coral border round pine, scarlet silk. In the scarlet merino the same arrangement of color, with the exception of the coral border, which should be done in black silk. Some of the embroidery is executed in buttonhole-stitch, some in herringbone-stitch, and some in varied dots. The making up, which is always a difficulty and an expense with articles of fancy work, may be accomplished by the worker. The eight pieces of merino must be stitched together, placing one selvaige and a crossway piece so as to prevent the merino from stretching. The bottom must then be cut out; this consists of a simple round the size of the top when all the pieces are stitched together. A calico case, made exactly the same shape as the merino, should be stuffed with wool, the merino laid over, and the opening sewn up. A ruching of ribbon forms a pretty finish to the edge, and the cushion is stabbed through the centre to the wrong side, and ornamented with a rosette. Sometimes the backs of these cushions are made of leather, as being stronger and more durable than merino.

BEAD BRACELET AND CHAIN.

This little bracelet may be composed of as many rows as the taste of the worker may prefer. If made in jet or imitation pearl, a chain to match is a great improvement. The following are the instructions for threading the beads. Commence with three strings, keeping one for the centre, on which thread one bead, which ought to be a little larger than the others. On the right hand, thread two beads; on the left, four, passing the needle of the right hand through two beads on the left, leaving the centre thread under. Thread two more beads on the left-hand side; pass the needle from the right through them, bringing the centre thread over. By passing the centre thread alternately under and over, the middle bead and thread are firmly fixed in their place. Repeat to the required length. Three rows make a pretty bracelet. Finish with a jet or fancy snap.

NETTED BORDER.

This border may be made any width, and is suitable for trimming bed-furniture, dimity window curtains, etc. Knitting Cotton No. 8, 3-threads, and 2 different sized meshes are required. After making a foundation, net 2 plain rows. 2d row: Net 4 plain, wind the cotton 3 times round the mesh, putting the needle each time into the stitch, but not netting it; then, to knot the stitch firmly, pass the needle round the 3 loops without putting the thread over the mesh, and secure it in the same manner as a buttonhole stitch would be made at the edge of embroidery. This, we think, will explain the mode of fastening the stitch. The arrangement of the little feathers in the netting can be easily worked from the illustration, and the pattern can be varied as taste dictates, making the diamonds larger, so decreasing the quantity of plain netting. When the top of the border is finished, the fringe is commenced with the largest mesh. 1st row: Net 4 stitches into every alternate loop, and secure in the same manner as the smaller feathers or fancy stitches. The 2d row is netted plain with the smaller mesh. The 3d row the same with the large mesh. 4th row: With the large mesh take 4 loops of preceding row, and make 1 stitch of them. Repeat. 5th row: Same as 1st. 6th row: Same as 2d.

CROCHET SOCK.

It is pleasant to combine utility and ornament together, and thus render the occupations of the work-table conducive to a double interest. Crochet is now so universally practised, that few ladies could be found who do not excel in this branch of fancy-work. We have therefore given a little article in it, which is so generally useful, that we feel sure it will be acceptable to many of our subscribers. Children's socks in this pattern are both easy of execution, and extremely durable; they are also adapted for summer wear from their openness, which renders them cool for the hot weather. The pattern will be perfectly understood by the illustration; the manner of forming the sock is the same as that of knitting, namely, to begin at the top. In the one we are now giving, it must be commenced under the fancy pattern which forms the welt, as this is worked the contrary way after the sock is formed. After the upper part is worked, half the width is continued for the heel, which, when long enough, is folded and joined together, the foot being worked from it. The best way is to take a woven sock for a guide for the size, and form it exactly in the same manner. The pattern for the welt is then worked from the top upwards, and must be in tighter crochet than the sock. If it were commenced at this part, the little pattern would be the wrong way upwards, which would spoil the effect. These socks are extremely pretty when completed. They must of course be worked in fine crochet cotton. The ornamental border at the top can be varied according to taste, as it can be made much more elaborate than the one given by those who are proficient in this branch of fancy-work.

RUFF FOR A YOUNG GIRL.

Materials—Seven skeins of white wool, and seven of pretty rose color. Knitting needles, No. 15.

With the white wool cast on 130 stitches, and knit a row. Purl the next; and knit and purl alternately six rows. Join on the colored wool. Purl the first row and knit the next. Repeat these alternately until six colored rows are done. Do the two stripes alternately three times more, then cast off loosely, dropping every fourth stitch, and subsequently undoing it to the foundation. Sew the edges together, and draw up the ends.

THE TASSELS.—Take some white wool, and also colored, and wind together round a strong cord about twenty-four times. Tie the strands tightly at even distances of three-quarters of an inch. Cut them between every two ties, and string the balls thus formed on wool, with a rug needle, to form the tassels. Chenille tassels also look very pretty.

Receipts, &c.

DIRECTIONS FOR PRESERVING FRUITS, ETC.

TO PRESERVE GREENGAGES.—The following receipt appears to be a good one: Pick and prick all the plums, put them into a preserving-pan, with cold water enough to cover them; let them remain on the fire until the water simmers well; then take off, and allow them to stand until half cold, putting the plums to drain. To every pound of plums allow one pound of sugar, which must be boiled in the water from which the plums have been taken; let it boil very fast until the syrup drops short from the spoon, skinning carefully all the time. When the sugar is sufficiently boiled, put in the plums and allow them to boil until the sugar covers the pan with large bubbles; then pour the whole into a pan, and let them remain until the following day; drain the syrup from the plums as dry as possible, boil it up quickly, and pour it over the plums; then set them by; do this a third and a fourth time. On the fifth day, when the syrup is boiled, put the plums into it, and let them boil for a few minutes; then put them into jars. Should the greengages be over-ripe, it will be better to make jam of them, using three-fourths of a pound of sugar to one pound of fruit. Warm the jars before putting the sweetmeats in, and be careful not to boil the sugar to a candy.

GREENGAGE JAM.—When the plums are thoroughly ripe, take off the skins, stone, weigh, and boil them quickly without sugar for fifty minutes, keeping them well stirred; then to every four pounds of fruit add three of loaf sugar reduced quite to powder, boil the preserve from five to eight minutes longer, and clear off the scum perfectly before it is poured into the jars. When the flesh of the fruit will not separate easily from the stones, weigh, and throw the plums whole into the preserving-pan, boil them to a pulp, pass them through a sieve, and deduct the weight of the stones from them when apportioning the sugar to the jam.

PLUMS.—There are several varieties of plums. The richest purple plum for preserving is the damson. There are of these large and small; the large are called sweet damsons; the small ones are very rich flavored. The great difficulty in preserving plums is that the skins crack and the fruit comes to pieces. The rule here laid down for preserving them obviates that difficulty. Purple gages, unless properly preserved, will turn to juice and skins; and the large horse plum (as it is generally known) comes completely to pieces in ordinary modes of preserving. The one recommended herein will keep them whole, full, and rich.

TO PRESERVE PURPLE PLUMS.—Make a syrup of clean brown sugar; clarify it; when perfectly clear and boiling hot, pour it over the plums, having picked out all unsound ones and stems; let them remain in the syrup two days, then drain it off, make it boiling hot, skim it, and pour it over again; let them remain another day or two, then put them in a preserving-kettle over the fire, and simmer gently until the syrup is reduced, and thick or rich. One pound of sugar for each pound of plums.

TO KEEP DAMSONS.—Put them in small stone jars, or wide-mouthed glass bottles, and set them up to their necks in a kettle of cold water; set it over the fire to become boiling hot; then take it off, and let the bottles remain until the water is cold; the next day fill the bottles with cold water, and cork and seal them. These may be used the same as fresh fruit. Greengages may be done in this way.

DAMSON JELLY.—Put any number of fine ripe damsons into a stone jar, and one-third the quantity of bullaces into another, and either bake them in a slow oven, or boil them in a pan of water, till the juice is extracted. Pour off the juice clear from the fruit, strain and weigh it; boil it quickly without sugar for twenty-five minutes, draw it from the fire, stir into it ten ounces of good sugar for each pound of juice, and boil it quickly for six to ten minutes longer, carefully clearing off all the scum. The jelly must be often stirred before the sugar is added, and constantly afterwards.

TO PRESERVE APRICOTS.—Choose fine apricots, pare them thinly and cleanly, and when done, take their weight, cut them in halves and remove the kernel, lay them with the inside upwards, take the same weight of pounded loaf-sugar and strew over them; break the stones of the apricots and blanch the kernels; let the fruit lie in the sugar for twelve hours, then put fruit, sugar, juice, and kernels into a preserving-pan, simmer gently until clear; as the scum rises, remove it; remove the halves of the apricots; as they become cold, lay them in jars, and when the whole of the fruit has been potted, pour equally over them the syrup and the kernels. Cover the fruit with brandy paper, and tie tightly down.

GOOSEBERRY JAM.—Stalk and crop as many as you require of ripe, red, rough gooseberries; put them into the preserving-pan, and as they warm, stir and bruise them to bring out the juice. Let them boil for ten minutes, then add sugar in the proportion of three-quarters of a pound to every pound of fruit, and place it on the fire again; let it boil slowly, and continue boiling for two hours longer, stirring it all the time to prevent its burning. When it thickens, and is jelly-like on a plate when cold, it is done enough. Put it into pots, and allow it to remain a day before it is covered.

TO PRESERVE APPLES, GOLDEN PIPPINS.—Take the rind of an orange, and boil it very tender, then lay it in cold water for three days; take two dozen golden pippins, pare, core and quarter them, boil them to a strong jelly, and run it through a jelly-bag till it is clear. Take the same quantity of pippins, pare and core them, and put three pounds of loaf sugar in a preserving-pan with a pint and a half of spring water, let it boil, skim it well, and put in your pippins with the orange rind cut into long thin slips, then let them boil fast till the sugar becomes thick and will almost candy; then put in a pint and a half of pippin jelly, and boil fast till the jelly is clear, then squeeze in the juice of a fine lemon, give the whole another boil, and put the pippins in pots or glasses with the orange peel. Lemon peel may be used instead of orange, but then it must only be boiled, and not soaked.

QUINCE MARMALADE.—Gather the fruit when quite ripe; pare, quarter, and core it; boil the skins in the water, measuring a teacupful to a pound of fruit; when they are soft, mash and strain them, and put back the water into the preserving kettle; add the quinces, and boil them until they are soft enough to mash fine; rub through a sieve, and put three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit; stir them well together, and boil them over a slow fire until it will fall like jelly from the spoon. Put it in pots or tumblers, and secure it, when cold, with paper sealed to the edge of the jar with the white of an egg.

TO PRESERVE PEARS.—Take small, rich, fair fruit, as soon as the pips are black; set them over the fire in a kettle, with water to cover them; let them simmer until they will yield to the pressure of the finger, then, with a skimmer, take them into cold water; pare them neatly, leaving on a little of the stem and the blossom end; pierce them at the blossom end to the core; then make a syrup of a pound of sugar for each pound of fruit; when it is boiling hot, pour it over the pears, and let it stand until the next day, when drain it off, make it boiling hot, and again pour it over; after a day or two, put the fruit in the syrup over the fire, and boil gently until it is clear; then take it into the jars or spread it on dishes; boil the syrup thick, then put it and the fruit in jars.

TO PRESERVE APPLES.—Take equal quantities of good moist sugar and apples. Peel, core, and mince them small. Boil the sugar, allowing to every three pounds a pint of water. Skim well, and boil pretty thick. Then add the apples, the grated peel of one or two lemons, and two or three pieces of white ginger. Boil till the apples fall, and look clear and yellow. Apples prepared in this way will keep for years.

TO PRESERVE CRAB-APPLES.—Take off the stem and core them with a penknife, without cutting them open; weigh a pound of white sugar for each pound of prepared fruit; put a teacup of water to each pound of sugar; put it over a moderate fire. When the sugar is all dissolved and hot, put the apples in; let them boil gently until they are clear, then skim them out, and spread them on flat dishes. Boil the syrup until it is thick; put the fruit in whatever it is to be kept, and, when the syrup is cooled and settled, pour it carefully over the fruit. Slices of lemon boiled with the fruit may be considered an improvement. One lemon is enough for several pounds of fruit. Crab-apples may be preserved whole, with only half an inch of the stem on; three-quarters of a pound of sugar for each pound of fruit.

APPLE JELLY.—Pare quickly some highly-flavored juicy apples of any kind, or of various kinds together; slice, without dividing them; but first free them from the stalks and eyes; shake out some of the pips and lay the apples evenly into very clean large stone jars, just dipping an occasional layer into cold water as this is done, the better to preserve the color of the whole. Set the jars into pans of water and boil the fruit slowly until it is quite soft, then turn it into a jelly-bag or cloth, and let the juice all drop from it. Weigh, and boil it for ten minutes, then draw it from the fire, and stir into it, until it is entirely dissolved, twelve ounces of sugar to the pound and quarter (or pint) of juice. Place the preserve again over the fire, and stir it without intermission, except to clear off the scum, until it has boiled from eight to ten minutes longer, for otherwise it will jelly on the surface with the scum upon it, which it will then be difficult to remove, as when touched it will break and fall into the preserve. The strained juice of one small lemon to the pint of jelly should be added two or three minutes before it is poured out, and the rind of one or two, cut very thin, may be simmered in the juice before the sugar is added; but the pale, delicate color of the jelly will be injured by too much of it, and many persons would altogether prefer the pure flavor of the fruit.

spoon over a gentle fire until all have burst, and the juice flows freely from them; strain it off without pressure, and pass it through a jelly-bag, weigh, and then boil it rapidly for twenty minutes; draw it from the fire, stir in it until dissolved fourteen ounces of loaf-sugar, roughly powdered, to each pound of juice, and boil quickly for fifteen minutes longer, keeping it constantly stirred and perfectly well skimmed. It will be very clear, and of a beautiful pale-rose color.

GREEN GRAPES.—Take the largest and best grapes before they are ripe; stone and scald them, let them lie two days in the water they were scalded in, then drain them and put them into a thin syrup, and heat them over a slow fire; the next day turn the grapes into a pan and heat them, then drain them, put them into clarified sugar, give them a good boil, skim them, and set them by. The next day boil more sugar, put it to the grapes, give them all a good boil, skim them, and set them in a warm stove all night; the day after drain the grapes and lay them out to dry, first dusting them.

GREEN GRAPES.—Weigh a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit; the largest when they begin to get soft are the best; split them, and take out the kernels and stew them in part of the sugar, take out the kernels from the shells and blanch them; the next day strain off the syrup and boil it with the remaining sugar about ten minutes; skim it and add the fruit and kernels, skim it until clear, then put it into small pots with syrup and kernels.

TO PRESERVE ORANGES.—Rasp or cut the oranges in scallops with a pen-knife and throw them into water; change it once a day for three days, then boil them till tender enough to run a wheat-straw through, then put them into cold water until next day; pulp and wipe them very dry, have the syrup ready, boil them two or three times till very clear, observing to put the syrup to them; when cold, make it the same as for cucumbers.

TO PRESERVE ORANGE PEEL.—Cut the orange in half, take out the pulp, put the peel in strong salt and water to soak for three days; repeat this three times, then put them on a sieve to dry; take one pound of loaf sugar, add to it a quart of spring water, boil it, skim it until quite clear, let the peels simmer until they are quite transparent, and dry them before the fire. Take loaf sugar with just sufficient water to dissolve it; whilst the sugar is boiling put in the peels, stirring continually until all the sugar is candied round them, then put them to dry, either before the fire or in the oven, and when perfectly dried, put them by for use.

TO KEEP PEARS.—Choose the soundest pears, peel and cut them into quarters, take out the pips, and put the pieces into bottles. If the pears are intended for dessert, one boiling is sufficient, but if for cooking, they must boil five or six times; should the fruit thus bottled have fallen from the tree, instead of being gathered, they will require a quarter of an hour boiling.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

In a recent number of the Book we inquired for a receipt for making "Old-fashioned Connecticut Wedding-Cake." We have received the two following, and we return our thanks to Miss H. N. C., of Boston, and Mrs. A. H. C., of Forrestville, N. Y., for them.

OLD CONNECTICUT BRIDECAKE.—Eighteen pounds of flour, ten pounds of sugar, good brown, nine pounds butter, eighteen eggs, eleven nutmegs, five quarts of new milk, one quart distillery, or good homemade yeast (brewers' yeast is too bitter), ten pounds of fruit, raisins, currants, and citron, if liked, one ounce mace, one quart wine, one pint brandy.

OLD CONNECTICUT ELECTION CAKE.—Eighteen pounds flour, nine pounds good brown sugar (it makes this kind of cakes more moist), nine pounds butter, ten eggs, three pints fresh yeast (distillery or homemade), nine pints new milk, two ounces nutmegs, two ounces mace, some cinnamon, if liked (cinnamon is not in the original receipt—it can be added in any; I usually put it in), nine pounds of raisins. Currants and citron may be added, if one please; but usually currants are not used in this. Eight wineglasses each of sherry or Madeira wine and brandy. Currant wine will not do in cake. It makes it heavy.

These quantities will make eighteen or twenty loaves, and as it is too much for an ordinary family, I have reduced the quantity of Election Cake, which will make four large-sized loaves.

A SMALL QUANTITY OF ELECTION CAKE.—Two and a quarter pounds of flour, eighteen ounces butter, eighteen ounces sugar, a gill and half of good fresh yeast (as directed in the foregoing receipts), four and a half gills of new milk, two nutmegs, two eggs, half an ounce mace, two pounds raisins (stoned and chopped a little), one wineglass of sherry or Madeira wine, one ditto of brandy. In every kind of cake as much fruit can be used as one chooses.

Directions for Making these Cakes.—The night previous to baking, take all the flour, and all the yeast, and all the milk (if warm from the cow it is sufficient, if not, must be warmed some), part of the sugar and part of the butter. Work it well together, and turn a pan over it, and let it rise. In the morning it will be light. Then take the remainder of the sugar, butter, spices, liquor, and eggs, and work well together as for some other cake, then put it all into the cake; put together the night before, and beat it well together for some time. Cover it, and let it rise again. After it is light, work in the fruit lightly, and put it in the tins, and let it stand a short time, then put it in the oven, and bake. After it is baked, it is to be frosted, if one please. I have given the full directions, as those that are not acquainted with making cannot have good luck unless it is made right. These are valuable receipts, and the best in existence.

Judgment must be used in all cake making, and these cakes must not be kept too warm or too cold. They are often kept too warm; that makes the butter oily, and scalds the whole, and makes it sour, and the fault is in the receipt. There is no fault in these. Mrs. A. H. C. Forrestville, Chautauque County, N. Y.

OLD-FASHIONED CONNECTICUT WEDDING-CAKE.—Four pounds of sifted flour, two pounds of butter, two and three-quarter pounds of sugar, two cents' worth of yeast, eight eggs, glass of white brandy, raisins, citron, mace, nutmeg, and any other spice to the taste.

Directions for Mixing.—Take all the flour, half the butter, half the sugar, a little milk, and all the yeast, and mix like biscuit dough. When perfectly light, add the rest of the butter, and sugar, with eight eggs, and set it to rise again. When light the second time, add the spice and brandy, and half a teaspoonful of soda mixed well. Paper and butter the tins, and let it stand in them half an hour. Bake in a quick oven. This will make six loaves. It is much improved by frosting.

Miss H. N. C., Boston.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A CHEAP AND PHILOSOPHICAL ORNAMENT.—Fill a clear glass bottle with distilled water, in which dissolve some sugar of lead, about a penny-worth to half a pint of water. Insert a scrap of sheet zinc into the cork, long enough to reach half way down the bottle when the cork is in; the lower part of the zinc may be cut into two or three forks and twisted like the branches of a tree. The strip of metal is no sooner immersed in the solution than the latter begins to act chemically upon it, and delicate feathery crystals of lead will cover the whole of the submerged portion. The deposit and growth of the lead may be watched with a magnifying glass, and will continue to increase for some hours, and can only be stopped by carefully pouring out the solution and replacing it with distilled water; it will, however, cease of itself when all the lead is deposited. The result looks like an inverted tree or bush, with thick metallic foliage, glistening as the light happens to fall upon it. It need scarcely be remarked that sugar of lead is poisonous to swallow.

HOW TO KNOW A DOUBLE FROM A SINGLE FLOWER, BEFORE THE BLOSSOM OPENS.—The usual way of ascertaining this is by comparing the buds, those of the double flowers being more globular and larger than the single ones. But the most simple and unerring test is to cut the bud through the middle, when the single flower will be seen folding around the stamens; the double will be all folds and no stamens.

HOW TO STOP BLOOD.—Take the fine dust of tea, or the scrapings of the inside of tanned leather; bind it upon the wound closely, and blood will soon cease to flow. After the blood has ceased to flow, laudanum may be applied to the wound. Due regard to these instructions will save agitation of mind and running for a surgeon, who, probably, will make no better prescription if present.

POMATUM.—Take one ounce of spermaceti, one ounce of castor oil, four ounces of olive oil, and two penny-worth of bergamot, and melt them together in a pot, placed in boiling water, stirring the mixture all the while; when thoroughly mixed, pour the mixture into pots while hot.

PERMANENT INK FOR MARKING LINEN.—Take of lunar caustic (now called nitrate of silver), one drachm; weak solution of tincture of galls, two drachms. The cloth must be wetted first with the following liquid, viz. salt of tartar, one ounce; water, one ounce and a half, and it must be made perfectly dry before it is written upon.

TO WASH BLACK OR COLORED SILKS OF A FAST COLOR.—Make a lye of soft soap by warming it in a pipkin with sufficient water to dissolve it, but do not let it boil; then add about half-a-pint of whiskey (to half-a-pound of the soap), and let it cool. Have a tub of cold water, and take each breadth separately, and rinse well in the water but do not rub it, and then spread it evenly upon a board or table, dip a piece of flannel in the mixture of soap and whiskey, and rub thoroughly over both sides of the silk; rinse again in clean cold water (but great care must be taken to cleanse it from the soap), then throw it over a line in the open air to drain, but not to dry, and, by the time you have completed the washing, the first piece will be ready to iron, which must be done with a hot iron—as hot as would be required to iron a piece of linen. The result will be that the silk will look equal to new.

WOMAN:

IN HER PERFECTION.

Blessed art thou among women.—St. Luke, 1. 28.

MORAL character decides the destiny of mankind. Goodness, resulting from obedience to God's laws, is the test of all moral virtue. No individual perfectness can be reached without this obedience, and no progress in what is called "civilization" can be permanent or really improve humanity, which is not founded on and sustained by moral goodness.

When the world has lost the sense of God's holiness,* and of His requirement of holiness (or goodness in men), it is fast ripening for destruction. Nor can any human device long stay its downward progress. The reintroduction of this moral element of character must be the influence of Divine Power in qualifying His chosen agents for the work. Thus Noah was saved to begin anew God's plan of salvation; Abraham was chosen; Moses raised up; and Cyrus, the Gentile, called when the Hebrew people had too nearly lost the idea of moral goodness to strive for their own deliverance from captivity.

At the time when Mary of Nazareth was born, the whole world lay beneath the darkest shadows of evil. Sins, crimes, and wretchedness filled the earth. The moral power of woman was nearly destroyed by the general licentiousness; all reverence and fear of the true God, and all faith in his promises were lost or derided, even among his chosen people. The selfish passions predominated everywhere; and the universal corruptions of society seemed like a pall over the face of the dead—to shut out even the hope of reviving life.

Man's power to sustain the Good and the True being thus overborne, woman was called to help in the ministry of redemption.

When the Angel Gabriel was sent from Heaven to announce that Divine message of mercy, the rekindling of the pure light of goodness before that sinful and miserable generation, did the holy watchers on the crystal walls of Paradise wonder as they marked the swift messenger of grace, and saw him pass by the abodes of the rich, the learned, the great, the mighty men of renown, and never stoop his wing till he entered the humble home of a young and lowly-born maiden? And yet, has it not ever seemed to men, from that age to this, an astonishing wonder, if not a wrong, that they had no part nor lot in Christ's "manifestation in the flesh?"

"Hail, highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women!" Such was the salutation of the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary.

To be the mother of "Shiloh" had, doubtless, been the hope and fervent prayer of many a pious mother in Israel from the time of Jacob's prediction. Isaiah had prophesied that "a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us;" yet it is not probable that any Jewish maiden had ever hoped to be thus miraculously endowed with the privilege of motherhood. And Mary of Nazareth could never, in her lowly estate, betrothed as she was to a poor carpenter, with a life of humble toil and obscurity before them, have dreamed of the glory awaiting her. She had, in perfect truth and humility, been ready to do all the good that offered, performing from her heart every duty of her lot in the fear and love of the Lord God of Israel; thus it was that she "found favor" in His sight. Yet when the angel had assured her she should be the blessed mother of the promised Messiah, and had answered her simple, child-like question—"How shall this be?"—she instantly believed, and accepted the high mission.

Zacharias did not believe the announcement, made to him by Gabriel, of the birth of John. The priest was righteous—as a man is righteous; but the difference between the masculine and the feminine nature is strikingly illustrated in these two examples. Zacharias was earthward in his doubts, his reason: Mary was heavenward in her faith, her feelings. He believed not the angel, and was struck dumb: she believed, and "the Holy Ghost overshadowed her!"

Great indeed must have been her faith, when it wholly overcame all fear of man, all selfish considerations. She was betrothed; therefore not only her reputation, but her life would be placed in jeopardy, if she were proven to have been unfaithful to her plighted husband. When assured that she should "bear a Son," who would not be Joseph's son, it might seem natural that some fears for her own safety would have clouded her faith. But no; her humble, trusting reply was:—

"Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word!"

Worthy was Mary the Virgin to be the mother of our Saviour; that the human nature He, who was very God, took on Himself, should be derived from her, the obedient woman. Thus is the high and holy duty of her own sex indicated—by Mary's example—to receive the promises of God in trusting faith, and transmute these, as it were, like living principles into the souls of their sons.

The next event in Mary's life is her meeting with her cousin Elizabeth; this scene, as described in the simple style of divine narrative, is one of the most beautiful and sublime exhibitions of piety and inspiration to be found in the world's history. And Mary's song of triumphant faith, love, and thanksgiving is the sweetest, purest, and most perfect lyrical production of the human mind. (See Luke i. 46.)

The mental endowments of woman will never atone for any lack of moral excellence; yet we are glad to know that the mother of our Saviour possessed the highest order of genius—that which can comprehend the beautiful in the true and the good, and give fitting expressions to these sublime ideas and pious aspirations.

From the birth of her first-born, her holy Son, Mary seems to have been absorbed in His high destiny. We only see her when ministering to Him. His nature and His offices were made known to her by the angel; that she applied the term "my Saviour" to God, in her song of thanksgiving, indicates that she was the first disciple of Jesus Christ. And she kept "all these sayings in her heart." A woman's heart held the mighty secret of Divine Wisdom—that the MESSIAH had come!

Mary was "highly favored" in her home life as well as in her heavenly destiny. Her husband was "a just man." What a volume of happy days for the wife is contained in those two words! When, obedient to the angel of the Lord, Joseph took Mary to be his wife, with what careful tenderness he seems to have watched over her and her precious Son! The offices of provider, protector, and lawgiver were as fully intrusted to Joseph as to any husband; he had the warning of danger, and took all the task of providing for their flight into Egypt; the return seems to have been left entirely to his care and judgment. In all these scenes, Joseph was the devoted, loving, and faithful husband; Mary the obedient, loving, trusting wife. That she truly loved and revered her husband, and that their hearts and minds were in tender sympathy, was manifested when "the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem, and Joseph and his mother knew it not." Together they searched and grieved; and when He was found, the mother gave to Joseph the first place in all their cares for her Son: "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing."

The domestic life at Nazareth seems to have been an example of conjugal love, parental care, and filial obedience, which would, if universal, almost restore to earth the lost happiness of Eden.

Two pictures of the human mother and her Divine Son are shrined in the sacred Book; during His man's life on earth their souls met and mingled, once in joy, and once in sorrow; the beginning of His miracles and the closing of His ministry.

There is a marriage in Cana, of Galilee; the mother, and Jesus, and His disciples are all there. Wine, the type, when rightly used, of innocent joy in God's earthly blessings, is wanted. The mother of Jesus told her Son, having perfect faith that He could supply the need.

Jesus replied: "Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come."

Still the mother's heart was not grieved nor discouraged by the reply. Her faith in God was shown by the care she took to help her Divine Son, when His human nature was thus, as it were, shrinking from the awful burden of the world's sins and woes to be laid on him; and her faith prevailed. When she said to the servants: "Do whatsoever He saith unto you," the darkness passed from His soul; He gave forth His command: "Fill the water-pots with water." It is done. "And the pale water saw God and blushed." What a triumph was this to the power of maternal influence! to the gift of insight or harmony with heavenly things which the mind of a true, pure, and pious woman possesses! Even the Son of God, when He came in the form of man to redeem the world, was to be subject to this influence; only at His mother's persuasions and with her sympathy did He begin His miracles.

There is darkness over Jerusalem: but the tear-swollen eyes of Mary the mother of Christ can see Him through the gloom. She was near Him in His last agony; though the dreadful scene was "a sword to pierce through her own heart," yet Mary, the pious mother, was near the cross of Christ.

We see in this the unconquerable power of her love for Jesus, and her perfect faith in His Messiahship, even when He had been rejected of men, scourged and crucified! And his last throb of human affection was for her; the dying Saviour provided for his mother!

One last gleam of light falls on the picture of this perfection of womanhood. The eleven Apostles are gathered in an upper chamber at Jerusalem; "and these all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women and Mary the Mother of Jesus."

Mary's youth was distinguished by the favor of God; her maturity by active piety and faithfulness in all her duties; her age by fervent faith in Christ, and holy communion with His first Church on earth.

What Mary said, prophetically, of herself has been fulfilled: "All generations shall call me blessed; for He that is mighty hath done me great things, and holy is His name!"

BORROWED FEATHERS.

CERTAIN pretenders to literary talent seem to be afflicted with a disease that, for want of a definite name, we will call the mania of appropriation. When a real poet has won popular applause, these pretenders to genius endeavor either to imitate or plagiarize a portion of the successful poem; and, in some instances, they even appropriate or claim the whole. The young lady who announced herself as the writer of "Nothing to Wear," is a distinguished instance of this kind of mania.

The foolishness of the pretender is even more pitiable than his falsehood. His borrowed plumes are only displayed for a moment, to be torn away with the contempt of all classes of readers, for none like to have their sympathies trifled with or an impostor gain their honest tribute of praise. The real author is never injured in these cases; on the contrary, a poem worth stealing, or imitating, is immediately invested with superior merits, all its readers seem ready for the duty of guarding the fame of the genuine poet, and really become his warm friends.

We have lately had an experience of this kind of popular feeling, which has quite interested us. In our long course of editorial duty, we have had many scores of imitations and plagiarisms sent us, but only in one or two instances have we been deceived into accepting and publishing the stolen article. One of these appeared in our April number; see page 365. The poem "Time," by E— (very modest to give only one initial), is the production of Benj. F. Taylor, Esq., formerly known as editor of the Chicago Journal, and really is worth reclaiming. The purloiner did not take the whole, therefore we will give the poem, as it deserves to be celebrated for its beauty of sentiment, as well as for the interest it has excited among the friends of the poet. We have half a score of letters on our table, some from ladies, as we judge, each eloquently pleading the right of the author to his own creations. We are gratified by this interest in our Book, and even the plagiarist may be pardoned on the plea that "all is well that ends well."

THE LONG AGO; OR, THE RIVER OF TIME.

BY BENJ. F. TAYLOR.

Oh, a wonderful stream is the river Time,
As it runs through the realm of tears,
With a faultless rhythm and a musical rhyme,
And a broader sweep and a surge sublime,
As it blends with the Ocean of Years.

How the winters are drifting like flakes of snow!
And the summers like buds between,
And the year in the sheaf—so they come and they go
On the river's breast, with its ebb and flow,
As it glides in the shadow and sheen.

There's a magical ISLE up the river Time,
Where the softest of airs are playing;
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the Junos with the Roses are staying.

And the name of this ISLE is the LONG AGO,
And we bury our treasures there;
There are brows of beauty and bosoms of snow—
They are heaps of dust, but we loved them so!
There are trinkets and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of song that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant's prayer;
There's a lute unswept and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows and pieces of rings,
And the garments that She used to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the fairy shore
By the Mirage is lifted in air;
And we sometimes hear, through the turbulent roar,
Sweet voices we heard in the days gone before,
When the wind down the river is fair.

Oh, remembered for aye, be the blessed Isle,
 All the day of our life till night—
 When the evening comes with its beautiful smile,
 And our eyes are closing to slumber awhile,
 May that "GREENWOOD" of SOUL be to sight!

OBITUARY.

WE have the sorrowful task of recording here, where the notice of "Miss Hale's School" has so long appeared, that her duties on earth are closed.

MISS SARAH JOSEPHA HALE died May 3d, suddenly at the last, although her health had been failing for some months; still she had been able to manage all the concerns of the school till the last day of her life. Endeared to all who knew her, and greatly beloved by the young hearts she had usefully trained to occupy woman's true place in the world, while earnestly seeking the heavenly inheritance, she was, in the prime of womanhood, taken from this world by her Almighty Father to enjoy the reward of the redeemed in Heaven. The mourning hearts she has left behind feel that her immortal gain is to them an irreparable loss, and that as daughter, sister, teacher, and friend, her loss cannot but be mourned deeply and long.

In our next number a friend has promised to furnish a sketch which may be more satisfactory, than this brief notice, to the many pupils who have enjoyed the benefits of Miss Hale's instruction.

COMMON SENSE, AND HOW TO GAIN IT.—In an excellent Essay on "The Mistakes of Literary Men," Professor John S. Hart makes the following wise suggestions:—

"This habitual intercourse with men and women, and thoughts and things outside of your own little circle, is the true generator of common sense. How often do we see men of great ability and of prodigious learning, become, for the want of a few grains of common sense, mere ciphers in the community. You see a Professor in the lecture-room, whose knowledge in his department is of the very first order, yet utterly powerless in discipline, and consequently utterly useless as an instructor. He has no common sense, no tact. His talents, consequently, are all thrown away. His pupils learn from him nothing, but the habit of insubordination, and skill in the arts of unmanly annoyance. We want among us, undoubtedly, profound scholarship—that original, independent knowledge, which comes only from patient, protracted study in particular lines of investigation. But we do not want men of merely one idea. We do not want the mere book-worm."

PAMPHLETS.—We have the Reports of the New-England and the Pennsylvania Female Medical Colleges, both of which we intend to notice next month.

Other notices are, unavoidably, postponed till the next number.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Uncle Hugh"—"Heroism"—"Eldorado"—and "The Old Maple."

The following are not needed: "A Storm at Sea"—"The Soldier's Fate"—"Columbia"—"England in a Fury"—"Doubt and Danger"—"Lady May"—"Admission to the Bar"—"The Sacrifice" (we are sorry to disappoint the writer, but the story is not well written; literature is not an easy path of life, and cannot be successfully pursued without greater effort than young ladies are willing to make)—"Early Friendships"—"The Money Chest"—"My own little Girl"—"Painting as an Art for Ladies"—"Idle Words"—and "The Gift."

Other MSS. on hand will be reported next month.

E. O.—We have no favorite localities. Our contributors are from all points of the compass. If an article is good, well written, and we want it, then it is always accepted. Your article is declined.

Health Department.

CHILDREN'S FOOD.*

THIS is a subject of literally vital interest to every family in the land; more especially in large towns and cities, where the want of facilities and inducements to out-door activities makes it absolutely indispensable to adopt some system in reference to the times, quantities, and qualities of the food to be taken by children; for the want of attention to which things multitudes die early, while other multitudes, not as large, however—for half of all that are born die before the age of eighteen years, in consequence mainly of inattention to the habits and health—become dyspeptic, serofulous, or consumptive before the age of twenty-five, many of whom are destined to a life of weariness, of painful toil, and of wasting efforts for a living through sickness, and disease, and chronic sufferings.

On entering the fifth year, or sixth at farthest, a child can be very easily habituated to eat at three regular times a day, at intervals of five or six hours, with nothing whatever between, except, at a little past mid-way, a single good ripe apple, or a piece of cold, dry, coarse bread may be allowed to the less vigorous.

A second consideration is quantity. If children are taught to eat slowly, in loving good-nature—as will be the case if they are let alone by their parents, and not put in an ill-humor by incessant reprimands and innumerable rules and regulations about a hundred and one contemptible trifles—they may generally be allowed, for breakfast and dinner, to eat as long and as much as they want, only if all the hard food is cut up carefully with a sharp knife into pieces not larger than a pea. This should be conscientiously and always attended to by one of the parents, for it cannot be safely entrusted to one hiring out of a million; parental affection only will do it as it ought to be done.

At supper, children should always be controlled; let observation determine how much a child will eat and leave something over, and then allow thereafter certainly not over two-thirds of that amount.

And now as to that most important of all items—quality of food for growing children. The instinct for sweetness is insappasable: without it, any child, however healthy, will soon die, and, fortunately, the two things which children most love everywhere, and of which they never could get tired, and will always relish when hungry, are milk and bread, and these furnish as much sugar as any child needs. But no child can ever grow up healthy and handsome without good teeth, and as the permanent ones begin to be made from the fourth year, their food should contain in great abundance those elements which are needed for sound, durable teeth. The bony part of the tooth contains seventy-one per cent of lime, the enamel ninety-four per cent. Out of one hundred parts of the finest, whitest flour, only six per cent is lime; of one hundred parts of flour made of the whole grain, there is twenty-five per cent of lime, or four times as much; and no other general article of food contains anything like as much lime as common brown bread. Therefore, it is a reasonable conclusion that if children were to live largely on flour made of the whole product of the grain, in the shape of well-made and well-baked brown bread, very much would be done toward securing them durable and beautiful teeth.

When children are from home, let them live as others; when at home their bread should be uniformly made of the whole product of the grain ground, from their third to their fifteenth year, to be eaten with half a pint of milk for breakfast and supper, adding some berries from June until September, and one or two baked apples the remainder of the year, adding a teaspoon or two of sugar. Such a supper or breakfast will always "taste good" to them. Such a bill of fare with two or three variations a week, and allowing them to eat what they want for dinner, will pretty surely, other things being equal, give good health, good teeth, a good constitution, and a good old age.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From GEO. W. CHILDS, Philadelphia:—
THE GEOLOGICAL EVIDENCES OF THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN; with Remarks on Theories of the Origin of Species by Variation. By Sir Charles Lyell, F. R. S., author of "Principles of Geology," "Elements of Geology," etc. etc. This book enters deeply and extensively into all the ramifications of the subject of which it treats. The author proceeds with commendable caution over his ground, rejecting all evidence in favor of his theory which bears the least suspicion of incredibility; while he uses the rest so boldly as to render his conclusions almost beyond cavil. All persons of intelligence will be interested in this work.

THE AMERICAN PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND LITERARY GAZETTE is a new and handsome publication of ninety-six pages, which is to be issued semi-monthly at $2 per annum, by the publisher G. W. Childs. It is issued simultaneously in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and, besides giving all the important literary information respecting current literature and authors, gives a list of all the works published in this country during the last year, with announcement of those which are to be published. To publishers of the country, this will be a very useful publication as well as an interesting volume. It will astonish the trade in Europe, being much superior to any publication of a similar character in London or Paris. The publisher may well be congratulated upon his enterprise, good taste, and tact.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—
ANNETTE; or, The Lady of the Pearls. By Alexander Dumas (the Younger), author of "Camille, the Camelia Lady." Translated by Mrs. W. R. A. Johnson.

From BLANCHARD & LEA, Philada., Publishers:—
THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—
CHAMBERS' ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE. Parts 61 and 62 of this valuable work have been received.
THE BOOK OF DAYS. Part 13.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—
THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the death of Lord Raglan. By Alexander William Kinglake. Volume I. This is a full and minute account of the Crimean war, written with evident care, and from an abundance of reliable material. The book is, however, intended for the especial glorification of Lord Raglan, and he is brought forward on all occasions in the position of a hero. Though the book is more peculiarly interesting to Englishmen, it will, undoubtedly, find many readers on this side the Atlantic.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Tale. This is a novel which it gives us pleasure to commend. Its tone is a healthy one, and its incidents sufficiently exciting to engage the reader, while it is far from being of the sensational school. Its theme is that pure and rare friendship that "loveth at all times."

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK. A Novel. By Mrs. Gaskill, author of "Sylvia's Lovers," "Mary Barton," etc. Mrs. Gaskill, usually so quiet in her style, has, in this work, attempted a sensational novel. And in this, though she may not have entirely failed, neither has she quite succeeded. Spite of an excellent plot and well drawn characters, the story drags a little, and would be none the worse for condensation. Nevertheless, this talented lady's works are always worthy of perusal.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. We have received Nos. 1 and 2 of this serial. This promises to be a work of both interest and importance, while its portraits of distinguished generals and statesmen on both sides render it particularly valuable.

SEA-KINGS AND NAVAL HEROES. A Book for Boys. By John G. Edgar, author of "History for Boys," "Foot-prints of Famous Men," etc. In this book we have brief yet spirited sketches of Rollo the Norman, Hastings, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Walter Raleigh, Lord Nelson, and a number of other distinguished Naval Heroes. In subject and style it is well calculated to please those for whom it is intended. The volume contains a number of illustrations.

A FIRST LATIN COURSE. Comprehending Grammar, Delectus, and Exercise-Book. With Vocabularies. By William Smith, LL. D., author of "A History of Greece," "A Classical Dictionary," etc. Revised by H. Drisler, A. M., Professor of Latin in Columbia College, New York; editor of "Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon," etc.

C. SALLUSTI CRISPI Catilina et Jugurtha. Recognized Geo. Long, M. A. One of Harper's series of Greek and Latin Texts.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. F. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

THE PENTATEUCH AND BOOK OF JOSHUA Critically Examined. By the Right Rev. John William Colenso, D. D., Bishop of Natal. Part II. We prefer not to enter into the discussion concerning the merits or demerits of this volume, as it is a matter of too serious consideration for a hastily formed or briefly expressed opinion. Our readers must examine it for themselves, or let it alone, at their option; for it is a book that is likely to try religious faith strongly.

THE GENTLE SKEPTIC; or, Essays and Conversations of a Country Justice on the Authenticity and Truthfulness of the Old Testament Record. Edited by the Rev. C. Walworth. The next book we find before us, whose title we have just given, is one of the several which Bishop Colenso's recent works have called out. It is intended not only to refute the arguments and point out the fallacies of that reverend gentleman's Biblical criticisms, but to strengthen wavering faith, wherever found, in the truth of Revelation.

A TEXT-BOOK OF PENMANSHIP. Containing all the Established Rules and Principles of the Art, with Rules for Punctuation, Directions and Forms for Letter-Writing; to which are added a brief History of Writing, and Hints on Writing Materials, etc. etc. For Teachers and Pupils. Adapted for use in Schools, Academies, and Commercial Colleges, in connection with any well-arranged Series of Copy Books. By H. W. Ellsworth, Teacher of Penmanship in the Public Schools of New York City, and for several years Teacher of Book-Keeping, Penmanship, and Commercial Correspondence, in Bryant, Stratton, & Co.'s Chain of Mercantile Colleges.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

DARRELL MARKHAM; or, The Captain of the Future. By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," etc. Miss Braddon has rung a fourth change upon her favorite plot, in which she makes her hero or heroine a bigamist. Though this plot has long since lost its novelty, we must yet give her credit for ingenuity and originality for the variety which she succeeds in introducing in it. She seems, too, to be capable of but two conceptions of female character: one, a commanding beauty, with flashing black eyes and imperious will, after which Aurora Floyd and Olivia Marmaduke are patterned; the other is an insipid, doll-like creature, with blue eyes, fair complexion, and hair "like a pale golden halo" around her face. Lady Audley, Lady Lisle, Lucy Floyd, and the heroine of the present novel, Mrs. Duke, are of this type. With her masculine characters she is somewhat more happy, at least presenting us with a greater variety. This, her latest story, is perhaps the best, though it contains no character, either male or female, that equals "Granville Varney," in "Lady Lisle."

VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By Oliver Goldsmith. We are glad to see that Messrs. Dick & Fitzgerald, in their "Hand and Pocket Library," are determined to number only sterling novels.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

MY SOUTHERN FRIENDS. By Edmund Kirke, author of "Among the Pines." This writer draws largely from his own experience at the South for characters and facts. He displays intimate acquaintance with Southern character, from the courteous and hospitable planter, to the colored dependents of the household and plantation, and the miserable "clay-eaters" of North Carolina. He has written a vigorous and entertaining story, though the narrative is rather loosely strung together, with occasional discrepancies. Mr. Kirke succeeds far better in delineation than in construction.

THE NATIONAL TAX LAW, as Amended. With a complete Compendium of Stamp Duties, etc., and the Decisions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. By E. H. Hall, Washington, D. C.

From CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through MARTIN & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

"I WILL." Being the Determinations of the Men of God, as found in some of the "I Wills" of the Psalms. By Rev. Philip Bennett Power, M. A. Those who have read the "I Wills of Christ," by this author, need no other commendation of this work. It is a remarkable merit in the productions of Mr. Power that his books interest the mind by their practical wisdom, while the heart is wrapt and moved with the devotional ardor of the Christian sentiment.

FAMILY SERMONS. By Horatius Boner, D. D. The poetical genius of this eminent writer has made his name widely known. His "Hymns of Faith and Hope" will be fitting companions for these Sermons, which are full of the pathos and sublimity of "the Gospel of the grace of God."

THE SUNDAY EVENING BOOK: Short Papers for Family Reading. This little book is a rare gem of its kind, as six of the most distinguished religious writers of Scotland have contributed to make its worth, beauty, and piety. It has a fitting companion in

THE THOUGHTS OF GOD. By the Rev. J. R. Macduff. The two books should be in every Sunday-School, and in every family. These editions are beautifully prepared.

MINISTERING CHILDREN. A Tale. By Maria Louisa Charlesworth. With illustrations. Two volumes. The work has already a wide popularity in our land; but this beautiful edition will find a warm welcome. For the young, there can hardly a book be named which deserves a higher commendation. It begins by interesting the child in works of love and mercy; the pleasure of doing good is so well described, or rather shown, that few of any age, who begin the story, will put it by till read to the close.

From LEONARD SCOTT & Co., New York:—

THE BRITISH REVIEWS AND BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE. Among all the aids of literature we Americans possess, no one is so accessible and useful as the general information which is offered us in the republication of the London, Edinburgh, North British, and Westminster Quarterly Reviews. Those who wish to keep up with the age should read these works; ladies who desire to be literary would find a mine of information in the Reviews, which would either greatly improve their capacity for writing, or—and this might be the better part for themselves—induce them to lay aside their ideal fancies for some practical plan of doing good. These Reviews (the Westminster excepted) and the Lady's Book are a living library for families; which will do more than any other secular influence to diffuse a healthy tone of thought and correct views of life, literature, and morals.

From JOHN BRADBURN, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

LEAVES FROM THE DIARY OF AN ARMY SURGEON; or, Incidents of Field, Camp, and Hospital Life. By Thomas T. Ellis, M. D., Late Post-Surgeon at New York, and Acting Medical Director at White House, Va. Few recent publications will be more eagerly sought for than this, as it touches the hearts of the people.

While giving a condensed record of events from the formation of the Army of the Potomac, it lifts the curtain, and admits the reader to many thrilling scenes among the wounded and dying soldiers.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE EVERYDAY PHILOSOPHER IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. By the author of "Recreations of a Country Parson." This is another of those delightful productions of the quondam "Country Parson," which no one can read without being charmed and profited. He is a model essayist, investing the homeliest subjects with interest: while his spiciest sayings have a flavor of truth that gives them a double relish.

ON LIBERTY. By John Stuart Mill. The subject of this book is civil or social liberty, which, after the introduction, it treats, in as many chapters, from the following stand-points: "Liberty of Thought and Discussion," "Individuality as one of the Elements of well-being," "Limits to the Authority of Society over the Individual," concluding with "Applications." This is a most masterly work, and well deserves the attention of all, of every nation, who prize the word "Liberty."

From T. O. H. P. BERSHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

SLAVES OF THE RING; or, Before and After. By the author of "Grandmother's Money," "Under the Spell," etc. Here we have a variation from the great mass of fiction which is crowded upon us—a book really novel and refreshing in character and aim. The chief character of the book is Thirk, a man of strongly marked characteristics, but who has been partly led and partly driven by circumstances to evil. He is selfish, cynical, and passionate, and in every way far from being a pleasing character. Yet when the right moment arrives, and his heart is touched, by mere strength of character he rises above his former self, and becomes a true and good man. His opposite is Robert Genny, who, with natural predispositions to good, and with the best of wives to aid him, yet goes to ruin through a too generous and over-yielding character.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR JULY.—Again we greet you, our fair subscribers. We now issue the first number of the Sixty-seventh Volume of the Lady's Book, and we assure you that we are untiring in our endeavors to please. Do we fall off in our attractions? Look at this number.

"Grandfather's Portrait." An engraving which we have no hesitation in saying cannot be equalled by any magazine in this country. The little fellow who has just scratched the outlines of his grandfather's portrait on the slate, shows no symptoms of the conceit which sometimes distinguishes young pretenders of artistic genius, but calmly awaits the verdict of the family who are scrutinizing the work with ardent interest and approval. The old gentleman himself is rather curious and not altogether at ease regarding the liberty which, unknown to himself, has been taken with his face, and peers across the table to see how he looks.

Our Fashion-plate. It seems useless for us to say anything about this, as it speaks for itself.

"Hats and Faces at a Watering-place. Truthful and satirical." Such is the title of our wood-cut for this month. It will be difficult for those who visit watering-places, and see the variety of dresses worn there, to tell which is truth and which is satire in our picture.

Fashions from A. T. Stewart & Co. We print in this number another of these splendid plates, and will have several in our next number. Other full length engravings and every variety of work for a lady will also be found in July number.

"Garden Structures" in this number we think will be found very useful to our friends having places in the country, who may wish to ornament them at a reasonable rate.

Our Contributors. Marion Harland, Miss Townsend, Miss Janvrin, Miss Frost, and Mary Forman each have a contribution in this number.

A LITTLE TALK WITH OUR SUBSCRIBERS.—We are willing and anxious to oblige, but our time is valuable; so don't ask us to look over sixty-seven volumes for a particular receipt or a piece of poetry. Here is a sample: "Some time between the years 1836 and 1845, you published a piece of poetry addressed 'To a Rose.' Will you please send me the number containing the article. I was once a subscriber, and probably will be again." Now this is profitable—a day spent in looking for a number that is to be sent gratis. We could multiply such cases, but this one is a sample of many others.

We call attention to the advertisement of the Women's Sanitary Committee on our cover for this month. We ask to it the attention of all who wish to contribute to so useful and patriotic an institution.

ESTLACK'S DIPHTHERIA PILLS.—We take great pleasure in introducing these pills to our subscribers; but we would not do so if they were not strongly recommended by two gentlemen of the faculty whom we know well, and also know they would not recommend anything that was not beneficial. They are useful in diphtheria, sore throat, inflammation of the fauces, membranous croup, enlarged tonsils, catarrh, influenza, asthma, hoarseness, and various other diseases of the throat. They are pleasant to the taste and are useful, in fact almost indispensable, to public speakers and singers for clearing the throat and giving power to the voice. They are manufactured by T. Estlack, Jr., corner of Eighth and Market Streets, Philadelphia. Price 25 cents per box.

OLD PRICES.—We trust that we shall soon be enabled to put our Book down to the old price. If paper gets down to the old standard, we certainly shall reduce our price.

BOOKS BY MAIL.—On account of the increase in the price, we do not send any books by mail other than our own publications.

ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS.—The fortieth annual exhibition of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts is now open daily, and the collection of pictures, statuary, and other works of art will be found eminently worthy of the attention of all who can admire the beautiful in art. There is a superb marine painting, of large size, by Hamilton, which excites general attention, and will repay a visit. It is one of his peculiarly grand and impressive efforts, with original ideas well developed, and striking effects portrayed with an adventurous hand.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

The New Musical Monthly.—The third number of our new and beautiful periodical is now published, containing a new and charming ballad by Balfe; a new Polka Schottische, the Lily Bunk; and an exquisite new composition by the author of The Maiden's Prayer. This last piece, which is entitled Magdalena, Pensée Fugitive, is the gem of the number. It is a delightful, dreamy composition, covering seven or eight pages, and is equally adapted to the advanced performer, who will find it a brilliant, showy piece, and to the learner, as a pleasing and profitable study. We will send single copies of the Monthly, containing the three pieces as above, for 50 cents; or, to those who desire to examine the Monthly as far as published, we will send numbers 1, 2, and 3 on receipt of $1 00. Future numbers will be 50 cents each, without abatement, excepting to subscribers, who get them at 25 cents by subscribing by the year. The terms are $3 00 per annum in advance. Every one whose purchases of music amount to twenty-five cents a month should take the Monthly, the cheapest and most beautiful publication, in sheet music form, ever printed. It is published by subscription, and is not for sale at the music stores. The only way to get it is to address the publisher, J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia. Those who desire complete sets should send in at once.

New Sheet Music.—The new firm of Wm. A. Pond & Co., New York, have just issued a splendid composition for advanced players, Solitude, a brilliant, dreamy reverie, by Richard Hoffman, 60 cents. Also, Reminiscences of Leah, a beautiful arrangement by Robert Staempel of gems from the new tragedy, with a splendid portrait of Miss Bateman, 50 cents. Manual of Ams Polka, by Grafulla, author of Captain Shepherd's Quickstep, 35. The same firm issues, Jane of Ravenswood, new ballad, by Keller, 25. How Long the Hours Seem Love, 25. Washington and our Country, fine patriotic song, 40. These are all fine publications. They warrant us in saying that the new firm who issues them cannot fail to be as successful as the old house of Firth, Pond, & Co., especially when we consider that Mr. Pond, the practical member of the late firm, is now at the head of the establishment.

Horace Waters, New York, publishes several fine new songs. Angel Visitants, sung at the Old Folks' Concerts. Come Sing with Me, pretty song and trio. Pleasant Words for All, song and chorus. Hark, the Signal; Where Liberty Dwells is my Country, and Freedom, Truth, and Right, three spirited patriotic songs. Also, Little Jenny Dow; A Penny for your Thoughts, and Merry Little Birds, songs by S. C. Foster, who is always welcome to the public. Each 25 cents.

O. Ditson & Co., Boston, publish Vespers in C, with Magnificat, by W. O. Fiske, with Latin and English words. This is a grand composition, containing solos and chorusses, and well adapted to Catholic and Episcopalian choirs, 25 pages, $1 00. Also, six short organ pieces by Karl Merz, which all organists should have, 40 cents. General Butler's Grand March, equestrian portrait, 35. Golden Robin Polka, pictorial title, 35. Fine transcription of Annie Lisle, by Brinley Richards, 35. Teresa Carren's Waltz, with fine portrait of the celebrated child pianist. This is a splendid piece, played by Gottschalk, 75 cents.

The Musical Editor of the Book will purchase and mail any of the above music on receipt of price. Address, at Philadelphia, J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

MR. JEPHATH A. WAGENER has attached to our Grover & Baker sewing-machine a highly important invention—"Wagener's Baster." A baster attachment, which obviates the necessity of basting fabric to be sewn by machine aid, which can be attached to all kinds of sewing-machines, has been awarded first premiums at late fairs, and is highly endorsed by all who use it. It is the invention of Jephth A. Wagener, of Pultney, Steuben County, New York, and is for sale and in use at No. 50 North Fifth Street, and No. 8 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, where all interested can see its utility. Letters patent have been granted Mr. Wagener. Its simplicity and utility will recommend it to all having sewing-machines, and over twelve hundred persons have already used and recommended it.

A GENTLEMAN lately said to his servant: "James, see what time it is by the sun dial."

"But, sir," said the man, "it is dark, the sun set two or three hours ago."

"Well, take a lantern with you," was the reply.

BLOCKLEY INSANE HOSPITAL.—We have received the 14th Annual Report of the Rev. Edward C. Jones, A. M., whose labors of love in the above institution have been so sedulously prosecuted, and with such abundant success. As a faithful friend and benefactor of the mentally affected Mr. Jones has secured for himself a high position, and we are pleased to know that he is fully appreciated by the community in which he has long toiled with a spirit so self-sacrificing and a zeal so unwavering. The Report contains an excellent analysis of mental disorders, and details his own plans of moral amelioration with great clearness and force. He is pastor to about 500 patients, and carries to this large number of stricken ones the genial consolations and rich hopes of the blessed and everlasting gospel of Salvation.

A CONTEMPORARY says that "the advantage of individual over official management is in nothing more apparent than in the present rapid conversion of legal tender notes into the Five-Twenty six per cent. bonds. This business was early put under the special supervision of Jay Cooke, of this city, whose facilities and extended connections with the banks and with capitalists all over the country, enabled him to inaugurate a system that has introduced the bonds into almost every county of the interior."

Let us say a word more upon this subject: if you deal with an official, you deal with a "Jack in office," who will rather pride himself upon letting you know your distance. In dealing with Mr. Cooke you deal with a gentleman in the proper sense of that word. We have seen in Mr. Cooke's office a poor man seated at a table, counting out his money; at the other end we saw, at the same time, one of our millionaires. Mr. Cooke was rather more attentive to the poor than he wasto the rich man. We think much of the popularity of this loan has been owing, at least in this city, to Mr. Cooke's management of it. We take this occasion to say that no one firm—could have managed this loan as well as Mr. Jay Cooke, a gentleman whom we delight to honor.

A NEW NATIONAL PRODUCT—BEET-ROOT SUGAR.

ONE of the compensations growing out of these troublous times has been an extraordinary stimulus communicated to our industries, and the development of new sources of national prosperity and wealth.

One of the sources bids fair to be a plentiful supply of sugar from the beet. We have had an opportunity, recently, of examining several specimens of it in this city, which were manufactured at Chicago, from beets grown on the prairies of Illinois. The supply of sugar by the Mississippi being cut off by the embargo of that river, Mr. Belcher, a well-known sugar refiner in the West, turned his attention to the refining of syrup from the sorghum plant, which has now become a staple crop in Iowa and Illinois. It is estimated that five million gallons of syrup were produced in the West the past year. To extend the source of supply of domestic sugar, Mr. Belcher procured last spring, from Europe, a supply of seeds of various kinds of the sugar beet, and by the agency of the Illinois Central Railway Company, distributed them among the farmers on the line of that road, and through a range of two hundred miles, with a view to ascertain the kind of soil and climate best adapted to the growth of the root.

The result, so far, has been of a most gratifying character. An analysis of several samples raised in the black prairie soil yielded from nine to thirteen and a half per cent. of saccharine matter. The samples of sugar produced were from liquor evaporated in an open pan, and although undoubtedly far inferior to what might have been produced by more elaborate and scientific processes, have been pronounced by our most intelligent refiners to be of a superior quality, and well granulated, and worth to-day ten cents per pound. The beet is pronounced by intelligent Germans, familiar with the process of sugar-making from it, to be fully equal to the best quality produced in Germany or France under the most favorable circumstances.

The production of sugar from beets has now come to be a leading interest in several European countries. The lands adapted to their culture command the highest prices, and the crop is so profitable that it warrants the most elaborate system of culture. The improvements in the quality of beet and in the process of manufacture, have been so great, that the yield within the last thirty years has increased from three to eleven per cent. Since this percentage has been obtained, the beet in France has become the most important crop in the Empire. In 1861, 148,000 tons were raised in that country, against 9,000 tons in 1830. In Belgium the crop in 1861 was 18,000 tons. In Germany a very large amount was produced; the aggregate for Europe exceeding, in 1861, 200,000 tons, worth more than $40,000,000.

In our own country the culture of the beet is beginning to attract great interest and attention. The Agricultural Societies of Iowa and Illinois have already taken action in the matter, in which they have been vigorously seconded by the Illinois Central Railway Company, which has offered to transport, free of charge to the manufacturers, all the beets grown from the seeds distributed by Mr. Belcher. Enough has been accomplished to demonstrate that a superior sugar can be produced, and that the percentage of saccharine matter in the American beet exceeds that in the European, as might be expected from the greater heat and moisture of our climate. The President of the Illinois Central Railway has already concluded an arrangement with a German firm to establish a refinery on his farm at Chatsworth, Ill., the buildings and machinery for which will be in readiness for work the coming season. The contractors will employ fifteen hundred acres of land in the culture of the root.

In the production of beet sugar we have all the advantage of the experience of European manufacturers. In the outset of the culture in France it was stimulated by the Government by the most prodigal bounties. It has now gained such firm footing that an enormous revenue is derived from it. It is so profitable that the annual rental of lands devoted to it in France exceeds four times the price now asked for the soil of the best prairie lands. In France the beet is cultivated entirely by manual labor. In this country, as soon as the plant gained root, the whole culture would be done by labor-saving implements. The produce of this country, the past year, averaged from fifteen to twenty-five tons to the acre, at a cost of not over one dollar the ton. The only element of cost of the manufactured article, remaining unsolved, is that of refining. But, with the well-known skill of our refiners, and the extraordinary success which has attended their efforts, there can be no doubt that this will be equally striking when applied to the clarifying of beet as of cane sugar.

The value of the results growing out of the introduction of the sugar beet into this country can hardly be estimated. Sugar already stands next to manufactures of wool in our imports, and is very rapidly becoming the first. We pay nearly $40,000,000 annually for foreign sugars alone. If we can place ourselves, as the French have already done, in a position of independence of foreign sugars, we can keep at home the 40,000,000 in gold and silver, which a balance against us has compelled us to export, to make good our account in the great London clearing house.

We hope the New Agricultural Commission will devote a portion of the appropriation made to it by Congress for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information upon this important subject. It is a crop peculiarly adapted to our Northern States, from the abundant moisture and heat of our climate—two indispensable conditions of successful culture.

EMBROIDERY STAMPS.—Send for a few dozen of S. P. Borden's Celebrated Embroidery and Braiding Stamps. There are thousands of dozens of these stamps in use, and they have never failed to give satisfaction. They will stamp on any material with accuracy. There should be a set in every town. Address S. P. Borden, Massillon, Ohio; or his agents, J. M. Pickering, No. 96 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio; Miss Carrie P. Aydon, Wilmington, Del.; Mrs. A. Brooks, No. 838 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia; Mrs. J. M. Newitt, Chicopee, Mass.; Miss Grace Law, Dixon, Ill.; Mrs. S. A. Childs, Titusville, Pa.; Mrs. E. C. Borden is travelling Agent. Inking cushion, pattern book, and full printed instructions accompany each order without extra charge. Price $5 per dozen.

A SUBSCRIBER wishes to inquire the best mode of making paste for scrap-books, to keep them from being so stiff. "I have inquired of a great many, and as the last resort I come to you."

"BIRDY, call me at five o'clock to-morrow morning; we leave town at six," said a lady to her domestic.

"Yes, ma'am, and will ye be after ringing the bell to wake me a little airlier, if ye please, so I'll remember."

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

We present our young friends with another of those choice illustrated hymns we promised them for their own department.

EVENING PRAYER.

Jesu, tender Shepherd, hear me!

Bless thy little lamb to-night!

Through the darkness be Thou near me,
Watch my sleep till morning light!

All this day Thy hand has led me—

Oh, I thank Thee for Thy care;

Thou hast clothed me, warmed and fed me—
Listen to my evening prayer.

Let my sins be all forgiven!

Bless the friends I love so well!

Take me, when I die, to heaven,
Happy there with Thee to dwell!

We also give another one of those amusing Charades in Tableaux.

KNAPSACK.

TABLEAU I.—NAP.

The scene represents the kitchen of a farm-house. At the right of foreground an old woman, with a large white cap, spectacles, and hood, is holding a ball of yarn, in the act of winding it. She has an open book in her lap, over which her hands have fallen, crossed, while her head droops forward on her breast—her eyes are closed: in short, she is an old woman taking a nap while winding her yarn. Standing in front of her, holding an enormous hank of yarn on his outstretched hands, and looking disconsolately at the idle ball connecting with it, is a little boy, in the dress of a country lad. At an open door in the background is a group of children, trying to coax the skin-holder out, making signals, and holding up tops, balls, and marbles.

TABLEAU II.—SACK.

The scene represents a barn. In the background are piled up sacks of apples and potatoes, while in the foreground a party of mischievous boys are collected. One of them holds open the mouth of a large sack of apples; each of the others has secured an apple, excepting one, who is crawling into the open sack—he is in, and the boys are grouped to show that they mean to tie up the mouth of the sack; one holds the string taut, another leans forward to help the one holding the sack open, and all are laughing. In the background the farmer is just entering, softly, with a large whip in his hand. The boys do not see him.

TABLEAU III.—KNAPSACK.

Here the scene is again the kitchen of a farmhouse, where the family is engaged in fitting out the volunteer. To the right, standing erect, his musket grasped in his right hand, his left arm clasping his wife, who is weeping on his breast, stands a man in the private's costume of the United States Army. His eyes are bent upon his wife, full of love, while his attitude and the firm grasp of his gun show his resolve to go. Near him, seated on the floor and playing with his canteen, is a little girl, while in the centre of foreground, upon the floor, is his open knapsack. The old mother kneeling beside it is putting in his Bible, the father stands with his hands full of stockings, shirts, and other necessaries, while to the left, two sisters are gathering from a table the other articles to fill the knapsack. Children are very good in this tableau, and there is plenty of room for effective dresses. The little old man and woman can wear the dress of the last century, the girls pretty country costumes, and the soldier-boy the blue uniform of the present day—or, the whole scene may be made to represent an event in the Revolution, with the young soldier in full Continental uniform, and the other characters in the dress of that day. If the costumes can be obtained the latter is by far the best for effect, and an old flag with the thirteen stars may be held by a child in the background. Music, as "Hail Columbia," or the "Star-Spangled Banner," if the performer is concealed, will add very much to the effect of the scene.

TO COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS.—A new preparation called Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen pictures is for sale by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston. As we receive a large number of new subscribers commencing with the July number, the publication of the following is not amiss.—

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to indorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Hale is not the Fashion Editress. Address "Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia."

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

Let the names of the subscribers and your own signature be written so that they can be easily made out.

THE PARLOR GARDENER.—A complete illustrated guide to the cultivation of house plants, care of green-houses, aquariums, and instructions to many new and beautiful methods of growing plants, of grafting, budding, etc. etc. Price 65 cents. By mail, 70 cents. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, Publishers.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Miss V. R. S.—We will not publish a receipt for removing superfluons hair; nothing will remove it without removing the skin also.

S. C.—We cannot spend several hours looking over numbers for a particular article. We have no idea when the "Camelia" article was published. Some months since we published about a dozen receipts for the skeleton leaves. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of this city, have published a book upon the subject. Should be pleased to oblige you, but "time is money."

Miss L. A. V.—It has become quite customary here, when advertising a marriage, to say "No cards sent." It saves trouble, and no one is offended by not receiving a card. The vile practice of sending presents is still continued. One marriage notice was lately published, "No friends to send cards to."

M. W. C.—An apology is expected by the lady whose frounce you tear off by stepping on it, and she is expected to receive it, knowing that you could not have avoided the accident. Her cue is to smile and say, "It is of no consequence;" but she is supposed to say privately, "The awkward fellow!"

L. V.—If a married woman were to wear over her wedding-ring a ring given to her by a single young man, "an acquaintance of three years' standing," we should consider it not only "very improper," but positively disreputable.

S. A.—You should receive good advice in a meeker and more amiable spirit. You asked, and we gave our opinion.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXIII.—(Continued.)

567. Add now to the silver a piece of lead about thrice its own dimensions; fuse both together. This silver we will now proceed to extract from the lead, by a process actually followed in practice, and termed cupellation. We shall, however, vary a few of the details, the better to suit our purpose.

568. Put into a clear fire—a bone. Burn it to perfect whiteness, and powder the result. Damp it with a little water, ram it very hard into a common brass thimble, smooth the surface level with the thimble's edge, then let it become perfectly dry in an oven, or other hot place; when perfectly dry, scoop out a small cavity on the surface, and fix the thimble tightly into a hole cut in a slip of wood, which may serve for a handle.

569. Put the alloy of lead and silver into the cavity thus formed, and direct down upon it the hottest part of the blowpipe flame.

570. For this experiment, a spirit-lamp flame probably will be superior to any other. After having continued the fusion for ten or fifteen minutes, all the lead will have become converted into oxide, and the fused oxide will be absorbed into the bone earth, as a sponge. In practice this operation is conducted on a little crucible formed of bone earth, and termed a cupel; the latter being heated in a little oven called a muffle, furnished with slits in its side to admit the passage of a current of atmospheric air. This muffle is let into the side of a furnace.

571. Had the alloy been one of silver, lead and gold, then the silver and gold would have remained unoxidized and combined. Had it been one of silver, lead, gold and platinum, still only the lead would have been removed. Therefore, silver, gold, and platinum are termed noble metals. Not only is fused lead oxide absorbed by bone earth, but in being absorbed is able to carry small portions of other oxides with it. Hence the operation of cupelling is had recourse to generally for separating the noble metals from the ignoble metals. The noble metals can only be separated from each other by the moist process.

572. In order to apply the process of cupellation, the substance operated on must be in the condition of alloy; that is to say, in the condition of one caligenous metal united with one or more others. Thus, for instance, common argentiferous galena or sulphuret of lead and silver is not in a condition proper for being cupelled, until all the sulphur has been driven off by the process technically called roasting, which consists in exposing the substance to the combined influence of heat and atmospheric air for a considerable period.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editrice of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.
No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR JULY.

Fig. 1.—Dress of white grenadine barège, spotted with purple. One deep fluted sounce is on the edge of the skirt. Over this is a narrow fluted ruffle and a rose quilling of purple silk. The corsage is low, in order that it may be worn with a lace, or muslin guimpe. It is made high in the neck by a fichu of the grenadine barège, trimmed to match the skirt. The sleeves are made with a cap, which forms a short sleeve if desired. The long sleeves reach nearly to the elbow, and are finished with one deep fluted ruffle. The sash is of broad purple ribbon. The hat is of Leghorn, caught up on the right side, and drooping very low at the back. The trimming is a wreath of myrtle with blossoms.

Fig. 3.—Boy's costume of buff piqué, braided with black. The skirt is laid in heavy box plaits, and a braided sash is fastened at the left side. The waist is a Zouave, worn over a very full white Garibaldi shirt.

Fig. 4.—Dress of white barège, trimmed with five narrow bias ruffles, edged with black velvet and black lace. The corsage is plain, and trimmed to correspond with the skirt. A short pelerine of the barège crosses in front, and forms a sash at the back. The coiffure is one of the most approved styles.

Fig. 5—Dress of striped pine-apple fibre, made with fluted ruffles on the edge of the skirt, and up the front in the tablier style. The scarf is of the same material as the dress, and perfectly plain. The hair is arranged in crêpe bands in front, and caught up in a waterfall at the back.

Fig. 6—Misses dress, of a very thin pink Mozambique. The skirt is trimmed with four ruffles bound with silk. The corsage is square, and worn with a gumpé. A wide sash of pink ribbon is tied at the back.

ORGANDIE DRESS.

Back and front view of an organdie dress. It is a clear white ground, dotted with purple. The bands bordering the skirt, and extending up the front, are of purple, and the design below the bands is to represent black lace, which it does admirably. The sash is also of organdie, stamped with the same design which ornaments the skirt.

COIFFURE FOR A YOUNG LADY.

The front hair is in three heavy curls, arranged to look like rolls, and kept in place by small combs. The back hair is tied very low on the neck, and the comb stuck in. The hair being made very smooth, has a fancy colored ribbon trimmed loosely round it, and then looped up to the right and left as represented in our plate.

HEADDRESS.

Hair turned off the face, and both back and front arranged very loosely over frizettes. The wreath is composed of large pink roses, with their buds and foliage, also fancy grasses.

THE MARIA THERESA CRAVAT.

Silk or velvet may be used for this cravat. The ends are embroidered in silk and beads, which should be worked before the cravat is lined. It measures thirty-one inches from end to end, and each end at the widest part is four and three-quarter inches, which is folded in to the width of two inches. The ends are trimmed with three rows of lace, as well as round the neck. In the trimming round the neck a piece of net should be cut, which should be trimmed with lace before it is attached to the cravat. Four yards of lace are required for trimming.

FANCY COIFFURES.

Fig. 1.—A fancy coiffure, made of ruby velvet, gold cord, and a white plume. The small cut refers to the coiffure without the plume. This is one of the most desirable styles.

Fig. 2.—Butterfly coiffure, suitable for a young lady. It is for the back of the head, and made of black velvet and gold cord.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JULY.

We think we cannot chat this month upon a more interesting subject than riding habits.

Riding, we are glad to see, has increased in favor all over the land. A fine horse is at all times a pleasant sight; but the finest horse never looks so well in our eyes, as when he proudly bears a fair lady, with her flowing skirt. The Empress of the French, besides being the most beautiful woman, is the most admirable rider in her dominions. She sets the fashion for all the world. If it be to her influence that we owe the fashion of riding on horseback, she has rendered our ladies an excellent service.

Fashion has changed very little, in the way of riding habits. All seem to agree that it is rather a conspicuous position for a lady, and consequently her dress should be plain, at least in the city. At a fashionable watering-place, fancy may be allowed more liberty.

The main points are, that the habit should fit well, and the skirt be long and ample. But bear in mind, dear readers, that there is such a thing as a "juste milieu." If the skirt be too long the fair lady's life is in danger, and if it be too wide the horse will be covered with a mountain of dress. The only rule we can give is, that the skirt must be just long and wide enough to hang gracefully.

Few under skirts should be worn. One is ample. Indeed, skirts are generally ignored, and pantaloons, the color of the habit, are now donned.

Though a cloth habit may be found uncomfortably warm on starting, still it is so difficult to provide for both heat and cold, that, as a sanitary precaution, we would advise a rather thick habit. For the city, we admire a dark habit, say black, blue, green, or gray, made with a deep jockey at the back, buttoned in front up to the throat, with tight, or elbow sleeves almost tight. With this should be worn linen collar and cuffs. The Byron is a pretty style. The tie can be of white muslin, or of bright ribbon, either of which, however, must be without streamers to fly about. The hair should be done up closely in a net. The invisible is the best style.

In New York, the steeple hat is much worn, and when the lady is short, and has a well shaped head, it is becoming. But the steeple hat, besides being very warm, does not soften or conceal defects, and we would rather substitute for it the Andalusian, Francis 1st, Henry 3d, or some other fancy style, to be found at Genin's on Broadway. The best style of veil is the Loup or Mask veil, which we described in our January Chat.

At the watering-places we see habits of every variety. There are alpacas and merinos of every shade, trimmed fancifully with silk, velvet, and braid; also gray, buff, white pipées made up in the most varied styles.

With these fancy costumes, of course the hat should correspond. The most stylish of the season is of white felt, with rather high crown and trimmed with a black lace scarf tied at the back. The contrast between the white felt and black lace is striking and beautiful.

A handsome whip and well fitting gauntlets complete the equipment of our equestrienne, and so we leave her.

Mme. Demorest has just brought out some entirely new styles for thin dresses. One dress, the Walowski, named after the countess of that name, has three bands of silk or ribbon, sewed on in points, or herring-bone. The lower band extends from the edge of the skirt to the top of hem, the under part of the hem being cut out between the points, which gives a light and novel effect. The same trimming extends up the front and trims the waist and sleeves. A scarf mantle of new and graceful form accompanies this dress. The Senorita—called so, we suppose, from its Spanish appearance—has three ruffles, headed by thick ruchings of silk and caught up in festoons by black lace rosettes. The same style of trimming is on the front of the skirt, the corsage, and sleeves.

Skirts are still plaited, the prettiest style being one large and three small plaits.

The newest body has a jockey half a yard deep, formed of three box plaits, each plait being pointed at the end.

For misses, Mme. Demorest is tucking the skirts, and binding each tuck (which is only one inch wide) with a tiny ribbon or velvet.

Nor have the juveniles been forgotten. From the host of pretty things, we select two for description. One, a dress for a little boy, consists of a white piqué skirt elegantly braided, and laid in heavy box plaits. To this is attached shoulder braces, connected both back and front by three bands, all beautifully braided. This is worn over a tucked white waist or shirt.

For a little girl, there is a dress open on each side of the skirt, and the space filled in with an elegantly tucked and braided side stripe. The dress skirt being trimmed all round and up the sides with a fluted ribbon. The corsage is merely side bodies and shoulder straps, sloped down to the waist both back and front, and trimmed with a ruching. This is worn over a muslin waist or gimp. The name of this waist is not taken, as some suppose, from the Sairey Gamp of Dickens's story. There are many other beautiful styles, which we have not space to describe.

We think mothers could not do better than to visit this establishment, where every article of clothing for infant, child, miss, or lady can be had in paper, the exact counterpart of the original. To amateur dress-makers, these patterns are of valuable assistance, and there is no excuse for them if they do not have pretty sleeves, when there are so many pretty and, at the same time, simple patterns to be had.

Trimmings for dresses are now of so varied a character, that it is almost impossible to enumerate them. Among them, however, are elegant gimp sets, made expressly for each dress, chenille fringes from two inches to one-half yard in width, and lastly, leather trimmings. This seems at first blush a harsh material for a trimming. When we first saw the plain bands, studded with gilt and steel knobs, it was so much in the trunk style that we were ready to consign leather to oblivion. We have lately, however, had reason to change our opinion respecting leather trimming, since we have seen them on some recently imported French mantles. The leather is pressed to resemble elegant gimps and gimp ornaments. Buttons are also ornamented to match, and the contrast between the leather and the black silk is charming. We can positively say that leather is the prettiest trimming of the season. Not only does it assert its claim to novelty, but also to elegance. Cuir-colored silk is also much used in the trimming of mantles, and with good effect.

The weather has now become so warm that light mantles entirely supersede the silk ones. At Brodie's besides the usual variety of lace of every style, shape, and price, are the pretty white barège wraps, always fashionable, of which one never tires, and so cool and pretty for summer. There are talmas, without arm-holes, trimmed with deep ruffles headed by ruchings, velvets, or braids, and finished at the neck by a very all ruching of the barège. Then the graceful scarf shape, trimmed also with fluted ruffles and ruchings.

A pardessus of lace, with an application of ribbon, covered with lace, makes a light and pretty wrap. Grenadines and barège Anglais are also made up in the most graceful forms, and will be found a most convenient wrap for the summer season.

Aprons are being introduced for home wear, made generally of black silk, or moire, trimmed with black velvet, black and white braid, fluted ruffles, steel buttons, or leather trimming. In the August number we shall give two very good illustrations of this pretty little article of dress.

The revival of hair powder has not been a success, though to some faces the white powder is decidedly becoming. But rest content there, dear ladies, and do not venture on the violet, blue, or green powders you see in the coiffeurs' windows. This, however, may be a useless precaution, for we think few of our belles would willingly appear with purple or blue heads. Red, in our eyes, would be decidedly preferable.

Velvet necklaces are among the pretty novelties. They are a yard and a quarter long, and half an inch wide, and are ornamented with pendants, which surround the throat, the velvet being tied in a bow behind.

The white clerical looking tie is still worn.

Sashes made of black foundation lace, and covered with rows of lace and ribbon, and ornamented with beads, are very fashionable, also very expensive, when purchased, though they may be made very prettily at home at a trifling expense.

Not only are children wearing the little Red Riding-hoods, but Mrs. Ellis is also making them up for young ladies. They are trimmed in various ways, some with swan's-down, which is rapidly gaining favor.

Another pretty wrap, to be made of scarlet material, is a very full circle, with pointed hood. The end of the circle, which is finished with a tassel, should be thrown over the left shoulder. When a lady has sufficient style to wear this gracefully, it is a most charming drapery. But how, we are sorry to say, can do it.

Mrs. Ellis is making up some new styles of bodies; some of them with square jockeys and square ends in front. In others, the jockeys and ends are rounded. The thin waists are made without a shoulder seam. The Poinpadour or square waist has been revived, and is much in favor.

Some of the prettiest braided dresses we have seen are from this establishment. One was an ashes of roses alpaca, braided very richly both on the body and skirt with a brown serpentine braid. The sleeves were a novelty. They were buttoned from the shoulder to the wrist, and when closed, made a plain, but pretty sleeve; but when unbuttoned part of the way, and the white sleeve pulled through, it was quite a dressy affair. A talma, richly braided, accompanied this dress. Linked rings of ribbon, silk, or velvet, arranged in different ways on the skirt, is one of the newest styles.

The most simple styles, suitable for misses, are three fluted ruffles, separated by three tucks or bands of ribbon, or else three tiny ruffles just at the edge of the dress.

No two dresses are made alike, and it is impossible for us to describe all the fanciful creations we have seen from the work-room of Mrs. Ellis.

of carnations on the right side. The mantle is made of figured black lace, and trimmed with rows of black velvet, and a handsome thread lace.

THE TOLEDO.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

This style, equally adapted to silks, in which it is charming, represents here a light summer fabric, suited to the heats of August. It is a mantilla shape, with fluted trimming.

We scarcely need observe that at this season the several styles of laces are emphatically "the mode." Among them the black lama lace shawls, single or double, are immense favorites.

AUNT ESTHER'S WARMING-PAN.

BY MRS. D. P. S.

Do you remember Aunt Esther's kitchen, friend Ellen? Ah, I need not ask! Neat, and thriftily kept as was that especial domain of the good housewife in most of our village homes, Aunt Esther's kitchen, in its bright and faultless array, seemed to excel them all!

In gleeful childhood we heeded little the working of that presiding spirit of order which ruled around us; but how often since, in the days of our matronhood, have we sighed for its benign presence, as emerging perhaps from a sick-room, we have sought in bewilderment to fathom the mysteries of Hibernian misrule. Oh, the indescribable atmosphere of negligence that pervades one's precincts under such sway! Deny it not, friend of mine, that at times like these, visions of such a kitchen as Aunt Esther's have floated before your mind's eye like some delightful region of enchantment!

But Katie Townsend—our blithesome friend Katie—I was to tell you of her! Yes, and it was in pursuing the thread of her simple story, that I was led into Aunt Esther's kitchen.

I can see, now, the rows of shining pewter dishes, ranged upon shelves of spotless whiteness; the untarnished painted floor, protected by its mats of brilliant hue, which had been evoked from the rag-bag by the magic of Aunt Esther's homely skill; the curtains of white dimity, shading windows whose small old fashioned squares might have vied in lustre with the costly panes of a modern city mansion. I recall also the presence of "the tall old clock, which ticked behind the door;" and last, not least, Aunt Esther's warming-pan!

An heir-loom was this; handed down, as its owner never wearied of relating, "from her great-great-grandmother," and an especial object of attraction it was to juvenile visitors, since while they paused professedly to admire its quaintly carved handle, and brightly burnished surface, it served as a mirror, returning the smiles which each little guest was sure to wear upon "Katie Townsend's birth-day."

Did you ever wonder how it came to pass that Aunt Esther—quiet and reserved, with habits of clock-work regularity—should have become involved in an annually recurring children's party? It happened on this wise. Katie, as you know, was ever Aunt Esther's pet. Soon after her birth, some desponding allusion made in her presence by the weakly, overburdened mother, awoke in Aunt Esther's kindly heart the determination to consider wee Katie as her especial charge. Well and faithfully was this resolve fulfilled; and well was it for the child that such a refuge was provided for her.

Poor John Townsend! I need not allude to the painful circumstances by which his household was so early broken up; and through which, but for the unwearied kindness of his good aunt, our Katie would have been left homeless, even before she became an orphan.

One day, when the little damsel was about completing her sixth year, she came after school, as was frequently her privilege, "to stay all night with Aunt Esther." Many, indeed, had been the days when a childish voice had rung gleefully through that quiet abode, causing the sage old cat, at first, to raise her head with a stare of grave surprise; although she seemed gradually to acquiesce in her mistress' benevolent purpose, quitting her favorite place upon the hearth-rug with almost as complete an air of resignation as that with which Aunt Esther herself laid down her knitting, and consented to be led around the house to answer questions!

On the occasion just referred to, Katie had scarcely entered when, coaxingly throwing her arms about Aunt Esther's neck, she exclaimed, "Oh, Aunt, I am so glad to come! I have so wanted to ask you if I might not have a birthday!" Aunt Esther's perplexity at this demand seemed in no wise to abate, as Katie went on rapidly to explain that "next week she would be six year's old—mother said so—and she wanted to have a 'birthday,' just as Josie Starr did; she had all the boys and girls there, and they had such a nice time! Mother said she couldn't do any such thing," continued the little one, artlessly; "but she told me I had better ask you, 'cause old maids had nothing else to do. And so I've been waiting so long to ask you, aunt; you don't think it's naughty to have a birthday, do you?" she asked, with a sudden misgiving, recalling some of the good aunt's serious observations and homilies.

"No, child, not naughty, I suppose," Aunt Esther replied; and added, musingly, "I will think about it, Katie." And with this answer Katie was forced to be content for the rest of the day, although, many times her eyes wistfully sought Aunt Esther's face, as wondering "why it took aunt so long to think about it!"

Why, indeed?—Because the child's simple request had awakened a struggle with her almost life-long habits. Never, since the period of her great disappointment, had Aunt Esther's house been opened for "invited company." It is true, for many years there was a reason for this seclusion in the constant care demanded by an aged, invalid mother; but now—"was it right to live thus?" But a party of children, what a trial! "Yet it might do good," argued Aunt Esther's earnest heart, "and perhaps I have been too strict with Katie; she has few enjoyments at home—ought I not to gratify the child?"

And so at last it was decided; Katie returned home next morning, in high glee, to consult her brothers concerning the invitations, and Aunt Esther applied herself forthwith to the unwonted task of preparation.

Great was Mrs. Townsend's astonishment, on learning that the querulous words which she little imagined Katie was treasuring up to repeat, had produced so unexpected a result; but it was fully equalled by the surprise of the village children, when invited to spend an afternoon at the house of the grave, solitary Miss Esther Townsend!

The "birthday" equalled little Katie's most delightful anticipations; and good Aunt Esther felt rewarded for her self-denial and exertion in witnessing the thorough enjoyment of her young guests, and receiving the earnest "Thank you, Miss Esther; we have had such a pleasant time!" After this it would be easy to conclude that Aunt Esther was not suffered to forget the returns of the happy anniversary; and thus it was that Katie Townsend's birthday-gathering became a fixed institution—an event long anticipated, and long afterwards the theme of conversation among our juveniles; while Katie's "Aunt Esther" was claimed in the same relationship by all the children in the village.

But I must hasten on to one particular birthday, whose occurrences Katie is not likely to forget.

Little as Aunt Esther realized the fact, the children who had grown up around her, looking upon herself as a public benefactor, were many of them children no longer. Wee Katie herself had now reached the age of fifteen, and though still retaining the gleeful spirit and artless grace of her childhood, her development in mind and heart was fully in proportion to her years. Half unconsciously, on this occasion, were the childish games with which the house had rung in former gatherings set aside for more congenial amusements. At length, one of the youngest of Katie's compeers exclaimed: "Oh, let us have a post-office!"—and explaining her plan, she added—"We had one the day I went to Cousin Helen's in Bristol; and I think the big girls and boys liked it best of any of us!" A general laugh at this remark was followed by a demand for pencils and paper, and Aunt Esther's warming-pan was designated as the post-office. The new game went merrily on, and the frequent clanging of the office lid caused Aunt Esther to peep forth from the pantry, wondering to herself to what novel purpose her time-honored relic was now devoted. The demand for that article in the children's games had ever been in proportion to Aunt Esther's veneration for it; and it would be difficult to enumerate all the parts which it had performed, the old lady having even been known to give her patient assent to the use of it as a corn-popper, in which capacity it was unanimously voted a "capital thing." The new diversion seemed a very harmless one, and Aunt Esther, having put on her large tea-kettle, seated herself unobserved to watch the frolic.

The young people had well nigh exhausted their stock of themes, and were beginning to weary of the amusement, when, glancing from an open window, Aunt Esther observed Frank Cuthbert—a manly lad of seventeen—seated beneath a tree absorbed in writing. So intent was he that one of his young companions was close upon him ere he was aware.

"Ah, Frank, I've caught you!" he cried, laughingly. "Writing to Katie, eh?"

"Attend to your own correspondence, please sir!" replied Frank in the same tone of pleasantry; but his deepening color did not escape Aunt Esther's observant eye.

Presently after, Frank passed through the kitchen, and noiselessly deposited his note in the post-office. The other young people were already engaging in some new amusement which Frank hastened to join; and, the room being vacant, Aunt Esther seized her opportunity, and softly abstracted the little note. "Mere children like these"—she murmured to herself—"it will never do! Katie must not see this!" And with a resolute face she set about preparing the long table for her guests. But, stepping nervously to and fro, the stern look passed gradually from her face, melted by the busy thoughts within. "How old was she when one—the unforgotten—first signified his heart's preference? Was that a mere boyish folly? And even were it so, was she just in depriving Katie of that which was intended for her—the dear child who had never deceived her?" It was enough; Aunt Esther penitently replaced the little note, saying to herself: "How could I think of wronging the children!" and thus set her mind at ease.

But the restitution came too late. Another had witnessed Frank's visit to the kitchen, and as soon as she could disengage herself from her young companions, Katie stole quietly to the depository to meet with a disappointment. "How very foolish I was to imagine he had been writing to me!" sighed the little maiden, and thus chiding herself into composure, she rejoined her young friends, apparently with undisturbed gayety.

"Well, Frank," observed one of the boys, as the blithesome company prepared to depart, "I suppose we shall not soon again enjoy your company on Miss Katie's birthday!"

"Ah! how so?" inquired Aunt Esther, with sudden interest.

"I am to leave town in a few days, ma'am, to enter college," replied Frank.

"And when shall we see you here again?"

"Perhaps not for many years," he answered, with a perceptible shade of sadness in his tone; "you know I have no home!"

Captain Cuthbert, Frank's father, was constantly absent upon long voyages; his mother was dead, and he had been of late pursuing his preparatory studies under the care of the clergyman of our village, who was a distant relative.

"I am really very sorry to hear this," said Aunt Esther, who had felt a warm interest in the youth; and half unconsciously she glanced towards Katie as she spoke. Frank's eye followed hers, but Katie was quietly occupied in assisting her young friends with their wrappers, and no sign of emotion could be detected upon her tranquil face.

In parting, Frank took her hand, saying calmly: "Good-by, Katie; I may not see you again!" And as Katie replied in a tone of friendly interest, wishing him all success in his studies, Aunt Esther breathed more freely, saying to herself: "Then there was nothing in that note, after all—it is best so," she added, mentally. "Frank is a noble young fellow, but then they are such children!"

A few days after this birthday and Frank's departure, a great change passed over Aunt Esther's quiet life. A younger sister—Mrs. Nancy Erle, who had been for some time a widow—was now, by the entrance of her only son upon business, left quite alone in the world. She now wrote, proposing to unite her resources with those of her sister Esther, and live with her in the old homestead. Her plan in its detail was really a very generous one, yet Aunt Esther hesitated long before accepting it. The truth was that, although sisters, there never were two persons more unlike than Mrs. Nancy and herself; and Aunt Esther had not forgotten the power of the good woman's tongue. "Still," pleaded the unselfish heart, "I dare say Nancy is different now after her trials; in any case it would be hard to refuse to let her come home." And she wrote to Mrs. Erle accordingly. But alas! for the future peace of Aunt Esther's fireside!

Mrs. Nancy's luggage comprised a large portion of her own furniture, for, as she remarked, "she could not suppose Esther had ever thought of purchasing anything new, and, really, to use those old-timed things, would be unendurable!" And forthwith, upon her arrival, began a sweeping attack upon her sister's household arrangements, maintained with such vigor, that good Aunt Esther was fain to purchase peace with the placable—"Well, well, sister Erle, I suppose you know best about such things—arrange the house as you like!"

Katie, meantime, knew little of the metamorphosis which was in progress. Her only remaining parent was prostrated with a dangerous illness, just about the time of Mrs. Nancy's arrival, and required all the daughter's care. Weeks of anxious watching ensued, in which Aunt Esther almost constantly shared; and when at last release came, and all was over, she tenderly led the sorrowing girl to her own home.

Katie was not long in comprehending Mrs. Nancy's complete self-installation as house-mistress, and the thralldom in which her meek-spirited aunt was held. One day some inadvertence on the part of the latter had drawn upon her a full tide of remonstrance and admonition, which was interrupted by the necessity for Mrs. Nancy's presence in another part of the house. As the door closed, Katie drew an audible sigh of relief, directing towards the victim a comically rueful glance. Aunt Esther replied only with a smile and a shake of the head.

"But, dear aunty," pleaded Katie, "how can you stand this? It is too bad that you should be turned out of home in this way!"

"I shall soon get used to it, Katie dear," said the gentle old lady; "Nancy never means to be unkind. I should feel much worse on your account," she continued, "but that I have another plan for you, my child."

"For me?" said Katie, wonderingly. "Not to send your child away from you, I hope," she added with playful earnestness.

"How would you like to go to school at B——?" asked Aunt Esther.

Katie's eyes sparkled with pleasure at the thought; she had deeply longed for higher advantages of education than our village afforded. "But, dear Aunt Esther, surely you could not send me without denying yourself every comfort! No, you must not think of it!"

"I have made inquiries, my dear, and calculated closely, and I find we can manage it very well: Your Aunt Nancy being here will lessen my expenses very much this year."

The good soul did not add, and Katie never knew, that a large share of her income had gone for several years towards the support of her nephew's family. Like most of Aunt Esther's good deeds, this had no record on earth.

"And I am really to go to B——!" said Katie, hardly able to credit the fulfilment of her girlish desire—"Oh, dear aunty, how can I thank you enough! And I know you will miss me so much," she continued, springing from her seat to throw her arms around Aunt Esther; "but indeed I shall try to improve every moment, if it were only for your sake! But oh, what will Aunt Nancy say?"

"We shall soon hear, I fancy," said Aunt Esther, smiling, "but she can say nothing which will change my intention."

The plan was divulged to Mrs. Nancy that evening, and met with most indignant remonstrance. At first, the good woman maintained stoutly that she would not suffer Esther to sacrifice herself so absurdly; but finding that on this point "Esther" was not to be moved from her purpose, she at length desisted, declaring that "it was sheer folly, but just like Esther," and at once gave herself vigorously to the task of overhauling Katie's wardrobe, and "fitting the child out," as she expressed it, "so that she needn't be ashamed of her!"

More than five years had passed rapidly away, and our Katie was still at the Seminary at B——, having for the last two years occupied the post of assistant teacher, still pursuing the higher branches of study. Her vacations had all been passed with dear Aunt Esther, who observed with delight the manifest improvement of her darling. Her partial eyes did not deceive her—Katie Townsend was, in truth, a lovely, engaging girl.

And how had Aunt Esther fared meanwhile? She had not, as she prophesied, "got used" to the "continual dropping" of words, timely and untimely; but the gentle, elastic spirit had ever so quietly yielded, that no fretted marks were discernible upon her placid face.

And now the long trial was to end unexpectedly. Mrs. Erle's son had married, and taken a house, and now wrote, begging his mother to come and reside with him. Aunt Nancy's bustling nature was delighted with the proposed change, and she at once began to prepare for her removal, although loudly and constantly wondering "what Esther would ever do without her!" "Yet still," as she said, "she felt it her duty to go; for, likely enough, James had married some foolish young thing as fit to keep house as a doll."

Her anxieties for her sister were in some measure abated by a letter from Katie, whose vacation was close at hand, announcing that "now she was quite sure Aunt Esther would need her at home, and that, with her leave, she should resign her position in the school, and return to remain with her." Dear old lady! She was only too glad to grant permission; and it was interesting to notice the briskness of her step, and the animation of her countenance when this arrangement was resolved upon.

Katie arrived the evening before Mrs. Nancy's departure. The bustle of that day passed, leaving the house somewhat bare and desolated in appearance, it is true, yet full of peace and light to the two hearts whose home it was once more. The next morning Katie addressed herself merrily to the task of rendering the old house presentable again. "And first, aunty, we must rummage the old garret, to see what Aunt Nancy has put away there which we shall need."

To the garret Katie hied; and one of the first objects which met her eye was the old warming-pan, the admiration of her childhood. A smile crossed her face at the remembrance of the last purpose which it had served, yet it was with a sigh that she half unconsciously raised the lid. There still lay the little note deposited so long ago, and as Katie wonderingly read the direction, she tore it open with quickened breath, and a flushing cheek. "Poor Frank! Oh, how could this happen?" was the murmured ejaculation, and the maiden read, and re-read the note, and still sat gazing upon it in thought so deep that Aunt Esther's call was all unheard.

"Katie, child, what has happened?" cried the latter in real alarm, having come in search of the missing one.

"Nothing, dear aunty," said Katie, trying to recover herself; "at least, that is, I ought not to feel so, only this little note!" and the tears would no longer be controlled.

"Frank Cuthbert's note! is it possible?" cried Aunt Esther, quickly. "Oh, why did I not think that you might not have looked again!"

"I did look, after I saw Frank go in," Katie admitted innocently in her surprise; "but, dear aunty, how did you know?"

"It is all my fault, then," said the old lady, in a tone of deep self-reproach; "my darling I am so sorry!" and she hurriedly explained her abstraction of the note.

"Did you read it, Aunt Esther?" was asked in a low voice, and with a downcast look.

"No, child, I am not prying enough for that, I hope!" said Aunt Esther with unusual resentment.

"Oh, I did not mean that, dear aunty—but—would you like to read it now?" and handing her the precious billet, Katie escaped down stairs to her own room. Aunt Esther, too, descended to seek her spectacles, murmuring as she went, "Poor children! it was my fault, poor children!" and tears dimmed the glasses while she read:—

DEAR KATIE: For you are very dear to me, and I have few to love. I know I must not say all that is in my heart, but I could not resist this chance of speaking silently to you before I go. You know I am to leave C—— this week, perhaps not to return for a long time. Would it be amiss, Katie, do you think, for me to write to you occasionally? Would your friends object? If you think they would, tell me so, and I will wait until I may speak. But if not, and if you care enough for me to be willing, I want you to place a white rose in your pin, where I may see it. I must not tell you now, but I may tell you in some letter ere long, how very much this will gratify FRANK.

Katie reappeared after an hour or two, wearing her own cheerful smile, although there were traces of deep emotion upon her countenance. Observing the anxious look with which her aunt regarded her, she threw her arms affectionately around her, murmuring: "Do not grieve any more, dear Aunt Esther, over that mistake; it is all past now, and I am trying to feel that it is all for the best. Perhaps, indeed I am afraid I should never have been good enough for Frank, even if he had still liked me"—adding, in reply to an inquiring look—"You know he will soon be a clergyman, now!"

"I did not know, my dear; I am very glad to hear it. It seems, then, you have heard of him, though not by letter?" remarked Aunt Esther, with a smile. And Katie blushing explained that "one of her schoolmates was a distant relative of Frank." She was not, of course, bound to confess with what interest—scarcely allowed to herself—she had watched for occasional glimpses of the young man's highly-honorable career.

A few skillful questions, artlessly and confidently answered, convinced Aunt Esther that "the children" had been mutually and sincerely attached; and while the subject was dropped with a few wise and tender words, deep in her own heart she cherished the purpose of making amends in some manner for the disappointment she had unwittingly caused.

And Katie—how was it with her? Although we must suppose that the thought would sometimes cross her mind of what might have been, it was not suffered to cast a shade over her cheerful daily life. Pleasantly sped the days and weeks in the restored home of her childhood's happiest hours; while to Aunt Esther, the peaceful brightness of her present lot more than repaid the trials of the past. It would have seemed almost too much of comfort, had she not schooled herself to remember that her darling might soon be claimed by another.

The old house, too, although its ancient furniture was replaced with but few additions, seemed invested with a new charm by the traces of Katie's skilful industry, and once more it became the favorite resort of our young people, among whom Katie reigned again, all unconsciously, as "a bright particular star."

Some months had passed since the discovery of the hidden note, when one day Katie quietly laid before her aunt a paper, pointing out the intelligence that the Rev. F. Cuthbert had accepted a call to L——. Aunt Esther started, but checked herself in an exclamation of pleased surprise, for she saw that Katie had not observed the coincidence: the manufacturing village in which Mrs. Erle resided with her son, was in the township of L——. At once Aunt Esther's plan was formed.

Very quietly was it matured, however, and no further allusion was made to the item which had so interested both readers.

Several weeks afterward, Katie chanced during an evening colloquy to make some allusion to Mrs. Nancy, wondering also why they had not recently heard from her. In reply, Aunt Esther reminded her that "old folks were poor correspondents, although they might think no less of each other for all that." And proceeded to intimate some intention of going to visit her shortly, if Katie thought she could keep house alone for a few days.

Katie listened with an expression of undisguised amazement, which deepened as she perceived that the old lady was really in earnest. "But, dear Aunt Esther, how could you go? you who have never been a dozen miles from C—— in your life."

"I am no traveller, it is true," was the quiet reply; "yet it seems to me the way to L—— must be very straight forward."

"Why, yes, I suppose you could hardly get lost," said Katie, doubtingly; then added, with a perplexed laugh: "Well, aunty, to say the truth, I did not imagine you ever found Aunt Nancy's society so congenial, as to induce you to leave home to visit her."

Aunt Esther smiled, but answered evasively: "Nancy always meant to be kind—she was very obliging; and she urged me to come."

There was no more to be said. And Aunt Esther, having fixed a day for her journey, went on calmly with her preparations and arrangements for her absence, in which Katie assisted as if in a dream.

A harder task was to satisfy the inquisitiveness of the neighborhood, in which surprise and conjecture ran high, when the tidings got abroad that Miss Esther Townsend was going away on a visit. At last all was ready, and on a certain eventful morning Aunt Esther found herself, for the first time in her life, ensconced in a stage-coach, on the way to the nearest railroad depot.

The journey was safely accomplished, notwithstanding Katie's anxious forebodings, and reaching the place of her destination just at evening, Aunt Esther was received with a bustle of astonishment, yet with a sincere welcome.

"Well, now, I really am surprised!" ejaculated Mrs. Nancy again and again; "I didn't know as you cared enough for me to come so far to see me, Esther!" And good Aunt Esther was obliged to keep her own counsel, although the words smote upon her conscience, well knowing as she did that, without another object close at heart, the idea of the visit would never have occurred to her.

How that object was accomplished, without exciting the remotest suspicion on the part of her relatives, is more than I am able to explain. Certain it is that, during the brief space of her visit, Aunt Esther contrived to ascertain the good report of the young clergyman at L——, to listen to his preaching, to renew her acquaintance with him, and—but the rest we can only surmise, and that from the sequel.

Safely at home once more, to Katie's unbounded delight, having enjoyed, as she truly affirmed, a very pleasant visit, Aunt Esther amused and interested Katie with her impressions of the novel journey, with accounts of the prosperity of her cousin, James Erle, of his amiable wife, and her childlike dependence upon the stirring mother-in-law (it was evident that Mrs. Nancy had found, at last, her proper element); and Katie came to consider the visit as the most natural thing that could have occurred, and wondered that she had felt so much exercised about it.

It was about a week after Aunt Esther's return, and the two sat by an open window, for it was midsummer again, enjoying the cool approach of evening. Katie, warned by the deepening twilight, had just laid down a volume from which she had been reading aloud, and sat watching the placid smile which rested upon the face of her companion, whose knitting-needles ticked unconsciously on. A knock was heard at the house door.

"Which of our friends has grown so formal?" remarked Katie, rising to answer the summons. Aunt Esther checked her, a little nervously, begging her to fetch some yarn from an upper room before any one entered, adding that she would attend the door herself. Unsuspectingly Katie hastened to comply; and, re-entering the sitting-room, after some little search for the article in demand, she was surprised to perceive a manly form seated beside Aunt Esther.

"This is my niece, Mr. Cuthbert," said the latter, rising. "Katie, you have not forgotten our friend, Frank?"

Katie had not forgotten, indeed; but the twilight shades concealed her agitation as she responded cordially to the earnest greeting of the unexpected guest.

"I had the happiness to meet my well-remembered friend during her visit at L——," said Frank; "and the sight of her brought old associations so strongly upon me, as to draw me hither once more, as you perceive."

"Visit to L——!" thought Katie; "how strange that the thought never occurred to me before!"

Lights were brought in, revealing more clearly the features of each to the other. "I do not see that you are at all altered, Mr. Cuthbert," said Katie.

"Then, if I seem unchanged, call me Frank!" was his reply.

The evening passed rapidly in inquiries after old friends, and reminiscences of youthful days; on rising to take leave, Frank expressed a wish to revisit old haunts, on the following morning, but, playfully distrusting his memory, requested Katie to act as his pilot during the drive.

As the door closed, Katie threw herself into Aunt Esther's arms; but the lips which would have framed a question were sealed with a kiss, and the smiling command to "go to rest, for it was late."

The morning drive was a long one, and the exercise must have proved unusually invigorating to judge from Katie's rosy color and sparkling eyes as she re-entered her home. That evening brought Frank again to the old place, but as Aunt Esther found it necessary to absent herself from the room for some cause, I cannot report the progress he may have made in the revival of "old associations."

A brief visit was all the young clergyman could spare from his duties, yet in the short time it would seem that much was accomplished.

It was now the last evening of his stay in C——. Frank had taken tea at Aunt Esther's; while the tea things were removed the young couple strayed into the garden, and as they returned, Aunt Esther smiled to herself, observing a spray of white roses fastened in Katie's pin. After a little pleasant converse, the good old lady was about to excuse herself on some pretence, but was gently detained, and re-seated with Frank and Katie close on either side.

"You do not need to leave us, dear aunty; and we have no secrets from you," whispered Katie.

"All is settled now between us," said Frank, "if you will give us your blessing, dear friend!"

Aunt Esther clasped a hand of each within her own, and blessed them in a voice tremulous with emotion. There was a long silence, as they sat thus in the deepening twilight, with hearts too full for words. At length Frank said, in tones of deep feeling, "Under a kind Providence, dear Aunt Esther, we owe this great happiness to you!"

"Yes," murmured Katie, kissing the hand she held—"and great as it is, it is not all I owe her!" And Aunt Esther was happy—truly she had not lived in vain.

Frank Cuthbert's visit was repeated, yet not very many times, ere there was once more a gathering at the old Townsend place. You were present on that occasion, friend Ellen; and I have no need to remind you of its bright, gladsome interest. The story of the warming-pan had, in some unaccountable manner, spread itself among Katie's young companions, and the old relic was invested with a new attraction to the merry groups who found their way into the kitchen. There it hung in the accustomed place, but it had changed owners, for Katie had claimed it as one of her bridal gifts. "It is yours, my child," Aunt Esther had said, "only let it remain here while I live."

Urgently had the young couple entreated Aunt Esther to leave her now solitary abode, and make her home with them; but the request was gently yet firmly refused. "I am too old now to be removed," she said; "let me end my days in the old place, and be buried by the grave of my father and my mother."

More than once, however, has the once dreaded journey to L—— been accomplished, with the happiest results; and Katie, now a sedate wife and mother, finds time for frequent visits to her girlhood's home.

I well remember my last call at the old Townsend place. A happy family party were gathered there; and Aunt Esther's smile seemed lovelier than ever, as she sat watching another "wee Katie," who with shouts of baby laughter had reached on tip-toe, and dropped with a resounding clang the lid of "Aunt Esther's Warming-Pan!"

That comes quickly—quick as sin does—ay, and often works to sin.—MRS. BROWNING.

Who shuts her hand, hath lost her gold,

Who opens it, hath it twice told.—HERBERT.

"Oh that some kind power would the giftie gie us, to see oursel as others see us!" exclaimed the poet, and his words have found an echo in many a human heart the world over. Man is not by nature a benevolent being, or he would be thankful for the very unconsciousness of our peculiarities, which keeps us from growing moping and morbid, and even is to many of us the kindly gate 'twixt us and the mad-house. It is well that we do not know exactly how we look, and speak, and walk, or we should at times want to put on "Mr. Hooker's black veil," or give up language and locomotion as altogether unsuited to our idiosyncrasy.

It is indeed a kind Power which makes us "behold our natural face in the glass and go our way, forgetting what manner of men we were." With every step we take from the mirror, the true image fades from our minds, and is superseded by an indistinct halo, half formed of vanity, and half of the kindly estimation in which we are held by our friends. And so we jog along, with the comfortable notion that there is something pleasing about us after all, in spite of freckled skin, pug-nose, boars' teeth, or other imperfections not set down in the description of Sir Charles Grandison, or his incomparable Lady Harriet.

All this is well as a general rule, yet there is one person who needs not only a mirror ever at hand, in which she may count her wrinkles, but a more than Gil-Blas to ring in her ears her nearness to the allotted three score and ten, and the indubitable signs by which all the world may know that she is "no baby." Such mentors and reminders are almost indispensable to the Rich Widow. The human heart, especially the heart of woman, is a wonderful thing: it never grows old, at least it never loses its power to love, and to believe its beloved. Much of the purest, truest affection that this world has ever known has lingered, flourished, and even had its birth in the bosoms of women no longer young, or fair, or in any way attractive to the outward eye. Pale, thin-necked, faded, forlorn-looking specimens of the gentler sex have loved with a love on which angels might look admiringly—a love which triumphed over self, made light of pain and privation, and was in truth a gem which consecrated and beautified its poor earthly casket.

A true woman is capable of a true affection as long as she treads this lower world; but it by no means follows that she can win that which she so munificently bestows. Youth and beauty, symmetry and grace—these are the charms which carry man's heart by storm, and rarely, very rarely, does he so far triumph over his nature as to love an old, an awkward, or an ugly woman. In these opposing facts lies the peril of the Rich Widow. She feels, perhaps, within herself a tenderness stronger and purer than welled from her maiden heart, an ability to love and sacrifice, which her undisciplined spirit never knew. No kind power "the gift will gie her to see hersel as others see her." She meets her hero—the realization of her cherished ideal. Youth, intellect, and energy struggling with the buffetings of the world, with an eager eye fixed upon the goal. He wins her sympathy at once. She encourages, advises, aids him. He becomes to her the centre of thought and interest. Her pulse beats as quickly at the sound of his footstep as if she were a girl of eighteen. She is hardly surprised when she learns from his lips that he adores her, that she is the queen who reigns in his heart. She feels no discrepancy between them. His strong mind makes him seem her elder, to his iron will it is second nature for her to bow. O Rich Widow! Now you need your ever-present mirror—your Mentor to tick out your by-gone years like the remorseless clock. Your foot is on the edge of a precipice! If you love that young man, save him from his first mean compromise between selfish interest and sacred honor! Give him your money, if you choose, but do not let him marry you as the mere figure, representing the sum total of your golden inheritance! Are you a brilliant, gifted woman like Madame de Stael? She might venture, when past forty, to marry a man just half her age, for she had twice his wit, wisdom, and worldly experience, as well as twice his years. She might venture, and have a "tolerably happy marriage;" but even for her, whose charms were not of the perishable sort, it was a doubtful, dangerous experiment.

Dear friend, count those gray tokens which besprinkle every lock of your daily diminishing braids of hair! Note the "crows' feet" at the corners of your eyes! Where is the delicate bloom that once graced your cheek? Where is the buoyancy of your step? How you puff and pant when your way lies up hill, or you mount the photographer's long staircase! You are a worthy, fine-looking, middle-aged woman, but are you a fit bride for a youth, who will be in his prime when you are "sans everything?" Do you suppose that he really loves you? Man's love and old women keep little company together now-a-days—be sure of that!

We are sorry for you. It is hard for you to wake from this bewitching dream, but wake you must; and it is better that it should be now than after the wedding. Be sensible! Be courageous! Look straight into the eyes of your would-be husband. Tell him this fancied affection of his will fade away like the morning dew. Tell him just how old you are, and how old you will be when he is in manhood's zenith. Be to him the kind, experienced friend he needs, but pledge yourself to see him no more, if he urge the suit which common sense pronounces utterly absurd. Would you rob him of his noble ambition, his energy, his best aspirations? Then marry him at once, take him to Paris, and while he flutters idly mid the gay dissipated crowd, sit at home in your loneliness, and live on the memory of the glad time when you fancied you had his heart's true affection!

No! Stretch out your hand to save him now, not to clasp his in a false alliance. The day will come when he will thank you that you left him to work his way upward, unshackled by an unloved wife, and the shame of a mercenary marriage. Let him struggle on, and grow strong through his struggles. Encourage him to do to the uttermost the great deeds of which his boyhood whispered. So shall his pretended love change to a true regard, a reverence which shall place you in a niche high above all other women, even above her who shall one day sit by his hearth-stone. Perhaps you do not care to play the cold statue in the cold niche! Warming influences, cheering influences, can reach you even there. You have a talisman which can win sunshine for your lot. Attention and flattery you will have in abundance, but they are not the sunshine of which we speak. You crave something better, and it is near you, within your reach.

It is the fashion to depreciate wealth, and to pretend to shake off the gold dust from our saintly garments. Let us rather honestly own its power, and wield that power well. Married women can rarely be either generous or charitable as individuals. Most wives go to their husbands for money to give, as well as to get, and so are but beggars themselves, or at least but almoners of another's bounty. (How some of them do hate to ask as much as a dollar from the men who must know what is done with every cent of it, and hem! haw! at each item of which their profound judgment disapproves.)

The rich widow is after all the independent woman. She can give when and how she pleases, and no man shall say her nay. She need not be a watering-place wonder, to be stared at and run after, and persecuted by fortune-hunters. She is not obliged to parade her velvets and laces to be known as the rich Mrs. So-and-so with an income without limit. She can have a higher ambition. There is a better path open to her, one that leads upward rather than into the vale of humiliation.

Make an estimate of your income, my friend of the money-bags. Decide how much you are willing to give away, not in useless baubles to people whose wants are all imaginary, but to the real sufferers who throng this pinching, work-a-day world. Your time will not hang heavily upon your hands. There is even danger that you may be kept too lazy, if you once enter upon the pleasant field of your labors. Ah! what charming pictures rise, as your future dimly flits before the fancy! What hand has banished the desolate, comfortless look from that humble home. Why! there is a fire on the hearth for the old grandmother, though it is only a chilly autumnal evening. That large lamp, with its clear, steady light, makes that pale seamstress work easily. She no longer toils beside the dim candle, and rubs her blinded, aching eyes. How comfortably clad are those happy children who are hastening to the door, to welcome a weary father returning from his work. Weary, yes, he looked so till he turned the corner which brought him in sight of the glimmer of his home. Now the cloud is gone, and his face is all smiles as he crosses his cheerful threshold. Poverty is fairly driven out, and only honest labor left in his lot. As he sits among his little ones, and thanks God for the plenty on his table, whose name mingles in his grateful prayer? It is the rich widow's! She it was who found him out in his misery, and gave him what he pined for, a chance to earn his bread in the sweat of his brow. Her thoughtful kindness has sent many a comfort to his altered home. He loves her, his children love her, the wife and mother loves her, truly. There is sunshine for her in their joyous greeting when her face looks in at the door. There is lasting sunshine for her in the simple prayer, "God bless the good lady," which nightly goes up for her, from the lips of the children of the poor!

Would that we had time, O rich widow, to paint the many glad pictures which may form the bright panorama of your future life!

Go your way with your golden wand, and do the work of the fabled fairy; joy and gladness shall not only follow your footsteps, but nestle in your own heart.

A WREATH FOR MATTIE E. S.

BY JENNIE.

I'm roving to-night in memory's bowers,
And weaving a garland for thee
Of the purest, and brightest, and loveliest flowers
That ever held honey for bee.

The first that I pluck from its home in the air,
I take as an emblem of thee;
'Tis soft as rich velvet, and fragrant, and fair,
And graces the Magnolia tree.
It wooes the warm rays darting gleams from the sun,
With bloom opened out to the view;
But at last, when 'tis found he is not to be won,
It mournfully turns from the dew,
And folding its leaves when its God sinks to rest,
Determines none other to spy,
Since the light of its love has gone out in the west,
It will sleep till he beams in the sky.
The soft dews of evening in vain lightly fall,
And weep at the toll of their doom;
It worships but one, so turns from them all—
Yet, pitying, gives sweetest perfume.

And now the green Ivy—most beautiful vine—
I wreath with the magnolia's leaf;
And all through the garland 'twill lovingly twine,
A winding and friendly relief.
'Tis Friendship, most dear in adversity's hour,
That bears the same color forever,
And blooms evergreen in storms, drought, and shower,
A something which death cannot sever.
I'll place with the Ivy this Eglantine face
That blossoms so beautiful here,
Whose flowers all teem with poetical grace,
And friendship shall render them dear.
It seems this sweet sprig of Hawthorn's white bloom,
Has beseeching peeped forth for a place,
So here with this sprig, to drive away gloom,
I'll put thy fair feathery face.

Well now, let me see, what flower will suit best
Next to twine in this beautiful wreath;
Ah, yes! most appropriate!—for all are at rest—
This small, precious stem of dear Heath.

Solitude oft-times is charming to me,
When thoughts pure as flowers and sweet,
Are thronging around me with whispers of thee,
So treasured! but, ah me, so fleet!

But what is this blossom with which the night breeze
Toying, permits it no rest?
Most lovely to me—'tis the precious Heartsease—
My wishes speak loud from its crest;
Come, sweet little flower with soft velvet cheek,
I'll make thee acquainted with Heath,
Near whose gentle aspect, so mild and so meek,
Thou must linger in Friendship's own wreath;
And when from my dear friend perchance a stray glance,
Wandering, lights upon thee,
Oh say, while thy soft leaves to low zephyrs dance,
In solitude sweet, "Think of me."

Here are two flowers I'll mingle together,
And bending down o'er them speak low,
In accents as gentle as wind kissing heather,
The wishes with which I o'erflow.
'Tis the sweet-scented Jasmine, yellow and sad,
I place to the Heartsease so near:
And then this pure flower, in blue garments clad,
To bid thee be always sincere.
'Tis a meek blossom this winning blue flower,
Which turning its soft eyes to thee,
Will throw thee of pleadings an azure shower,
Lispings—Forget thou not me.

Then take as 'tis offered, this garland of mine;
As cold fate has doomed us to part;
I lay it—a tribute—on Friendship's pure shrine,
So there let it weave round thy heart.

NOTE.—EMBLEMS OF THE FLOWERS: Magnolia, high-souled; Ivy, My Friendship is lasting; Eglantine, Poetry; Hawthorn, I am hopeful; Heath, Solitude; Heartsease, Think of me; Yellow Jasmine, We must separate; but Forget-me-not—Forget me not.

WHEN THOU ART NEAR.

BY J. BRAINERD MORGAN.

WHEN thou art near, o'er all my soul
A sparkling stream of joy is poured;
The fleeting moments as they roll,
Are each with rarest pleasure stored,
When thou art near.

When thou art near, no shade of sadness
Can ever fall from sorrow's wing;
The sweetest songs of joy and gladness
My happy heart doth ever sing,
When thou art near.

When thou art near, not e'en one thought
In wayward flight desires to roam;
It seems as though the world had brought
Its choicest treasures to my home,
When thou art near.

When thou art near I seem to know
All of sweet bliss the world can hold;
My life is wreathed with pleasure's glow,
With truest happiness untold,
When thou art near.

OUR GAL.

BY MARY FORMAN.

I must write it; if nobody ever reads a line of it, I must, while it is all new and fresh in my mind, write out the history of the last two weeks and the description of "our gal," as Harry calls her.

Our gal first made her appearance in the house two weeks ago last Monday, and I hailed her broad face and stout figure with a most hearty welcome. Little did I realize—but to begin at the beginning. I was, I am a very young housekeeper, yet theoretically I do know something of the arts and sciences thereunto appertaining. I was married about two years ago; but we have always boarded until now, and when I started in my pretty house, with two good girls, and everything new, I fancied that clockwork would be a mere wandering vagrant compared to the regularity of my proceedings. "'Twas on a Sunday morning," as the song says, that my troubles began. I was dressing for church, when my chambermaid came up with a rueful countenance.

"If you please, Mrs. Harvey, I'm going."

"Going!" I exclaimed. "Where?"

"To leave, ma'am! Home! I've got a spell of neuralgia coming on, and I'm going home to lay by."

"But you can lie down here, if you are sick."

"Well, ma'am, I ain't to say sick, exactly, but I'm fixing for a turn."

"A turn?"

"Yes; I have neuralgia in spells, and I always feel 'em a comin'."

Words were vain. Go she would, and go she did. I went into the kitchen to explain to the cook that she must do double duty for a time. She was a perfect termagant, and to my utter amazement she wheeled around with the cry—

"Gone! Jane gone! Will you get another girl?"

"Certainly."

"To-day!"

"How can I get a girl on Sunday?"

"And to-morrow wash day! Well, I'm not going to stay to do all the work. You'll either get another girl early to-morrow or I'll leave!"

"You'll leave now, in the shortest space of time it takes to go from here to the door," cried Harry, from the sitting-room, where he could overhear us.

With many insolent speeches she departed, and inconvenient as it was I was glad to see her go.

Of course there was no church, and I began to get dinner. Harry, like a masculine angel as he is, took off his coat and came down to help me, with an assurance that he actually could not sit still and hear the cook use the tone she did, one instant longer. It was a merry day. Harry raked the fire till his glossy brown curls were powdered with gray, which premature sign of age was produced, he assured me, by "care, and not the weight of years." He peeled potatoes so beautifully that they were about as big as bullets, after he had taken off the skin an inch thick all round. Pies were the only article of cookery with which I was practically acquainted, so I made a meat pie, two apple-pies, and short-cakes for supper, which we ate with the dinner at six o'clock. It was late enough when we cleared up, but at last all was done but one thing. Harry was in the bath-room, refreshing himself, when I discovered that the coal was all gone. I hated to call him down, for he had worked hard all day, so I took the scuttle and went down in the cellar myself, laughing to think how he would scold when he knew it. I am a wee woman, and not very strong, but I filled the big scuttle, and tugging away with both hands, started up stairs. I was at the top, my labor nearly over, when somehow, I cannot tell how, I lost my balance. I reeled over, and the heavy thing came with me, down to the bottom of the stairs. I felt it crushing my foot. I heard Harry's call, and rush down stairs, and then I fainted. I know now, though I did not then, how he lifted me in his strong arms, and carried me up stairs, and the touch of the cold water which he poured over me is the next thing I remember. As soon as I was conscious, and able to speak, I let him go for a doctor, lamenting that mother and Lou were both out of town for the summer.

Well, well! it was a weary night; no time to scold, Harry said, so he petted, nursed, and tended me, till my heart ached with its fullness of love and gratitude. Morning found me, my fractured ankle in a box, lying helpless in bed, and Harry promised to send me a girl immediately. So after all this long prelude I come to "our gal." Oh, I must tell you how Harry made me a slice of buttered toast for breakfast, by buttering the bread on both sides, and then toasting it.

It was about nine o'clock when my new girl came. Harry had given her a dead-latch key, so she entered and came up to my door. Her knock was the first peculiarity that startled me. One rap, loud as a pistol shot, and as abrupt.

"Come in!" I cried.

With a sweep the door flew back, and in the space stood my new acquisition. Stop a moment! I must describe her. She was very tall, very robust, and very ugly. Her thick black hair grew low on her forehead, and her complexion was a uniform red. Her features were very large, and her mouth full of (her only beauty) white, even teeth. Still, the face was far from stupid. The mouth, though large, was flexible and expressive, and the big black eyes promised intelligence. But oh, how can I describe her "ways," as Harry calls them. She stood for an instant perfectly motionless, then she swept down in a low, and really not ungraceful courtesy.

"Madam," she said, in a deep voice, "your most obedient."

"You are"—I said, questioningly.

"Your humble servant."

This was not "getting on" a bit, so I said—

"Are you the girl Mr. Harvey sent from the Intelligence Office?"

"I am that woman," she said, with a flourish of her shawl; "and here," she added, "is my certificate of merit," and she took a paper from her pocket. Advancing with a long step, a stop, another step, and stop, till she reached my bedside, she handed me the paper with a low bow, and then stepping back three steps she stood waiting for me to read it, with her hands clasped and drooping, and her head bent as if it were her death warrant.

It was a well written, properly worded note from her former mistress, certifying that she was honest and capable, and I really had no choice but to keep her, so I told her to find her room, lay off her bonnet, and then come to me again. I was half afraid of her. She was not drunk, with those clear black eyes shining so brightly, but her manner actually savored of insanity. However, I was helpless, and then—Harry would come as early as he could, and I could endure to wait.

"Tell me your name," I said, as she came in with the stride and stop.

"My name is Mary," she said, in a tone so deep that it seemed to come from the very toes of her slippers.

"Well, Mary, first put the room in order before the doctor comes."

Oh, if words could only picture that scene! Fancy this tall, large, ugly woman, armed (I use the word in its full sense) with a duster, charging at the furniture as if she were stabbing her mortal enemy to the heart. She stuck the comb into the brush as if she were saying, "Die, traitor!" and piled up the books as if they were fagots for a funeral flame. She gave the curtains a sweep with her hand as if she were putting back tapestry for a royal procession, and dashed the chairs down in their places like a magnificent bandit spurning a tyrant in his power.

But when she came to the invalid she was gentle, almost caressing in her natural manner, propping me up comfortably, making the bed at once easy and handsome, and arranging my hair and dress with a perfect perception of my sore condition. And when she dashed out of the room, I forgave the air with which she returned and presented a tray to me, for the sake of its contents. Such delicious tea and toast, and such perfection of poached eggs, were an apology for any eccentricity of manner. I was thinking gratefully of my own comfort, and watching her hang up my clothes in the closet in her own style, when the bell rang. Like lightning she closed the closet door, caught up the tray, and rushed down stairs. From my open door I could hear the following conversation, which I must say rather astonished even me, already prepared for any eccentricity.

Dr. Holbrook was my visitor, and of course his first question was—

"How is Mrs. Harvey this morning?"

In a voice that was the concentrated essence of about one dozen tragedies, my extraordinary servant replied—

"What man art thou?"

"Is the woman crazy?" cried the doctor.

"Lay not that flattering unctio to your soul!" cried Mary.

"H'm—yes—" said the doctor, musingly; then, in his own cheery brisk tone, he added: "You are the new servant, I suppose?"

"Sir, I will serve my mistress till chill death shall part us from each other."

"H'm. Well, now, in plain English, go tell her I am here."

"I go, and it is done!" was the reply, and with the slow stride and halt I heard her cross the entry. She was soon at my door. "Madam, the doctor waits!" she said, standing with one arm out in a grand attitude.

"Let him come up," I said, choking with laughter.

She went down again.

"Sir, from my mistress I have lately come, to bid you welcome, and implore you to ascend. She waits within your chamber for your coming."

Is it to be wondered at that the doctor found his patient in perfect convulsions of laughter, or that he joined her in her merriment.

"Where did you find that treasure?" he asked.

"Harry sent her from the office."

"Stage-struck evidently, though where she picked up that fifth cut actress manner remains to be seen."

The professional part of his visit over, the doctor stayed for a chat. We were warmly discussing the news of the day, when—whew! the door flew open, and in stalked Mary, and announced, with a swing of her arm—

"The butcher, madam!"

I saw the doctor's eyes twinkle, but he began to write in his memorandum book with intense gravity.

"Well, Mary," I said, "he is not waiting?"

"The dinner waits!" she replied. "Shall I prepare the viands as my own judgment shall direct, or will your inclination dictate to me?"

"Cook them as you will," I said, "but have a good dinner for Mr. Harvey at two o'clock."

"Between the strokes 'twill wait his appetite." And with another sweeping courtesy she left the room, the door, as usual, after her exit standing wide open.

She was as good as her word. Without any orders from me, she took it for granted that Harry would dine up stairs, and set the table out in my room. I was beginning to let my keen sense of the ludicrous triumph over pain and weariness, and I watched her, strangling the laugh till she was down stairs. To see her stab the potatoes, and behead the celery was a perfect treat, and the air of a martyr preparing poison with which she poured out the water, was perfect. Harry was evidently prepared for fun, for he watched her as keenly as I did.

Not one mouthful would she bring to me, till she had made it dainty as could be: mashing my potatoes with the movements of a saint crushing vipers, and buttering my bread in a manner that fairly transformed the knife into a dagger. Yet the moment she brought it to me, all the affectation dropped, and no mother could have been more naturally tender. Evidently, with all her nonsense, she was kind-hearted.

It took but one day to find that we had secured a perfect treasure. Her cooking was exquisite enough for the palate of an epicure; she was neat to a nicety, and I soon found her punctual and trustworthy. Her attentions to myself were touching in their watchful kindness. Sometimes, when the pain was very severe, and I could only lie suffering and helpless, her large hands would smooth my hair softly, and her voice become almost musical in its low murmurings of "Poor child! Poor little one!" I think her large strong frame and consciousness of physical superiority to me in my tiny form and helpless state, roused all the motherly tenderness of her nature, and she lavished it upon me freely.

I often questioned her about her former places; discovered to my utter amazement that she never was in a theatre, never saw or read a play, and was entirely innocent of novel reading.

I had become used to her manner, and no longer feared she was insane, when one evening my gravity gave way utterly, and for the first time I laughed in her face. She had been arranging my bed and self for the night, and was just leaving the room, holding in one hand an empty pitcher, and in the other my wrapper. Suddenly a drunken man in the street called out, with a yell that really was startling, though by no means mysterious. Like a flash, Mary struck an attitude. One foot advanced, her body thrown slightly forward, the pitcher held out, and the wrapper waved aloft, she cried out, in a voice of perfect terror—

"Gracious heavings! What hideous screams is those!"

Gravity was gone. I fairly screamed with laughter, and her motionless attitude and wondering face, only increased the fun.

"Go down, Miss Mary, or you will kill me!" I gasped at last.

Apparently unconscious of the cause of my merriment, she went slowly from the room, waving, alternately, the pitcher and the wrapper.

To see her brandish a dust-brush would strike terror to the heart of the most daring spider; and no words of mine can describe the frantic energy with which she punches pillows, or the grim satisfaction on her face at the expiring agonies of a spot of dirt she rubs out of existence. The funniest part of all is her perfectly stolid unconsciousness of doing anything out of the way.

Harry found out the explanation. She has lived for ten years with a retired actress and actor who wish to bury the knowledge of their past life, and who never mention the stage. Retaining in private life the attitudes and tones of their old profession, they have made it a kind of sport to burlesque the passions they so often imitated, and poor Mary unconsciously has fallen into the habit of copying their peculiarities. When they left for Europe, she found her way to the Intelligence Office, where Harry secured her. Long, long may she remain "Our Gal."

THE OLD LOVE.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

HILDRED HAYNE sat alone in her quiet parlor. It was late in November, and a great wood fire blazed on the hearth, lighting up the remotest corner of the apartment with a ruddy glare. The warm light fell full over the lonely woman, reclining in the wide easy chair, and brought out with vivid distinctness every line and curve of her motionless figure.

Miss Hayne had, probably, seen thirty years of life, though the silver threads in her temples gave you the impression that she was older. She was slight and tall, with deep gray eyes; abundant brown hair put plainly back from her forehead, well cut, clearly defined features; and a mouth which had once been sweet and womanly; but now, its expression was cold and hard. The crimson lips shut tightly, and there was a steel-like determination about them, at variance with the tender light in the downcast eyes, and the thoughtful curve of the fair brow. Looking in her face, you know that all Miss Hayne's life had not passed as quietly as the days she was now living. The existence of her girlhood was a thing entirely dis severed from the present; looking back upon it, she could scarcely realize that she was the same gay girl who, six years ago, had made the Red Rock farm-house vocal with the music of her laughter.

For six weary years she had been a recluse. Her only companions at the farm were the sturdy hired man and his practical wife, who, under her supervision, managed the farm work. She had received no company—gone none abroad; she had buried the world and its interests; and a little removed from the turmoil of the city, she dwelt on in seclusion. Little children avoided her. Neighbors never ran in of an evening, for an hour's chat with her; the very dogs trotted past her gate without halting to utter a friendly bark. Yet, Mrs. Hayne was unkind to no living creature. She was only supremely indifferent. Positive ill temper would have made her more popular than this strange, passionless apathy, through the ice of which nothing could penetrate.

At twenty two, Hildred Hayne was the acknowledged belle of her vicinity—the liveliest, gayest girl for miles and miles around. To her personal grace and beauty, she united charms of mind and heart, far above the common order. Sensitive, high spirited, confiding, and affectionate, she won the love of Paul Lancaster—the only son and heir of Judge Lancaster, at the hall; and with the consent of all concerned, they were betrothed.

Mr. Lancaster was handsome, well educated, engaging in his manners, and self-willed. Never in his life had a single wish of his been allowed to die ungratified. He knew nothing of disappointments, nothing of self sacrifice; he was noble and generous; but impulsive, almost reckless.

They had been engaged a year, when there came to Portland—the city of Mr. Lancaster's birth—a fair southern lady, a distant relative of Paul's mother. Isabel Courtland was beautiful and fascinating, and was much in the society of the Lancasters. There is no need of enlarging on the subject; it was but a repetition of the old, old story—the first love was valueless beside the second. Almost before he was conscious of his perfidy, Paul Lancaster avowed his passion for the fair stranger, and heard the words from her lips which made life for him an Eden.

Like a flash of lightning from a cloudless sky came the knowledge to Hildred, that her lover was hers no longer. She did not weep, or rave—she heard it with a white face, and nerves like steel; her own heart was so true and loyal that it was with difficulty she could understand such dishonor in the man she loved. She did not censure him for loving another better than herself, and remembering how he had kept her in ignorance of the change in his feelings, she was cold and unforgiving; and when she sent Paul free from her presence, it was with the command never to show his face to her again so long as they both should live.

From that time Hildred was an altered being. She did not pine, or mope, but her youth seemed dead. She went about slowly and methodically; became hard and calculating in her disposition, and shut out all love from her heart. When her parents died, within a few months of each other, leaving her all alone in the world, but for her little sister, Mary, she refused to break up the old establishment at Red Rock farm, as her friends advised, but lived there still, taking all the responsibility of the large farm on her own slender shoulders.

Mary, beautiful, golden-haired Mary, was her solace—the only thing she seemed to love; to her, she was tender, devoted, and self sacrificing. The sole tie that bound Hildred Hayne to humanity! Even this was rent away. A malignant fever swept over the vicinity of Red Rock farm, and Mary was among the first smitten. Three dreadful days of dumb agony to Hildred passed, and, on the morning of the fourth, she held her dead sister in her arms! And when they buried the sweet girl, Hildred's human love was laid to rest in her grave. Thenceforth, for the dark-eyed, lonely woman at Red Rock, the world held not a solitary charm!

Once only since her banishment of him had she seen Paul Lancaster. The day her sister was buried, he had thrown a snow-drop into the grave; and, as he turned away, they two, Paul and Hildred, met face to face. There was a wild, imploring, passionately tender look in his eyes—a stony, immovable look in hers, and not a word was spoken. He understood her.

He went away into the world shortly afterward; the Hall passed out of the hands of his father, who removed to a distant State, and Hildred knew nothing more of the family. No one ever mentioned them to her; she made no inquiries; she said to herself that she did not care to know.

Life passed on monotonously enough. She hardly noted the change of seasons, except as agricultural interests compelled her to do so. She took little thought for the things of the morrow; she never looked forward; it was doubtful even if she realized the present. She might have interested herself in the poor, but she did not; she gave nothing to beggars; sat in no sanctuary, and lived a life hidden from the view of all.

That November night Hildred, for the first time in many years, was looking back over her past life. Somehow her heart felt softer—there were tender memories at work; the spirit of mercy plead with iron-breasted justice; she almost felt that she could forgive Paul Lancaster all he had made her suffer. A rap at the door aroused her. She waited, expecting old Francis or his wife to answer the call; but evidently they did not hear, and, taking up the lamp, she went herself. The air was thick with snow; and on the door-step, his blue overcoat gray with the feathery flakes, stood a man in the Federal uniform. He lifted his hat, and spoke with courtesy.

"Is this the residence of Miss Hildred Hayne?"

"It is," she answered, coldly; "what is your business?"

The young soldier's bronzed cheek flushed at her haughty tone, but he replied with feeling: "Madam, I have in my charge a wounded officer who was given over to die by our regimental surgeon; and on his discharge from the hospital, he made one solemn request, probably his last one. He asked to be brought here, that his dying breath might be drawn in the place where the only happiness of his life had come to him. I, as his friend and subordinate, have complied with his request. Shall I bring him in?"

Miss Hayne's cool hand trembled slightly; a faint quiver of scarlet shot up to her forehead.

"What is the gentleman's name?" she asked.

"Colonel Paul Lancaster."

She made a movement as if to close the door, but the soldier put himself in the way.

"Madam, you may be refusing shelter to a dying man. Reflect before you decide. Col. Lancaster was once your friend; will you shut the door of your house upon him when he asks, with his expiring breath, the cover of its roof?"

Miss Hayne underwent a struggle, but it was only momentary. She threw open the door, and called old Francis.

"Carry him in there," she said, pointing to the warm parlor; "I will come to him directly."

She went up to her chamber, and locked herself in. What a fearful trial she passed through was known only to God and her own soul.

In a little while she came down, pale and quiet, and entered the room where they had taken her guest. The sofa was drawn up before the fire; and the pale, wan face that was lifted to meet her eyes, was hardly recognizable as that of the Paul Lancaster she had once known.

A slight tinge of color swept the ashen white of his cheek; he held out his left hand—the other he had lost.

"Hildred," he said, feebly, "at last I have dared to return to you."

She took his hand; her face softened, there was a little tremor in her voice. "I am pleased to welcome you, Col. Lancaster."

"By the memory of the sweet past, O, Hildred, let me stay where I can sometimes look at you! I only asked God to let me live until I could come here to die! until, dying, I could plead for and obtain your forgiveness! You will not refuse me, Hildred?"

"I have buried all enmity," she said, slowly and solemnly; "we will forget what has been and be friends. Where shall I address a letter to your relatives?"

"I have none near enough to care for my misfortunes. My father is dead; my sister sleeps in a foreign grave. I have neither friends nor relatives."

She looked at him with dumb wonder. Perhaps he understood the doubt expressed in her face, for he said, as if in explanation:—

"No, Hildred; I have never married. The first love of my life was the one true love of my soul. My fancy for Isabel Courtland was a brief passion. It died a speedy death, and I buried it out of my sight. Hildred, I have never loved any woman save you!"

She laid her hand on his forehead softly; the hardness and gloom went out of her face; the lines of determination around her mouth were smoothed away; she was kind, and tender, and womanly.

"Sleep!" she said, gently; "henceforth nothing save death shall divide us!"

From that hour a wonderful change came over Hildred Hayne. Once more she was human; the world held interests for her; she left her solitary life of selfishness, and did good to those around her. The poor blessed her name; the little children flocked around to kiss her; the stray dogs took bread from her hands without fear.

Col. Lancaster owed his life to her unremitting care; and when, at last, he rose up, maimed and feeble, but chastened and purified by long suffering, Hildred became his wife.

The old, hard existence was forever cast aside; and to-day you can find no more womanly woman than Hildred Lancaster.

WE would gain more if we left ourselves to appear such as we are, than by attempting to appear what we are not.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Pearl the Eighth.—August.

THE summer, lingering through the August days
Languid and indolent, by signs betrays

Her lack of promise;

The flower that droops beneath its sultry rays
The laws of Nature forced to feel, obeys,
And passes from us.

Now at the even-tide the Katy-did,
Within the branches of the willow hid,
Repeats her story;

While the grasshoppers in the hedges say,
In their quaint utterance, "either way,
It yields no glory."

The cricket on the hearth-stone chirps; the air
Is full of fireflies, flitting here and there,
The meadows over;

(A Moorish legend runs: the spirits thus
Of the departed come to visit us, Friend, child, or lover.)

The corn's brown tassels woo the wanton wind;
The grain-stalks topple with their wealth in kind,
As they were planted;

And swarthy reapers through oppressive hours
Scythe-swinging, are rejoicing in the dowers
By nature granted.

And here and there the gleaners follow fast
Their footsteps, gathering a rich repast
With glad demeanor;

Recalling the familiar story, found
In sacred writ, upon historic ground,
Of Ruth, the Gleaner.

And we, by sea-shore, or in some retreat
Where quiet reigns, familiar faces meet;

Or, sad and weary,
We watch the shadows lengthen from the west
And say, "He all things ordereth for the best, Yet life is dreary."

For, as we muse upon the summers past,
Come memories that will forever last,
Of joy and gladness;

This summer, in its going, takes away
A sorrow that outlives its longest day
Of grief and sadness.

So, as we journey through the year of life,
The pearls from out its casket drop, in strife
'Twixt joy and sorrow;
Shadow and sunlight thus in conflict stand Until we reach the confines of the land
That hath no morrow.

EFFECTS OF WINE.—Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.

OUR SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY—LAY Z. BONES AND I.

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

SAY, will you go with me? Not to the war. For you travel over the horrors of the fray with your morning coffee, digest skirmishes at dinner, have scouting parties at tea, and a nightmare when the bursting of shell drowns the fierce shout of foemen, and riderless horses trample to the red earth the dead and dying. Ah, yes! you have too much of this. Therefore, not to the war.

But let us take a trip over the bustling land and bounding waves. You shall come with me, and I will lend you my eyes. You shall not only see blue peaks and very commonplace valleys, but Lay Z. Bones and I would have you contemplate through our spectacles (and they are not green) the great rich hills which lay afar off in the hazy distance, and find them vernal-clad temples whose minarets touch heaven. We shall see the long shaded valleys, threaded by serpentine, coiling rivers which kiss the feet of the towering hills, as the lazy streams flow outward, singing toward the sea, and we think this the river of Life, rippling gently toward the Ocean of Immortality. "Stop!" I say to Lay Z. Bones. "This is not merely an old crumbling church beneath these elms. We do not perceive in its decay but the rascality of a mason, or incompetency of a country carpenter. Nay, it is clinging as full of sweet memories to us as it is of old ivy which hang in matted festoons from its cracked walls. Here is the old porch, too; naught is left but the quaint old pillars, carved at the base, where they have parted in decay from the portion under ground, and rest on the velvety moss. There is no light in the chancel now, save the glow of the sunset; now no anthems are heard from the rude choir, and even the good old man (for how good he was, you recollect, even if he knew not Latin, and did not lecture in the city) is not heard with his cracked voice and perhaps poor, rude logic. Yet to us, dear Lay Z. Bones, the old porch groans with its living weight of youth, and joy, and hope. The chancel gives a hollow echo to the quiet laugh and love-breathing whisper; the church is thronged, and over the heads of those in the high-backed pews, and past the crowding forms in aisles, up to the altar, we glance and see the pair who pledge their vows of love before Heaven and the Man of God; and like a dream the view is changed. Still the old porch is crowded; still the little chancel is filled. But the whippers are hushed, and sobs are but sad symphonies. The old church is full, but a coffin stands before the altar, and the pastor's voice is broken. (Ah! he recollects that other scene.) His hair is gray, and the hair is gray of the weeping woman by the coffin, and the forms in the high-backed pews are crooked with age—youth is not here with Death. Let us go away, or we shall weep. Not towards the little stones in the graveyard, all green with age, and almost buried in the dark grass. No! not there! And this is why we pause by the old church, my dear Lay Z. Bones. It is not simply an abandoned building to us, but a sacred ruin. And the voices of the Past come back, tuneful with sad melodies, yet so good to be remembered now and then by us all. And again, this is why we will trip along and leave the old ivy-clad ruin with such tender and womanly regrets. Are you sorry you came with me first here, ere we leave this by-way for the path of the busy world?

Don't you like this bustling depot, eh? There is so much life and character here, and that huge monster, snorting and puffing like a colossal land porpoise, connects our thoughts with far-off towns; and such a good friend he is, too, for on the iron pathway he carries us past charming landscapes, and over broad, far-reaching rivers; and in a rapid panorama, which in our speed seems almost a gloriously-colored dissolving view, we see picturesque villages nestling in the heart of mammoth hills, whose sides are decked with wild flowers, whose feet are washed by quiet streams, and whose peaks are crowned with exquisite, iridescent sunset clouds, and then we dash through walls of granite, and over plains, and through black tunnels which recalls Dante's lines:—

"Gli occhi, diss'io, mi fieno ancor qui tolti"

"Mine eyes may yet have to endure the blindness in this place, etc."

And then we have beside a great book in which to study as we trip along our five hundred miles a day. Oh, the meanness in that pinched face before us! The conceit in the supercilious eyes on the platform! The vulgarity and coarseness in that red-faced, huge neck-tied animal in the aisle. That is a young wife,

Lay Z. Bones, I will wager. See how keenly she enjoys this exciting life of the traveller! How she points out the pretty spots to her husband, and oh! the wretch! he gives her back never a smile, and dives more deeply in the insipid newspaper. Et tu, Brute! why, you are nearly asleep, my friend, or are you peeping out under your eyelids at that pretty woman in mourning? What if she is a coquette, sir? I will have no flirtation here! Hang her beautiful eyes! Look out on the stars from the car-window, and notice the quiet which broods over the country beyond, and how the pallid moon floods the whole landscape with a limpid, garish light. Ah! we are approaching our seaport town, are we? and want our great-coats, and soon our baggage. See! see, my friend, the broad expanse of waters, and the ripples of dancing diamonds, and smell the fresh, bracing sea air! Ah! ah! how delicious! How appetizing! And the great ship which floats upon the waters, nodding to us gayly as we go down to the pier. Every spar says—"How d'ye do!" "How d'ye do!" And the wind through the cordage is giving us a serenade. Let us on board! On board! And now we realize the corsair's exultation, for

"Who can tell save he whose heart hath tried,
And danc'd in triumph o'er the waters wide,
The exulting sense—the pulse's maddening play
That thrills the wanderer of the trackless way!"

Through long days of changing, health-giving pleasure: through long nights of strange though sweet experiences; perhaps through storms, and certainly 'mid broodings on the stars, and rapt contemplation of the waste of waters and the vault of heaven, its reigning Day King or its Queen of Night, rising and setting on the great passion-panting sea, as we watch the wild changes like a hungry soul; yes, through all this (and even Lay Z. Bones shares our experience) we reach a distant country. Now for messieurs of the customs, and messieurs for the passports, and messieurs the spies, whom you think are but simple citoyens, curious, but so well-bred.

Of course we land in la belle France first, for we intend raking staid old England as we come back, pretty sure that the island will not be moved away ere we do so. You may be certain, Lay Z. Bones, that this is Paris. Revolutionary, artistic, fashionable Paris! Embodied Anachronism! Living, Louis Napoleonic Paris! What marvellous houses, what strangely narrow streets, and now what wonderfully wide squares! Let us take a cabriolet, et allez donc; we whirl along Les Boulevardes; we shall visit le Maison Dorée in the brilliant cit  des Italiens. Here is the piquant marchande with her high cap, rich brown hair, striped petticoat, and Lay Z. Bones says, "What handsome ankles above her wooden shoes!" But above all his nonsense we are saddened when we come to view THE LOUVRE. How the thoughts of the mediæval ages rise up as one paces the courts of the historic palace! Titian again assists the architect, Pierre Lescot designs for Francis 1st, and what a troupe of Italy's sculptors and painters come with Catherine De Medicis, and thought even flies to sweet Mary Stuart, who passed the only brief happiness here of her whole life; and we hum as we leave its sacred walls the very tune which marked the plaintive farewell of Mary when she left the shores of France. Shall I give it to you that you may set it to some mournful music and sing it when you are brooding in the twilight, but yet happy?

"Adieu! plaisant pays de France;
O, ma patrie!
La plus ch tie—
Qui as nourri ma jeune enfance.
Adieu, France! adieu, mes beaux jours!"

And we too will bid adieu to the palace, or memories cluster so thickly, that we should think a volume ere we could indite a page. Let us pass the galleries with their treasures of art, or as each master salutes us from his frame we must dot down our thoughts, Prince Lay Z. Bones and I.

Let us pass by Le Jardin de l'Infante; it has no particular interest to us, although she who named it was the Infanta, and dust for two hundred years; cheated by Prince, afterward King Louis xv, and dying in a Spanish convent, why should we weep when ages have lapsed, and the world's poets have never crowned her memory with a song? But we must hasten away or our eyes will moisten at remembrance of the wrongs of the poor girl, who loved like a woman although she was a princess.

Oh, let us visit a convent! Say St. Vincent de Paul, where we shall feel more sinful in the holy, quiet, and religious light; we have passed the ordeal of the portress and the Lady Superior, and, shall we confess it? our heart hitherto untouched, trembles with a new emotion before the vision of the beautiful sister Agatha. She is like an angel of goodness and light which comes to us in some memory of our pure childhood; she looks at us with her earnest eyes, and smiles till even Lay Z. Bones, who says he is blaz , blushes.

"These visitors are from a far off land," the superior says, "bien loin, bien loin au delà des mers—from America."

And the smile of the vision thanked us, beamed thanks from the tender eyes, and the tongue framed some simple words of thanks for our small tribute to the charities of the convent. I am silent when we leave St. Vincent, and the gaiety of my friend fails to rally me. I am thinking of the "merci!" of Sister Agatha, and I shall never forget that face. We pass through the Quartier Latin and see how the students rally in sets; and how distinctive a class they are, with their long hair, extraordinary garments, and revolutionary principles, which is constitutional with them; and I have but just pulled Lay Z. Bones away from a huge fellow with whom he was quarreling in very bad French, the point of dispute being "whether it is better for a gentleman who has holes in his boots to get them mended, or black the stocking of doubtful white beneath so the hole would be unperceived?" My friend took the American view of the question, which was considered personal by the embryo gros-bonnet (professor), and by my action the metaphysical question remained unsolved—perhaps to this day.

I shall not dilate now on the Morgue where the bodies of the unknown dead are placed, nor tell you of the touching scenes we witness here; for after all Lay Z. Bones has a tender heart, and I should record his sensibility if I did, which does credit to any manhood. For say I, a man may have a woman's heart and yet be able to strike a hard blow, and the tenderness of a woman's nature does not weaken the brain of an Irving or Humboldt.

Ah! if space would permit, we should weave you a pretty romance out of the flower market, and tell you how we were crowned with all flora's wealth for a few sous; explore with you the galleries of the Rue Rivoli; and tell you how when coming from an allée of the Bois de Boulogne we are assailed by the loud voices of women with baskets on their arms who cry:—"Voulez-vous du plaisir, messieurs?"

And how after having bought the "plaisir" (wafer of sweets), find that it crumbles into dust ere we give it a chance to melt in our mouth; take you as a friendly chaperone through the wonderful cafés, to a riotous bal masque after le grande opera; discover to you the marvellous atmosphere of BOHEME, and bid you say it is rosy, if you are not stifled with tobacco smoke; bid you read French sentiment, wit, and philosophy, and present you with the latest editions of Lamartine, Michelet, Rabelais, and Voltaire if you please, but as our diligence is waiting (and "Hoe's last fast" press is a blustering postillion), and Lay Z. Bones with American eagerness is anxious to post through the fair country to look at the low vine-clad cottages, which dot the plains beyond Paris; to ogle the handsome peasant girls with striped petticoats which they wear short—on purpose; to pluck the purple grapes which cluster by the road side at every inn, and hasten into Gascony, that he may be cheated by the natives, who, I tell my friend, can even swindle a Yankee. We dash on through a lovely country, past huge rocks and shadowy woods, their colors cheering my eyes as if my passionate love for sweet mother nature was a religion, which deepened all other delicious appetites and loves and feelings.

And so, after days of dolce far niente, we leave sweet France, and awaking one fine morning Lay Z. Bones and I find ourselves in Spain. On a cluster of hillocks, in the midst of an arid, and uneven plateau, Madrid lies, full of lazy beauty, and as we saunter through the Plaza de Toros we discover that we have come so many thousands of miles to see a bull fight! But we are faint with the heat and "Malditos!" the savage fight in the vast circus, and we push out past some handsome Andalusians to be stopped by a lusty beggar who looks like a grandee in disguise. He thrums his cracked guitar and sonorously speaks: "Hermanitos! por el amor de la santissima Virgen!" And as the rascal looks as if it would be pleasant to open a vein for us, we give him alms "for the love of the blessed Virgin." But we must not linger long in this sunny land, for, shall I tell you, we feel here as in a garlanded tomb. Alas, poor Spain! where is thy grandeur gone! Where is the glory of the Alhambra, and the chivalry of thy sons? Once the master, now the mockery of nations; we roam amongst her towered castles by the side of famed streams, but we only behold them in the light of the Past. History has made them sweet to us; we love their romance, but dare not pause with the reality. Pope sung of Rome, but Spenser thought of Spain when his sad muse wrote:—

"High towers, fair temples, goodly theatres, Strong walls, rich porches, princely palaces,
Fine streets, brave houses, sacred sepulchres,
Sure gates, sweet gardens, stately galleries—
All these (oh! pity!) now are turn'd to dust,
And overgrown with black Oblivion's rust."

We may stray with our vagaries, dear reader, into Portugal, or take you with us in our sentimental journey through the steppes of Russia;

but don't give a premonitory shiver, for we will not. We might climb the Alps, and lose ourselves in historic Greece, and, as we stand on the Jardin of Mont Blanc of the former, we could swell these pages with the grandeur of the mountain which dwarfs the Jura; or live a Homeric age again in the latter country—fabled, famous Greece. For who loves not the poet's creation of Achilles? Who does not strive to rival Ulysses? But though the lagoons of South America, with their adventures, and beasts, and rare mosses woo us, the Sheiks of Turkey interest us, and the Rajahs of India positively are seductive, still we float towards Italy surely and swiftly. There is a magnetism which draws us towards Rome; a spirit which calls us softly to Florence. And Lay Z. Bones and I pay our hotel bills, engage new valéts, who shall, on the score of economy, serve as guides also, and soon enter the Holy City. We were dwelling on Art, and Glory, and Religion, and sooner find the Vatican and the Catacombs than our hotel. We behold the works of Raphael, and are wrapt in admiration of Murillo's Madonna; but as we left the side of the Venus de Medici, a voice exclaims that he "don't like those stone gals," and again we hasten away; ignorance and vulgarity have broken the charm, and our grosser humanity seeks the table d'hôte, stifling our emotions with macaroni. (Lay Z. Bones, as I write, insists that I mean lazzaroni. Poor fellow! He soon will know the difference.)

What a charm, thus wandering in Italy! I know the vagrancy of feeling. Do you, and you? But what a wealth of thought thus reaped and garnered for life! Here, on the banks of the Arno, the unquiet spirit has in a manner folded its wings, and the richness of coloring which reclothes and rebeautifies the green banks is as tender as the beauties on the hills of Attica. Glorious skies reflected in calm and almost waveless water; Nature, through the whole of this Italian garden, has massed her wealth, brightest birds, and brilliant flowers; lovely vegas, rich, soft, and sunny; vine-clad hills; plains covered with scented groves; lakes lying bright and smiling in sunshine, lapped by wooded slopes; temples white and cloud-crowned on the hills looking outward toward placid seas; Art and Nature in a dreamy embrace. Is it strange that Heaven should smile, and the earth be glad?

But even while we thus drink in beauty and give utterance to our dreams, Lay Z. Bones is discussing an omelette in the shade, and laughing at me, and I think with a sad prescience. How many of you are doing so, too? I comprehend the materialism of the present, but can you comprehend the softening, illuminating, spiritualizing effect of such philosophical and sentimental journeys as we are taking? The indwelling forms of beauty which saves us from what has been rightly called "the curse of the age"—weariness of self; that restlessness of spirit with which so many chafe through the voids left by work, pleasure, or pursuit. Think of this; and to please you and the printer, we will come from still-breathed, classic Italy towards home, via that stanch Freeman's Estate, Merrie England. John Bull, Esquire, owner and proprietor.

"It is good to speak English once more," says Lay Z. Bones.

Say I: "It is good to feel the Anglo-Saxon hand, and see the marks of Anglo-Saxon power and progress, to feel the pulses bound with a new sense of freedom, to—"

"Have a good cut of roast beef at 'Morley's?'"* quoth Lay Z. Bones.

And I am left at the foot of Charing-Cross in London, and may have a cold slice of the statue of Charles I., if I please, with sauce. The deuce takes moralizing! The deuce take all London, and especially the vulgar thief who stole my pocket-book as I was contemplating Northumberland House opposite.

But philology comes as naturally to travelers as extortions to innkeepers; and Lay Z. Bones and I jog along as merrily to Canterbury next day as if we had a million sterling each in the funds.

But another day, perhaps, we shall describe the old buildings here, and give you some degree of information about old Oxford which Tom Brown don't disclose. You shall go with us to quiet, stately Windsor; and after wandering to that Mecca, Stratford-von-Avon, take rail for Birmingham, and Nottingham, and Sheffield, and some other 'hams, and 'fields, and 'shires, where the busy looms throb through the great towns, and steam, and brain, and muscle create kings who sit on thrones of money-bags—monarchs who in return destroy their living subjects.

And, after all, we have but skimmed over the countries we have named, Lay Z. Bones and I; and it is so sweet to find in each tree, and house, church, or sleeping village some significance which escapes the careless observer, that we have asked your company in our sentimental journey. And would you believe,

* Hotel in London where Americans "most do congregate."

Ephemeral Butterfly, Esq., that we find charms in every cloud which flecks the sky; in every patch of sunshine which rests on woody dells and throws strange shadows over the waters? It is so, indeed! And what a strange tuition we receive—those of us who own emotion as a master! Where all was before dull, leaden earth, a cultivated taste will soon transform into blooming causeways, hillsides reel with strange wild flowers, brooks sing tunes which such souls interpret as though hummed to their spirits by angel voices. Pictures are graven upon our hearts, the beauty of which is not effaced when the reality has passed. No, they remain complete, satisfactory, and are framed with most tender memories. Faces are revelations; we see in them traits of humor, quaint individualism, and grotesque originality—we have books before us where we can always read of love, devotion, and valor, as in the darker background we can see and study a tragic face like SALVATOR would paint.

Take our advice, and always be ready for Sentimental Journeys like our own.

GET KNOWLEDGE.

BY F. S. C.

Ignorance is the curse of God,

Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.

SHAKESPEARE.

THE cultivation of the mind is a duty which every man owes to himself and society. All that he may know he is bound to know by the very conditions of his mental and moral being. All knowledge is useful. The more a man knows the greater his happiness and usefulness, provided he put it to the right use. Every idea he gains, every truth he gleans from nature, science, or religion, is so much wealth and treasure, compared to which dollars and cents are literally nothing. Hence his mind should always be active, always seeking after additional gains in knowledge. Truth, valuable truth, belongs to everything we see above, around, beneath us. We cannot move a step without something to think about—something that will enlarge the limits of our knowledge, and be of service to us in practical, every-day life. The great variety of objects in nature, their multifarious relations and dependencies, cannot be without the design of enriching our minds and hearts. It is, therefore, our duty to consider them and evolve from them truth and knowledge. We wrong ourselves, wrong our intellectual and moral natures, if we do not draw from them all the wealth of thought they seek to impart. No intellect can possibly hold communion with nature without having some of nature's own grandeur stamped upon it. The contemplative mind, alive to the grand teachings and harmonies of the universe, cannot help finding with the Bard of Avon—

“Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything.”

Not only does nature spread out her vast volume for our instruction and mental enlargement; but the generations of the past have lived for us. The millions who have thought before us, albeit they are in their graves and have been for centuries, think for us now. Their gathered treasures, brought from innumerable sources and from all conditions and grades of mind, even the wealth of ages, we have in books. Surely we ought to get knowledge, and be the wiser and better for what others have thought and written in the past. Books, too, are cheap in our day, and knowledge condensed and thrown into small limits.

Then there is THE BOOK—the Bible—a book which is full of wisdom, full of information upon every subject in any way related to our intellectual or moral nature. God himself, the fountain of all truth, the source of all knowledge, there speaks! Christ, who came to be “the light of the world,” there speaks as never man spake! There, too, speak all the holy and wise men of God who have lived and died and ascended to rest. Truths are here which only God himself could reveal—truths that burn and flame with their own divinity!

Nature, history, and revelation all unfold their pages and lay their gathered treasures at our feet, reader; they have noble designs toward us; they would enlarge and enrich us with true knowledge and wisdom. If, as one has said—

—“He who binds

His soul to knowledge steals the key of heaven,” ought it not to be the ambition of every rational intelligence to “intermeddle with all knowledge?” If so, “go thou and do likewise.”

A BROKEN FORTUNE.—Ovid finely compares a broken fortune to a fallen column; the lower it sinks, the greater weight it is obliged to sustain. Thus, when a man's circumstances are such that he has no occasion to borrow, he finds numbers willing to lend him; but should his wants be such that he sues for a trifle, it is two to one whether he may be trusted with the smallest sum.

In Memoriam.

DIED, at her residence in Philadelphia, May 3, 1863. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE, youngest daughter of Mrs. Sarah Josepha and the late David Hale, Esq., of New Hampshire.

ALTHOUGH no day passes without removing from some circle those whose places can no more be filled—those whose passage into eternity has unsealed fountains that must never cease to flow, and dried up the sources of smiles and joys that in this life cannot be born again—death still comes into our midst, with a pang as fresh, as poignant, as if we only were allotted to bear the sting: as if we alone were called upon to lay at the footstool of the Comforter a burden such as He has never yet laid upon the children of men.

There is no household into which this experience has not entered, no hearth around which mourners have not gathered, sorrowing for those who have gone, ere their career of usefulness on earth, judged by our limited vision, has been accomplished.

In the case of women generally, this sorrow, this regret, is confined to a comparatively limited number—relatives, and the friends and companions of social life. But, when, as in the instance before us, the departed occupied a position which brought her into responsible relations with numbers who were placed within her influence, as pupils, or as associates in the important post which she filled as a teacher of youth, the circle of mourners becomes more extended. It is for this reason—because she was revered and loved in many a distant home—because her teachings and example have borne fruit which will multiply in generations yet to come—it is because the example of the faithful in well doing, the meek in heart, and the holy in life, should not be left without record, that we have drawn her name from the shade in which she herself loved to dwell, that it may serve as an example for others, as well as prove an acceptable tribute to her memory for the many who loved and honored her in life.

MISS HALE was born at Newport in New Hampshire. Deprived in infancy of the tender care of an affectionate father, she was left to the sole guardianship of her mother, Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale, whose training and influence in early life gave the bent to her character. She was educated for the important office of a teacher at the well-known seminary of Mrs. Willard, at Troy, New York, where she was distinguished for her talents and diligence.

She afterwards, at intervals, spent several years at the South, honorably filling the duties of her profession, and eventually declining a tempting and lucrative offer to remain as principal of a prominent seminary in Georgia; her affectionate nature rendering a further separation from family ties an evil which outweighed all considerations of interest. Finally, Miss Hale established, about seven years ago, a seminary for young ladies in Philadelphia, the success of which fully rewarded her modest desires. From this career of usefulness it has pleased God to remove her, and though friendship may not at first be able to suppress the lament of sorrow, or check the tear of regret, it will find its best consolation in echoing her own words of faith and resignation: "Thy will, and not mine, be done."

The solidity and range of Miss Hale's acquisitions were far beyond those generally possessed by women. Her reading was extensive and varied; her familiarity with general literature rendering her a valuable associate to the youthful, and a most responsive and interesting companion. Habituated through life to the society of persons of literary tastes and habits, she naturally occupied herself at intervals with her pen. Numerous graceful little articles were furnished by her for the magazines; and much of that heavy and laborious work, of which authors and publishers alone know the details, in her aptitude of assisting her mother, passed from time to time through her hands.

It was as an epistolary writer, however, that she excelled. The restraint which the consciousness of addressing an audience imposes, was here unfelt, and her impressions of the persons and events passing before her, were sketched off with a playful humor and power of analyzing character, that was charming to those whose privilege it was to read her letters.

The office of teacher, was, certainly, the one she loved best. Her heart was in her school; few instructors, probably, have better exemplified the poet's ideal, that "to teach" may be a "delightful task," than did our friend, whose instructions will bear the precious fruits of goodness in future years, when the loving and sorrowing pupils, who wept her premature death, have become noble, useful, and honored women in our land.

Miss Hale's mental training fitted her peculiarly to influence and guide the young. Perfectly self controlled, her sway was as calm and gentle as it was firm, and the regard which she won was based upon the surest of all foundations—respect. She was warm in her affections, though somewhat reserved in their exhibition, trustful and steady in her friendships, consistent in her life, walking ever beneath the broad banner of TRUTH, without which there is no foundation for integrity of character.

On those higher and more solemn characteristics, her religious life and profession, we do not feel ourselves qualified to dwell. In this, as in all things, her consistency was exhibited. Earnestly impressed with the truths of Christianity, and making a public profession of her faith in Christ in her early youth, her faith was a part of her nature. Except in the line of her duty, she seldom spoke on this subject, but every action of her life showed that she was influenced by its teachings. And almost every year of her school found some of her pupils ready for baptism or confirmation.

When disease insidiously sapped the springs of strength, she was prepared, with calmness and trusting faith, to await the issue. And when the hour opened which was to be her last on earth, she was still at her post, exercising her faculties, and performing her duties in that station of life which it had pleased God to call her. "She has been faithful over a few things;" to such is promised a rich reward. The good Teacher holds a position of honor as well as responsibility scarcely inferior to that of the good mother. An eminent writer has well said: "The Teacher's mission is from God; and whether this teaching be that of masters and mistresses in their schools; or that of the mother who clusters her little ones around her knee; or that of the nurse, from whom the infant catches the first meaning of the different tones of the human voice; it is a mission from God; it is ennobled by Him—and, if it be carried on for Him, it will, in eternity, take rank amid the great things which were done by God's people in time."

MIRIAM'S DUTY.

BY J. E. W.

THE business committee of the Arrowdale sewing society had assembled in the parlor of the directress to prepare work for the next gathering. The preliminaries having been arranged, the ladies were able to converse upon things in general, and the neighborhood in particular.

"Does Miriam Grant intend to take home her dissipated brother, Mrs. Morse?"

"Yes; Richard has fallen so low that no one will shelter him. Miriam considers it a duty to receive the degraded man."

"I am not sure that it is a duty to place one's self in contact with the vile. Provision is made by law for such persons; but Miriam seems desirous of becoming a martyr."

Mrs. Morse was about to reply that Jesus sat down with publicans and sinners; but, recollecting that her interlocutor had suffered her father to die in the almshouse, she merely said: "Miriam has been a model of self-denial since her childhood. After the deacon failed, she became the staff of the household; Rachel was spared because she was the beauty, and Mrs. Grant was too fine a lady for labor. For a time everything was made subservient to Richard's advancement. He was spoiled from his birth; one cannot wonder at his evilcourse."

"Miriam might have been well married, if it had not been for her devotion to her parents," remarked a third lady.

"William Wright treated Miriam shamefully."

"Oh, that was only a childish affair—such rarely end in marriage. But what will she do for support, Mrs. Morse? Parents will scarcely like to place their children in a family containing such a member as Richard."

"Miriam is conscious of that. She will quit teaching; but her plans for the future are unformed."

The tall elms at the bottom of the court cast dark shadows over the large, square house which some sixty years before Deacon Grant had erected, much to the admiration and somewhat to the envy of the inmates of the adjoining homesteads. Now the weather-stained walls, dilapidated out-buildings, and rickety fence told the story of wealth diminished and family decayed.

On the old-fashioned window-seat of a western window in the spacious parlor, sat Miriam. The last rays of a glorious autumn sunset lighted up the sweet face, and tinged the wavy brown hair with golden tints. The soft hazel eyes are fixed on the glowing sky; the shapely hands fitted rapidly over the knitting-needles; but the clouds were not seen, nor the work heeded. Back, far back had the thoughts wandered. Again she is the petted child of the aristocratic family. Memory recalls the stern, but kind father; the gentle, but helpless mother; the beautiful, imperious, elder sister; the wayward, but warm-hearted, generous brother. Then came the dark days of misfortune; days when the strong man bowed himself, and the grasshopper became a burden; and the weak woman, sinking under her affliction, became as helpless as an infant. Next the sister's marriage, which amounted to alienation, and the brother's downward career. Other troubles were in store for the devoted girl—troubles which rankled none the less because they were silently locked within the heart. The weary years, the patient care and untiring vigils are ended; Miriam Grant is an orphan—worse than brotherless and sisterless. A maintenance must be secured—an honorable situation as a teacher is obtained; but the brother goes from bad to worse, till now he has become wholly dependent on his overtaken sister. Little wonder that in that quiet hour the lone woman questioned the Divine decrees. Why must she, year after year, uphold others, who would so gladly find rest and support?"

The answer came, an angel whisper breathed to the soul: "It is more blessed to give than to receive. Give, and it shall be given to you, good measure, pressed down and shaken together, and running over."

Quieted and strengthened, the lady arose to attend to her evening duties. Glad, young voices were heard in the adjoining room. The pupils whom Miss Grant had watched over the past few years had become greatly endeared. It was no small cross to send them from her, but she felt that it was right. Her school must be closed at the end of the month. The pupils had indulged in a good cry at the news, another tearful scene ensued when the parting hour arrived; but at that moment they were in the full tide of enjoyment. The door connecting the two apartments was thrown open, an eager voice exclaimed:—

"Miss Grant, here is Clara Brown; she has come home. You can't think how pretty she looks; such a nice bonnet and dress! and she says she made them herself."

This orphan child Miriam had educated gratuitously. The past six months had been spent with an aunt, who conducted a fashionable store in Boston. These months had effected a wonderful change in Clara. The tall, awkward, bashful girl had developed into a pretty young lady, with easy, well-bred manners. Her dress, without being expensive or showy, was neat and tasteful. Miss Grant regarded her with satisfaction, and, as she assured her admiring school-mates that she did really and truly make her dress and bonnet herself, a new idea was suggested. Though she had quietly announced her decision to give up her school and receive her brother, the resolution cost her much anxiety. "God will provide;" but she knew that He works through the many contingencies of our daily lives. She knew that she must live by the labor of her hands; but till that moment the future had been completely veiled. Instantaneously it flashed upon her that the long unused shop at the end of the avenue could be fitted up for a dressmaking and millinery establishment. Such a store was needed in the village; she had good taste and ready fingers; with Clara's knowledge they could certainly succeed. While the giddy girls chatted on, the plan grew in Miriam's mind. The deacon had done his youngest daughter the justice to bequeath the remnant of his fortune to her. Application had recently been made for the purchase of a house lot from her garden; Miriam had hesitated, but now she determined to sell in order to obtain the means for her new enterprise.

Clara's concurrence having been obtained, the business was commenced by the sale of the land, and workmen were engaged for the repairs needed at the shop. At the end of the month the building was in order. A week was spent in Boston buying goods; next a modest sign announced to the people of Arrowdale that millinery and dressmaking would be done at Miss Grant's variety store. Many were the doubts expressed by Miriam's neighbors respecting the wisdom of her undertaking; but assured success soon silenced them. The more active life she was compelled to lead, the constant contact with manifold dispositions, the harmless gossip of customers, the chit-chat upon taste and fashion, the becomingness of this and the economy of that, all did the thoughtful Miriam good. It prevented too much retrospection, and hindered her brother's wayward conduct from wearing upon her spirits as it otherwise would have done. For a few weeks after his return, the wretched man behaved very well; but his love for drink overcame his good resolutions. No liquor was sold in the village, and Miriam wisely refused him money. But a victim to intemperance will always find means to minister to his vitiated appetite: by doing odd jobs in his sober moments, Richard picked up a little change; and, though unwilling to bring even a pail of water for his sister, it was no hardship to walk half a dozen miles to procure his favorite beverage.

Miriam was obliged to submit to the evil which she could not overcome. To work with a strong, patient heart for his support; to keep a cheerful home and nice table for him always; to be a pleasant companion for him when sober—a silent, uncomplaining one when he was drunk; a kind nurse in the frequent illness he brought upon himself, and a daily intercessor for him at the Throne of Grace was all that the devoted sister could do, and God alone knew how faithfully her task was done.

It was the afternoon preceding Thanksgiving; Miss Grant's store was thronged; Clara and the two apprentices were wishing for as many hands as had the idol Vishnu. Bonnets in boxes and bonnets on stands crowded the counter; dresses were being tried on and packed; murmurs of dissatisfaction and exclamations of delight, mingled with calls for gloves, laces, ribbons, and all the et cetera or feminine wants. Suddenly the door closed, bonnets were thrown down, goods dropped; with one impulse they rushed to the windows.

"Yes, that is William Wright!"

"I should know Bill anywhere; but he's stouter than he used to be."

"Oh how handsome he is, and so rich!"

"Why, they say he is worth a million—dear me, Miss Grant, he's going in at your front gate."

Every eye was instantly turned to the pale, weary shop woman. Many recollected that before Mr. Wright went South there had been a youthful attachment between the two. With flushed cheeks and trembling limbs, Miriam summoned Clara behind the counter, and hastened to receive her visitor. Worn and weary, with a distressing nervous headache—the result of late hours and over-exertion—the lady was conscious of looking her very worst at the moment of all others when she would have desired to appear young and fresh. He will not recognize me, she thought, as she glanced at the calico morning gown of an exceedingly ugly pattern—which had been taken for a debt, and used because unsalable—and smoothed her luxuriant hair, which in the morning's hurry had been twisted up in the most unbecoming fashion. To add to her mortification, she found Richard stretched on the sofa in a state of semi-intoxication. These adverse circumstances so acted upon Miriam's unstrung nerves that it required a strong will to retain sufficient composure to lift the latch, and salute the stranger.

If any show of sentiment had been anticipated, one glance proved the mistake. By-gones were evidently by-gones; the greeting was friendly, nothing more.

As the gentleman entered he thought—"This is my old flame, my boyish love. Zounds, how old and faded she looks! What a horrible gown!"

The parlor was cold, Miriam was obliged to conduct Mr. Wright to the sitting-room, which, owing to the hurry at the store, did not present its usual inviting aspect. Richard in his maudlin condition was especially disgusting. The cold glances which so critically scanned herself and her surroundings cut Miriam to the heart. Another time it would have aroused her pride, now depressed and fatigued, it only grieved. There were distance and restraint between the former lovers, no one was at ease but tipsy Richard.

Much to Miriam's relief, the call was brief; and she was at liberty to return to her post, but oh, what bitter, bitter feelings, were at her heart! What murmurs filled her thoughts, as she furnished the finery for the morrow's festival. Why was every one happy? why had she been selected for so much misery? why had all a hopeful future except herself? She was aware how wrong these thoughts were, but she was too tired and weak to resist them at the moment; with the simple prayer, "Lord help and forgive," she laid her throbbing head upon her pillow.

Thanksgiving always brings a festive season to a New England village. The return of the wealthy bachelor was the signal for an increase of gayety. Old friends and schoolmates desired to honor their former companion; ambitious mammas were anxious to obtain his favor, and gay belles were delighted to laugh and flirt with such a handsome, agreeable man. Gatherings from the social tea, to the more assuming evening party became frequent. Thus Miriam and Mr. Wright were constantly brought in contact. At first there was merely formal politeness between them: gradually the ice thawed and an easy cordiality marked their intercourse. The gentleman began to drop into Miss Grant's shop of a morning, and he had passed a pleasant evening at a sociable given by Miriam in return for her neighbor's civilities. Meantime, under this cover of friendly courtesy, each was watching and measuring the other's character. Miriam, the love flims removed from her eyes, saw every defect of her former lover.

She began to understand what had been so mysterious—how in the pursuit of wealth and eminence she had been first neglected, then forsaken. She came to understand how his heart and intellect had been brought to bow themselves to the lower purposes of life; how wealth had become a despot instead of a servant, an idol instead of a use. She saw his undue self-esteem, fastidiousness, and pride; she saw also that in many respects he was high souled, moral, honorable, and, unless prejudiced, just. A business man, among business men one to be trusted and honored. A firm upholder of the church, a respectful observer of its outward forms, but alas! too much deadened by love of self and the world to be conscious of any lack of spiritual devotion.

The gentleman watched as closely. He gradually came to the conviction that Miriam Grant was a noble woman, one to honor any company and grace any home. He saw that her womanly beauty was of a higher order than her girlish loveliness; there was more expression, a higher tone of both face and mien. The obnoxious attire had given place to an unexceptionable toilet; no lady could dress in better taste; she might lean to extravagance, but that was a fault he could easily forgive. She was a shade too pious, but that was a failing in the right direction also—an unchristian woman was a monstrosity. He wished she was some half a dozen years younger, but then no one would think her over twenty-five. He would not be hasty, but he was not sure but manly reason would confirm the boyish passion, and Miriam become his wife. So the lady was carefully scanned, while he did the agreeable, played the gallant to old and young, married and single, winning smiles and golden opinions from all.

As was natural, others were watching and commenting. "Did you see Miss Grant's new silk?" asked one young lady of another, as they passed out of the store.

"Was that her dress? I suppose it is for Mrs. Ellis's party. How extravagant she is this winter."

"Mr. Wright's wife will be able to dress in the best, and Miriam evidently aims at that honor," interposed a third lady.

"It is hers by right," responded the first speaker; "but it strikes me she is rather cool towards her old lover."

"That's all art. She is human, though some set her up for a model of perfection."

"Miss Miriam still possesses attraction for Mr. Wright. Watch him; his eyes follow her constantly, though he may be engaged with a dozen other ladies."

"I fancy he would prefer a more youthful bride. Mrs. Ellis intends to secure him for Araminta Jane."

"Yes, that is why this party is given. The new piano arrived last evening."

"How Minta will screech. I pity our poor tympanums. But they will have their labor for their pains. William Wright will never choose a northern wife."

Mr. Ellis' large, new house was brilliant with light, and crowded with the elite of the village and vicinity. Araminta Jane and a few other boarding school misses had exhibited themselves, and their accomplishments as well upon the new piano, and people were showing undisguised symptoms of weariness.

Squire Morse, a real lover of music, begged Miss Grant to play. "Some of the old songs, Miriam," he whispered, as he led her to the instrument.

Why, instead of complying with his request, did the lady select one of the newest and most difficult pieces of the fashionable music scattered over the rack? As her friend had said, Miriam was human, and Mr. Wright had not the least idea of her musical proficiency. Few had, as the old mahogany instrument which had been her mother's, was seldom opened in company, and it was not often she sang in public, other than the psalm tunes at the prayer meeting. For Richard's pleasure she had practised of late, and something prompted her to display her skill. The piano was a fine one; the scene had effected just the degree of excitement to call forth her full power; the piece she chose was striking. People started and ceased talking; all eyes were turned to the player. The new silk was becoming; the fuchsias and myrtle sprays twined amid the glossy brown braids, gave grace to the finely formed head. The small hands, with that one ring, flew over the keys, and the delicate lace shaded while it disclosed her soft, finely moulded arms.

"Never in her girlish days did Miriam Grant look so handsome, so queenlike," mentally ejaculated Mr. Wright, as he edged his way through the throng.

Well did Miriam know, though her eyes had not been lifted, who was beside her. Her heart beat quick, her hour had come, womanly triumph sparkled in her eyes—alas! womanly revenge was at her heart. Regret and penitence followed; but that moment was sweet.

A well-formed, muscular hand was stretched forth as the music was turned; a plain gold ring on the little finger flashed in the light. The lady raised her eyes, the gentleman smiled, and whispered: "Thank you for wearing mine; play some of the old tunes, Mirry."

With her grace, music, and conversational power, Miriam had carried the palm. For the first time in her life she had striven to shine, and she had succeeded. Miss Grant with her twenty-nine years was pronounced the belle of the evening. Mr. Wright had decided Miriam was worthy to be his wife.

"Miriam, I am engaged for a dinner-party to-morrow; it is given in my honor by the merchants of H——; but I shall return early. Can you spare me an hour in the evening? I have much to say to you."

The request was granted; and Mr. Wright, having escorted home a bevy of beauties, retired with satisfaction.

Miriam sat a long time by the smouldering fire; a sore conflict raged within—one of those soul battles, which are more terrible than any outward contest; but the fight was fought and the victory won. Strength was given her to walk by the spirit, and angels came and ministered unto her.

"I am later than I intended, Miriam; but I was detained longer than I expected at H——. There were so many compliments paid to your humble friend."

There was little humility in the air with which Mr. Wright seated himself. Miriam, pale and collected, a prayer in her heart, and a sad tenderness in her eyes, inquired respecting the dinner party.

"You will read the report in the papers; we will not talk of that now. Tell me of the past; I wish to learn the particulars of your parent's death."

Miriam recollected that the intelligence had been sent at the time (they had died in the same week), and that the letter was never answered. She did not revert to the neglect, but briefly and with emotion gave the required information. Enough was said to show her auditor how much she had suffered—and suffered alone. Conscience whispered this ought not to have been.

"Miriam, I ought to have been more sympathizing; but I had position and fortune to gain; for years every instant has been claimed by business demands. My efforts, I am happy to say, have met with a just reward. My wife will hold an enviable situation—you promised to fill that place years ago. Will not the future make ample amends for the past?"

Miriam felt that it could not. Nothing could recompense her for what she had endured—it could only be atonement; but she saw that Mr. Wright was incapable of understanding her feelings, and that the moiety of heart he would give to any woman was wholly hers, and raising her eyes to his with tremulous lips, she murmured, "And Richard?"

"Let him go to the almshouse. It is the fittest place for him!"

"Never while I live!"

With a surprised look, the gentleman demanded "if she could expect him to receive into his family such an inmate as Richard?"

"No; and, therefore, I see clearly I can be only your friend."

"Miriam, this is too Quixotic; Richard will never be reformed."

"I neither hope nor expect it. That does not render my duty less clear and obligatory."

"This is sheer insanity. Have not I a claim as well as Richard?"

"No; once you had, but that is abrogated by your neglect—desertion."

"Miriam, you do not understand—"

"Neither do you comprehend. Once our paths lay together; you turned aside and chose your route; mine I was forced to tread. We have widely diverged—a great gulf yawns between; it is impossible for us to unite. I cannot, I ought not to be your wife; it would not be a true marriage."

The gentleman gazed wonderingly into those clear, resolute eyes. "Did I hear aright—this woman rejecting me?" he thought.

"Miriam, do I understand rightly, do you refuse to become my wife?"

"You must forgive me if I say yes."

Mr. Wright had never dreamed of opposition; but he never allowed obstacles to stand between him and his wishes. In a tenderer voice he said: "I will see what can be done for Richard."

"That cannot change my decision. If Richard was to die within the hour, I could not marry you, William. As I have said, no true union can exist between us."

The suitor would not listen. A brilliant picture of what might be hers was portrayed. The lady did not waver, but her tone was kinder as she replied:—

"I know you could give me the means of much culture and enjoyment. Sometimes the old love would exert itself, and I should be intensely happy; but womanly reason would assert its sway and render me restless and dissatisfied. I will not censure your thoughts and aims, but I cannot share them. Pardon me, William, I must be truthful. I cannot stand before the altar and vow before God to reverence you as a woman should reverence her husband. Your friend I shall always be, but nothing more."

Mr. Wright saw that opposition was useless; his doom was sealed. In the presence of this high-souled, keen-sighted, conscientious woman he was powerless.

"Miriam, will you never regret this? Will you not take time to consider?"

"I have considered; time can make no change. Please urge me no farther."

A silent hand pressure, and Mr. Wright found himself in the street.

"Refused, refused by Miriam Grant!" There was a strange ringing in his ears—a confusion of every faculty. Hundreds of younger and prettier women would accept him any day. Why should he care? Let the old-maid have her whims. He had done his duty—made the amende honorable.

With superfluous energy his trunk was packed, and his name booked for the early stage. Before sunrise the following morning, the disappointed suitor was on his way to the sunny South.

Henceforth Miriam went on evenly and prosperously in her occupation, without the slightest allusion that might satisfy curiosity in regard to her lover's sudden departure, doing every duty that presented itself, and bearing with her brother's increasing moral and physical weakness as best she might.

Mr. Wright also resumed his former life, but with the firm determination to marry. This, however, he found no easy matter; it was impossible to make a satisfactory choice. One lady was too tall; another too short; still another too stout, and a fourth too slender. One had black eyes when they should have been blue, and vice versa; one dressed too much; another not enough; one was too learned; another really ignorant; a third displayed false teeth; a fourth talked too loud. So months passed, and the wealthy bachelor grew stronger and richer in the eyes of men, and poorer and weaker in the "Eye that seeth not as man seeth."

"O, Miss Miriam, Mr. Richard has come home so bad! Do come! he's throwing things all round the kitchen. I'm afeared he's got the deliriums."

Miriam cast aside the goods she was folding, and hastened to the house with her frightened handmaid. Her worst fears were realized. The time for which she had long been waiting had come. Richard was a raving maniac. A terrible scene ensued—too terrible to be depicted. The delirium continued eight days; then the wretched man sank into a helplessness as great as that of infancy. Reason had returned, and though the patient needed constant care, it was a season of comparative repose to the weary watchers at his bedside. Great kindness was displayed throughout the neighborhood at this time of trouble. There was no lack of manly service, and those female friends that had been the most forward to animadvert upon Miriam's conduct, became her most efficient aids. The sympathy increased when it was found that, though Richard might regain partial health, he would never have the full use of his limbs, and that henceforth he must be a cripple. No one could question the justice of his punishment; still one could not fail to commiserate the sufferer. The sweetest flowers, the gentlest tones, and most cheerful faces brightened his room. The untiring sister kept constant ward and watch, and the invalid improved rapidly.

Miriam's most ardent desire had become realized. In his enfeebled condition it would be easy to keep Richard from an undue use of stimulants; the prayers of years had been answered. The power she had sighed for was hers, but she could only bow tearfully and submissively before Him, who has declared that His ways are not our ways.

The fretfulness of the first stages of weakness settled into an apathy that bordered on sullenness, but as the weeks passed, and body and mind improved, thought and feeling became perceptibly quickened. The patient sister watched every mood, and in her cheerful manner encouraged confidence and inspired hope. At last Richard was able to move about on crutches, and Miriam resumed some care of the store. The fall season had come, and its hurry, combined with what she had previously undergone, began to tell seriously upon her constitution. One dull November afternoon, incapacity cited by a headache from tending the store, she took home half a dozen bonnets which she had promised to trim that day. Richard had been apparently sleeping in his chair, but suddenly he reached out his hand and exclaimed, "Mirry, give me that bonnet, you are making an exceedingly ugly bow. I can better it. Move the stand here; give me the pins; I'll trim the whole batch while you take a snooze in my easy chair. Do as I bid, I tell you. I've been ordered around long enough; I'm going to take the command now."

Miriam smiled. "You wont make the hat fashionable, I'm afraid."

"Give me the fashion plates, then; don't you doubt I have as good taste as any lady can desire. Just free your mind and go to sleep."

Miriam felt that she was indeed incapable of work, so putting the materials before her brother, she turned the easy chair from the light and settled herself for a nap. As she did so she heard Richard muttering, "It is profitable for thee that one of thy members perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell." When Miriam awoke she found Richard contemplating the row of bonnets he had trimmed.

"I'm going to set up an opposition line, Mirry," he said in answer to her expression of admiration. "The only way to prevent it is to take me into partnership, and hand over to me this sort of rig in future."

As Miriam found it pleased and interested her brother she allowed him to have his own way, and in a short time he became chief oracle in many matters pertaining to the artistic part of her business. She found him a valuable assistant in keeping her accounts, making out bills, and advising her in financial matters, in which his masculine nature and experience had made him more especially wary.

Squire Morse also solicited his assistance, and towards the close of the year he was employed by the thriving firm of Ellis & Co. to settle their accounts. For several weeks Mr. Ellis took him in his sleigh to the comb factory every morning. The fresh air and exercise, the bustle and novelty of the establishment were exceedingly beneficial to the invalid, while his mind and heart, liberated from the mists of sin, became literally born again. One evening in mid-winter he asked his sister if she could spare him the apartment she had formerly used as a school room. Miriam gladly replied in the affirmative, and inquired if he did not wish it refurnished. "Thanks, sister, I will provide what I need. You know I am a moneyed man now."

Miriam smiled; glad that her brother was well and happy, she took little note of his proceedings till the setting of a stove, and the arrival of some unfamiliar tools attracted her attention; but as Richard seemed to wish for secrecy she made no remark. The room now became a sort of Blue Beard chamber to the household. Strange noises issued from it, an incessant sawing, tinkering, and hammering. There were frequent consultations with Mr. Hines the blacksmith, and constant visits to his shop. Miriam's curiosity had arrived at the highest pitch, when, one June morning, it was announced that Richard Grant had made a wonderful discovery in mechanics, one that would greatly improve the comb machines, and which could be applied to other machinery. A patent secured he would have a competence. A patent was obtained, but Richard did not sink into idleness. He was made a partner in the firm he had so efficiently aided. He invented other improvements in machinery, became a respected and noted man, a benefactor to the poor and sinful, and a meek follower of Christ. The old house was thoroughly repaired, and again resumed its rank among the aristocratic mansions of the neighborhood. The stables were rebuilt, a horse and carriage purchased, and everything done that could conduce to Miriam's comfort. Miriam would not yield to Richard's wish that she should relinquish business. She preferred independence, but she promised to take time for rest and recreation, and always held herself in readiness to ride or converse with her brother. The cheerful tranquillity so grateful to the over-taxed girl was soon interrupted. News came that Rachel was in great affliction. This sister had not scrupled to leave Miriam with the sole care of her parents at a time of great adversity. In the prosperity which her marriage secured, she entirely neglected her younger brother and sister; for years there had been no intercourse between them. Richard's rising fame first induced Mrs. Long to break this silence. A correspondence was accordingly commenced some two months prior to the arrival of a letter informing them of Mr. Long's failure in business and subsequent illness; it closed with a weak, childish appeal for assistance.

Richard was opposed to Miriam's going to her sister. "She had never solicited her company in health, why should she wish it in sickness? She had left her to combat the ills of life alone; it was just that now she should bear her burden without too much aid and sympathy."

Richard was but a beginner in the regenerate life. Miriam had practised the Christian precept "to resist not evil," too many years to swerve from duty now. The next evening after the receipt of Rachel's letter she reached her sister's sumptuous abode—the abode at that moment of death, poverty, and despair. The funeral over it was found that the childless widow was penniless. She did not have the slightest idea of helping herself, but sank in tearful despair upon the charity of her hitherto despised brother and sister. Poverty and shattered health wrought a great change in the gay, fashionable woman which did not contribute to the happiness of those around her. The reply of Miriam's young domestic to a query from Mrs. Ellis depicted her character.

"Oh, Mrs. Long is dreadful aggravating. You can't do right no how. If we've applesauce she wishes it was cranberry, and if it's cranberry she wishes 'twas apple. Then she makes such a fuss about religion; it's well there aint many such pious folks, or the world would be worse than it is. She seems to think if she goes to so many meetings, and says so many prayers, she has a right to be just as lazy and ugly as the old Harry the rest of the time, and hector the rest of the family upon their sinfulness. If Miss Miriam wasn't a saint she couldn't put up with her as she does. Mr. Richard isn't so patient. He says she is his one great cross; that it is as much, as he can do to keep from swearing twenty times a day. But Mrs. Ellis, I expect we will get rid of her pretty soon. She is dreadful sweet upon the rich widower that has bought the Howe place. You'd laugh to see her; butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, and she's so lonesome. I guess she'll get him. Such good-for-nothing women always do catch the men."

Hetty was right. In less than a year Mrs. Long became Mrs. Adams, and again took her place at the head of a handsome establishment. Her new connections and prospects entirely obliterated her troubles from her memory, but it was no part of her policy to disown her relatives. "My sister, Miss Grant, and my brother, the great inventor," were quoted abroad and at home, in season and out of season.

A noble steamer was ploughing the moonlit waves. Its crowd of passengers were eagerly anticipating a reunion with home and friends. Rapidly sped the ship; brighter grew languid eyes, more buoyant became weary hearts.

The old and young were there, the sick and the poor, the healthy and prosperous. Stewart Yankees returning with their pile of gold to settle near the old homestead; disappointed invalids despoiled of health and wealth; bereaved widows on their way to seek again the shelter of the parental roof; strict descendants of the Puritans, and Catholic sisters of Charity, ambitious politicians, busy merchants, fast young men, coquettish young ladies, anxious mammas, crying children, scolding nurses, men, women and children of every nation, color and degree.

Conspicuous among this mass of humanity was the distinguished merchant and rising member of Congress the Hon. William Wright. This evening the great man had been enjoying his cigar upon deck. The cool night wind swept his brow, and as midnight approached and the throng dispersed he leaned back, and with eyes fixed on the tropical stars, counted his gains, and looked confidently into a still more enviable future. Like the rich man in the parable, he said: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; eat, drink, and be merry."

But hark! What is the cry that rises on the still night? He does not hear aright—it is a fanciful illusion. No, horror! no! the ear has not been deceived. "Fire! fire!" rings out clear and shrill. Fifty voices reiterate the cry:—

"The ship is on fire!"

Then comes shriek on shriek and wail on wail; the direst despair and the wildest confusion. Five hundred human beings, a burning ship beneath, a wild waste of waters around, a midnight sky above.

A momentary pause of terror and dismay; then strong, manly hearts, with the noble generosity that cares first for the weak and helpless, spring forward to launch a boat. This done, women and children are quickly and orderly passed over the side. Thank God! the last is on board! crowded and shivering, still they have a chance for life; it will be easier to die knowing this. From the first alarm Mr. Wright had been prominent for his calmness and forethought. With that kindness and heroism which had gained him so many friends when a boy, he had assisted to place the ladies in the boat; that done, he looked about to ascertain the best means of securing his own safety. The prospect was sufficiently dubious; but with marked coolness he commenced directing the construction of a raft. Under an inefficient captain, discipline had long since ceased; but men instinctively obey one who has the power to command, and every direction of the firm, collected man was hastily obeyed. Intrepidity cannot resist the power that now holds mastery. Onward sweep the devouring flames. The work cannot be carried on; each man must trust to himself and his God. There are cries, groans, and shrieks; wild, imploring prayers and silent appeals for mercy. The boldest infidel in that awful hour acknowledged a higher Power to help and save.

Securing his life-preserver around him, Mr. Wright lowered himself from the ship's bow, and swam to a door that was floating at no great distance. Alone, with only a frail board between himself and eternity, the millionaire sank down fainting and hopeless. What then was all his wealth? What the thoughts, hopes, and projects of the past fifteen years? Worthless—worse than worthless! At that moment his soul was compelled to confess its poverty. Outwardly he possessed untold treasures; inwardly he was poor, naked, and miserable. Much goods had he for earth, but what for Heaven? "Lord, pity and forgive!" cried the penitent, as he laid him down to die. Suddenly a voice sounded in his ear.

"Willie, did you eat mamma's jelly?"

It was his mother's voice, and his first falsehood; the lie that had burthened his youthful conscience, but which had not been recalled for years, rose vividly to mind. Then came his mother's corse, the coffin and pall, the darkened room, and sable-clad mourners. To this closely succeeded the new home, the sadness and desolation of the lonely orphan. A fair vision arose: an angel, the boy then thought, came winding her soft arms around his neck, pressing her red lips to his, and lisping with a sweet voice: "Do not cry, Willie; Mirry will love you." Now came the old brown schoolhouse at the corner; again he saw the wide fire-place; the notched, unpainted desks; the mistress in summer with her thimble; the master in winter with the heavy oaken ferrule. Ever by his side, through good and evil report, stood the fair-haired, bright eyed little comforter, with her shield of love and gentleness. Childhood expanded into youth, the twain advanced to the white Academy on the hill. New feelings developed in both hearts; they were no longer children—still the maiden promised love.

Sorrow came; the young head was bowed; the bright eyes were dimmed. She must rely upon him. He would go out into the world and win wealth and fame. She must never doubt, only love and trust. The tender eyes grew bright; the little head rested more confidently on his bosom. Years went by—years of hurry and struggle; the youth was rising in wealth and power. What was the simple village girl to him? This love was a childish whim to be cast aside with other boyish fancies. Surely such a contract was not binding. If he ceased notice, maintained silence, she would soon forget him. Then, as the panorama moved on, he saw a pale girl glide silently down the wide stairs, and slip stealthily out of the hall door as post-time came. Still no letter. The pale face grew rigid; resolution came into the sad eyes; the listless, aimless, expectant life was cast aside; the dependent, loving girl passed into the self-reliant, energetic woman. One last advance was made—a mere act of courtesy to inform him of his old friend's decease. What fiend prompted him not to answer that letter?

Groaning with sorrow and despair, the wretched man murmured: "Mirry, I comprehend you now. There is a great gulf between us; we cannot be united. I am as far below thee as hell from heaven—never in this world, never, oh, never in the world to come! Separated forever! an eternity without her; without anything better or purer than my own selfish, sinful, world-bound soul!"

Indescribable anguish filled the heart of the perishing man. There was a benumbing of every sense; he could neither see nor think.

A fearful blank ensued; then he became conscious that people were around him; next he knew that he was on a vessel's deck. Three days had passed, and the rescued man stepped once more on terra firma. Pale and weak, he made his way to his hotel. Many matters required instant attention, and with his usual celerity these were dispatched. The evening after his arrival found him on board a "sound steamer," and twenty-four hours later, he entered the environs of Arrowdale. The swift cars, since his last visit, had superseded the slower mail coach; and, as he stood in the spruce, new depot, he felt as a stranger in a strange place. No one recognized him, and, with a mazy, dream-like feeling, he walked up the principal street.

Everything seemed changed. Was that handsome establishment the Grant mansion? He had heard of Richard's reform; he must have repaired the buildings. Opening the iron gate that had replaced the rickety wooden one, he passed up the paved walk, ascended the stone steps, and stood under the handsome modern portico.

One of the linen window shades was drawn partly up; the lamp shone brightly on the clear plate-glass, disclosing the pleasant scene within. The autumn night was chill; a bright wood fire burned in the polished stove, before it in her low chair sat Miriam. The centre-table was drawn up, her writing-desk was by her side. A note had been received that afternoon from Mr. Clark, the minister; it must be answered. What should she say? He was a good, talented, handsome man; he was fond of her; Richard favored the match; why could she not love him? "Oh, Willie! Willie!" burst from her overburdened heart.

The door opened.

"Have you farther news from the steamer, Richard—have you the evening paper?"

No answer.

Miriam turned; the telegraph had informed her that Mr. Wright was among the saved. She knew that it was not his spirit, though very pale and haggard was the face that met her gaze. With that quick, electric glance which gives us a slight revelation of the intercourse it will be ours to enjoy when disenthralled from this earthly body, eye spoke to eye, soul recognized soul; and, as the fainting form was pressed in the trembling, clasping arms, Mr. Wright solemnly murmured: "Mirry, the deaf hears, the blind has received sight, the dead is alive again, the lost is found."

"So Miriam Grant is going to marry William Wright after all. I always said she would if she had a chance."

"She would never have consented if he had not changed so much. There is little resemblance between the William Wright of to-day and the William Wright who made such a sensation here a few winters ago."

True; how beautiful it was to see her go to communion on Sunday between her brother and lover. They will make but one family, I am told—will still reside in the old house. Miriam will accompany her husband to Washington this winter, and Clara will continue the store and keep house for Richard. I suspect we shall have another wedding in the spring. I suppose the Armitage girls will eventually have the store. No doubt they will succeed nicely. All of her apprentice girls have done well.

"Yes; people may say what they please about the ungratefulness of this world, and duty's not meeting its reward. I have come to the conclusion that it is best to do whatever we see to be clearly right, and leave the reward to Him who giveth rain to the just and unjust. Miriam Grant has received that which is promised to the good and faithful servant. It is right that we should rejoice and sympathize with this entrance into her joy."

HALLOWED BE THY NAME.

(See Plate.)

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD.

"OUR Father—Hallowed be Thy Name!"
O Holy Name, of Love Divine!
What human heart can be Thy shrine,
What lips to worship Thee may claim?

For in Thy sacred Word we learn,
The spirit of a little child,
Ere yet by earth and sin beguiled,
Thy kingdom only can discern.

Misled by cares and pleasures vain,
We give to earth our thoughts and powers:
The light of childhood's happy hours
Is dimmed by clouds of doubt and pain.

Yet courage take, O fainting heart!
Nor yield thee to thy sad dismay;
The Lord hath found thee words to pray;
He bids thy doubts and fears depart.

"Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done!"
Thus when thou prayest, labor still
To bow before the Father's Will—
And thou shalt be indeed a son.

His life is prayer, who truly prays.
Who asks must give. Who looks to Heaven
Forgives, that he may be forgiven,
And seeketh God in all his ways.

Who turns him from temptation's snare,
And in the Saviour's pathway bright
Walks by the Spirit's guiding light,
Is of the Father heard in prayer.

If thus our hearts and lives we frame,
Thus praying live, and living pray,
Our constant language, day by day,
Is "Father, Hallowed be Thy Name!"

LINES TO ———.

LET me at thy footstool kneeling,
Lay my head upon thy knee,
Feeling that earth's best emotion
Is the joy of loving thee!

Shut not up my life in darkness,
It is night without thy smile;
Let the sunshine of thy favor
Light my pathway yet awhile.

Is there doubt or dull indifference?
Is there coldness in thy heart?
Is thine anger stirred against me?
Doth it rend our lives apart?

Cease, O heart! be still thy throbbing!
Cease this turmoil in my breast!
Or if death, forgiving Father,
Take, oh take me to thy rest!

CHAPTER XVII.

"How gay Mrs. Hammond has grown lately!" said Mrs. Greyling, the fashionable critic of the — House drawing-room. "Do you see that she is actually waltzing to-night? She moves well, too! That pearl-colored moire antique is handsome, and must have cost every cent of nine dollars a yard. She is partial to heavy silks, it seems. It gives an air of sameness to her dress; otherwise she shows very tolerable taste."

"I have heard it said that she was a regular dowdy before she was married," observed Mrs. Parton, who was also on the "committee of censure"—a self-appointed organization, which found ample employment in this crowded nest of pleasure-seekers. "Her husband is perpetually making her presents, and she dresses to please him."

"Humph! I distrust these pattern couples! 'My husband doesn't approve of my doing this—won't hear of my acting so!' are phrases easily learned, and sound so fine that one soon falls into the habit of using them. What a flirt Mr. Benson is! That is the fifth young man she has danced with this evening. I pity her husband and baby!"

"He does not look inconsolable! I tell you what my notion is: He may love his wife—of course he does—but he admires her sister more. See how he watches her! Mrs. Tomes told me that she was standing near him the first time Mrs. Hammond waltzed, and that he seemed real worried. When the set was through, she came to look for a seat, and he got one for her. As she took it, he said something to her. Mrs. Tomes could not hear, but she laughed out in his face as saucy as could be, and said: 'Oh, I am learning when I am in Rome to do as Romans do! Doesn't my elder sister set me the example?'"

"He could say nothing then," said Mrs. Greyling. "Those girls played their cards well. The Hunts have very little, if anything, besides the father's salary, and the family was very obscure."

Mrs. Greyling's paternal progenitor was an opulent soap-boiler, who was not ashamed, during her childhood, to drive an unsavory cart from one kitchen door to another. But he counted his thousands now by the hundred, and his children ranked, as a consequence, among the "upper ten."

She continued her charitable remarks: "Somehow the old lady contrived to keep up the appearance of wealth, and married both daughters off before their second season. Mr. Benson is reputed to be rich; but for that matter these Southern planters are all said to be rolling in gold. Mr. Hammond is certainly making money. Mr. Greyling says he is a splendid business man."

"He sailed for Europe a week ago, you know?"

"Yes; and since then Madame has been the belle of the ball. The old story—'When the cat is away, the mice will play.'"

"Sarah," said Philip, an hour later, "will you walk on the balcony with me? You are heated, and the air is balmy as Georgian breezes. It will do you good."

"Are you going to scold me?" she asked, archly, before she would take his arm.

"No. I have no right to do it if I had the disposition."

There was no moon; but the sky was strewed thickly with stars, and the white foam of the surf caught and held tremulously the sparkles from the bright watchers above. Philip did not appear disposed to converse, and Sarah waited for him to begin. Meanwhile they strolled on and on, until the murmur of the ocean was louder than the music of the saloon band. The sea moaned to the stars, as it had done to the sunless July heavens on that day so memorable in the history of one of the pair—the day of shipwreck stories and a real shipwreck—none the less disastrous, that the treasures and their loss were hidden from all but the bereaved one.

To many it is appointed to lead two lives: to think and feel as well as act a double part;

to separate, as inexorably as human will can decree, past hopes and joys—past sorrows, and, if practicable, past memories from the thoughts and emotions of the to-day in which they exist. Thousands keep up the barrier until death ends the need of watchfulness and labor; the coffin-lid covers the faithful mask that has smiled so patiently and so long above an aching heart. Yet dammed up passion is a dangerous thing. If hearts were so constituted that they could be drained like pestilential marshes, the flood conducted off in harmless and straight channels, then, indeed, might hypocrisy rejoice, and sleek decorum sit down at ease. As it is, genteel propriety and refined reticence are perpetually endangered by the unforeseen swell of some intermittent spring, or the thawing of some ice-bound stream, that is liable to over-leap or tear away the dyke—engulfing in an instant the elaborate structures years of toil have cheaply purchased.

Such was the moment when, withdrawing her hand from Philip's arms, Sarah struck suddenly—fiercely—upon her breast, and cried: "Oh! why cannot I die and end this misery!"

"Sarah!"

"I say I can bear it no longer! Others do not suffer thus! If they do, they die, or lose their reason. I will not endure it, I tell you!"

"Sister!"

"Do not call me by that name, Philip Benson! You know better!"

She leaned forward on the balcony railing, her eyes fixed on the sea. Her deep, hurried breathing was like the pant of some worried animal, gathering strength, and, with it, courage for renewed conflict. To her last words the mysterious plaint of the sea lent meaning. Philip, too, remembered that barren shore, the tumbling breakers, the solitary sea-bird's labored flight landward. Was this his work? It was but a flicker of truth—dashed out the next second by a blow of indignant will.

"You may forbid me to address you by this title, Sarah; but you cannot hinder me from sympathizing in your sorrow, and trying to befriend you. If my companionship is unwelcome, allow me to conduct you to your room. I cannot leave you alone here, where there is continual passing."

"You are right. Regard for appearances is the one thing needful," she said, mockingly. "I must be a dull scholar, if I have not learned that. I am sane again now—fit to associate with other sane people. If you please, we will go to the ball room instead of up stairs. I am not a candidate for solitary confinement yet!"

"Mrs. Hammond, I heard a gentleman inquiring anxiously for you just now!" called out a lady, in passing. "He said that you promised to dance with him."

"I did. Thank you for reminding me. A little faster, my good brother!"

She hurried him into the saloon, where they were met immediately by her would-be partner. Philip, bewildered and uneasy, watched her motions through the evolutions of the dance. She talked rapidly and animatedly, keeping her cavalier in a broad smile, and confirming her lately won reputation of a wit. Her eyes shone; her color was high; she was "really handsome"—as the "censure committee" had occasion to remember at a later day, when it was spoken of in a very different tone from that employed by a member of this distinguished sisterhood in addressing Mrs. Hunt on this night.

"You are a fortunate mother, my dear madam, to have two such brilliant daughters. They eclipse the girls entirely."

"I have nothing to complain of in my children, ma'am. I done—I did my best by them, and they have repaid me a thousandfold."

"Now, I am ready!" said Sarah to her brother-in-law. "I release you, Mr. Burley!" waving her hand to her late attendant as a princess might to a courtier.

Vexed and disturbed by her unsettled manner and queer freaks, Philip gave her his arm, and conducted her through the throng.

"Lewis has had fair winds, and must now be nearing the end of his voyage," he remarked, as they sauntered along the piazza.

"Ah! he is on the sea to-night! How strange! I had not thought of that!"

"I see nothing wonderful in the idea, as he has not had time to cross the Atlantic since he left these shores," returned Philip, dryly. "The oddest thing I can think of at present is yourself, Sarah!"

"I am aware of that, Philip. Do not speak harshly to me! You may be sorry for it some day." They were at her door. Her softened manner moved him, and as she offered her hand, he took it with fraternal warmth.

"Forgive me, if I was rough! I have not understood you this evening."

"It is not likely that you ever will. Time was—but it is folly to allude to that now! Think of me as kindly as you can—will you? You have wounded me sometimes, but never knowingly. I cannot say that of many others with whom I have had dealings. Good-night."

The little parlor was still. Mrs. Hammond never kept her maid up to assist in her disrobing, if she intended remaining out until a late hour. Nurse and child were quiet in the adjacent nursery. Closing the door of communication, Sarah stripped her hair and arms of their ornaments; took off her diamond pin, then her rings, and laid them away in her jewelry case; divested herself of her rich dress, and drew from her wardrobe a plain, dark wrapper, which she put on. Next she sat down at her writing-desk, selected a sheet of paper, and wrote a single line—when a thought struck her, and she stopped. A momentary irresolution ended in her tearing off a strip containing what she had penned, and holding it in the flame of the lamp until it was consumed. "Best not! best not!" she muttered. "Doubt may bring comfort to the one or two who will need it. Let them doubt! Save appearances if you can, my poor mother would say." A smile of unutterable scorn glimmered over her face. She pushed away the desk and walked to the window.

From the distant ball-room the throbbing waves of music still rolled past on the summer air, and blent with them was the solemn undertone of the surf. Did men call its mighty voice a monotone? To her it was eloquent of many and awful things—not frightful. What was there of terror in thoughts of rest, endless sleep, rocked for ages by the rising and falling tide, hushed into dreamless repose by the music of the billows? No more of a vain and wearisome life; no more baffled aspirations and crushed affections; no more disheartening attempts to find and reach the right—to follow in the steep, rugged path of duty, and shun the easy, alluring way to which heart and memory were ever pointing; no more of stern rebuke and sneering taunt; no more galled pride and outraged womanhood; no more lying gayety, smiles, and repartee, when the spirit was writhing in impotent agony, longing to shriek out its intensity of woe! Only sleep, rest, peace! "Sleep! rest! peace!" She gasped the words feverishly, as they seemed to come to her on the breeze. Might she not seek these now! now! Not yet! The grounds, the beach were still populous with groups of strollers. She would be seen—perhaps recognized—probably frustrated in her purpose. Leaning her head against the casement, she sat there an hour—not debating, still less wavering in her resolve, only waiting until flight would be safe—and thinking! thinking! thinking! until her brain whirled.

had hers been from its beginning. Denied food suitable for her mental and spiritual need, denied sympathy, air, and expression of suffering, under the slow torture of this starvation, every avenue to goodness and liberty hedged up, and for the future temptation, repudiation, loneliness, perhaps a sullied name—who could dispute her right to try release by one brief pang she alone would feel? Who would miss her? Not the world that flattered her wealth and wit, her laces, silks, and diamonds; not the mother and sister who worshipped the gilded Juggernaut "Society;" not he who was that night sleeping soundly on the same sea that would embosom her in her sweeter, deeper slumber. Shocked he might be at an event so unexpected and uncommon. His next sensation would be relief at his deliverance from a burden, at his freedom to come and go as he liked—no longer banished by her obstinacy and his own. He had loved her as most other men do their wives—a bond too weak to bear a heavy blow at their self-love. She had sinned beyond forgiveness in his eyes.

Of Philip she thought with a mingling of tenderness and resentment. His unthinking gallantry had been the root of her sorest trouble; but it was unthinking, not wilful wrong. Nor was she the only sufferer. His heart was well nigh as hungry as hers. Within the past week, she had seen this more clearly than ever before, and he had felt it! Lucy's narrow mind, her insipidity, her inordinate vanity, her selfish idolatry of pleasures that wearied him; her disrelish for intellectual and domestic enjoyments, displayed in its most objectionable form, in her indifference to his company, and her neglect of her child—these were working out their legitimate result in his alienation from her, and attraction towards the once slighted sister, whose large heart and mental gifts he now valued at their true worth. To repel him, as much as to drown her cares, Sarah had plunged into the vortex she had heretofore avoided. She had heard that there was temporary solace in this species of dissipation. The cup was, for her, sparkless and bitter from surface to dregs.

She was saving him with herself by this final step! He would realize his truth in the throes that would shake his soul when he found that she was gone; perhaps, even in that anguished hour, would bless her for having showed to him, while she drove him back from, the abyss they were together approaching. It was no idle vaunt she had made to

Lewis, that the principles inherited from her father would save her from overt sin. Thus, thus would she flee the temptation when the heart had left the will to battle unaided.

Her father! the gray old man who was toiling through this summer's heat, in his deserted home, as he had through so many summers gone! he who had never given her an impatient or angry word—whose pride and joy she still was! The stroke would be severe upon him. Yet he would not refuse comfort. There were still left to him his boys—fine, manly fellows; Jeannie and his baby-grandchild—his lost daughter's gift. Tears rushed into the hot, wild eyes with this last image, but she would not let them flow. "Is it not better that I should leave her now, when the parting will give her no pain, when one little week will blot out my memory entirely from her mind, than to wait until she can recollect and miss me?"

The music had ceased. The revellers had dropped away faster than they had collected, when once the movement was made to retire. The murmur of the deep was the only sound abroad; the stars were the only sentinels. Sarah arose, threw a shawl over her head, and cautiously unlocked the door. A strong rush of air blew it from her hold, and as she caught it, to draw it after her, she trod upon some object lying on the floor. Mechanically she stooped to pick it up. It was an infant's shoe, a dainty little gaiter, that peeped, during the day, from beneath Baby Belle's white skirt. To Sarah's touch it seemed that the lining still retained the warmth of the child's foot.

Never, oh never, was the patter of those baby feet to make glad music for the mother's ear! Others must guide and sustain her trial steps; others smooth her daily path; others direct the inexperience of the girl in the perilous passes where that mother had fallen and perished!

"Oh, may I not bless her before I leave her forever?" she cried to stern Resolution. And Conscience rejoined, with meaning severity: "Is it you who would breathe a blessing above her purity?"

"Suffer me, then, to take the farewell look I dared not grant myself before."

And while Resolution faltered at the impassioned appeal, she opened the nursery door and stole to the side of the crib. The night-lamp shed a feeble halo over the table whereon it stood. The rest of the room was in darkness. Mary's light bedstead was close to the crib. Was hers that hard, short breathing, that sent a start and chill through the hearer? A touch to the lamp threw a blaze of light over nurse and child. A sharp cry rang through the chamber. "Mary! Mary! get up!"

The girl sprang to the floor before she comprehended the meaning of the alarm. Mrs. Hammond had sunk into a chair beside the crib, from which she had snatched her infant. Baby Belle's head was strained back; her hands clenched; her limbs stiffened in a deathlike spasm. The eyes were rolled out of sight under the lids; and the four little teeth—her "most precious pearls," the fond mother had called them—were hard-locked within the purple lips.

Terrified as she was, Mary had the presence of mind to run for assistance. Mrs. Hunt and a physician were soon on the spot, and every appliance of the healing art that promised relief to the sufferer was used, but with partial effect. Sarah saw nothing but the child; heard nothing but the doctor's calm orders.

"You do not try to help her!" she said, impatiently, as a convulsion, more fearful than any that had preceded it, seized the delicate frame.

"I could not do more, were it my own child, madam!"

He was an elderly man, whose charity for fashionable mothers was very scant, and, having seen Mrs. Hammond in the ball-room the evening before, he was not prepared for the solicitude she manifested.

"You had better let the nurse take her!" he said, more gently, as Sarah, with difficulty, held down the struggling hands that might do hurt to the head and face.

"No! I will have no one touch her but myself!"

The morning broke, the day heightened into noon, and the paroxysms only abated in violence as the babe's strength declined. Steadfast to her word, the mother had not once resigned her. She had herself immersed her in the warm baths, applied the poultices, and administered the medicines prescribed. Mrs. Hunt was compassionate and active; Mary sorrowful, and prompt with whatever service she could perform; Lucy frightened and idle.

Philip, who had often been in the outer room to make inquiries and offer aid, if any were required of him, was told, just before sunset, that he could go into the chamber. Mrs. Hunt invited him, and the information she added gave to his countenance a look of heartfelt sadness, as he followed her. Sarah sat in the middle of the room, so altered that he could scarcely credit the fact of her identity with the being he had parted from the previous night. Her eyes were sunken, her features sharpened, and her complexion had the dead, grayish hue of an old woman's. In her arms lay the babe, and, as she crouched over it, her mien of defiant protection suggested to him the idea of an unnatural savage guarding her young. He could not say whether or not she was aware of his presence until he knelt by the dying child and called it by name.

"Baby Belle, do you know Uncle Philip?"

The dark eyes, soft still through the gathering film, moved slightly, and Sarah said—

"Speak to her again!"

"Will Baby Belle come to uncle?"

This time there was no sign of consciousness. The wee hands clasped in the mother's grew colder and colder, and the breath fluttered slowly through the parted lips. The end was near, and Philip's pining accent expressed his sense of this.

"Give her to me, dear Sarah! It is not right for you to keep her longer."

"She is gone!"

The glare that came to her eye with the three words revealed a desperation that would have done battle with the King of Terrors, had he appeared in visible shape to claim his victim.

More faintly, slowly, trembled the life over the sweet mouth, and the hands, like waxen shapes, lay pulseless in the mother's clasp; while through the silent room flowed the dirge of the sea. Shaken by the freshening breeze of evening, the shutters of the western window swung car. letting in a golden ray upon mother and child, and along that path of light the untarnished soul of Baby Belle was borne by its waiting angel—home!

CHAPTER XVIII.

AUNT SARAH sat in the wide porch at the back of her house, knitting in hand. It was a still, but not oppressive August afternoon. There was not a ruffle on the bright surface of the river, and the long meadow grass was as smoothly spread out in the yellow sunshine. From the poultry-yard on the left arose a pleasant murmur, and now and then a stray hen tiptoed around the end of the house, singing idly as she rambled. Charley lay on the green ground—his old reading-room—with a book before him, and to him Aunt Sarah's motherly eyes turned most frequently. Those kindly orbs were dimmer than they were two summers ago, and the gentle face was a thought more pensive. A glance into the sitting-room window, from where she sat, would have showed one Uncle Nathan's empty wicker chair in the chimney-corner, and above it were suspended his cane and broad-brimmed hat, just as he had put them off when he took his departure for a country where neither shelter nor staff is needed. Aunt Sarah's cap had a widow's border now; and in her faithful heart there was a sadder void than the death of her children had created—loving parent though she was—and yet more plentiful springs of sympathy for others bereaved and suffering.

Her rocking-chair was set near the entrance of the hall that bisected the dwelling; and the front and back doors being open, she had a fair view of the public road, whenever she chose to look up the lane. The Shrewsbury stage met the boat at four o'clock, or soon after, and hearing a rumbling along the highway, which she knew presaged its transit through this end of the village, the old lady leaned forward to catch a glimpse of the trunks upon the roof, this being all she could distinguish with certainty above the fence.

"Why, it is stopping here!" she ejaculated, getting up to obtain a better look. "Who upon earth can it be?"

The coach rolled on, and the passenger for the farm-house came through the gate and down the lane. She was dressed in black, wore a crape veil, and carried a small hand-trunk. With hospitable instinct, Aunt Sarah advanced to the front porch to meet her, still entirely in the dark as to who it could be.

"She has a different look from any of the neighbors; and there's nobody in York would be likely to come to see me, except Betsy's people, and it can't be either of her girls!"

At this stage of her cogitations, the visitant reached the step on which the hostess stood, and put away the long veil from a face so worn and seamed with grief, so hollow-eyed and old, that the good aunt screamed outright in her distressed astonishment—

"Sarah, dear child! can this be you?"

"What I am now, Aunt Sarah. May I come in and stay with you a little while?"

"Stay with me, poor darling! As long as you like, and welcome! Come right in; you don't look fit to stand!"

She was not; for, now that the necessity for exertion was removed, she was faint and trembling. Aunt Sarah helped her up stairs to the room she had occupied at her former visit, undressed her, and put her to bed. Sarah submitted like a child, too much exhausted to resist being made an invalid of, or to offer any explanation of her singular apparition. She had not slept an hour at a time for many nights; yet, when she had drank a cup of tea, and tried to eat a bit of the toast her aunt prepared and brought up to her, she fell into a profound slumber, which lasted until long after sunrise on the following morning. Unclosing her eyes then, they rested upon the dear face, shaded by the widow's cap, that watched at her bedside. A shadowy phantom of a smile flitted over her features at the recognition.

"It was not a dream, then?" she said, languidly. "But I have dreamed of you often, of late—every night in which I have had any sleep. Aunt Sarah, I must tell you why I came to you!"

"Not now, dear," Aunt Sarah hastened to say, seeing the wild stare and the cloud return to her countenance. "Wait until you are stronger. I will bring up your breakfast, and when you have eaten it, you may try to dress, if you like. There will be time enough for your story, by and by. Charley is in a great fidget to see you."

Sarah submitted to the delay; but it was plain that she was not satisfied with it, and that her mind would be easier when once the tale was told. Aunt Sarah hindered her no longer a time than sufficed for her to take the much needed refreshment, to bathe and dress, and to see and exchange a few sentences with Charley, who supported her down to the sitting-room. There, resting among the pillows of the lounge, Aunt Sarah beside her with the ubiquitous knitting-work in hand, lest too close observation should confuse her niece, the stricken one unfolded the whole of her sad history.

No more affecting proof could have been given of her prostrated mind and will than this unreserved recital. The secret she had sold conscience and liberty to preserve she communicated now without a blush. Here—where she had formed the intimacy that had shadowed so darkly her after days—she detailed every step of the wrong course to which this weakness was the key; went over all—the stormy parting with her husband; her conviction of the mutual peril she and Philip were tempting in their daily communion; her resolve of self-destruction—as circumstantially as if she were relating the biography of another.

Aunt Sarah, horrified and pitiful by turns, struggled, with indifferent success, to maintain equal composure, and against growing doubts of the narrator's sanity. It was a striking and instructive contrast: the world-weary woman returning for consolation and advice to the simple-minded matron, to whom the artificial existence she now heard depicted—its gilded vices and giddy round of vanities; its trials and temptations—were a wonderful, a monstrous tale, as foreign to her sphere of principles and feelings as if they had transpired in another world. But when Sarah came to speak of her child, her manner changed, her voice was hoarse and uneven, and over the careworn visage there went such alternations of fierceness and heart-breaking sorrow that the listening mother, upon whose soul the shadow of her own children's graves still lay long and dark, could hear no more in silence.

"My poor girl!" she cried, falling on her knees, and throwing her arms around the reclining figure. "Dear child! Our Father in Heaven pity and comfort you! There is no help in man for such trouble as yours!"

Sarah had not shed a tear in the course of her story. She said afterwards that she had not wept since they took her dead baby from her clasp; but at this burst of unfeigned sympathy, this gush of pure love and compassion, the burning rock was cleft, and a blessed flood streamed from it. For some minutes they wept together without restraint, and when the more quiet grief of the elder mourner was repressed, the other still clung, sobbing, to her bosom.

Aunt Sarah held and soothed her as she would have done a sorrowful child; stroking away the hair from her forehead, drying and kissing the tear-stained cheeks, with many an epithet of fond reassurance.

"Let me finish! There is very little more!" resumed Sarah, keeping her aunt's hand fast in both of hers. "We went back to the city, and the next day we laid her in Greenwood. We stayed at father's—I would not return to the house that used to be mine. Father was very kind, and mother meant to be; but she tormented me with suggestions and consultations about my black clothes. Lucy was pining to get back to Newport. She said it was hot and dull in New York. Philip wanted to comfort me, but I shunned him, and I think he was hurt by my conduct; but it was best, was it not, Aunt Sarah?"

"Certainly, dear!"

"I had often imagined myself lonely before; but I never dreamed of such a horror of desolation as filled my soul during the two days that I remained there, after all was over. Twenty times each night I would start from a feverish doze, thinking that I heard my baby cry or moan, as she did in the intervals of those awful convulsions; and then would come in upon me—as if I had never felt it until then—the truth that I could never see her again, and that my wicked, wicked intention of deserting her had brought this judgment upon me. I could not stay there, Aunt Sarah! I heard other voices besides my child's in the air, and saw strange, grinning faces in the darkness. But the worst was to see that, to every one but me, the world was the same that it had ever been. Father looked grave when I was in his sight; but the children could laugh and talk as if nothing had happened, and I have seen mother and Lucy chatting merrily in the room with the dressmaker over my new dresses, while they were criticizing the crape trimmings. And I had buried my last earthly hope in my baby's grave! Then I remembered you, and how you had talked to me of your lost children, and how you had assured me of a home in your heart and house whenever I chose to claim it, and I believed in you, Aunt Sarah! There are not many whom I do trust; but I was sure you never said what you did not mean. I would not tell them that I was coming, for I feared they would prevent me. I slipped out of the house when none of them were at home, and went to the nearest back-stand, where I got into a carriage and drove down to the boat."

"My dear, did you leave no letter to let them know where you had gone?"

"No, ma'am. I was afraid they would come or send for me, and I cannot go back."

"But your father—your mother! Did you not think how distressed they would be when they missed you? And your reputation? What will be said when it is known that you have left your father's house, and no one knows where you are? You are very weak and tired, dear; but you must sit up, right away, and write a note home. Tell them that I will take care of you as long as you like to stay with me; but don't lose a minute! You may be in time for the afternoon boat."

Sarah obeyed; and the careful old lady hurried Charley off to the boat, with directions to place the billet in the hands of the captain, who was a personal friend, and could be relied upon to post it directly he reached the city.

Mr. Hunt replied without delay. Sarah's absence had given rise to the most harrowing conjectures, made plausible by her extreme melancholy and fitful behavior since her infant's death. The police had been privately notified of her disappearance, and cautiously worded advertisements inserted in the papers. He regretted to add that Mr. Marlow, who, as Mr. Hammond's nearest friend, was informed of the distressing occurrence, had thought proper to communicate the intelligence to Mr. H. before Sarah's note arrived, and the steamer bearing the letter had sailed. Mr. Hunt expressed himself as entirely willing that his daughter should remain in her present retreat until her health of mind and body was re-established, but did not conceal his disapprobation of the manner of her leaving home.

Aunt Sarah looked concerned as she read this epistle, which her niece had passed over to her.

"I am sorry for your husband, my dear. This affliction, coming so close upon the other, will be a dreadful blow. It is a pity they did not wait awhile, until they knew something of your whereabouts, before writing to him."

"I am more sorry that the news must be contradicted," was the reply. "As we are now situated, the certainty of my death would be a relief to him. This was my reflection that night—" She left the sentence unfinished.

"My dear!" Aunt Sarah removed her spectacles, and surveyed her niece with her kind, serious eyes. "Have you made up your mind to live separate from your husband for the rest of your life?"

"What else should I do, aunt? He will never come back unless I promise to love him, and that cannot be."

"That doesn't alter the fact of your duty, as I look at it. You ought to make him an offer to do right, at any rate. It would have been easier and pleasanter to live with him, if you had felt for him as a woman should for the man she marries; but you are married to him, and in the sight of the Lord you ought to cleave to him, and him only. That is a solemn covenant, dear—'for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse!' 'Those whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder!' It doesn't excuse people, who take these vows upon them when the right spirit is wanting, that they never thought how awful the engagement was. Their obligations are just the same, whether they love or not."

"The responsibility does not rest with me. I performed my duty while we were together. The separation was his act, and he must abide the consequences. I have erred greatly, Aunt Sarah; but ever since the night of our rupture, my conscience has been easy with respect to Mr. Hammond. I confessed that I had misled him, and begged his pardon. Could I do more?"

"Put the case to yourself, child! Do not be angry if I speak out my mind, and use against you some things you have told me. When you saw that Philip was growing to like you better and better, and that you felt nearer to him every day, why did you determine to die sooner than to have things go on so?"

"Because it would have been a crime for us to love each other—infamous treachery to my sister, to his wife, for us to name the word between us."

"And how would Lucy have felt, if you had come to an understanding and spoken out the true feeling of your hearts?"

"Hers is a careless, indolent nature, but this insult would have aroused her. She would never have forgiven him or me, had she suspected a warmer sentiment on either side than that of friendship."

"But an honorable, affectionate man like your husband, who thought his wife the most precious thing in the world, was to forget his disappointment, overlook your lack of love and truth towards him, only because you allowed that he had found out your real feelings at last, and all the excuse you could give was that you could not help them! You were the one in fault all the way through, from the day you entered to marry him up to the minute when you would not say the word he begged from you to keep him at home. It is right that all the advance should come from you."

High-spirited as Sarah was, she was not angered by this plain-speaking. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend;" and she felt that she had but this one. Aunt Sarah studied her thoughtful countenance before she renewed the argument.

"I am an old-fashioned woman, dear—born and bred in the country, where, thank God! I have spent all my life. But I've been thinking about your story of the way people act and feel up there in York, and maybe in all other great, fine, money-making cities, and my notion is just this. I look back of their pushing and straining after riches, and show, and worldly vanities: every man for himself, and the one that climbs highest, forgetting as soon as he gets there that he was ever any lower, and ready to kick over anybody that tries to get alongside of him; and I see that they have lost sight of the second great commandment—'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' Then I look back of this too, and I see where the greatest sin is, and—dear, bear with me! I see where you have gone furthest astray. Here's a passage I was reading this morning that tells the whole story." She raised the Bible from the table, and laid it upon Sarah's lap, pointing as she did so to these words enclosed in brackets:—

"Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength, therefore shalt thou plant pleasant plants, and shalt set it with strange slips. In the day thou shalt make thy plant to grow, and in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish; but the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief and desperate sorrow!"

Mrs. Hunt would have regarded as an insult any expressed doubt of her religious principles and practice. She had a desirable pew in the fashionable church which was nearest her residence, and, stormy Sabbaths excepted, it was generally full at morning service. When her children were presentable as to looks, very young babies being seldom pretty, they were offered in fine lawn and Valenciennes at the fount for the rite of baptism, and not a confirmation had passed since her daughters were grown, that she did not fancy how interesting they would look kneeling before the surpliced bishop, heads gracefully bowed, and the regards of the whole congregation fixed upon them. Sarah never could be brought to the performance of the commonest act of public worship, unless it was to rise with the rest, when a standing posture was prescribed by the prayer-book, and she shocked her mother by declaring that she only did this because she was tired of sitting! Lucy's serene grace of devoutness was beautiful, if not edifying to behold. Those who occupied adjacent pews involuntarily suppressed their responses as her mellow tones repeated, with melancholy sweetness—"Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners!" And as the melting cadences entranced their ears, the lovely penitent was speculating upon the probable cost of Miss Hanton's Parisian hat, or coveting Mrs. Beau Monde's sable cloak.

If Sarah had ever heard of regeneration, it was as a technical phrase of the church articles and christening service. Of its practical meaning, its inward application, its absolute necessity to the safety of the soul, she had as vague a conception as a Parsee or New Zealand cannibal would have formed. She had read the Bible in connection with rhetorical lectures, and admired it as a noble specimen of Oriental literature. What other associations could she have with it? A handsome copy of the Holy Scriptures, surmounted by a book of common prayer, lay on a stand in Mrs. Hunt's third and rear parlor, and was dusted when a like attention was paid to the other ornaments of tables and Étagères. An Oxford edition, russet antique, formed one of the wedding-gifts of each of the sisters, and in due time was laid in pious pomp on its purple pillow in the library corner. It was hardly strange, then, that the quotation, so apposite to the case in point, should fail to impress her very strongly. Aunt Sarah had gone out, deeming solitary reflection the best means of enforcing the lesson she had tried to inculcate, and, after re-reading the two verses, without further appropriation of their meaning, Sarah turned leaf after leaf of the volume, catching here and there a sentence of the large print, so grateful to the failing sight of her who was its daily student.

“David said unto his servants—‘Is the child dead?’ And they said ‘He is dead!’”

The smitten chord in the mother’s heart sent out a ring of pain, and her listless hand paused upon the open page. It is a simple story—the royal parent’s unavailing wrestle with the Chastener, the dread end of his suspense, and the efficacy of the affliction, made manifest in the calm resignation, the sanctified trust of the mourner. But when received as Sarah read it, with the vision of a similar death-scene intermixing itself with its unadorned details, the fresh blood still welling from the wound made by the tearing away of a portion of one’s own life, every line is fraught with truth and pathos.

“Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me!”

“Go to her! Oh, if I could! My baby! my baby!”

To the low, sad cry succeeded a season of yearning and of tears. It was an echo of the wail of the heathen mother who, centuries ago, having seen her babes slain before her eyes, cried aloud, in unselfish agony, as the sword, reeking with their blood, was plunged into her own bosom—“O, my children! where are ye?”

Sleep on, in thy lowly bed upon the hillside, sweet Baby Belle! Like the pale buds that are fading with thee in thy narrow resting-place, thy mission on earth is accomplished. Joy, young freed spirit, if, stealing through the melodies of Heaven, there comes to thee the whisper of that mother’s call! Fair lamb! the love that folded thee in the Shepherd’s arms designed likewise, in recalling thee, to lure the wandering parent home!

CHAPTER XIX.

“MY DEAR LEWIS: Before you receive this letter, you will have had the explanation of my disappearance from New York. A merciful Providence directed me, in my partial derangement, to this peaceful retreat. Here I have found rest for body and soul—peace such as the world could never give the heart, even were it not bowed down by a sorrow like mine. Not that I forget past errors; nor that the review does not humble me in the dust. I confess, with shame and bitterness of spirit, my wasted years, my unsanctified affections, my evil passions. But for the assurance of the Father’s pardon, the Saviour’s loving pity, the black catalogue would strike me dead with horror and anguish. It is a fearful thing to be made to see one’s self as she is; to scan in terrified solicitude the record of a life, and find there nothing better than pride, misanthropy, falsehood, hatred of men—rebellion against God. It is a sweet experience to taste, however tremblingly, the consolations of the Friend who invites the weary and heavy-laden to draw near and learn of Him. In His strength—not in that feebleness I once called power—have I resolved to lead a new life. Of the causes which have contributed to produce this change, we will speak more at length when we meet.

“‘When we meet!’ Lewis, will you, can you forget your manifold wrongs and come back to me? I do not plead, now, ‘for the sake of our child.’ Her sinless soul henceforth can know no pain or woe. God saw that I was not worthy of her, and He took her. In the earlier weeks of my selfish mourning, I had no thought of your bereavement. Latterly, I have longed to comfort you, for I know that your heart is riven by this stroke. She was your joy, as she was my angel of peace. Her loss is our common sorrow. Shall it not draw us together? Yet, as I have said, our estrangement cannot now affect her. Thoughtless of evil, she passed away. Had she lived, the Omniscient only knows what grief and mortification might have darkened her pathway. Nor do I desire a reconciliation as a shield from the world’s sneer or ban. I hold its applause and its censure alike cheaply. In prosperity its favors were painted, tasteless fruit; in adversity it would have fed my starving heart with husks. But for my sake—by the thought of my late and sore repentance; by the remorse that must gnaw my spirit, when I remember your noble trust in me, your unswerving fidelity, your generous love and my base requital of it all;

by the sorrow that never leaves me by day or by night—forgive me, and return to the home we have both forsaken! I will serve you very faithfully, my husband! I have gained other and higher views of the marriage relation within a short time past. However presumptuously I may have assumed its responsibilities, however unworthily I performed its duties in former days, I would enter upon our re-engagement with a solemn sense of what I owe to you and to Him who united us. You must have despised me at our parting, and since. Perhaps you have come to think of me with dislike as well as contempt. I will bear this—grievous though the burden will be—as a part of my righteous punishment. I will never murmur—never, even in thought, accuse you of unjust harshness, if you will grant me the opportunity to make what amends I can for all you have lost and suffered through my fault.”

Sarah was still far from strong; and wearied as much by the intensity of her feelings as by the manual effort of writing, she laid the pen down, and leaned back in the cushioned chair. Her table stood in the parlor beneath the window overlooking the river. The room was prim and clean, as of yore, with its straight lines of chairs, its shining specks of mirrors; the grim black profiles above the mantel, and the green boughs in the fire-place. The outer scene was in its general features that which the girl had surveyed, with pleased surprise, the July evening of her arrival here two years ago.

Only two years! The sufferings and lessons of twenty had been crowded into that brief space. The meadows were growing sere, as if scorching winds had swept over them, and the stream reflected truthfully; yet one could have fancied, sadly, the changing foliage fringing its borders. But the sky, with its tender blue and fleecy clouds, ever shifting, yet ever retaining their likeness to one another—the river's smooth, steady flow, were the same; fit emblems both of them of counsels which are mercy and truth through all their workings; of love that abideth forever!

The train of thought was replete with refreshing to the spirit that was striving, in prayer and watchfulness, to adhere to the right, to accept, with meek submission, all that her cup yet held of pungent or nauseous lees. There was no affectation in the humble tone of her letter. She would not begin it until she had mastered the stubborn remnant of her native pride. It should be nothing to her that her husband had wilfully separated himself from her and refused her overtures of reconciliation.

If this was unkindness, it was all she could reproach him with in the course of time they had spent together. He had been a true friend, an honorable protector, and dimly still, but more justly than ever before, she perceived that into his love for her there had entered none of the merely prudential considerations, the cool calculations, wherewith she used to account for his choice of herself as a helpmeet. Where, in the world's heartless circles, could she point out another wife as much indulged, as much honored in public and in private as she once was by him? Mournfully, if not lovingly, she dwelt upon the countless evidences of his cordial fulfilment, in letter and in spirit, of his part of their mutual engagement, with something of the sinking of heart the alchemist may have felt when, after he had by a mechanical and habitual fling of his arm, tossed the eagerly-sought philosopher's stone into the sea as a worthless pebble, he discovered that the divining steel he held had been changed to gold by its touch.

To whom of us has not an experience similar to this come? It may be that the eyes which once besought affection with dumb and disregarded eloquence are closed and rayless for all future time; the lips that told, with modest frankness, how dear we were to hearts we cared not then to win, are now but silent dust. Or, perchance, grieved by indifference, repelled by unkindness, those hearts have sought and found in other loves solace for the pain we in our blindness inflicted. It matters little whether they be dead to all the world, or only to us. In either case, the longing and despair of our lonely lives are rendered the more unendurable from the flash of tardy truth that shows us, side by side, with our actual poverty of heart riches, the tranquil beauty of the pictured “might have been.”

Aunt Sarah had gone on a visit to a neighbor; the hired girl was in the distant wash-house; and Charley considered it his duty to linger within easy reach of his cousin, should she need him for any purpose. To guard her from all chance of intrusion, he stationed himself on the front porch steps, with his book on his knee. For an hour, he read on uninterruptedly; then, glancing up as he turned a leaf, he saw a gentleman coming down the gravel-walk. He looked thin and anxious, and his restless eye wandered from door to windows, as in expectation of seeing some one besides the boy. With a ready apprehension of his infirmity, only to be accounted for by some prior knowledge of the person he saluted, he took from his pocket a card, which he presented before he shook hands with the silent host. Charley's intelligent face was one beam of pleasure as he read, and his warm grasp showed his sympathy in the happiness he fancied was in store for his cousin. Inviting the guest by a gesture to follow him, he went softly to the parlor-door, tapped lightly—too lightly, indeed, to attract the notice of the musing occupant of the room, then drew back the bolt, admitted the stranger, and delicately withdrew.

Sarah heard the door open and Charley's retreating footsteps, and, supposing that he had peeped in to see that she was comfortable and wanted for nothing, she did not look around. The intruder stood still one step within the room, as if unable to advance or speak. The languid attitude of the figure before him, so unlike the self-poise and quiet energy of her former deportment, her black dress, even the wasted hands dropped so wearily upon her lap, told of the storm that had passed over her, the utter revolution in her life and nature. A struggling sigh he could not repress broke from the gazer's breast, and Sarah turned hastily towards him. She did not swoon, as he feared she would. A thrill, like an electric shock, shook her from head to foot; a wild inquiry looked from her eyes; a question of the reality of the appearance, succeeding so closely to—did it grow out of her reverie? Lewis put this imagination to flight.

"Sarah!" he said, pressing in his the hands she extended mutely. "They told me you were lost, and I hurried home to find you. I could not wait for your permission to come to you, when I learned in New York that I had a living wife! The loss of the child was heavy enough; but this—" He could say no more.

"I am thankful! I am glad that you are here!" A faint, beautiful smile shone over her wan features. "And our baby, Lewis! We must remember that she is an angel now!"

CHAPTER XX.

To no one except Aunt Sarah were the facts of the estrangement and reconciliation of her relatives ever revealed, and within her faithful bosom the secret was hidden as securely as in a tomb.

Great was the chagrin of gossips, male and female, when it was known that Mrs. Hammond's strange flight from her father's house, which had leaked out nobody knew how, and been variously construed into an elopement, a freak of derangement, and a deliberate intention of suicide, according to the degrees of charity possessed by the theorists, was a very innocent and unromantic journey to the country home of her favorite aunt and godmother, a lady of ample fortune and benevolent heart, who would in all probability make her namesake her heiress. Under her care, and for the benefit of the seclusion so congenial to one in her affliction, and the salt air so necessary for the restoration of her impaired health, Mrs. Hammond had remained until her husband's return from abroad.

Mrs. Hunt had told Mrs. A., who had told Mrs. B., who repeated it to Mrs. C., how he had not stopped in New York an hour after he stepped ashore from the Adriatic. He drove to the bank, and ascertained from Mr. Hunt that his wife was with her aunt, and that a boat which would land him near Shrewsbury was to leave in fifteen minutes. So he drove down post-haste, and jumped on board of her after the plank had been drawn in and the wheels began to move. There never was a more devoted husband or a more attached pair, Mrs. Hunt affirmed.

"More than she could say for that flirting Mrs. Benson and her other half," agreed A. B. and C. unanimously.

"Her conduct at Newport was scandalous, and would have been outrageous if he had not watched her like a lynx!" said Mrs. Beau Monde, who had never been able to secure one half as many admirers as had Lucy, and hated her as honestly as if they were a couple of Biddies pulling caps for Patrick or Murphy.

"I don't see why he should have felt jealous, I am sure. He wasn't dying of love for her! That could be seen with half an eye. They say he loved Mrs. Hammond before he addressed her sister, and married this one out of spite," rejoined Mrs. Townes, who had made beaux yeux at the distinguished Southerner for three whole evenings, and won only the most indifferent glances in requital.

"Mrs. Hammond behaved very prudently!" pronounced Mrs. Greyling, "and dressed very well. I suppose Mr. Hammond brought her some elegant things from abroad. Pity she is in mourning, and must dress plainly at present! If I were in her place—as it was only a baby—I would not wear black more than six months, unless it was very becoming."

"She has become very religious, you know," said Mrs. Parton.

"Indeed! People are apt to, I think, when there has been death in the family," concluded Mrs. Greyling, pensively. "I remember, when my poor sister died, I used to look forward to church and Sunday with real pleasure. I could not go anywhere on week-days, you know, although there were piles of tickets lying in my card-receiver, and we had just taken a box at the opera that very winter! I declare, I should have lost the run of the fashions entirely, and forgotten people's faces, if I had not gone to church. I dare say, too, that she finds some comfort in religion—poor woman! if what the preachers and good books tell us be true."

Had Sarah found comfort?

Look we, for reply, to the chastened lustre of the eye, where once burned restless fires, like the sunward gaze of the imprisoned eagle; to the holy serenity struggling through and finally dispelling the clouds of memory and regret that, at times, would roll in between her soul and the bright, sustaining hope upon which Faith would have its regards forever fixed; to her daily life, sanctified by prayer, beneficent in good works, and by its unostentatious loveliness winning others, first to admire, then to imitate; to the wifely submission and loving kindness of her bearing to her husband, her grateful estimate of the affection he lavished upon her, the deep, true tenderness growing up in her heart for this fond and noble companion; look we, lastly, to the snowy marble guarding that tiny mound in Greenwood, where the mother once believed that hope and joy were buried to know no awaking.

CHEERFUL MUSIC.—The poet Carpani once asked his friend Haydn how it happened that his church music was always of an animating, cheerful, and gay description. Haydn's answer was, "I cannot make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts which I feel. When I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy, that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be easily forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

THE SOLDIER'S WAYSIDE DREAM.

BY S. F. FLINT.

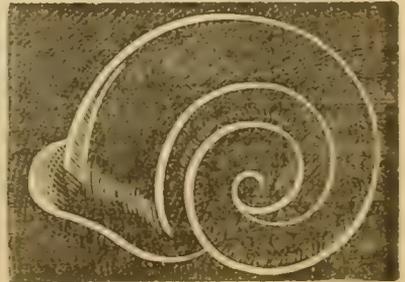

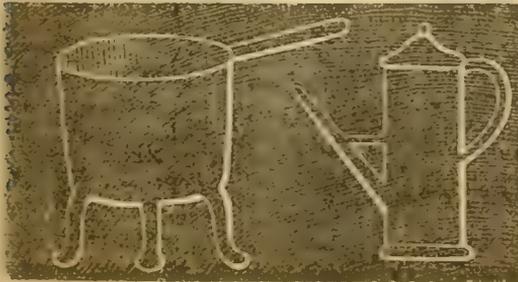

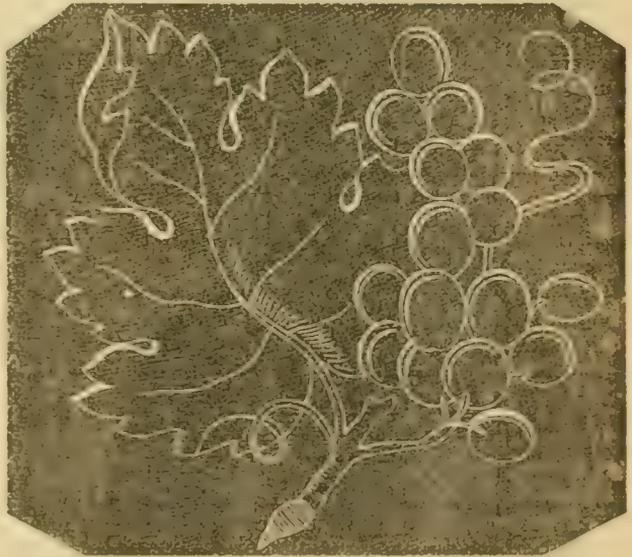

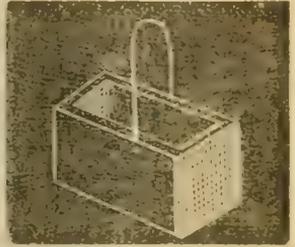

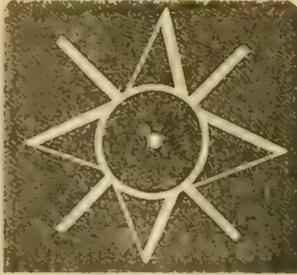

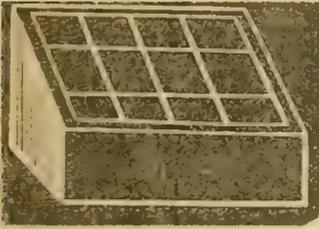

(Seventh Illinois Infantry.)

THE word was "Rest." The dusty road was rocky, worn, and steep;
And many a sun-browned soldier's face sank on his breast to sleep.
Afar, the Alabama hills swept round in billowy lines;
The soft green of their bowery slopes was dotted dark with pines;
And from their tops a gentle breeze, born in the cloudless sky,
Stole through the valley where a stream was slowly warbling by;
And, as it passed, it brought a cloud of odors in its plumes,
Of violets and columbines, and milk-white plum-tree blooms.
The coolness and the perfume o'er my weary senses crept,
And with my musket on my arm I bowed my head and slept.
No more the Alabama hills; no more the waving pines,
But still the scent of violets and red wild columbines;
I drew my breath in ecstasy, my feet were shod with joy—
I dreamed I trod the prairie sod in my beautiful Illinois.
The lark sang welcome from the grass, the well-known path along,
And the pulsations of my heart seemed echoes of his song;
I thought the sunlight never shone so gloriously before;
But sweeter were the smiles of love that met me at the door.
O hold my hand while yet you may, love of my earlier years,
And wet my face, my mother, with thy proud and happy tears!
And bless me again, my father—bless me again, I pray!
For I hear the bugle—I hear the drum—I have but an hour to stay.
Alas! my dreaming words were true; I woke, and knew it all—
I heard the clamor of the drum—I heard the captain's call;
And over all another voice I oft had heard before:
A sound that stirs the dullest heart—the cannon's muffled roar!
No longer "Rest," but "Forward!" for, ere the day is done,
It will tell of the fearful glory of a battle lost and won.
And ere the breath of its blackened lips has time to lift away,
My hand must be red and warm with blood, or white and cold as clay!
O pray for me in thy gentle heart, love of my earlier
years!
And mother, only weep for me those proud and happy
tears!
And bless me again, my father, bless me while yet you may!
My dream-words may be doubly true—I may have but an hour to stay!

A TRUE believer, when blessed with a smiling imagination, is the happiest of mankind.

very pretty made in either blue or green cloth, the collar and cuffs being velvet, and when worn with the new buff or white vest, with a small neck-tie and puffed linen under-shirt, with a small standing collar, is as stylish and perfect a costume as our lady equestrians can adopt.

The buttons may be either gold or velvet, to match the collar.

The Leonora Sleeve.—This sleeve is closed at the wrist, but cut open nearly up to the elbow,

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT,

Burnside Habit.—A new riding-habit, the jacket closely resembling a gentleman's cut-away coat; the skirt of the jacket is quite short; the sleeve, the plain tight-fitting coat style, with a turned-back cuff. This habit is so as to show the white undersleeve. It is shaped like the small bishop, only longer. It is then cut up at the back about half way, gathered on each side, and a trimming of ruffles, or ribbon laid on, finished with a bow at the top of the opening. The sleeve is also gathered at the seam, inside the arm; it has a cap cut in two points, trimmed like the opening at the back of the sleeve, and finished with a bow, and a small turned-back cuff, cut and trimmed like the cap.

Misses' Street Sack.—This pattern is sack shape, with a seam in the back. The front has a seam or small gore taken out, beginning at the arm-size, and runs about half the length of the sack. This seam fits it slightly, and gives a better outline than when the usual fulness is left in; requiring two and a half yards for a child of thirteen years.

The Clerical Tie.—This is one of the numerous variations of the popular tie, called "Clerical." It is made without a bow, merely two wide ends with a catch across, in which the brooch is placed. It is composed of very fine muslin or bishop lawn edged, and trimmed with rows of Valenciennes lace; between each row of lace the muslin is delicately embroidered. The "Clerical" is also very pretty edged with lace, and having a handsome medallion in each end. Another kind, much worn, is made of fine muslin with large bows, the ends simply tucked, or tucked and insertion let in. Any of these styles are elegant and becoming, especially to a fair complexion. This tie is well suited to light silks and other fabrics.

GENTLEMAN'S KNICKERBOCKER STOCKING—KNITTING.

Materials.—6 ounces of coarse Scotch yarn, gray or brown; 5 knitting needles, No. 16, Bell Gauge. This will make a very strong and thick stocking, but if wished finer, fingering yarn may be used instead.

THERE are but few articles which a lady has it in her power to work which prove really serviceable to a gentleman. For long pedestrian excursions, the Knickerbocker possesses great advantages over the ordinary long trousers; and as the time has now come for summer excursions, we trust that the following simple directions will prove useful to those ladies who wish to provide the travellers with Knickerbocker stockings.

Commence on the top of the leg, cast on 31 stitches on each of four needles, in all 124 stitches. Keep the fifth needle to make it round.

1st round.—Knit 2 and purl 2 alternately; repeat all round. Work 41 rounds more the same.

43d round.—Purl the first stitch, knit the rest plain. Work 140 rounds plain, but purling the 1st stitch of every alternate round, which is to be continued to the end of the heel to form the seam; then to decrease the leg.

184th round.—Knit 1, knit 2 together, knit the rest plain to the last 2 stitches, then knit 1, slip 1, turn the slipped stitch over the knitted one, which will make the decrease stitches correspond with the other side of the seam.

Knit 4 rounds plain, still purling the seam stitch.

Repeat the last 5 rounds 18 times more, when it will be reduced to 86 stitches.

Knit 82 rounds plain as before.

Then to shape the heel, purl 1, knit 22, turn back so as to work on the last stitches; and for the 1st row.—Slip 1, purl 44, turn back.

2d.—Slip 1, knit 21, purl the seam, knit 22, turn back; these 45 stitches should all be on one needle, and the remaining 41 stitches are to be kept on two of the needles until required for the front. Repeat these 2 rows 29 times more.

61st.—Slip 1, purl the rest.

62d.—Slip 1, knit 19, knit 2 together, purl 1, slip 1, knit 1, turn over, knit 20.

Repeat the last 2 rows 3 times more, working one stitch less each time before decreasing; then slip 1, purl 18. Place the two needles together, so as to double the work, and with the 3d needle slip 1, then knit a stitch off each pin together, turn the slipped stitch over, knit a stitch off each pin together again, turn the 1st stitch over, and repeat until these stitches are cast off.

1st round.—Knit the 41 stitches on the two needles, then on the stitches which were raised purl 1, knit 70, purl 1.

2d.—All plain.

3d.—Knit 41, purl 1, slip 1, knit 1, turn over, knit 66, knit 2 together, purl 1.

Repeat the last 2 rounds 13 times more, knitting 2 stitches less at the 66 stitches each time. Then work 63 rounds plain, purling the 2 seam stitches every alternate round.

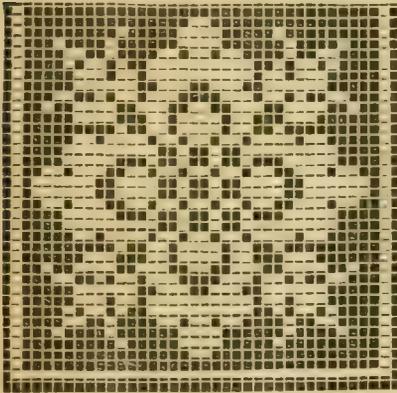

93d.—Knit 2 together, knit 37, slip 1, knit 1, turn over, purl 1, knit 2 together, knit 38, slip 1, knit 1, turn over, purl 1.

94th. All plain.

Repeat these 2 rounds 12 times more, knitting 2 stitches less between each of the decreases; then double the remaining stitches and cast them off the same as at the heel.

A NEW MODE OF PAINTING IN OIL.

BY A CONTRIBUTOR.

PROCURE a stretcher the size of the engraving, allowing only so much of the margin to remain as will bring the frame to the edge of the picture when it is done. Procure also the finest and whitest canton flannel, and nail it to the stretcher with small tacks, closely and evenly, and as tight as possible, leaving the nap side up. Dissolve a few cents' worth white glue, when dissolved, put it into boiling water, and stir continually for a few moments. Have ready some clear starch, nicely prepared in cold water, and stir into the boiling glue. Take a flat bristle brush, and apply the preparation to the canton flannel evenly, moving the brush the way the nap lies, smoothly, until every part of the flannel is saturated. Lay the lithograph on a clean white cloth (after wetting it thoroughly in clean water), and lay another clean cloth upon it to absorb the superfluous moisture. Then let two persons take hold of the engraving, one person at each end, and lay it carefully and exactly, right side up, the wrong side next to the nap of the flannel. Take a soft clean cloth, and, commencing in the middle of the picture, rub lightly all over, until it is perfectly smooth, free from blisters and air-bubbles. Then with the brush, which must be fine and smooth, go over the picture with the same preparation, and set it away to dry.

After it is perfectly dry, give it one more coat, being cautious to have it perfectly dry at first. Allow not the least lump or roughness to exist in the glue. When the last coat is perfectly dry, commence to paint on the side prepared with the glue in the same manner as if it was a sketch drawn for oil painting by an artist, observing the lights and shades as they are found in the lithograph. Proceed in the same manner as in the oil painting, putting on as many coats as are desired (though two will generally be found sufficient), glazing, scumbling, and being especially careful and delicate in blending the tints. There will be no real necessity for so much labor; but each artist can follow his own plan. When the engraving is painted, let it dry perfectly before varnishing, which must be done with pure mastic varnish, laid on quite thin, or, if thick, diluted with spirits of turpentine.

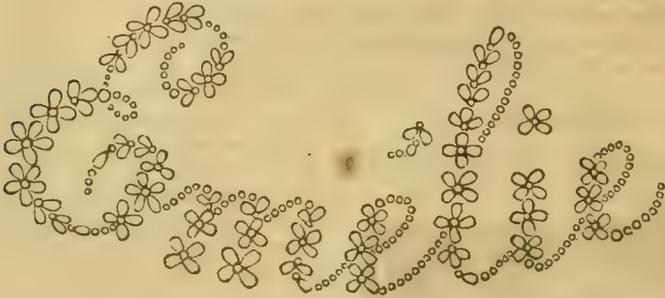

The advantage in this style of painting is the saving of time and labor in sketching, also in the number of coats required. Landscapes are formed very nice in this way, and defy the closest observer to discover that they are engravings. If well mounted and properly prepared, they will last as long as any other paintings. Let the frame touch the edge of the engraving, covering the margin, and receiving the stretcher also, as in oil painting.

The preparation of glue must be applied when moderately warm; not a lump, however small, must be allowed either on the flannel or on the engraving. The colors can be chosen according to taste. Use the best tube oil paint and best brushes, a palette and knife. Thin a little with poppy oil, if necessary. Very small white objects need not be painted at all—the varnishing will give the effect. Commence painting at the top, and go from left to right.

NAME FOR MARKING.

GENTLEMAN'S FLANNEL SHIRT.

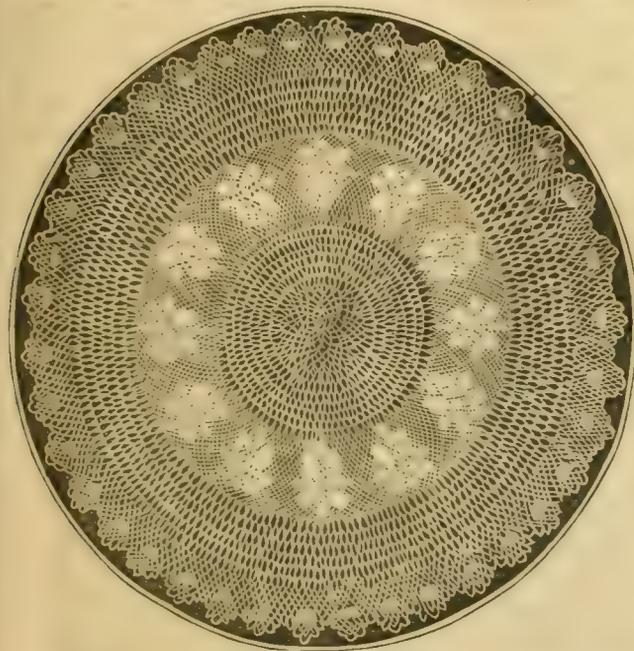

A new pattern, which will be found very convenient.

A NETTED TIDY.

Materials.—Three meshes; No. 1, round mesh, a quarter of an inch to measure round; No. 2, a half an inch flat mesh; No. 3, three-quarters of an inch, also flat. It will be necessary to place a number on each of the meshes. No. 6 cotton. No. 8 cotton, or Magenta-colored Andalusian wool.

With round mesh. Net on a foundation (which must afterwards be cut off). 16 stitches, unite, and net 4 rows of knots, or three diamonds.

No. 1 mesh. Net 2 stitches into every loop.

Round mesh. Net 3 rows, or 2 diamonds.

No. 1 flat mesh. Net 2 stitches into each loop.

Round mesh. Net 2 rows or 1 diamond.

No. 1 mesh. 1 row plain.

Same mesh. Net 2 stitches into each loop= 128 stitches.

Round mesh. 5 rows, or 4 diamonds.

No. 1 mesh. 1 row plain *.

Same mesh. 1 row netting, 2d stitch 1st, and 1st stitch 2d.

Round mesh. 2 plain rows, or 1 diamond *. Repeat from * to * again.

No. 1 mesh. Net three stitches into every loop.

Round mesh. 1 row, taking up 3 loops into every stitch. Now continue these 2 last rows till there are 5 patterns of the long stitches (the last part of the pattern must finish with the small round mesh).

No. 1 mesh. Net 2 stitches into every loop.

Round mesh. Net sufficient rows to make 13 diamonds, reckoning them perpendicularly, and not across.

No. 2 mesh. 1 row plain.

Same mesh. Net 4 stitches into every loop.

No. 1 mesh. 1 row taking up 4 loops of last row into every stitch.

Repeat these 2 last rows for six patterns of L stitches more; after the last row when No. 1 mesh is netted, net with same mesh 2 more rows plain.

BORDER.—* No. 3 mesh. Net 9 stitches into 1 loop (remove this mesh, and take up No. 1 mesh), then net 5 stitches, i. e., 1 stitch into every loop, repeat from *, thus using the 2 meshes alternately all round.

Round mesh. Begin on the L stitches, and net 1 stitch into every loop of the 9, then net 2 of the short stitches into 1, then 1 plain, then net the 2 remaining short stitches into 1, and repeat.

Same mesh. 2 next rows. Net 1 stitch into every loop all round.

No. 1 mesh. 1 row, netting 1 stitch into every alternate loop.

DARNING THE PATTERN.—The beauty and strength of the darning in all netted work depends so much upon the method of working, that a few words upon the subject will not be out of place. The darning should always run one way; the needle used should be a blunt top rug needle of large size; the end of cotton should never be longer than can be conveniently used. First, to fasten on, make a small loop in the cotton about four inches from the end, pass the needle through one thread of the diamond, then through the small loop, and draw it up tight (this short end of cotton must afterwards be darned in), darn the pattern till the long end is used to within an inch or two, then tie on another end with a weaver's knot very tight, and continue the work, slipping the needle and cotton where the pattern requires it between the basket-work resemblance of the darning, and when required to fasten off, run the cotton backwards and forwards, so that it is unseen, till it becomes impossible to unravel with washing. To darn the present engraved pattern, run a piece of colored wool into every 20th diamond from top to bottom; in each of these divisions the pattern must be worked; then in the 10th diamond, close against the bottom rows of the border, commence to work the centre of the termination of the pattern, as in engraving, with Trafalgar cotton or Andalusian wool.

TUFT NETTING IN WOOL AND COTTON.

Materials.—Cotton, No. 4; a flat mesh five-eighths of an inch wide, two long netting needles, and some skeins of Magenta or red violet-colored Berlin or Andalusian wool; the latter is the prettiest, and does not felt or mat together like the Berlin wool.

This netting is entirely original, and is not

2d.—Net two stitches with cotton; having threaded the wool on one needle, lay the cotton needle down; not cut it off; take up the wool needle, and in the same stitch that has the last knot of cotton, pass the needle with the wool up through this stitch (leaving out a short end), then over the mesh and through the stitch again for eight times; now with the left thumb draw the cotton on one side from the wool; pass the wool-needle down between the tuft of wool and the loose cotton; pull the needle through downwards, and then pass it up through the loop, which forms a button-hole stitch or tie over the tuft; now net a stitch into the wool into the same loop where the tuft is, bringing the end of wool upwards so as to tie it in with the knot of the stitch, then cut off to be found in any netting or other books treating of fancy-work. It works well, and is adapted for sofa pillows, work-table covers, and tidies.

An even number of stitches, but edge stitches may be added.

both ends of wool, and lay the wool needle down; take up the needle with the cotton which has not been cut off, and net two loops; repeat with the tuft of wool into where the last cotton stitch was netted.

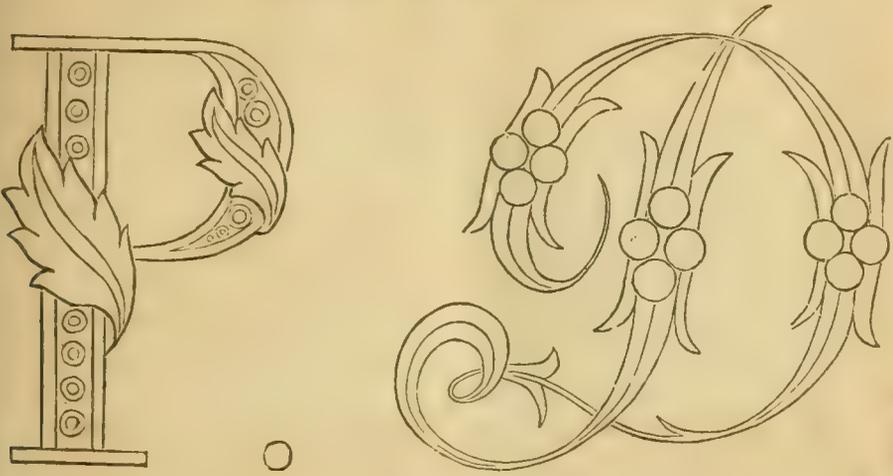

Next row.—Plain netting.

DIRECTIONS FOR PRESERVING FRUITS, ETC.

PEACHES.—The following is the best plan for preserving peaches in cans:—

Take the peaches, either just ripe or fully ripe—this does not matter; pare them, and if you desire to preserve them whole, throw them into cold water as they are pared, to prevent them from losing color. When everything is ready, place them in the can, adding merely as much sugar to each layer as is sufficient to render them palatable; set the can in a vessel containing hot water, and allow it to remain in boiling water until the fruit becomes heated through; this will require, if a quart can be used, from twenty minutes to half an hour. The temperature required is about 160° F. A very little experience will enable any one to know the proper temperature. It is not possible to heat the contents of the can in this way above a temperature of 180°, unless the cover is fastened down, which is not necessary; but it is evident that it is desirable to subject them to as little heat as possible. When heated sufficiently, seal at once, by heating the cover, and pressing at once firmly into place, and allowing a weight sufficient to keep down the cover to remain upon it until the cement hardens. The proper temperature of the lid is easily and conveniently ascertained by putting a piece of rosin about the size of a small pea on the cover, when it is put upon the stove; as soon as the rosin melts the cover is ready to be put in place. This precaution is necessary, as the solder with which the parts of the lid are joined together easily melts.

It is not absolutely necessary to use sugar in this process, but, as it assists in the preservation of the fruits, they can be sealed at a lower temperature than if it is not used. As sugar is used to render the fruits palatable, there can be no objection to using it when preparing the fruit for family use, as it will, in any case, be necessary, and there is no reason why the sugar should not be used before the can is sealed, as afterwards.

AN ECONOMICAL WAY OF PRESERVING PEACHES WHOLE.

—To fifteen pounds of cling-stone peaches take seven and a half pounds of loaf-sugar; put two or three quarts of water in the kettle with one teaspoonful of pearl-ash to destroy the skins of the fruit. When the water is hot, throw in a few peaches, and let them remain a few minutes; take them out and wipe off the skins with a coarse towel, and then throw them into cold water. Take half the sugar with as little water as possible to dissolve it; then put in a layer of peaches, and let them boil from twenty to thirty minutes. Take them out on a flat dish to cool. After two or three layers have been boiled in this way, the syrup will increase; by degrees add the rest of the sugar. When all are done, boil the syrup until it becomes a little thick, then add while in the kettle half a pint of alcohol, which will cool and thicken it sufficiently to put on the peaches, which should be ready in your jars; do not cover them until the next day. They will not have the least taste of the alcohol, and are a very fine preserve.

TO PRESERVE PEACHES.—The clear-stone yellow peaches, white at the stone are the best. Weigh the fruit after it is pared. To each pound of fruit allow a pound of loaf-sugar. Put a layer of sugar at the bottom of the preserving-kettle, and then a layer of fruit, and so on until the fruit is all in. Stand it over hot ashes until the sugar is entirely dissolved; then boil them until they are clear; take them out piece by piece, and spread them on a dish free from syrup. Boil the syrup in the pan until it jellies; when the peaches are cold, fill the jars half full with them, and fill up with the boiling syrup. Let them stand a short time covered with a thin cloth, then put on brandy paper, and cover them close with corks, skin, or paper. From twenty to thirty minutes will generally be sufficient to preserve them.

PEACH JAM, OR MARMALADE.—The fruit for this preserve must be quite ripe and perfectly sound. Pare, stone, weigh, and boil it quickly for three-quarters of an hour, and do not fail to stir it often during the time; draw it from the fire, and mix with it ten ounces of well-refined sugar, rolled or beaten to powder, for each pound of the peaches; clear it carefully from the scum and boil it briskly for five minutes; add the strained juice of one or two good lemons; continue the boiling for three minutes only, and pour out the marmalade. Two minutes after the sugar is stirred to the fruit add the blanched kernels of part of the peaches.

BRANDY PEACHES.—Take four pounds of ripe peaches, two pounds powdered loaf-sugar. Put the fruit over the fire in cold water; stimmer, but not boil, till the skins will rub off easily. Stone them, if liked. Put the sugar and fruit in alternate layers in the jars till filled; then pour in white brandy, and cover the whole. Cork tightly.

QUINCES PRESERVED WHOLE.—Pare and put them into a saucepan, with the parings at the top; then fill it with hard water; cover it close; set it over a gentle fire till they turn reddish; let them stand till cold; put them into a clear, thick syrup; boil them a few minutes; set them on one side till quite cold; boil them again in the same manner; the next day boil them until they look clear; if the syrup is not thick enough, boil it more; when cold, put brandied paper over them. The quinces may be halved or quartered.

TO PRESERVE PINEAPPLES.—Slice the pineapples rather thinner to preserve than to eat, and take one pound of loaf-sugar to one pound of fruit; powder the sugar, and place in the kettle alternately a layer of pineapple and a layer of fruit. To each pound of fruit put three table-spoonfuls of water. Let it remain over a slow fire until the sugar is all melted; then boil it slowly until the fruit looks clear; take out the fruit piece by piece, and lay them on a dish, until the syrup is boiled nearly to a jelly. Put the fruit in jars, and pour on the syrup hot. After putting on brandy papers, cover the jars with paper and paste it on, which secures their keeping, and preserves the flavor of the pineapple.

PINEAPPLE JAM.—Pare and weigh the pineapples, and grate them down on a large grater. To one pound of fruit put three-quarters of a pound of powdered sugar; put it over the fire, and when it comes to a boil, stir till done. Boil it half an hour or more till clear; put it in jars, and cover it carefully.

CANTELOPE RIND PRESERVED.—Take one pound of rind not quite mellow, and cut the outside carefully off; lay it in a bowl and sprinkle over it one teaspoonful of alum; cover it with boiling water, and let it stand all night; then dry it in a cloth, scald it in ginger tea, but do not boil it; then dry it again in a cloth; to one pound of rind allow one pound of sugar and half a pint of water. Boil it an hour.

TO PRESERVE PLUMS DRY.—Gather the plums when full grown and just turning color; prick and put them into a sauce-pan of cold water, set them on the fire until the water is on the point of boiling; then take them out, drain, and boil them well in some clarified sugar, let them settle, and then boil again; if they shrink, and will not take the sugar, prick them as they lie in the pan, and then give them another boil, skim and set them by; the next day add some more sugar, boiled to the fruit and syrup; then put them together, place them in a stove till next day, then drain the plums from the syrup, sprinkle a little powdered sugar over and dry them in a stove.

JAM OF GREENGAGES.—Put ripe greengages into a kettle, with very little water, and let them stew until soft; then rub them through a sieve or colander, and to every pint of pulp put a pound of white sugar powdered fine; then put it in a preserving-kettle over the fire, stir it until the whole is of the consistence of a jelly, then take it off; put the marmalade in small jars or tumblers, and cover as directed for jelly.

BLACKBERRIES.—Preserve these as strawberries or currants, either liquid, or jam, or jelly. Blackberry jelly or jam is an excellent medicine in summer complaints or dysentery. To make it, crush a quart of fully ripe blackberries with a pound of the best loaf-sugar; put it over a gentle fire and cook it until thick; then put to it a gill of the best fourth-proof brandy; stir it a while over the fire, then put it in pots.

BLACKBERRY AND WINE CORDIAL.—We avail ourselves of the kindness of a friend to publish the following excellent receipt for making cordial. It is recommended as a delightful beverage and an infallible specific for diarrhœa or ordinary disease of the bowels:—

Receipt.—To half a bushel of blackberries, well washed, add a quarter of a pound of allspice, two ounces of cinnamon, two ounces of cloves; pulverize well, mix, and boil slowly until properly done; then strain or squeeze the juice through homespun or flannel, and add to each pint of the juice one pound of loaf sugar; boil again for some time, take it off, and while cooling, add half a gallon of the best Cognac brandy.

Dose.—For an adult, half a gill to a gill; for a child, a teaspoonful or more, according to age.

BLACKBERRY WINE.—The following is said to be an excellent receipt for the manufacture of superior wine from blackberries: Measure your berries and bruise them, to every gallon adding one quart of boiling water; let the mixture stand twenty-four hours, stirring occasionally; then strain off the liquor into a cask, to every gallon adding two pounds of sugar; cork tight, and let stand till the following October, and you will have wine ready for use, without any further straining or boiling, that will make lips smack as they never smacked, under similar influence, before.

GRAPES JELLY.—Strip from their stalks some fine ripe black-cluster grapes, and stir them with a wooden spoon over a gentle fire until all have burst, and the juice flows freely from them; strain it off without pressure, and pass it through a jelly-bag, or through a twice-folded muslin; weigh and then boil it rapidly for twenty minutes; draw it from the fire, stir in it till dissolved fourteen ounces of good sugar, roughly powdered, to each pound of juice, and boil the jelly quickly for fifteen minutes longer, keeping it constantly stirred, and perfectly well skimmed. It will be very clear, and of a beautiful pale rose-color.

QUINCE AND APPLE JELLY.—Cut small and core an equal weight of tart apples and quinces: put the quinces in a preserving kettle, with water to cover them, and boil till soft; add the apples, still keeping water to cover them, and boil till the whole is nearly a pulp; put the whole into a jelly-bag, and strain without pressing.

TOMATOES.

TOMATO PRESERVES.—Take the round yellow variety as soon as ripe, scald and peel; then to seven pounds of tomatoes add seven pounds of white sugar, and let them stand over night; take the tomatoes out of the sugar, and boil the syrup, removing the scum; put in the tomatoes, and boil gently fifteen or twenty minutes; remove the fruit again, and boil until the syrup thickens. On cooling, put the fruit into jars, and pour the syrup over it, and add a few slices of lemon to each jar, and you will have something to please the taste of the most fastidious.

TO PICKLE TOMATOES.—Always use those which are thoroughly ripe. The small round ones are decidedly the best. Do not prick them, as most receipt-books direct. Let them lie in strong brine three or four days, then put them down in layers in your jars, mixing with them small onions and pieces of horseradish; then pour on the vinegar (cold), which should be first spiced as for peppers; let there be a spice-bag to throw into every pot. Cover them carefully, and set them by in the cellar for a full month before using.

TOMATO CATSUP.—Take ripe tomatoes, and scald them just sufficient to allow you to take off the skin; then let them stand for a day, covered with salt; strain them thoroughly to remove the seeds; then to every two quarts, add three ounces of cloves, two of black pepper, two nutmegs, and a very little Cayenne pepper, with a little salt; boil the liquor for half an hour, and then let it cool and settle; add a pint of the best cider vinegar, after which bottle it, corking and sealing it tightly. Keep it always in a cool place.

Another way.—Take one bushel of tomatoes, and boil them until they are soft; squeeze them through a fine wire sieve, and add half a gallon of vinegar, one pint and a half of salt, two ounces of cloves, quarter of a pound of allspice, two ounces of Cayenne pepper, three teaspoonfuls of black pepper, five heads of garlic skinned and separated; mix together, and boil about three hours; or until reduced to about one-half; then bottle, without straining.

DRINKS FOR HOT WEATHER.

APPLEADE.—Cut two large apples in slices, and pour a quart of boiling water on them; strain well, and sweeten. To be drunk when cold, or iced.

INDIAN GINGER BEER.—To ten quarts of boiling water add two ounces of pounded ginger, one ounce of cream of tartar, two limes, and two pounds of sugar. Stir until cold, then strain through flannel until quite clear, adding a pint of good beer, and four wineglassfuls of good toddy. Bottle, tie down the corks, shake each bottle well for some time, place them upright, and they will be fit to drink the next day. This ginger beer will not keep long.

ORGEAT.—Blanch and pound three-quarters of a pound of sweet almonds, and thirty bitter almonds, with one tablespoonful of water. Stir in by degrees two pints of water and three pints of milk, and strain the whole through a cloth. Dissolve one-half a pound of loaf sugar in one pint of water; boil, skim well, and mix with the almond water, adding two tablespoonfuls of orange-flower water, and one teacupful of good brandy.

REFRESHING SUMMER BEVERAGE.—Take one-half an ounce cream of tartar, the juice and rind of a lemon, one half a pound of loaf sugar, and one-quarter an ounce of bruised ginger. Pour on these half a gallon of boiling water, stand till cold, and strain through a hair sieve.

LEMONADE.—Boil together and skim one pound of loaf-sugar, and one-half a pint of water. Melt in a teaspoonful of water, one-half an ounce of citric or tartaric acid. Let the syrup stand until it is cold, and then add the acid and a teaspoonful of essence of lemon, and when it is wanted for use, four quarts of water, and a little more sugar, if desired.

SHERBET.—Boil two pounds of sugar in a quart of water. Pare six oranges and two lemons very thin. Mix together the boiling syrup, the peel of the fruit, the juice, and five more pints of water. Clear it with a little white of egg, let it be until cold, strain it, and bottle it.

WATER-MELON SHERBET. A BENGAL RECIPE.—Let the melon be cut in half, and the inside of the fruit be worked up and mashed with a spoon, till it assumes the consistency of a thick pulp. Introduce into this as much pounded white candy or sugar as may suit your taste, a wineglassful of fresh rose-water, and two wineglasses of sherry. Pour, when strained, the contents into a jug, and fill your tumblers as often as needed. This makes a very agreeable drink in summer.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

DEAR MR. GODEY: I have been a subscriber to your Book for four years, and I consider it indispensable. If I am wearied with my domestic duties, I have only to take up Godey, and it is soon forgotten as I turn its fascinating pages. I think its equal cannot be found. The engravings are perfectly exquisite, and it is a mystery to me how you can furnish and afford so much that is both valuable and interesting in each number at the price you ask for the work.

FROM AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

Here are some receipts which I know to be good, and am most happy to furnish you with:—

FRUIT CAKE.—One pound of flour, one pound of sugar, three-quarters of a pound of butter, two pounds seeded raisins, two pounds of currants, one pound of citron, a quarter pound of almonds, half an ounce of mace, one teaspoon saleratus, one wineglass of brandy, one ditto of wine, ten eggs. Stir butter and sugar together to a cream, add the whites and yolks of the eggs beaten separately to a froth, stir in the flour, then the wine, then brandy and spice. Add the saleratus and fruit just before it is put in the oven; it takes over two hours to bake if baked in a milk-pan.

MOUNTAIN CAKE.—One pound of flour, one pound of sugar, half a pound of butter, five eggs, one cup of milk, saleratus, one gill of liquor.

FAIR CAKE.—Five coffee cups flour, three of sugar, two of butter, one of milk, one of yeast, five eggs, gill and one-half of wine, one pound of raisins. Take milk, and yeast, and one half of the materials, and stir them up, and let them stand over night; add the remainder in the morning, and bake.

COCOANUT CAKE.—One coffee cup of butter, three of sugar, one of milk, four and a half of flour, four eggs—the whites beaten to a stiff froth—one teaspoon of soda, two of cream tartar, one cocoa-nut grated. Excellent.

FRENCH CAKE.—Two cups sugar, three of flour, half a cup butter, three eggs, one cup milk, two teaspoons cream tartar, one teaspoon soda.

JUMBLES.—Three cups of sugar, two of butter, three eggs, four tablespoonfuls of sour cream, one teaspoon saleratus. Roll thin, sprinkle coffee sugar thickly on the top before placing them in the oven.

TO MAKE YEAST.—Five large potatoes, one quart of boiling water, one cup of brown sugar, one cup of yeast. Boil your potatoes, and sift them; add your sugar, when milk-warm, your yeast; half a cup is sufficient for two loaves.

ORANGE COLOR.—Two ounces of saleratus, one ounce of otter, six quarts of soft water. Dip your yarn in hot water, then in the dye. Boil one hour.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO WASH LAWN AND MUSLIN.—Delicate lawn and muslin dresses are so frequently spoiled by bad washing, the colors of the fabrics yielding so readily to the action of soap, that it is better to adopt a method of cleaning the finest materials, and imparting to them the appearance of newness. Take two quarts of wheat bran, and boil it for half an hour in soft water. Let it cool, then strain it, and pour the strained liquor into the water in which the dress is to be washed. Use no soap. One rinsing alone is required, and no starch. The bran water not only removes the dirt, and insures against change of color, but gives the fabric a pleasanter stiffness than any preparation of starch. If the folds are drawn from the skirts and sleeves, the dress will iron better; and will appear, when prepared in this way, as fresh as new.

REMOVING GREASE SPOTS OUT OF SILK.—Take a lump of magnesia, and rub it wet over the spot; let it dry, then brush the powder off, and the spot will disappear; or, take a visiting card, separate it, and rub the spot with the soft internal part, and it will disappear without taking the gloss of the silk.

HOW TO REMOVE MILDEW FROM LINEN.—First of all take some soap (any common sort will do), and rub it well into the linen, then scrape some chalk very fine, and rub that in also; lay the linen on the grass, and as it dries wet it again; twice or thrice doing will remove the mildew stains.

All linen will turn yellow if kept long unused, locked up in a linen press, excluded from air and light; so the best way that I have found of restoring it to its color, is to expose it to the open air in nice dry weather. Exposure to the light and continual airings will be found the best way of preserving its whiteness. I know of none other.

VARNISH FOR RUSTIC GARDEN SEATS.—First wash the woodwork with soap and water, and when dry do it over, on a hot, sunny day, with common boiled linseed oil; leave that to dry for a day or two, and then varnish it once or twice with what is commonly termed "hard varnish." If well done, it will last for years, and will prevent any annoyance from insects.

TO PREVENT MITES IN CHEESE.—A cheese painted over with melted suet, so as to form a thin coat over the outside, never has mites.

WOMAN:

HER PLACE IN THE PLAN OF REDEMPTION.

"God sent forth his Son made of a woman."

In the wonderful mystery of Redemption, "two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided; whereof is one Christ very God and very Man."<sup>6</sup> In this holy union of Divinity and Humanity, WOMAN was the medium between the two natures; and also from her substance the pure nature of the Man Christ Jesus, with His perfect Mind, and Heart, and Soul, as well as all His perfection of bodily organs, was derived.

Are not these sacred truths, which all Christian men believe and teach, proofs of the high moral destiny of woman and of the paramount moral influence she was, by her Creator, designed to wield over the race, not only in the Redemption, but also in Eden? Remember Eve was not made from "the dust of the ground," as Adam was, but from his flesh and bone; that is, from living material, which is surely more perfect than inert matter. True, their bodily elements, chemically tested, would have been found similar; like diamond from carbon, woman had been formed from out of man; still the process, which refined her purity and beauty, did not alter this elemental identity; hence they were one in the flesh. Yet why was this record of the first human pair given, if not to teach us that the wife was of finer mould, destined to the purest moral and spiritual offices, the heart and the soul of humanity, as the husband was the head and the hand?

After the Fall, when the Lord God revealed His purpose of Redemption, was it not based on the moral nature of woman and her Seed? "I will put enmity between thee and the woman;" when the Lord God made that declaration to the Tempter or Satan, was there not assurance given that the woman had still the disposition towards good which would be opposed to evil in this world? The conflict with sin was first to be waged with her and by her. How could this be, unless she was then endowed with the germ of divine grace which, unfolded by the breath of the Holy Spirit, would, in the fulness of time, be honored by "her Seed" the glorious Saviour, who "would put all His enemies under His feet?"

The life and character of Jesus Christ are conclusive proofs that His human origin was from the feminine nature. All His manifestations of feeling and affection, of thought and reasoning are womanly. Examine the doctrines He taught, the duties and virtues He enforced, the examples He set—where, in any of these, are the distinctive qualities and talents men vaunt as proofs of masculine greatness and glory? Physical strength, earthly honor, worldly wisdom, even the gifts of intellect and the acquirements of learning—Jesus the Son of God, put all these down far, far beneath love, meekness, mercy, purity, patience, charity, humility—qualities, graces, and characteristics always considered peculiarly feminine; qualities and graces his blessed Mother had possessed and commended.

Moreover, during all His ministry women drew His marked manifestations of confidence and sympathy. Not only was His first miracle done at the suggestion of a woman, but the two most wonderful miracles—raising the dead to life, were both proofs of His deep sympathy with their heart sorrows. And He trusted to one of these lowly and despised women His most precious confidence, even the secret of His spiritual mission, which He had not revealed to his chosen disciples; men who were to found His church on earth and be Apostles of His religion for the world. Christ had instructed these men, had sent them forth to do miracles and to preach "The kingdom of heaven is at hand;" still they thought this reign was to be earthly and temporal: there is no record that they made a single convert to Christ as the Messiah. But when Jesus met the "woman of Samaria" and had revealed to her His spiritual mission, she went her way and immediately taught that He was "the Christ"—and "many believed on Him" from her testimony. A woman understood him, and was the first teacher of His doctrine of spiritual worship.

Take the whole example of Christ's life, does it not show that perfect manhood is manifested in the submission of the human will to the Divine Will? that thus results the power of comprehending truth and teaching wisdom, of doing good works, of becoming fit for the kingdom of Heaven? Did not Christ, by His example as well as precepts, place love and duty far above worldly understanding and physical power? And did not the women who heard His teachings show that, better than the men, they felt the truth and wisdom of His words, believed in His divine mission, loved him as a personal Saviour from sin and sorrow: in short, that womanhood had retained the Eden sympathy with perfect manhood, which the men of earth had lost?

Indeed, one of the most wonderful circumstances of Christ's earthly ministry is sympathy with the feminine nature, and the tenderness, devotion, and steadfastness with which He was loved, trusted, and worshipped by all women. Not in a single instance did Jesus find an enemy, or opposer in the sex. From His first miracle women were faithful in their discipleship, ministering to Him, welcoming Him to Jerusalem, bringing their most precious offerings, their "little children" to His arms—when men, His disciples, would have thrust them away. When Christ's hour of trial had come, the awful hour, when Satan and his seed (devils and wicked men) were to have their triumph and "bruise His heel"—when all men seemed to spurn or to shun Him; even then the Gentile woman, Pilate's wife, plead His cause; and as the rejected and condemned Saviour was led up to Calvary to be crucified, "many women" followed weeping and bewailing. He had been betrayed by one of His own chosen twelve; all the others fled from Him, excepting the youngest, the most loving, the woman-like John. He and three faithful women stood by the Cross; and the women followed to the sepulchre, "to see where He was laid;" and went home only to weep and work for Him, preparing "sweet spices" to do honor to their beloved dead, when the Passover was ended.

How these faithful women were honored! Angels met them at the sepulchre; the risen Saviour showed Himself first to these feminine disciples: and to these women He gave the first gospel mission, that of telling (or teaching) the Apostles the great doctrine they were to preach to all the world—that Christ had risen from the dead!

But why, if women were thus good and gifted, and faithful, in comparison with men, why was not the public ministry of the Gospel committed to them? That such was not the will of God is sufficient answer to all who truly believe His word; but the apparent reasons are clear and cogent, and will be treated of in our next paper. Now we will briefly indicate the Gospel parallel between the sexes.

Four pictures are sketched by the finger of Omnipotence; four times the Son of God, during His life on earth, judged between the man and the woman, brought into close comparison beneath the eye of our Omniscient Redeemer who could not err. Let us examine His record of their characters and deeds.

A table is spread in the hospitable home of Simon the Pharisee, and Jesus sits at the feast. The host, proud of his guest and satisfied with his own display of homage, is startled and shocked to see an outcast woman dare to creep into his respectable dwelling and throw herself at the feet of Jesus. She, who was once the flower of innocent beauty, is now a "sinner," cast out and trampled down like a worthless wayside weed; while Simon the Pharisee, having means to give feasts and being a man, is honored and followed, as man will be, and, whatever has been his own life, can look with contempt and disgust on the poor, weeping Magdalen. How he despises her as she, all unconscious of his scorn, is washing with her warm tears the feet of her beloved Saviour; and, as she wipes them with her clustering hair, what contrite kisses she presses on those blessed feet that have brought to her breaking heart and blasted hopes the tidings of salvation! The Pharisee cannot comprehend her heart, and he questions in his own mind whether Jesus is a true prophet, because He does not spurn her away.

"I have somewhat to say to thee, Simon," was the Saviour's reply to the self-satisfied man's thought; and the Pharisee then learned the lesson, which lies at the foundation of all true worship of the true God, that the love of the worshipper's heart is the homage most acceptable to Divine mercy; that this "perfect love," which "casteth out fear," and all selfishness also, is the gift which penitent woman brings to God in her humility; while man, in his pride of wealth and of reason, seeks to display his own right and power to judge of God's ways and to guide his own.

The story of that woman's love—"for she loved much"—has brought thousands to the feet of the Saviour: who was ever made better or happier by the Pharisee's feat?

The Temple is thronged. Priest and Levite, scribe, and lawyer, and Pharisee—the noble, the honorable are there; for are not all the ambitious and respectable people of Jerusalem bringing their gifts to the Treasury of the Lord? What large offerings! How every rich man, as he casts in his gold, feels his heart swell with pride and joy as he thinks of the great amount given, and that his name will be among the worthy and liberal donors!

Unnoticed, as in the bright sunshine the nightingale would be in an assemblage of eagles and rooks, of peacocks and parrots, a pale, meek-eyed woman, in her toil-worn raiment of the humblest life, is softly winning her way towards the table of costly offerings. She brings her gift, richer than all the gold of Ophir, a heart full of faith in "the widow's God;" and as the little brown bird, unseen in day-time, makes night glorious with his song of love, so, in the loneliness and darkness of her earthly lot, this woman's faith has sung its song of love, trust, and thankfulness to her Lord, till she can bring "all that she had" to His Treasury.

We have the Saviour's testimony that this poor widow gave "more than all the others." Her "two mites, which make a farthing," offered in faith and receiving God's blessing, have made her example the seed of charities which have, from that day to this, sprung up in the hearts of lowly Christians, blossoming and bearing rich fruits for the true Church; thus aiding the spread of the blessed Gospel to the ends of the earth.

Again the Temple opens; not for gifts to God: the stern terrors of His violated Law are now to be invoked. A guilty woman is brought before the Saviour. He is told that "Moses in the Law commanded such to be stoned; but what sayest thou?"

Did not that miserable woman feel there was hope of mercy even for her, when she saw who was the Judge? Scribes, and Pharisees, and a crowd of honorable men are waiting Christ's decision. Will He venture to controvert the Law of Moses? Christ forgives sinners in general, but will he dare set aside judgment on the heinous sin which this woman has had proven against her? And that throng of honorable men, how their eyes flashed with joy as they anticipated a triumph over the self-styled Son of God!

His reply (which the crowd loudly demanded)—"He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her"—sent that multitude of men like branded felons from his presence;—leaving the woman uncondemned! And Christ, who knew her wrongs, temptations, sorrows, and repentance—for the poor, feeble, fallen woman called Him "Lord," and submitted herself to His guidance—did not condemn her, while condemning her sin. In this judging between the sexes, has not Christ given His own record that men are the greatest sinners?

Once more at the feet of Jesus. The believing Mary is there offering her sacrifice of love, faith, and adoration—all included in the fervent piety with which she anointed "His head" and "His feet!"

As the "precious ointment" fills the room with its sweet odor, do the chosen disciples, men who have followed Him, and known, as they think, His will, feel their minds in harmony with His, like the mind of this loving woman? Do they not, even the holiest among them, believe that "ointment" might have been "sold," and done more good in secular or charitable uses? One there certainly was the "thief," who "carried the bag," and coveted the worth of the ointment for his own benefit. Not one of those men comprehended the feelings and faith of Mary in her pious duty; nor did they understand that she, by that "costly incense," showed forth the inestimable value of the gift of life and salvation, which the death of Jesus Christ would confer on all believers, and that the redeemed should bring their best, their dearest treasures to His feet.

"She hath wrought a good work upon Men"—was the testimony of the blessed Saviour. What greater glory can be given to a human deed?

SENSATION NOVELS.

THE London Quarterly Review for April has a long and well-written article on this subject, cutting up, by title, twenty-four of the latest of these English works. The list shows that the best of these only have been republished in America; the worst and silliest trash is treasured for the circulating libraries of British novel-readers.

As a preventive of still a "lower deep" in this "sinking fund" of English literature, the Reviewer proposes to resuscitate the novels of Scott and other writers of his time, these works being now obsolete. He says:—

"By way of experiment, we should like to see a 'Lending Library' established, which should circulate no books but those which have received the stamp of time in testimony of their merits. No book should be admitted under twenty years old—a very liberal allowance for the life of a modern novel, and which is long enough to give rise to a new generation who could not have read the book on its first coming out. A real competition between old favorites and new would have a good effect, not in destroying, which is not to be wished, but in weeding the luxuriant produce of the present day. The appetite, even of a novel-reader, has its limits; and, if the best of the old books could be brought in, the worst of the new must drop out to make way for them."

We wish this plan could be tried in our large cities.

VALEDICTORY ADDRESS, to the Graduating Class of the Female Medical College of Pennsylvania, at the Eleventh Annual Commencement, March 14th, 1863. By Emmeline H. Cleveland, M. D.

Mrs. Cleveland is at the head of the Women's Hospital of Philadelphia, and respected by all who have the privilege of her acquaintance, as one of the "honorable women," who are working for the cause of humanity in the true faith of the Gospel. This lady was educated for a missionary physician to her own sex; the ill health of her husband, a Presbyterian clergyman, prevented them from going abroad; she then devoted herself to the College for women physicians in this city, and when the Women's Hospital was to be established, went to Paris, and passed a year in the celebrated Hospital Maternité. We can give only a short extract of her excellent and beautiful address; but we hope any lady interested in these subjects will apply for copies of the Report on the Hospital, and also for this Address, to Mrs. Cleveland, Women's Hospital, North College Avenue, Twenty-Second St., Philadelphia.

DUTIES OF THE PHYSICIAN.

"The physician should be alike impartial to the rich and the poor, lavishing his attentions upon the most sick and the most unfortunate, and never refusing his care, in an urgent case, to a fellow- mortal, however unworthy—be he a personal enemy, the enemy of one's country or of humanity, or to whatever extent degraded by debauchery and crime.

Perhaps, in a moral sense, this forgetfulness of social distinctions, and this self-abnegation is more especially required of women who would make themselves ministers of good to their kind. The duties of the physician are not limited to the relief of the physical sufferings of his patients, and when we remember the low estate of women in mental culture and attainments, the manifold hindrances which place themselves in her pathway toward excellence in any department, and the sorrow with which an erring daughter of Eve's continually repented of her fault, and plunged deeper in ruin, we cannot but regard it as one of the distinctive missions of the woman physician, in giving her portion to the defence of the public health, that she spare no effort for the instruction and elevation of women, especially that she endeavor to diffuse correct hygienic notions, and to inculcate those moral precepts from which one may not depart without danger to health and life."

PIANOS.—A parlor without a piano seems like a greeting without a smile. Music in the family always includes the idea of cheerfulness at home; and also a resource, when one is not cheerful, which will supply the place of pleasant conversation. Therefore, we like to aid our friends in their efforts to obtain good instruments, and in reply to several inquiries, we commend the pianos of Messrs. Boardman & Gray (Albany, N. Y.), as excellent. These instruments are celebrated for their fine tone and beautiful finish. Ladies who have small parlors will find the cottage style very convenient and ornamental; and, moreover, reasonable in price. The large pianos are magnificent. Our friends cannot fail of being suited to their taste and means. We cannot enter into particulars, but those who are interested may easily obtain all needed information from their circulars.

Address Siberia Ott, agent for Boardman & Gray, 726 Broadway, New York.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted:—"The Soldier's Dream"—"My first Venture"—"Dreamland"—"The Faded Flower"—"Friendship's Whisper."

These articles are declined; we are not able to accept some that we like for want of room—"She is not Dead, but Sleepeth"—"Kate"—"The Aged Lunatic"—"Guardian Angels"—"Love"—"The Dying Indian Girl"—"My Favorite Flower"—"Tribute of Respect"—"The Beautiful Night"—"The Broken Engagement"—"The Two Nellies"—"A Pain Story of Real Life"—"My Dream and what it taught me" (no other article needed at present)—"My Theme"—"To E****" and the other poem (we are obliged to decline)—"Freedom"—"Aggravating Circumstances"—"The Lost and Found"—"My Fortune"—"Song"—"Going to Saratoga"—"The East Wind"—and "Agnes Day."

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

MUMPS.—This is a common affection of children and young persons. It is a contagious inflammation of one or both the glands beneath the ear, called the parotid glands.

Symptoms.—Slight feverishness, with stiffness of the jaws, and redness, soreness, and swelling of one or both of the above glands.

Treatment.—A mild laxative of Epsom salts if the bowels are costive; the warm bath or warm wet-sheet pack; warm sweating teas of sage, balm, etc.; or cold water, if there is much fever. As local applications to the throat, it is the custom to use all kinds of stimulating liniments, poultices, and plasters, under the idea that the disease may be driven off to some other part. But the danger from this source is much exaggerated, and there is no good reason to believe that cold applications have any tendency to cause translocation of the disease. We have no hesitation, therefore, in recommending cold wet cloths to the throat, where there is considerable fever and local inflammation. Should the inflammation be slight, a flannel bound around the throat will be all-sufficient. When the inflammation runs high, the wet cloths should be frequently changed, and exposed to the air, so that the cooling process of evaporation may go on freely. But when the inflammation is more moderate, a towel, three or four double, should be dipped in water, applied over the affected part, and then a dry binder should be placed over the towel. This acts as a warm poultice, and promotes perspiration of the skin to which it is applied, while it is far superior in comfort, cleanliness, and convenience to any kind of poultice or plaster. The diet of a patient with mumps should be light and unstimulating, and exposure to cold should be avoided for some time after the subsidence of the disease.

CONSTITUTIONS CREATED.

To build up a good constitution, we must take good care of what we have, and add to it, by pretty hard work and moderate thought, until the age of forty-five; then, there should be less work and more thought.

Bodily labor consolidates the constitution up to forty-five; then, mental labor preserves it, keeps it good to the verge of fourscore years, if the bodily activities are very moderate. As witness Humboldt, who was a great traveller in early life; but from fifty to ninety a great student. Many similar instances will occur to intelligent minds. The general idea is of great practical importance. Work hard until forty-five; think hard after, and all the while, be "temperate in all things." This is to live long.—Dr. Hall.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE INITIALS. A Story of Modern Life. We are glad to see a new edition of this most charming and excellent work by the Baroness Tautphœus. The public are already too familiar with the work to need any extended description of it. Therefore it will suffice us to say that as a picture of domestic life in Germany it is most entertaining, and, we believe, truthful.

THE CONSCRIPT. A Tale of War. By Alexander Dumas, author of "The Count of Monte Cristo," "The Three Guards-men," etc. etc. Dumas has gone out of his usual track in the writing of this book. It is free from many of the faults of the majority of his works, and a book we can recommend without reservation. It is pastoral in its character, and its moral tone is good.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

AT ODDS. By the Baroness Tautphœus, author of "Quits," "The Initials," etc. This, we believe, is a new work by that charming writer, the Baroness Tautphœus. As a delineator of German life and German character she is not excelled. The scene is laid in Bavaria, and the time a half century since, when Napoleon was first Consul of France, and Bavaria and Tyrol were the theatres of various military operations. Interwoven with the story is an interesting account of the Tyrolean revolution.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A HISTORY OF THE INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. By John William Draper, M. D., LL. D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York; author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," etc. This is a large volume of over six hundred pages, in which its author makes a minute, careful, and comprehensive examination of his subject. His introductory chapter argues the absolute effect of temperature and geography upon the physical and intellectual development of man. He then turns to Greece as presenting the earliest evidence of intellectual progress; and, beginning with what can be deduced from tradition and mythology, traces civilization up to the highest degree represented by that nation. The intellectual progress of both Greece and Europe he divides into five periods, namely: The Age of Credulity; the Age of Inquiry; the Age of Faith; the Age of Reason; and the Age of Decrepitude; premising, however, that Europe at the present time is in the fourth degree of progress. He reviews history and religion from his own stand-point; and though opinions may differ in regard to many of his conclusions, all who give him their attention will be convinced of the learning and ability which have aided him in the production of this work.

ST. OLAVE'S. A Novel. In this story the aristocratic proclivities of a little cathedral city are made the especial theme; and the exclusiveness and self-righteousness of Mrs. Archdeacon Scrymgeour, who might be called a representative woman of her class, are brought into strong contrast with the loving charity of Mrs. Amiel Grey. Miss Alice Grey, the heroine, is a very pleasing little lady, without any particularly striking traits.

THE FAIRY BOOK. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. The stories of "Cinderella," "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Puss in Boots," etc.; will find interested readers and listeners among the little folks to the latest generation. Nor do we think we need say they will prove additionally attractive in the garb which Miss Mulock has provided for them. The book contains thirty-five of the best popular fairy stories.

XENOPHONTIS ANABASIS. Recent J. F. Mac-michael, A. B. This book belongs to Harper's superior series of Greek and Latin Texts.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. Nos. 3 and 4 have been received. Price only 25 cents per number. There must be an immense sale to pay the expense of getting up this work. It is splendidly illustrated.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

TWO PICTURES; or, What we Think of Ourselves, and what the World Thinks of Us. By M. J. McIntosh, author of "Two Lives; or, to Seem and to Be;" "Charms and Counter Charms," etc. An excellently written story, the aim of which is to show the vast influence for good which the Southern planter may exert over his dependents. Hugh Moray, the hero of the book, is a noble man, and his schemes for the amelioration of the condition of his slaves truly commendable.

EVIDENCE AS TO MAN'S PLACE IN NATURE. By Thomas H. Huxley, F. R. S., F. L. S., Professor of Natural History in the Jermyn Street School of Mines. Mr. Huxley brings forward a long mooted question as to whether man as an animal is identified with the same Order to which belong Apes. This by a course of reasoning, sustained by much physiological evidence, he decides in the affirmative. He says: "Our reverence for the nobility of manhood will not be lessened by the knowledge, that man is, in substance and in structure, one with the brutes; and that we must look to his intellectual and moral faculties to account for the vast difference which separates them."

LECTURES ON THE SYMBOLIC CHARACTER OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES. By Rev. Abiel Silver, Minister of the New Jerusalem Church in New York. The subject of these lectures is one which Swedenborg loved particularly to dilate upon, as those familiar with his writings well know. This symbolic character, which, if it be correct, places upon the Scriptures the indelible stamp of truth, is certainly very beautiful in theory. These lectures, now gathered in book form, were designed as simple and plain lessons of instruction to those unacquainted with the Science of Correspondences.

MONEY. By Charles Moran. As next to war and politics, the subject of finances most occupies the public mind, this book will not come inopportunistly. It opens with a brief history of money from the earliest times, and in the course of its pages gives a description of the financial systems of England, France, and the United States.

THE CRISIS. This pamphlet will find many attentive readers among politicians. It goes over the grounds of our present national difficulties from their commencement, and is strongly State Rights in character.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

FRANK WARRINGTON. By the author of "Rutledge," and "The Sutterlands." This unknown author is certain to make a sensation whenever she appears before the public. With the prestige of her former success, this, her last production, has a sure passport to popularity. To add to its interest it is a story of to-day; the first word of the book is "enlisted," and its masculine characters are soldiers.

MARIAN GREY; or, The Heiress of Redstone Hall. By Mrs. Mary J. Holmes, author of "Lena Rivers," "Tempest and Sunshine," etc. This story is about a young wife who, on discovering that her husband had married her unwillingly, in compliance with his father's dying request, disappears from her home; and despite of all her husband's efforts to find her, remains absent for a number of years. However, when time has perfected both physical and mental graces, she returns unrecognized in the capacity of a governess, and in accordance with her strongest desires, the former indifferent husband becomes her lover, and "they live happily ever after."

INCIDENTS IN MY LIFE. By D. D. Home. With an Introduction by Judge Edmonds. All have heard of Home, who during the past few years has kept up such an interest in Europe in the so-called spiritual manifestations. Foreign correspondents have, from time to time, furnished us with on dits concerning his whereabouts and doings. The book before us is a personal narrative, we must confess very modestly written of his life both in this country and abroad, and a description of the phenomena which have made his name so well-known. As his book has already found extensive sale in England, and as he himself has been received cordially among the highest social classes throughout Europe, and has even connected himself by marriage with a noble Russian family, we can safely say that readers will not be lacking here for so remarkable a work.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

THE DEVOUT CHURCHMAN'S COMPANION; or, a Faithful Guide in Prayer, Meditation, and the Reception of the Holy Eucharist. Edited by Rev. W. H. Odenheimer, A. M., Rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, author of "Young Churchman Catechized," "The True Catholic no Romanist," etc. This is a beautiful devotional book, which cannot fail to meet the approbation of every one in the Episcopal communion.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

LIFE IN THE OPEN AIR, and other Papers. By Theodore Winthrop, author of "Cecil Dreeme," "John Brent," etc. This is the last which the public will receive of Winthrop's writings. They are just as fresh, and characterized by the same raciness and abandon as his previous works. The "Other Papers" form the larger portion of the volume and comprise a humorous sketch, entitled "Love and Skates," "New York Seventh Regiment—Our March to Washington," "Washington as a Camp," etc. etc. There is a beautiful steel engraving of Winthrop, copied from a crayon likeness, fronting the title-page.

LILIAN. We are half pleased, half displeased with this book. The plot is poetic in the extreme, and we sometimes feel tempted to regard it as an exquisite prose-poem. Again, the short sentences, and construction, half French, yet lacking the French naivete, weary one from their tameness. Yet this fault is more evident in the first pages of the book than in succeeding ones. The episode of the danseuse is touching; the description of Lilian's life in Italy beautiful and highly imaginative; while there is something almost sublime in the picture of the great grief that came upon her, and her resignation to the will of God.

GOOD THOUGHTS IN BAD TIMES, and other Papers. By Thomas Fuller, D. D. This is a reprint of an excellent work by a most excellent man. The general division of its contents is: "Good Thoughts in Bad Times," "Good Thoughts in Worse Times," "Mixed Contemplations in Better Times," and "The Cause and Cure of a Wounded Conscience." These are again divided into "Personal Meditations," "Scriptural Observations," "Historical Applications," etc. etc. The publishers have brought out this volume now, because there is much in it relevant to the present disturbed state of our country.

THE GENTLEMAN. By George H. Calvert. A pleasing and profitable book, in which the Gentleman is presented in all his phases, including the ancient gentleman of refined Greece and Rome, the rather barbarous specimen of early Irish history, with those who claim the name at the present day. Many individuals are cited as examples of true gentlemen, among whom are named Sir Philip Sidney, Charles Lamb, and Washington; while the first "gentleman in Europe" is declared to have been "the commonest metal, glaringly painted, gorgeously gilt;" and Napoleon I. is set down as a "sublime snob." The style of this book is easy and attractive, and no one can peruse it without a higher estimate of the true gentleman.

THE STORY OF THE GUARD: A Chronicle of the War. By Jessie Benton Fremont. The immense demand for this book, especially among the soldiers, has induced the publishers to issue what they term a "Knapsack edition," in a cheap form, to bring it more easily within the reach of all who may desire it.

From T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN JOHN DANGEROUS. A narrative in plain English, attempted by George Augustus Sala. Mr. Sala has evidently made use of historic researches to place before the public a picture of society, its ideas, manners, and habits, at a period more than a century remote from the present. If the statements of the notable Captain Dangerous may be relied upon, the world has made considerable progress in civilization since then, the contemplation of which fact ought to silence those who are continually regretting the "good old times." This narrative, which does not aspire to having a plot, and reads as a simple autobiography, is most amusing.

AMERICAN PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND LITERARY GAZETTE, No. 2. We have received No. 2 of this invaluable work from the publisher, GEORGE W. CHILDS, 62s and 63s Chestnut Street.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR AUGUST.—Our engraving this month is one that will call to the mind of all the beautiful prayer of our religion. Some time since, we published "Our Father who art in Heaven;" this is "Hallowed be thy name." Read the admirable illustration by the Rev. H. Hastings Weld.

Our Fashion-plate contains six beautiful colored and seasonable figures. We pride ourselves upon thus giving the fashions of the months correctly engraved and beautifully colored.

"A Sudden Shower"—just as school is dismissed; giving juvenile gallantry an opportunity of displaying itself.

We give in this number two more fashions from the renowned establishment of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., of New York. Remember, no other magazine has these fashions. We also give two entirely new styles of dresses, in addition, just received by the last arrival from Paris. More, also, of the newest styles of head-dresses will be found in the August number; and an infinite variety of everything in the way of fashions and articles for the work-table, that will be pleasing to our lady subscribers.

OUR CARTES DE VISITE.—The orders coming in, daily, for these charming portraits and pictures are very large, and still increasing. We have already supplied our friends with many thousands, and in all cases, so far as we have learned, the satisfaction has been complete. No finer photographs are made. Our list now embraces over five hundred subjects. Catalogues sent free. We send 8 cartes for $1, and 20 for $2, post-paid.

MR. GODEY.—Allow me to express to you the high estimate in which I hold your Book.—Of eight periodicals, "War Times" have compelled me to drop all but that; that I must have, it is economy to have it. With its assistance, I am Dressmaker, Milliner, Drawing-master, and Compendium of general information for the family—upon any subject, I can refer to it, assured that I shall there find just what is wanted.

Not long since an employee of the Government applied to me for some information relative to the South, which present circumstances prevented him from readily obtaining. My Lady's Book afforded me the necessary details at once.

So often have I received valuable suggestions from others, that I am quite inclined to contribute an item or two which I have not noticed in it, and which may benefit some one. The "method of preserving fruit" I have tested for several years, with unvarying success. The others, when "weighed in the balance will not be found wanting."

With best wishes for your continued success, I am respectfully yours.
Mrs. C. H. M. N.
These receipts are published elsewhere.

THAT unfortunate gentleman, who hinted in our February number what qualifications he wanted in a wife, would hardly like to see the hundred answers we have received, and to which we cannot give place, with one or two exceptions. He would be overwhelmed with the indignation he has excited.

We publish the following with great pleasure. Miss Anna E. Dickenson is well known to our readers as the able lecturer and patriotic woman:—

MR. L. A. GODEY—I thought, perhaps, you might wish to have a copy of some lines written by Miss Anna E. Dickenson some years ago. We are intimate with the family, having known Anna when she was quite young, when she brought the poetry to our house. It was written on witnessing the funeral of Dr. Kane. I therefore send it to you. Respectfully yours, E. A.

LINES,

WRITTEN ON WITNESSING DR. KANE'S FUNERAL.

'Tis a solemn scene; the mournful words
Are slowly, sadly said,
And sobs break forth, the tear-drops fall
O'er the loved and early dead.

The organ rolls its music deep,
And the anthem grand is sung;
And falls like dew the earnest prayer
On hearts with anguish wrung.

Now lift the form and bear it forth
Through the surging, living wave,
Through the city's din and ceaseless hum,
To the calm and quiet grave.

Now lay your burden gently down,
Throw the cold earth on his breast,
Give a lingering, longing look behind
Then leave him to his rest.

'Tis the last of earth! but his name shall be Embalmed in the nation's heart,
And the works he wrought, and the fame he won,
Shall be of himself a part.

And though years roll by in their ceaseless flight,
And centuries wane and wane,
As a sweet and loving household word
Shall be kept the name of KANE.

MISS ANNA E. DICKENSON.

HOW TO COLOR THE PHOTOGRAPH.—Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, have just published a little manual on the art of painting the photograph, which is for sale at the bookstores, or will be sent by them, post-paid, for 10 cents.

The same publishers are about publishing a capital story for the boys, by the author of "Father Bright-hopes." It is to be called "The Drummer Boy," and is a true historical account of "The Burnside Expedition." It will be illustrated by F. O. C. Darley, and issued in the Messrs. Tilton's well-known attractive style.

WHAT OUR FASHION EDITOR CAN SUPPLY. Address Fashion Editor, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia. Mrs. Hale is not the fashion editress.

LONGFELLOW beautifully says that "Sunday is the golden clasp that binds together the volume of the week."

DEAR MR. GODEY.—We have been grievously disappointed that the communication from a bachelor, in the February number, should have received no attention from the fair readers of "The Book," and are, therefore, somewhat inclined to believe it is ordered that we should take the matter in hand ourselves, particularly as by so doing we shall be enabled to "kill two birds with one stone"—as it has long been our intention to write Mr. Godey, and express, or attempt to express something of the pleasure we experience in conning over the pages of his estimable magazine.

We do not think of Mr. Godey as a stranger, but always as a friend; and seldom take up the book without a grateful feeling arising toward him for his untiring efforts in behalf of us ladies. A good book is a great gift—and certainly the maker of such should rank one of mankind's "great benefactors" (ergo, Mr. Godey is——). When solitary and dispirited, it has been both companion and friend; but as a panacea for home sickness we can testify that the Lady's Book "bears the bell." But, we do protest against its usurping the place of "Heaven's last best gift to man" as—the arm-chair informs—a certain bachelor has so long allowed it. We admit, however, to feeling somewhat mollified that Joe Hopkins' recent transformation from a gay bachelor to a happy Benedict should have brought Joe's friend to a proper sense of his unhappy condition and—well, "to make a long story short," we confess we were charmed with the letter, and have not the slightest doubt that one who has so admirably portrayed the offices of a good wife and knows how to appreciate the Lady's Book into the bargain could be otherwise than a model husband. Not that we wish it to be understood that we could consider our individual self the one kind Heaven has fashioned in answer to his pathetic appeal, but if we could receive, now and then, from our friend a letter, such as we feel assured he could write, we should not be—ungrateful.

Hoping Mr. Godey will accept best wishes in regard to health and prosperity,

We remain,
ALWAYS A FRIEND.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE PRINCESS OF WALES, a piece of court gossip.—"Of course the charming young Dane is a Princess born, but still of a modest and comparatively humble house. I am told that, like Penelope, she is not unaccustomed to embroidery, and that she is rather proud, indeed, of her cleverness with her needle. There are many well authenticated stories of the simplicity of manners at our pure and well-ordered Court, but what would Mrs. Grundy say if she were assured on indubitable authority that a certain young Princess actually offered, in a playful mood, to show a proof of her taste and nimbleness of finger by newly trimming the bonnet of a Queen regnant? When, after much entreaty and a great deal of laughing, the desired permission has been given, the ladies in waiting, it seems, remark that the chapeau when it is brought back is much lighter and more cheerful looking than before. Their quick eyes soon discover that it has been divested of a great deal of crape. Perhaps a certain royal personage made the same discovery. Perhaps the young Princess stood timid and trembling, wondering whether the loving hint would be kindly taken. A little bird has whispered that after a momentary sigh she received a hearty and affectionate kiss, and that several pairs of loving eyes, by a not unnatural coincidence, brimmed and ran over at the same moment."

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

The Musical Monthly.—Our thanks are due to our friends everywhere for the hearty support thus far given to our new periodical. From every quarter we hear nothing but the most unqualified encomium lavished upon it, and we are in constant receipt of the most substantial kind of proof that our attempt to popularize first class piano music so as to bring it within reach of all has been entirely successful. But three numbers have been published and delivered, yet the Monthly has already received sufficient subscriptions to guarantee its faithful and regular publication no matter what contingency may arise. This for a new periodical, which was viewed as an experiment, as nothing similar in kind had ever before been published, is wonderful.

The fourth and fifth numbers, which are now ready, contain several beautiful compositions by Brinley Richards, Fritz Spindler, and other well known composers. The fourth number also contains a new ballad, Among the Roses, by the author of At the Gate, the song which was so popular in the first number. The brilliant and beautiful romance, Warblings at Eve, by Brinley Richards, is given in the fifth number at the special request of many subscribers. This piece in the music stores costs more than the price of the entire number, yet two other pieces are given, one of them a beautiful song, We Met and Talked of Other Days, by James M. Stewart. The terms of the Monthly are $3 00 per annum, in advance; four copies $10 00; single numbers 50 cents. The work is not for sale at any music store, and subscriptions must be inclosed to the publisher, J. Starr Holloway, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

New Sheet Music.—The new and enterprising publishing firm of Sawyer & Thompson, Brooklyn, have issued several new and beautiful piano songs. When This Cruel war is Over, or Weeping Sad and Lonely; Who will Care for Mother, now? and my Emma Louise; are three songs either one of which will prove, how far a certain adaptability of words to music, and the whole to the popular taste, united with tact and enterprise on the part of the publisher, will certainly secure a signal success. The first song has already attained the enormous circulation of seventy-five thousand copies; the second is almost as popular; and the third is only less so because it is the most recently published. The words of all these songs are by Chas. Carrol Sawyer, who, in their construction, has exhibited a singularly intelligent appreciation of the public taste. Call Me not Back from the Echoless Shore, is another of Mr. Sawyer's popular songs, and the best reply yet published to the famous ballad, Rock Me to Sleep, Mother. The music of two of these songs is by Henry Tucker, author of Beautiful Star. Father, Breathe an Evening Blessing, and Hear our Prayer, are two beautiful sacred compositions, the first a solo and quartette, the other a trio, with piano or organ accompaniment. Price of each of the above 25 cents. The same publishers issue a fine arrangement of When this Cruel War is Over, with variations by Grobe. Price 50 cents.

We will purchase for our friends any of the above; and can also supply the following new songs and pieces. Magdalena, brilliant fantasia, by the author of The Maiden's Prayer, 40 cents. Marche Militaire, very fine, by Glover, 30. An Alpine Farewell, nocturne by Richey, 25. Lily Leaf Polka Schottische, 10. Warblings at Eve, fine edition with colored covers, 35. We Met and Talked of Other Days, beautiful song, by J. M. Stewart, 25. I cannot Mind my Wheel, Mother, by Linley, 25. Address the Musical Editor, at Philadelphia, J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

THE HABILIMENTS OF GRIEF, FROM A COMMERCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

On the occasion of a recent visit to London, whilst I was debating with myself over the breakfast things as to how I should spend the day, I received by the post a letter deeply bordered with black, evidently a messenger of affliction. I tore the white weeping willow upon a black background which formed the device upon the seal, and read the contents. It proved to be an intimation from a relative of the sudden death of her brother-in-law, and a request that under the circumstance of the sudden bereavement of the widow, I should undertake certain sad commissions relative to the articles of mourning required by the family.

I at once set out upon my sad errand. I had no difficulty in finding the maison de deuil to which I had been referred. It met me in the sad habiliments of woe; no vulgar colors glared from the shop-windows, no gilding amazed with its festive brightness. The name of the firm scarce presumed to make itself seen in letters of the saddest gray upon a black ground. Here and there beads of white set off the general gloom of the house-front, like the craps pipings of a widow's cap. The very metal window-frames and plates had gone into a decorous mourning—zinc taking the place of what we feel under the circumstances would have been quite out of character—brass.

On my pushing the plate-glass door it gave way with a hushed and muffled sound, and I was met by a gentleman of sad expression, who, in the most sympathetic voice, inquired the nature of my want, and, on my explaining myself, directed me to the Inconsolable Grief Department. The interior of the establishment answered exactly to the appearance without. The long passage I had to traverse was panelled in white-black borderings, like so many mourning-cards placed on end; and I was rapidly becoming impressed with the deep solemnity of the place, when I caught sight of a neat little figure rolling up some ribbon; who, on my inquiring if I had arrived at the Inconsolable Grief Department, replied, almost in a tone of gayety, that that was the half-mourning counter, and that I must proceed further on until I had passed the repository for widows' silk. Following her directions, I at last reached my destination—a large room draped in black, with a hushed atmosphere about it as though somebody was lying invisibly there in state.

An attendant in sable habiliments, picked out with the inevitable white tie, and with an undertakerish eye and manner, awaited my commands. I produced my written directions. Scanning it critically, he said:—

"Permit me to inquire, sir, if it is a deceased partner?"

I nodded assent.

"We take the liberty of asking this distressing question," he continued, "as we are extremely anxious to keep up the character of our establishment by matching, as it were, the exact shade of affliction. Our paramatta and crapes give satisfaction to the deepest woe. Permit me to show you a new texture of surpassing beauty and elegance, manufactured specially for this house, and which we call the inconsolable. Quite a novelty in the trade, I do assure you, sir."

With this he placed a pasteboard box before me full of mourning fabrics.

"Is this it?" I inquired, lifting a lugubrious piece of drapery.

"Oh, no," he replied; "the one you have in your hand was manufactured for last year's affliction, and was termed 'The Stunning Blow Shade.' It makes up well, however, with our sudden bereavement silk—a leading article—and our distraction trimmings."

"I fear," said I, "my commission says nothing about these novelties."

"Ladies in the country," he blandly replied, "don't know of the perfection to which the art of mourning genteelly has been brought! But I will see that your commission is attended to to the letter." Giving another glance over my list, he observed: "Oh! I perceive a widow's cap is mentioned here. I must trouble you, sir, to proceed to the Weeds Department for that article—the first turning to the left."

Proceeding, as directed, I came to a recess fitted up with a solid phalanx of widows' caps. I perceived at a glance that they exhausted the whole gamut of grief, from its deepest shade to that tone which is expressive of a pleasing melancholy. The foremost row confronted me with the sad liveries of crapen folds, whilst those behind gradually faded off into light, ethereal tarlatan, and one or two of the outsiders were even breaking out into worldly feathers and flaunting weepers. Forgetting the proprieties of the moment, I inquired of the grave attendant if one of the latter would be suitable.

"Oh! no, sir," she replied, with a slight shade of severity in the tone of her voice; "you may gradually work up to that in a year or two. But any of these"—pointing to the first row of widows' weeds—"are suitable for the first burst of grief."

Acquiescing in the propriety of this sliding scale of sorrow, I selected some weeds expressive of the deepest dejection I could find, and, having completed my commission, inquired where I could procure for myself some lavender gloves.

"Oh! for those things, sir," she said, in the voice of Tragedy speaking to Comedy, "you must turn to your right, and you will come to the Complimentary Mourning counter."

Turning to the right accordingly, I was surprised, and not a little shocked, to find myself amongst worldly colors. Tender lavender I had expected; but violet, mauve, and even absolute red, stared me in the face. Thinking I had made a mistake, I was about to retire, when a young lady, in a cheerful tone of voice, inquired if I wanted anything in her department.

"I was looking for the Complimentary Mourning counter," I replied, "for some gloves; but I fear I am wrong."

"You are quite right, sir," she observed. "This is it." She saw my eye glance at the cheerful-colored silks, and with the instinctive tact of a woman guessed my thoughts in a moment.

"Mauve, sir, is very appropriate for the lighter sorrows."

"But absolute red!" I retorted, pointing to some velvet of that color.

"Is quite admissible when you mourn the departure of a distant relative. But allow me to show you some gloves?" and, suiting the action to the word, she lifted the cover from a tasteful glovebox, and displayed a perfect picture of delicate half-tones, indicative of a struggle between the cheerful and the sad.

"There is a pleasing melancholy in this shade of gray," she remarked, indenting slightly each outer knuckle with the soft elastic kid as she measured my hand.

"Can you find a lavender?"

"Oh yes! but the sorrow tint is very slight in that; however, it wears admirably."

Thus by degrees the grief of the establishment died out in tenderest lavender, and I took my departure, deeply impressed with the charming improvements which Parisian taste has effected in the plain old-fashioned style of English mourning.

THE FIRST NEWSPAPER—The first published, says Galignani, bears the date of Nuremberg, 1457; the first English one was in 1622, and the first French in 1631. A very ancient printed sheet was offered for sale in the Labri collection, and of which a duplicate exists in the British Museum. It is entitled, "Nouve Zeitung, aus Hispania und Italien" (News from Spain and Italy), and bears the date of February, 1534. The catalogue gave the following description of it: "An exceedingly rare journal, which appears to have been printed at Nuremberg. It contains the first announcement of the discovery of Peru, and has remained unknown to all the bibliographers that we have been able to consult. In this printed sheet it is said that the Governor of Panamyrá (Panama in the Indies, wrote to his majesty Charles V. that a vessel had arrived from Peru, with a letter from the Regent, Francisco Pizarro (Pizarro), announcing that he had taken possession of the country; that with about 200 Spaniards, infantry and cavalry, he had repaired to the possessions of a great seignior named Cassiko (who refused peace), and attacked him, that the Spaniards were the victors, and that he had seized upon 5000 castillions (gold pieces), and of 20000 silver marks, and lastly, that he had obtained 2,000,000 in gold from the said Cassiko."

SOMETHING ABOUT MUSK AS A PERFUME.—When "boarding round" was the fashion with school teachers, Farmer A., on coming to the house at tea-time, was introduced to the "school-ma'am." In a moment he perceived a strong odor of musk, which came from the school-ma'am's clothing. He, entirely ignorant of the cause, immediately charged it on Ponto, who had a strong propensity for hunting muskrats, and at once commanded him: "Ponto, you scamp, you have been killing muskrats; go out of doors, sir, and get sweetened off." But Ponto did not stir, and Farmer A. spoke again more sharply: "Get out, you'll scent the whole house!" The school-ma'am, by this time, was blushing red as crimson, while the girls and the boys could scarcely keep from bursting into laughter. One of them, unnoticed, at last made their father understand how the matter stood, and he, of course, dropped the subject. The evening passed away rather awkwardly with all, and the teacher failed to return the next day. On her account the affair was kept quiet until after she left the neighborhood, when many were the hearty laughs had over Farmer A.'s error and the school-ma'am's discomfiture. She omitted musk thereafter.

MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $2 00. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

A GENTLEMAN lately returned from London, says, the year there is four months of winter, and eight months of villainous weather.

THE UNFORTUNATE MUSIC SCHOLAR.

BY MRS. J. N. PAGE.

"The ground is all covered with ice and sleet, Caro," said her sister Bell; "do come back and get your rubbers before you undertake to cross the street!"

"But I am so late, Bell, and you know I was tardy the last time I took a music lesson, and such a scolding as I got, I never wish to hear again. I believe I'll trust my old friends Caro and Good Luck for a safe footing." So taking Bertini's large instruction book, and a bound volume of sheet music with her own name on the cover, she tripped gayly down the steps and on to the icy pavement. Men hastening to their various avocations were slipping and sliding, and grasping each other's hands to balance themselves. Seeing her old friend Gen'l P. coming down the street, and fearing he might fancy a joke at her expense, she quickened her steps. But haste is often a poor aid to gravity. One, two, three efforts of the provoked little beauty to keep her feet, but all in vain. Away went the centre of gravity over the base, and books and maiden were brought low.

While many a young cavalier was preparing to come to her assistance, the General kindly raised her to her feet, placed her books in her hands, and herself on the steps of her music teacher's door, saying playfully:—

"Well, Miss Music Scholar, what do you call that? A flat or a sharp?"

"It's a flat," said the tearful, pouting, rosy-cheeked maiden, "but don't say anything about it."

Her teacher kindly met her at the door, and soon, in harmony's soul-thrilling strains, she, for the time being, forgot the mishap of the morning.

Young ladies, when you would trust yourselves on the slippery pavements without rubbers, remember Caro.

INFLUENCE OF FEMALES.—It is better for you to pass an evening once or twice a week in a lady's drawing-room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's song by heart, than in a club, tavern, or the pit of a theatre. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious to their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid, or have gross tastes, and revolt against what is pure. Your club swaggers, who are sucking the butts of billiard cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is uninspiring to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please a poor beast who does not know one tune from another; but as a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water, sancey, and brown bread and butter, I protest I can sit for a whole night talking to a well-regulated, kindly woman about her girl Fanny or her boy Frank, and like the evening's entertainment. One of the great benefits a man may derive from woman's society is that he is bound to be respectful to her. The habit is of great good to your moral men, depend upon it. Our education makes of us the most eminently selfish men in the world. We fight for ourselves, we push for ourselves, we yawn for ourselves, we light our pipes and say we won't go out, we prefer ourselves and our ease; and the greatest benefit that comes to a man from a woman's society is, that he has to think of somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

A LADY impatiently awaiting the arrival of her lover, moved the hands of the clock forward an hour to make the time for his appearance come sooner.

RURAL RESIDENCE.

FIRST STORY.

First Story.—A parlor, B sitting-room, C dining-room, D breakfast-room, E kitchen, F wash-room, G porch, H carriage porch, I porch, J wash-room.

Second Story.—L principal chamber, M chamber, N bath and water closet, O bath, Z chamber, X roof.

MADAM—In late numbers of your Lady's Book, I see several notices "on the use of oatmeal instead of soap." A most excellent nurse, who brought up all my children, had constantly a small barrel of oatmeal in her nursery cupboard, and in cold frosty weather never used any soap, only oatmeal, to wash all the children under her care, and always used it for the baby from the first bath. I never saw one of them have chapped hands, and they had all most delicate fine skins. A little cupful of oatmeal was moistened with the white of a raw egg into a paste, a spoonful of tepid water added to it, and with this she always washed their hair, rubbing the paste into the roots with her fingers, and afterwards cleansing the head with clean tepid soft water—rain water is best; this will make the skin of the head free from scurf, and the hair soft and glossy. M. W.

NATHANIEL LEE, author of the Rival Queens, was one night travelling by moonlight. A light cloud passed over the moon; the poet cried: "Jupiter, arise and snuff the moon!" A denser cloud now made total darkness. "Stupid!" cried the poet, "you have snuffed it out."

THE Fashion Editor desires us to say that she receives orders from those who are subscribers and those who are not; in fact, she never stops to inquire whether they are or are not subscribers to the Lady's Book.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

CHARADES IN TABLEUX.

HAT-BAND.

TABLEAU I.—HAT.

The scene a parlor. In the foreground (centre), facing the audience, is a very little girl dressed in white. Long yellow curls, and blue eyes are the prettiest for effect. She is trying on a man's hat, and holding it up from falling down on her shoulders, with both hands. Two other children to the left are laughing at her, while, to the right, just entering, are a lady and gentleman. The former is in a home dress, the latter in street costume, with overcoat and cane, but without any hat. The lady holds up her finger to silence the laughing children, while the gentleman stoops over the little thief, with his arms outstretched to prison her, and his lips ready for the kiss she has forfeited.

TABLEAU II.—BAND.

The background has a balcony window in the centre. (A very effective one may be made by placing a fender on a large table, with two upright posts at each end, placed about two feet apart. Drape from these heavy crimson curtains, isoped up, and put a bar across for the window-frame.) At the window are two little girls wrapped in large shawls, as if just awakened by the music. In the foreground seven little boys represent the serenade band. One blows a penny trumpet, the second has a pair of bone clappers, the third a toy drum, the fourth a toy fife, the fifth a tambourine, the sixth a toy violin, and the seventh an immense trombone. They all carry sheets of music, are wrapped in long cloaks, and wear large slouch hats. The stage must be darkened, except the light given by seven candles, held one behind each performer by his servant, dressed as a negro-valet. These seven boys, with black faces and hands, dressed in absurd negro costume, must be grinning with delight at their masters' performance. One of the little girls at the window leans forward, holding a bouquet over the balcony front, while the other points with dismay to a tall figure of a woman, who is seen behind the window, holding up a bucket of water to deluge the juvenile serenaders.

TABLEAU III.—HAT-BAND.

Here the same scene and performers as are in the first tableau appear again. The little girl seated on the floor has a long garland of flowers, which she is going to wreath round the hat. A second little girl is cutting off the hat-band with a pair of scissors, while a third holds the hat for the operation. The little one on the floor has her lap full of flowers, and holds one end of the garland up in front of the hat to try the effect; the one who holds the hat kneels, to her right, and between them stands, stooping, the one who has the scissors. Laughing, in the background, are the lady and gentleman mentioned before; she springing forward to save the hat, he holding her back.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Mrs. J. S. S.—Sent hair fob chain 12th.

Will.—The lady is right. If she were poor, it would be otherwise.

M. M.—"A Party and what came of it," will appear in September number.

Mrs. M. G. E.—Single crochet (S C). Having a stitch on the hook insert it in another, and draw the thread through that one; then through both the stitches on the needle.

Double Crochet (D C). Having a stitch on the needle, put the thread round it before inserting it in the stitch of the work, or drawing the thread through which there will be three loops on the needle; now bring the thread through two, which leaves one and the new one; bring the thread through both of them.

Treble Crochet (T C) is worked precisely the same way, but with the thread twice round the hook, which, as two stitches only are taken off at a time, will finish the stitch by a treble movement.

Miss S. R.—"Receipt" is correct. Recipe when applied to medicine.

Miss G. R.—We cannot recommend any description of lotion or powder for improving your complexion, as we never heard of one which was really efficacious. Plentiful ablutions, regular exercise, and a good diet will be more likely to improve your skin than any cosmetic.

Dear Sir: I sincerely love a young gentleman, who is a very intimate friend of mine, but he has never spoken of love to me. Dear Sir, I should very much like to have a lock of his hair, and, as he is a very shy young man, it is not at all likely I shall get it without asking. Do you think there would be any impropriety in my asking for a piece? I remain yours very truly. E.

We think you had better ascertain whether he wears a wig before you ask the question.

G. R. T.—The gentleman's family should, most certainly, be the first to call upon the lady who has accepted him as her husband. As the gentleman is generally supposed to woo the lady, the first advances, even in the most trifling matter, should be made by him and those belonging to him. We are rather surprised at the question.

S. L.—We cannot publish "the prices of patterns and everything we furnish." It would fill one number of the Book. Send a stamp with your inquiry, and the Fashion editor will answer.

Miss B. H.—We can't help it. It is no business of ours. Apply to the publishers of the work.

Miss R. M. O.—To our thinking, the very best mode of cooking a good potato is to boil it in its jacket and roast it before the fire.

Chemistry for the Young.

573. Take an open glass tube, slightly bent at the end, thus—in the spirit-lamp flame, and drop into the bend a fragment of argentiferous galena, sulphuret of lead and silver. Expose the fragment to the heat of a spirit-lamp flame, holding the long bend of the tube highest, and remark the odor of sulphurous acid evolved from the long bend of the tube. This operation will give an idea of the process of roasting—had recourse to for the purpose of driving off sulphur and arsenic. It will also impress upon the mind a ready means of ascertaining, in the dry way, the presence of sulphur in the mineral containing it. This process of smelling through a tube, by the way, is a very excellent means of recognizing an odor, and frequently had recourse to by chemists. Had our object been that of merely roasting away sulphur, in the form of sulphurous acid gas, the process might have been more conveniently performed by means of an iron spoon and an open fire-place. Remember that the process of roasting is that by which sulphur is universally dissipated from minerals on the large scale, and in the dry way. Perhaps the student may like to know how sulphur-containing minerals are dealt with in the moist way. Either the sulphuret may be acted on by dilute and warm nitric acid, when the metal or metals (except tin, antimony, and bismuth) (332-3) will be dissolved, leaving the sulphur, as sulphur, in which state it may be collected, dried, and weighed; or the mineral may be boiled with concentrated fuming nitric acid, until all the sulphur has been converted into sulphuric acid, at the expense of the nitric acid, from which it removes oxygen (302). Supposing the sulphuret acted upon to be argentiferous galena, the former method is preferable, because the sulphuric acid generated by the latter method, instead of remaining dissolved, in a condition to be precipitated by a barytic salt, as sulphate of baryta, and the amount of original sulphur calculated from the amount of resulting sulphuric acid; instead of this, the sulphuric acid, so soon as formed, would combine with oxide of lead, and be precipitated as sulphate of oxide of lead—a very insoluble salt. Nevertheless, this scheme of analysis also yields very accurate results, but it involves more calculations than the other.

574. The Use of Fluxes.—The term flux is derived from fluo, I flow; and is employed by chemists to indicate any substance which, being heated with another substance, increases the fusibility of the latter. For instance, when we exposed to a red heat the mixture of powdered flint (silica) and carbonate of soda, the carbonate acted as a flux. Without it, the silica would not have fused, even by the greatest heat of a blacksmith's forge; with it, fusion was accomplished most readily. The whole theory of smelting turns on the proper selection of a flux, which, for adoption on the large scale, must be not only efficacious but cheap. In the laboratory, where operations are prosecuted on a small scale, and the expense of fluxes is no object, we have a large choice of substances from which the metallurgist is debarred. In furnace operations, the only use of a flux is to impart fluidity; but when employed in connection with the blowpipe, fluxes are made to convey much information. We have already seen that glass is colored of various tints by means of different metals; thus, by gold it is tinged ruby red; by arsenic, iron, green (bottle-glass); and tin, opaque white, etc. Suppose, then, we, in the course of our blowpipe experiments on an unknown mineral, should succeed, by fusing it with a flux, in producing a glass whose color is referable to that corresponding with some known metal, is it not clear we should derive important information? The chief fluxes employed by chemists are: (1) carbonate of soda, (2) borax, (3) microcosmic salt (a phosphate of soda and ammonia), (4) nitre.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR AUGUST.

Fig. 1.—White French muslin dress, trimmed with six rows of muslin quilting. The corsage is low, and over it is worn a Marie Antoinette fichu laid in plaits, and trimmed with flutings and worked ruffling. The fichu ties at the back, and has long embroidered ends, also trimmed with a quilting of muslin. The sleeves are puffed, and just wide enough to pass the hand through. The hair is cripé, and arranged in a waterfall at the back.

Fig. 2.—A pink grenadine dress, trimmed with box-plaited ruffles of pink silk. The little corsage is of the same material as the dress, and worn over a white muslin guimpe.

Fig. 3.—Purple grenadine skirt, with black velvet girdle and bretelles. The guimpe is of French muslin, tucked and trimmed with quiltings.

Fig. 4.—Ashes of roses silk, trimmed with rows of black lace, headed by bands of Magenta velvet. The corsage is made with a fancy bertha, and trimmed in the fan shape. The hair is cripé, and parted at the left side, and arranged very low on the neck with a black lace barbe.

Fig. 5.—Lilac silk dinner-dress. The skirt is edged with a fluted brouce, headed by a rose quilting. It is trimmed in capilles, formed of black velvet and white lace. This trimming is carried up to the waist, on the left side only. The corsage is trimmed with lace and velvet sewed on in the jacket form, and finishes at the back in long sash ends. The hat is of Leghorn, bound with black velvet, and trimmed with a scarlet and black feather.

Fig. 6.—Cuir-colored Paris grenadine, figured with black, and trimmed with five rows of box-plaited green silk. The corsage is low, and over it is worn a fancy fichu, with long sleeves, trimmed with green ribbon. Fine straw hat, trimmed with green ribbons and a fall of black lace.

LATEST STYLE OF DRESSES.

(See engravings, pages 118, 119.)

FOULARD ROBE.

This novel robe is of foulard silk. It has the appearance of a skirt of mauve silk, with an over dress open in front, and rather short, showing the mauve in the front and on the edge of the skirt. The overdress is a white ground figured with black, and edged all round with a bordering resembling a rich black lace. The corsage is in the Pompadour style, trimmed with mauve ribbons.

GRENADINE DRESS.

This dress, one of the most elegant designs of the season, has a white ground powdered with patches of the natural colors and light leaves. The bordering at the edge of the skirt is a deep sea-green, headed by bands of black resembling velvet. The corsage is in the Pompadour style, with rich muslin guimpe and sleeves.

HEADRESSES, ETC.

Fig. 1.—Coiffure of black velvet and black lace, with a coronet of roses, on which is a small humming-bird.

Fig. 2.—Coiffure formed of black lace and black ribbon, flowers, and a cluster of cherries.

Fig. 3.—Headdress of scarlet velvet edged with black lace, having a coronet of flowers and loops of velvet mingled with lace.

Fig. 4.—Black velvet coiffure, with gold ornaments and scarlet flowers.

Fig. 5.—A thick roll of brown velvet, with heavy coronet of roses and light flowers.

Fig. 6.—A very stylish coiffure composed of Magenta velvet and gold ornaments, with a tuft of white flowers on the left side.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

WHEN sultry August comes, and the Dog Star rages, nothing brings us to town but our duty to our readers. We come for a few days to visit the modistes, to see what their fruitful fancy has produced, or where, in some moment of inspiration, they have "snatched a grace beyond the reach of art." And we must say we never cease wondering at the fertility of their invention.

Age cannot wither it, nor custom stale
Its infinite variety.

We allude more particularly this month to decorations. Instead of the usual braid binding, on the edge of the dress, a bourrelet, or thick roll stuffed with wadding, is now substituted. When a dress is too thin for the bourrelet, it is edged with a braid, which is manufactured ready fluted, and the effect is very pretty.

All kinds of braid trimmings are much worn, sewed on in endless variety of design. We noticed that on the travelling dresses at Mme. Demorest's, the braid was doubled and stitched on in different styles, and had the appearance of a silk piping.

Leather trimmings increase in favor, and, for a black dress, we know of no prettier ornament than the leather gimps and buttons so straw like in appearance. They are used on bonnets as well as on dresses and wraps.

Flounced or tucked organdies are bound with cambric of a contrasting color. This has much the effect of ribbon, and has the advantage of washing. The very expensive muslins are generally trimmed with ribbon, the same as a grenadine.

Skirts are faced with grass cloth, or enamelled leather, which is now to be had in light colors.

There is nothing particularly new, either in the shape of bonnets or dresses, with the exception of the corsage, made with four points in front, and three behind.

Jockey waists with square ends in front, Pompadour waists, and sleeves à la Condé (that is, quite small, and made with an elbow), are the most desirable styles for all kinds of goods.

Alpacas, camlets, India silks, and mohairs are now merely used as travelling dresses, or for the seaside. Gossamer fabrics are now almost exclusively seen. Among the prettiest are the corded cambrics and organdies of the finest texture, printed in the most beautiful designs. For instance, a plain colored, or self-colored ground, as it is termed, with a black lace tunic, or else the skirt half covered with ends of sashes, seemingly of black lace, extending from the waist. All these lace delusions are effective, beautiful, and in great variety of design.

The grenadines and barèges, we have previously described, and they are of every imaginable shade of cutr, which is suitable for both old and young, and contrasts so well with all bright colors.

The ornithological taste has extended to thin tissues. We see lovely white fabrics with peacocks in their rich plumage, and on a lovely clair ground, are black swallows darting hither and thither.

For morning, nothing is prettier than the printed percales and piques, and so excellent are the braiding imitations on them, that few persons now go to the expense and labor of braiding their dresses.

For thin, or silk dresses, the braiding appliqué is very fashionable. Vines and designs are cut out of velvet or silk, laid upon the dress, and finished with a braid. Another style is for the design to be in lace, and the material cut from underneath. This is quite novel. The appliqué is generally of a darker shade than the dress, or of a contrasting color.

Pongees are much worn for the entire suit, including bonnet and parasol. For the latter, as well as sun umbrellas, it is particularly fashionable.

In Paris the ladies are wearing wraps of the same color as the dress, though frequently of a darker shade and of a different material.

While on the subject of dresses, we must call attention to the admirable dress shields just brought out by Mme. Demorest. They are of a new material, perfectly impervious to moisture, and resemble a creamy white muslin. They are also very thin, and have not the disagreeable odor of India-rubber. Bibs and dress protectors are also made of this material for infants, which will be found exceedingly nice and convenient. We think this a great invention, and particularly call the attention of mothers to it.

A new material for wraps has lately appeared in Paris. It is called Yak, and is a white worsted lace, lined with a colored silk. We give two illustrations of these wraps in the present number.

Though the collet, or talma, seems to take the lead, we think it a very warm wrap, and decidedly prefer the little scarf mantles at Brodie's. They are to be had with pointed, round, or square ends. Another style fits the shoulders like a berthe, fastens in front, and falls in scarf ends. We saw at this establishment a mohair shawl, a very excellent imitation of guipure lace.

At the watering-places there seems to be a perfect furore for the scarlet cloaks, so gypsy-like in appearance.

Seated, a few afternoons since, in a shady corner of a broad piazza, we watched the crowd as it passed by. There came up the road an equipage all aflame, with one of these brilliant garments thrown over the shoulders of a lady, seated on the box. And who is the little body coming yonder? Surely that is little Red Riding-hood herself. We are not a wolf, and yet we devour her—with kisses.

Barège, and grenadine shawls, are of all styles, plaids, checks, stripes, and plain. Then there are the made shawls, trimmed with futings, or else a ribbon of a contrasting color, laid on plain and crossing at the corners, the shawl being folded to show two borders.

In fans, there is also a great variety. First, the elegant bridal fan, of point lace, with mother of pearl sticks richly carved. Then the lovely silks and moires, with real lace decorations. Less expensive silk fans are also to be had in endless variety. We see also the pretty little round straws, interlaced with ribbons and velvet. Also the useful companion the linen fan, to be had in white, black, brown, and gray—watered, spangled, plain, and feather shaped. The prettiest style is the folding round fan, though the ordinary shape is much used. A great variety of leather belts have appeared, ornamented with velvet or morocco of different colors, and gilt or steel knobs. We do not like them for ladies, but think they would make a very pretty addition to a little boy's costume.

For the little folks we have nothing very new. What is worn by grown up people is made in miniature for the little ones.

Tulle and tarletane, being light, airy materials, are the most suitable for summer ball dresses for young ladies. The newest styles are trimmed with swan's down. Loops of down imbedded in puffs, have a very charming effect.

Some of the newest tarletanes are worked with silk, chenille, or velvet, in imitation of branches of coral, which are very effective and pretty.

The prettiest coiffure for this dress, is La Gitana, which particularly attracted our attention at Mme. Tilmann's, of 148 East Ninth Street, New York. It was the most fascinating combination of gleaming scarlet verbenas, enamelled leaves, grass, and scarlet ribbon bordered with black, falling in long graceful pendants. Imagine a rich brunette complexion and sparkling black eyes, beneath this fanciful coquetry.

Another model of grace and elegance was the postillion hat, of white chip, very peculiar in shape, and trimmed with bands of cherry velvet, and cherry and white feathers. This was the most stylish and expensive hat of the season.

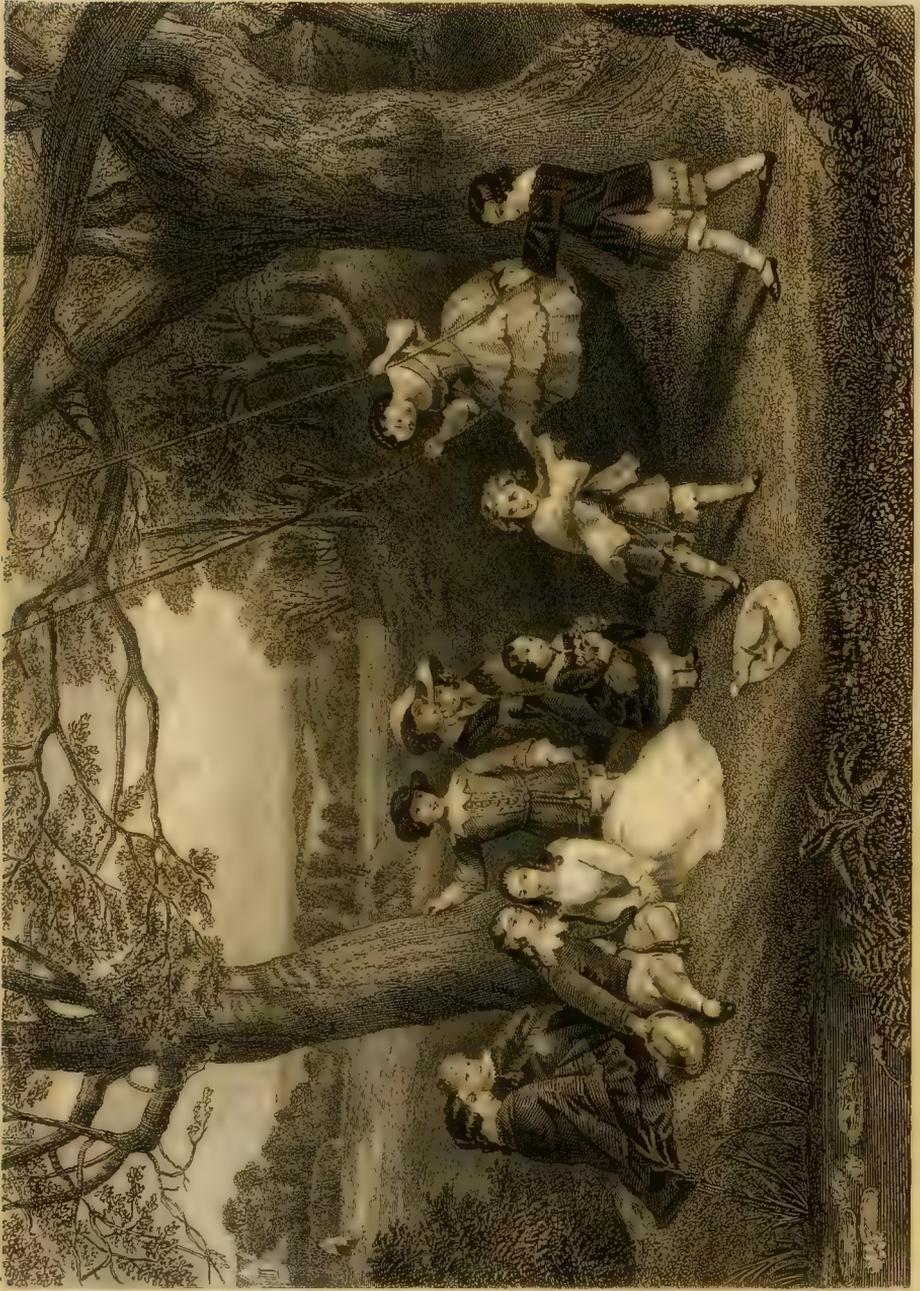

Mme. Tilmann's flower creations are perfect rivals of nature. Many of them are orchids mixed with grasses and variegated leaves. In all the flowers, nature is most closely followed, the stems being velvety, prickly, or thorny, to suit their respective flower. Many of our readers are probably not aware, that at this house flowers are arranged to suit the taste of the purchaser. Either for the inside or outside of a bonnet in wreaths or dress garnitures. Full bridal parures are furnished and the veil is so arranged on the wreath, that the assistance of a coiffeur is not required. Think of that, ye fair ones, who like to have the latest styles and live at a distance from our large cities.

From a number of dresses just finished at the establishment of Mme. Demorest, we selected the following as being particularly elegant and becoming: An organdie dress for a young lady. The skirt was made full with a very deep hem, above which was a cluster of tucks about an inch wide, then a tuck half the width of the hem, and another cluster of small tucks, the trimming continued and graduated half way up the skirt. The waist was composed of small tucks with a band of insertion between each cluster and filled into a band at the waist. The sleeves were made to correspond with the waist, and gathered into a loose band at the wrist where it finished with a ruffle of Valenciennes. The sash of clusters of tucks and insertion edged with Valenciennes was to be worn on the left side.

A very distingué dinner dress was of mauve silk with an overskirt of French muslin, open on the left side nearly to the waist, and trimmed all round with a quilling of mauve ribbon. The open space at the side was joined by interlaced mauve ribbons. The corsage was of white muslin puffed to the throat, and the sleeves a mass of puffings; over this was a Spanish waist of mauve silk. The tout ensemble was exquisite, and it was decidedly one of the most stylish dresses of the season.

DINNER-DRESS.

Pearl-colored silk. The skirt is trimmed with five very narrow ruffles of Magenta silk. The corsage is made with a very deep point in front, and trimmed in the fan style, with Magenta silk ruffles. A narrow ruffle is sewed on the waist of the corsage, and is finished up the back with two bows and long streamers. The bodice is rolled, but taken very little off the face, and is dressed in a bow at the back. The headdress is of Magenta velvet.

DINNER-DRESS.

...shes of roses silk, with a deep flounce of black lace on the skirt. The flounce is headed by a band of the ...dged with narrow black lace, and caught at intervals by black velvet bows, thus forming puffs. The ...es and corsage are trimmed to match. The headdress is of scarlet and black velvet. The hair is arranged
...low on the neck in a bow.

MORNING ROBE.

Shirt and jacket of gray piqué, braided with black.

THE CASTILIAN.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOTER, from actual articles of costume.]

This beautiful garment for the present month is made in black silk, with a magnificent ornamental braiding in silk cord and black beads, and with lace frills upon the body and sleeves. For the coming season, they will be made in the same fashion of black velvets, and also some will preserve the main features, but have flowing sleeves instead of those in the illustration.

NAME FOR MARKING.

GORED MORNING ROBE.

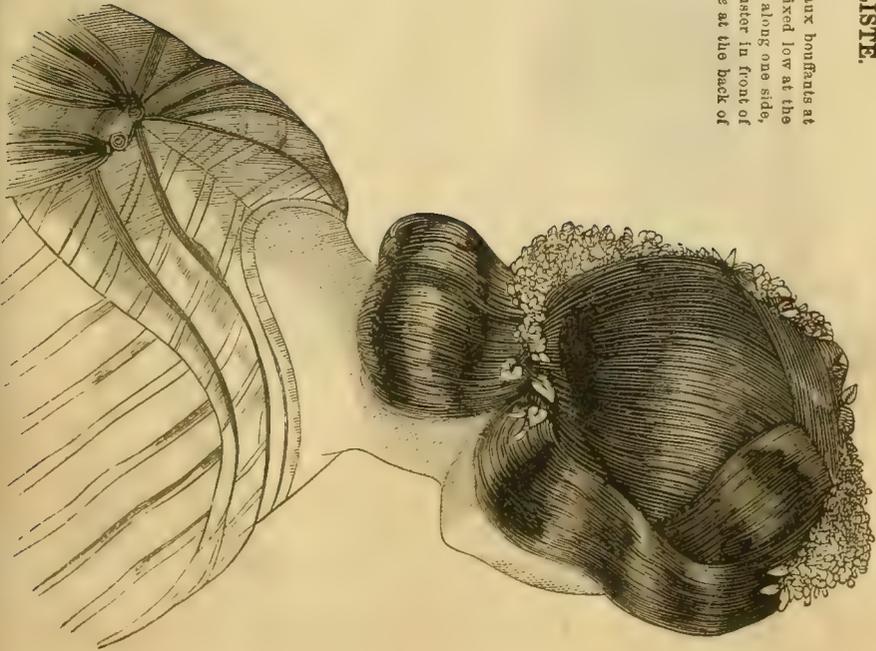

Made of white muslin, trimmed with graduated ruffling, which is carried up every half breadth for about three-quarters of a yard. The small pelerine and sleeves are trimmed to match. White muslin cap, trimmed with black velvet and amber ribbons.

THE COIFFURE CALISTE.

(Front and Back view.)

This headdress is composed of bandeaux bouffants at each side of the head, and a full bow fixed low at the back. A wreath of red verbonna passes along one side, the flowers being disposed in a full cluster in front of the forehead, and forming a cache-peigne at the back of the head.

"THE WAR OF THE ROSES."

BY DAISY HOWARD.

"WHAT dress will you wear to Mrs. Hilton's to-night, Rose?"

"I do not know, dear Carro; indeed I have not given it a thought, and would much rather remain at home than mingle with the gay to-night."

"Not attend the most splendid party of the season! Why, Rose Traverse, are you crazy, child? Stay at home, indeed, and give your famous rival, Rose Arlington, a chance to captivate your handsome Ernest? Rose, she is perfectly lovely—not your noble beauty, darling—but a tiny, blue-eyed, golden-haired fairy, beautiful as rose-tinted evening clouds, or like one of those glorious crimson and gold sunsets we saw last year in the land of sunny skies—bright Italia. But pshaw! Rose, I cannot be poetical. I have mentioned the two most beautiful things my eyes ever rested upon, and now am at the 'end of my string,' always excepting the beautiful slumbrous light in your own glorious dark eyes, darling. What ails your eyes to-night, Rose Traverse? Their look is wierd and unearthly."

"I feel saddened, Carro. Emma Hade's foolish talk about Ernest's devotion to Miss Arlington last night has grieved me."

"Never heed her words, Rosie dear; she is a mischief-maker, and would make trouble between you and Ernest Clare. The little vixen! I could twist her neck off."

"Fy, fy, Carro! that is rough and unusual language from your sweet lips. But tell me—did you not think Ernest too devoted, as Emma said, to this Southern belle, when his hand and heart are pledged to another?"

"Well, he certainly was attentive to Miss Arlington; but she was quite as attentive to him—she did not give him a chance to leave her. I passed them during the evening, and Ernest made a movement as though about to join me, when la belle yellow hair chained him again, to answer some question regarding the gayeties of his 'beautiful city.' I foresee very plainly, Rosie, that I shall honor that deceitful little Arlington with my most cordial hatred."

"Not so fast, Carro. I think, for so very small a lady as you are, you are talking pretty large about this young stranger."

"You are right, Rosie. To use one of George's elegant expressions, I believe I have been talking rather 'high falutin;' but, Rose, you cannot imagine the wiles of that girl—remember you have only met her once. When Captain Acton came to claim her hand for a promised dance, she actually filled Ernest's arms so that he would be obliged to await her return—bouquets, fans, handkerchiefs, opera-cloaks, and even her gloves. I had half a mind to send one of the servants with Miss Mason's compliments, and ask if he did not need some one to help him bear his burden."

"Oh, Carro Mason, you are incorrigible. You make me laugh, even while swallowing down a sob. I do not grieve because Ernest finds pleasure in the society of another—as you know I am not of a jealous nature—neither do I grieve because I have not moral courage to give up the love of Ernest Clare; but for the reason that it has shaken my faith in human nature. If Ernest, with his noble soul and high, brave spirit, can be so easily won to forget the love of years, who can we trust?"

"Bide a wee, sweet cousin, bide a wee. He loves not Rose Arlington; he loves but the bright crimson rose of his boyhood's idolatry—sweet Rose Traverse; he is but captivated by her wondrous beauty."

"I care not, Carro; I will not have a share in the heart which once was all my own. I will release him from the vows made in the old Cathedral in Rome if they press too heavily upon his spirit; one word from his own lips, and he is free as air."

The cousins were in a sumptuous chamber in the house of Rose Traverse. Rich crimson damask curtains shaded the window, throwing a warm ruddy glow over the two fair faces. A carpet of crimson and white, with flowers so rich in coloring, one could fancy Flora herself had flung her treasures over it with no sparing hand, rich clusters of crimson roses and convolvulus, mingled with the trailing myrtle, whose bright green contrasted beautifully with the glowing flowers, almost winning one to stoop and gather them. Carro stood before the grate, with her forehead bent upon the marble mantel, beating an impatient tattoo upon the floor with her restless little feet. Rose sat before a rose-wood writing-desk, thickly strewn with manuscript. Her magnificent black hair was pushed back from the white temples, and the crimson lips were tightly compressed; the sweet face wearing a look of weariness and pain. The rich glow on her cheek almost shamed the bright rose-colored dressing-gown which fell from the glistening shoulders. Her white hand almost flew over the paper till arrested by Carro.

"Rose, put away your writing, and let us to our toilet. Ernest will be here, and you know he dislikes to wait."

"I shall not go out to-night, but will assist you in one moment, Carro."

"Rose Traverse, I don't love you one bit; you are too provoking!" And Carro flung herself into a chair, saying: "I will not go unless you do—that I am determined on. You want to give the Arlington a chance to win from you the noblest heart the sun shines upon!" and glittering tears rolled over Carro's bright face.

Rose left her seat, and in one moment her arms were around the loving girl. "Carro, I do not wish to grieve you, and would rather go with you than see these wasted tears. I do not feel like going into a crowd to-night, and was very anxious to finish this manuscript, and have it in the hands of the compositor at an early hour to-morrow; besides, I have promised to write a sketch for the —— Magazine, and you know I never fail to meet an engagement. Ernest, too, he only comes because he deems it his duty, not from choice."

"Now, Rose, you wrong him. It is only in her presence that he feels the spell of this Southern beauty. Please, Rosie, come to-night, just to make me happy. I will copy all day to-morrow for you, if you do."

Rose could not withstand the pleading eyes, and sadly she gathered up the scattered papers and replaced them in the desk.

"I will go with you, Carro, if only for the sake of making my little cousin happy."

"How you seem to love those tiresome papers, Rose! One could fancy you had to write for a living."

"No, darling, I do not have to toil for my daily bread, but I have to write to satisfy the cravings of my restless heart, which is ever clamoring, write—write. I could no more keep from writing, than you can keep from singing all day long, my happy Carro. I love to hear your rich voice, clear and sweet as the bulbul's song."

Carro flew round like a bird—first dressing the tiny feet in white satin slippers, that surely must have been handed down to her from Cinderella, so small and beautiful they were.

Rose stood before the mirror, and as she gazed upon her own rare loveliness, she murmured in a tone too low for Carro's busy ears—"They tell me of my soul's lofty gifts, and yet they could not win my love—that would not change." She removed the golden comb, and the glittering mass of shining hair fell rippling almost to her feet. She smoothed it with her soft hand till it shone like the mirror in which she gazed, then the white fingers wandered through it and rapidly it grew into broad massive braids, which she bound about her brow in the shape of a coronet, and gathering the whole into a heavy knot behind—the task was done. She robed her beautiful form in a dress of amber satin. She clasped a diamond necklace upon her snowy throat, the bright, glittering gems answering the light in her purplish black eyes. Taking from the wardrobe a white silk opera-cloak, she tied it carelessly around her neck; saying: "Now, Carro, I am ready. I will go into the drawing-room and play over that new song till you come down."

"Oh, Rose, how quickly you do dress. I am not near ready yet. Please send Amy to me. I want her to dress my hair."

Rose crossed to the servant's hall, and sending Amy to the tiny sprite who could not robe her dainty limbs under an hour's time, she passed into the drawing-room. The room lay in shadow, lighted only from the hall. Rose sat down to the piano. Her song was mournfully sad, then the rich voice surged through the lofty rooms, appealingly, almost wailingly. Poor Rose, her heart caught the trick of the song's sadness, and her head sank upon the instrument, and bright tears fell upon the rich dress. Ere she was aware, a voice thrillingly low was whispering, "Rose, darling," and passing his arm around her, the proud head was laid upon the breast of Ernest Clare, and the sweet tear-stained face pressed against his own. Rose sought to free herself from his embrace, though her heart thrilled at the sound of the loved voice, as does a harp-string when too rudely touched.

He led her into the hall under the brilliant gas-light, and gazed sadly upon the drooping head and snowy brow, and murmured, "Rose, you are peerlessly beautiful to-night."

At this moment Carro came tripping down the stairs. "I am happy to see you, Sir Knight of the eagle eye. Do I not look passing well, Lord Ernest? I mean to walk straight into the heart of Captain Acton to-night, so the Arlington had best look to herself, or her harp will yet be 'hung upon the willows.' But here is the carriage, let us to the banquet."

There was a baneful light in Rose Arlington's eyes, as the cousins entered the room leaning upon the arm of the handsome, regal-looking man she was trying to win from his allegiance. The glorious beauty of Rose Traverse was acknowledged by all. A subdued murmur of admiration followed her wherever she moved. The heart of Ernest Clare was at rest; he felt that the eyes of Rose Arlington had lost their spell. The "war of the roses" was like to end, our bright, crimson rose coming out victor, though we must confess the "war" was (as Carro said) all on the "Arlington's" side. Will the war be at an end? Time will show. It is said that a "pair of bright eyes with a dozen glances suffice to subdue a man, to enslave him; they dazzle and bewilder him, so that the past becomes forgotten."

Ernest Clare was happier to-night than he had been for many weeks; he determined to show Miss Arlington no attention; in very truth her eyes seemed to have lost their spell, overshadowed by the radiant beauty of our own bright Rose. But ah, who can compute the power that lies in curls of a golden hue, and eyes of melting softness? The hand of Rose Traverse was claimed for a dance by a white-haired hero of many battles, General G—, one who admired her above all women, though his love for her was that of a father for his child. Ernest stood watching the graceful movements and noble face of his boyhood's love, his manhood's idolatry, when a beautiful hand was laid upon his arm, and dewy eyes looked sadly into his own.

"Have you forgotten my presence, Ernest? You have not sought me once to-night. Come, let us promenade, I have something to tell you;" and the arm of the syren was linked within his own.

Once more busy tongues were whispering of his devotion to Miss Arlington, and sundry black, blue, and gray eyes were directed to the face of Rose Traverse. But the pride of Rose suffered her to make no change in her demeanor. Her smile was sweet and calm as it ever was, and her step unflinching.

Again Rose and Carro are seated by the fire in the former's pleasant chamber. By mutual consent the name of Ernest Clare was not mentioned.

"You look weary and tired, Carro, and it is one o'clock; I think you had better retire."

"And you, Rose?"

"I shall write to-night; the spell is upon me, and I could not sleep."

"Oh, Rose dear—but I shall not waste words, my head aches dreadfully, so I will to bed, perchance I may dream of my brave captain;" and laughing merrily she said "good-night." A few moments and the pretty head was laid upon the pillow, a few more, and the white lids closed wearily over the eyes so like in hue to the blue bells and violets of her own dear home.

And Rose? Without disrobing she unlocked the writing desk, and drew forth the unfinished manuscript; rapidly the pen travelled over the paper, and at last it was complete.

"And now for the promised sketch; what shall it be?" she soliloquized. "I must write it, though it be but half a column, for I have given my promise. Ah me, how shall the aching head and weary heart improvise matter to please the multitude? I fear me it will be but a dreary plaint."

'Tis ever thus with earth's children. Like Rose, they must labor on, though the pain at their heart grows more unbearable; the anguished face must wear a smile, the lip must be ever gay, lest the cold world should see, and the "lookers on in Venice" comment. How little reckes the world, as it reads and either praises or condemns the writer—how little, we ask, do they who read know how oft from an aching and deeply anguished heart, those words have sprung, the bitterness of whose lot no tongue can tell, over whose well-nigh broken heart-strings sweep mighty sorrows, whose path is encompassed by sorrow-clouds for evermore, that path which perchance their tender feet must tread alone? Alone—is there not a volume in the word? Can the heart not suffice to itself alone and unaided, can it not work out this mighty problem of life? Cannot woman, like man, pour out the glorious beauty of her soul, and in fame find happiness? No, no, forever no! Ah, 'tis sympathy and love a woman's heart craves. She longs for love and tender care; she longs to be protected and watched over, else she droops, and the brightness passes from her life forever, and ends in eternal night.

All things must have an end. Rose wrote the last word of the coveted sketch, sealed and directed it. Then she wrote a note to Ernest Clare, releasing him from his vows, and giving back his plighted troth. It was hard to give up the love of years, but she could not share a divided heart. Throwing up the window she knelt beneath it, inhaling greedily the pure air, unmindful that the chill winter wind blew upon her uncovered neck. The face wore a weary look, and in the deep eyes there slumbered a wondrous woe. She had vowed to forget Ernest—could she? Wherefore, after the vow was made, did the heart clamor for the loved presence—the gentle tones whose music lingered everywhere?

“The night is glorious, but my heart is breaking. Ah, Ernest, Ernest—why should thine eyes come between me and the midnight heavens?—must I kneel forever beneath this starry sky a mourner like to-night? Tell me, ye glittering stars, and thou, bright, cold moon, will happiness ever dwell in my heart again? All! all is changed. And yet the starry sky forms as bright a dome as that which canopied my head in childhood. But ah, where are the joyous hopes, the happy light-heartedness that then filled my heart? Ah, the Gordian knot is wound too tightly about thee, poor heart; my trembling fingers are powerless to unloose it. Ah, my wild invocation avails me naught; the stars are silent and the moon sails majestically onward, and all is lost, ‘except a little life.’”

After a storm, whether of the elements or the human heart, there comes a calm. So it was with our mourner; the moonlight fell upon the bowed head and the rich dress, and the diamonds flashed back a mocking light beneath her rays. Rose, listening to the wind anthem, felt a calm descend upon her soul; upon the wings of the wind came floating the sweet promises of Him whom, in her sorrow, she had forgotten. “Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.” Ah, how refreshingly fall such promises upon the storm-tossed soul! Pour out thy soul in prayer, sweet maiden; far, far away, beyond yon starry dome—up, up beyond the glorious clouds, where the Deity sits enthroned, there, hard by the throne of Grace at the feet of God's gentle Son, pour out thy woe! Woe, did I say! Could the spirit of mortals feel woe, while standing even in thought in the “New Jerusalem!” Ah, well may the stricken heart prostrate itself before the Saviour, assured of sympathy, feeling that through him the sweet stranger “peace” will flutter down into that heart. He, the “man of sorrows,” who, in this our beautiful world, was reviled and persecuted by men; Gethsemena's Lord, whose weary feet paced Jerusalem, and whose own glorious head was bowed that we might live, whose brow was encircled by a wreath of thorns, that we might keep the flowers of Eden's garden to gem our pathway. Remembering all this, canst thou not be patient? Weep on and pray. O'er the grave of Lazarus “Jesus wept,” and o'er the sins of the people He anguished. Remembering all this, let thy proud head be bowed in adoration and in prayer, and thy passionate heart be stilled, and murmur again never more.

The last months of winter passed wearily away. To Rose it seemed interminable. All was at an end between Ernest Clare and herself; henceforth their path led down a different current. Rose was content to have it so; though the rich crimson of her cheek was fading, and her bounding step grew weary and slow, yet she moved through her home cheerfully as of old. In those happy days, when she knew herself beloved, these were blissful hours spent in dreaming; now she must keep herself busily employed, lest the sorrow at her heart should rise up and clamor to be heard. Ah! the human heart is a stern tyrant, and the question that has been asked and answered wailingly by many a heart was hers—“How can I live without thee?” At such hours she flew to the only refuge that has power to still the soul's tumult—that of prayer; and oh! how soon her heart grew calm, and her faith strengthened. “As rivers of waters in a dry place; as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land,” came the thought that, though the love of earth had failed her, she had a Friend whose love was priceless, and who knew no change.

Twice had letters come from Ernest Clare filled with sorrow, renewing the vows so lately broken, pleading for the love he had so cruelly slighted; but Rose was firm; she could not risk this great sorrow a second time, lest her happiness should be shipwrecked forevermore.

"Rose! Rose! come out upon the colonnade, do—George is waiting to tell you something. Oh, there is something so nice going to happen to-morrow!"

Rose passed her arm around Carro, and the two went out to where the brother and (shall we perch?) the lover stood waiting. It was a lonely evening, and though the sweet sunset glow had faded, the earth and sky were beautiful; surely the evening breeze must have lately been kissing the flowers so fragrant and heavily-laden with sweets; it came lightening the load pressing the heart of Rose, and fluttering the curls on Carro's sunny brow.

"Well, my brother, what is this great treat Carro says you have in store for us? I am all curiosity."

"Why, sister, we are going to have a riding party to the 'Cliffs' to-morrow. We start as soon as the sun is up, and stay till evening, take our dinner in the woods, and our tea at the famous sign of 'The Golden Star.' Won't good old Mother Belton be in her element? You will ride with Carro and I. You will go for my sake, sister?" And George Traverse drew his sister's head upon his breast, and fondly kissed the white brow.

"Yes, George, I will accompany you."

"Ah, Rosie, that is well; now I am content. Come hither, little one—don't be jealous. I have room enough in my other arm to encircle your tiny waist."

"Don't trouble yourself, Mr. Impudence; I am not anxious to have your arm about my waist."

"Then you shall, whether or not," and suiting the action to the word, he flew after the laughing Carro, and soon captured her, pressing a lover's kiss upon the dewy lips.

Ah, these happy lovers' days are surely the sweetest season in life! When the last thought at night and the first in the morning is the blissful one—we are beloved; when we sleep and dream of somebody: when we dress and wear the colors that somebody loves, and watch with eager eyes and a listening ear for the foot-step of somebody who is perhaps our all of earth—our more than all of Heaven. I fancy this is why there is so much of sorrow around our earth-path; that it is a punishment sent in rebuke of the wild love we bear the creature, forgetful oft of Him who has said, "Thou shalt not make idols."

Rose stood watching the lovers. They were quiet enough now. Carro, with the arm she had a few moments ago so saucily refused, thrown around her. The fluttering heart was stilled now, listening to the low manly voice whose music thrilled her soul. With a deep sigh Rose entered the house, and the lovers stood in the gleaming till the stars came out.

I repeat it again. Ah, these happy lovers' days! and I fancy many and many a heart responds to the words.

"What kind of a day is it, Viney? Will it be pleasant for our ride?" Thus spoke Rose Arlington to her maid.

"Beautiful day, Miss Rose: splendiferous for your ride!"

"Hasten, then, Viney, and bring my breakfast whilst I curl my hair."

The proud beauty placed herself before the mirror, and thus soliloquized: "I must look my best to-day, for I do believe Ernest Clare is growing weary of me, and mamma writes that funds are low; so I must try and bring my wealthy lover to the point this day. I believe he loves that haughty Rose Traverse yet. Well, I shall make my last great effort to-day. If he hears I think of leaving for home, perhaps he may propose. I think the gentlemen in mamma's native country are very cold of heart, or I should have won Ernest ere now."

"Throw up the window, Rosie, and tell me of the sky. If it is a beautiful blue, and we can have our ride, I shall get up; if not, I shall stay in bed and have the pouts."

"It is a glorious morning, Carro. You had better mount, and prepare for your ride to the far-famed 'Cliffs.' I feel almost happy this morning, darling; the very wind seems to bear upon its wings something exhilarating and life-giving."

And well she might be happy, our sweet Rose. The morn was beautiful—one of those bright mornings in early June, the sweetest season in all the year, where summer's fairy sister, spring, hath so lately rested, leaving even yet her breath among the flowers.

Carro stood arranging her silken curls, as George loved to see them. When the riding-dress was donned, and the coquettish cap of dark blue velvet laid upon the sunny curls, the little maid looked wondrous winsome. So thought George Traverse, for as she descended the stairs he met her, and drawing the little hand through his arm, he whispered: "You are radiant this morning, and you are mine—mine."

Though pearly tears trembled upon the long lashes as the caressing tones fell from his lips, the little gypsy would not be entirely subdued.

"Excuse me, George Traverse, I am my own, not yours yet; and if you don't quit ruffling my hair, I shall be mine forever." Something closed the wee mouth. I wonder what it was?

As Rose made her appearance at the door, a portion of the party swept by on their way to the "Cliffs," among whom were Rose Arlington and Ernest Clare. The former drew up before the door for the purpose of letting her rival see who was her companion. She made a bad move by thus doing; for this morning Rose Traverse was gloriously beautiful. Ernest Clare felt it, and his heart throbbed tempestuously. Queenly Rose Traverse, thou art now avenged; for, as in the first days of thy love, so now the heart of thy lover is thine—thy lightest footfall, or the tones of thy voice fill his soul with wild emotion.

Rose stood upon the marble steps waiting for her brother. Her riding-dress was black, and the graceful cap of black velvet was singularly becoming, with its long drooping plumes, waving above the white brow. Ernest gazed upon the noble face, and read there nothing; true, he could see the traces of a battle fought and won, but naught he wished to see. The proud beautiful lips quivered not; could it be that upon those lips his kiss of betrothal had been pressed? His very lips grew pale; his life seemed like a helmsless ship upon the angry sea—all was lost, and he would have perilled much to regain the love he had slighted. There was anguish in his heart and on his face, as he turned to Miss Arlington, and proposed riding onward. Could the proud beauty have read his heart, her face would have quickly lost its wreath of smiles. But the end is not yet.

Merry songs and ringing laughter resounded all day long through the old woods beneath the "Cliffs," and, if sadness dwelt in one or two young hearts, none heeded it; for the sweet lip of Rose wore the olden smile, and it is not given to mortals to read the heart. Mother Belton, the merry hostess of "The Golden Star," laid before them a repast that would have tempted an anchorite, much less a happy, hungry crew like her guests. All too soon evening came, and old Sol grew drowsy, and prepared for going to rest behind the blue hills. The gay cavalcade were soon mounted and moving towards the city, some few of the weary equestrians as glad as their "bonnie steeds" to turn their faces homeward.

Several times during the day Ernest had shown some courtesy to Róse, which she accepted politely and calmly; so calm indeed was her manner, that it froze the words of entreaty trembling upon her lover's lips. He rode by the side of Miss Arlington sad and still—so still that the fair Arlington wondered, and pouted, and smiled by turns. How could he smile and jest when his heart was shrouded in gloom? He was near the idol of his heart, could hear her sweet, low voice, and yet he dare not seek her side. They were already in sight of her home, and soon even the solace of her sweet presence would be lost to him. At this moment one of the lingering couple came dashing by in a race; recklessly they rode, and in passing struck the horse of Ernest Clare, who reared and sprang to one side, throwing his unguarded rider upon a pile of sharp stones by the wayside. He lay perfectly still, with the crimson blood flowing from his temples. Fortunately they were near the house of Mrs. Traverse, where he was immediately carried. Rose Arlington screamed—a pretty little scream—and if she could have had a pair of lordly arms to support her, would have fainted; as it was, she said the sight of blood always made her ill, and rode onward alone. A physician was called, and an examination took place.

"Oh God, let him not die!" broke from the pallid lips of Rose Traverse. "Is he dead, Doctor? Tell me! oh, tell me the truth!"

"No, not dead, I hope, but bruised and dreadfully injured. I fear for the result, Miss Rose." Forgetful of the past, poor Rose bent over the prostrate form; she drew the dear and noble head close to her heart, and pressed her lips to the marred and bleeding brow. "Speak to me, Ernest, speak but one word—so handsome, so proud and brave, why dost thou not answer me?"

Her voice must have had power to reach the heart whose pulses beat so feebly, for the heavy eyes unclosed and wandered about the room; then, as memory returned, he comprehended all. A look of wild joy flashed over his face as he saw Rose, and, raising his unwounded arm, he laid his hand upon the bright head.

"God bless you, my darling! I do not feel my sufferings now."

His arm was broken, and many internal injuries were discovered. Rose held his hand whilst the arm was set, pale, but firm—wiping the dew of suffering from the loved brow. Long he lay in that shaded room, even till summer had grown towards its noon. Need we say that past sorrows were forgotten, or that the broken rows were renewed?

'Tis a month since the fated riding party returned so sadly. Ernest Clare has grown strong again, under the watchful care of his friends. Very beautiful was our Rose this summer's evening in her pure white dress, with blue and white violets twined among her glossy curls. A heavy gold ring is upon her slender finger, which tells a tale of happiness to come.

"You leave us to-morrow, Ernest? I shall miss you sadly." And her voice grew tremulous with feeling.

"Yes, my darling; but soon I shall call you my own; then we will part no more forever."

Reader, the "War of the Roses" is ended. Our Rose is the victor, and Carro is happy. The Arlington has returned to her home in disgust.

It is whispered that when the leaves fall, a double wedding will come off in the old Traverse Mansion.

HOW THE EYE IS SWEEPED AND WASHED.

For us to be able to see objects clearly and distinctly, it is necessary that the eye should be kept moist and clean. For this purpose it is furnished with a little gland, from which flows a watery fluid (tears), which is spread over the eye by the lid, and is afterwards swept off by it, and runs through a hole in the bone to the inner surface of the nose, where the warm air, passing over it while breathing, evaporates it.

It is remarkable that no such gland can be found in the eyes of fish, as the element in which they live answers the same purpose. If the eye had not been furnished with a liquid to wash it, and the lid to sweep it off, things would appear as they do when we look through a dusty glass.

Along the edges of the eyelid there are a great number of little tubes, or glands, from which flows an oily substance, which spreads over the surface of the skin, and thus prevents the edges from becoming sore or irritated, and it also helps to keep the tears within the lid.

There are also six little muscles attached to the eye, which enable us to move it in every direction; and when we consider the different motions they are capable of giving to the eyes, we cannot but admire the goodness of Him who formed them, and has thus saved us the trouble of turning our heads every time we wish to view an object.

Although the eyes of some animals are incapable of motion—as the fly, the beetle, and several other insects—yet the Creator has shown His wisdom and goodness in furnishing their eyes with thousands of little globules, and by placing their eyes more in front of their head, so that these little insects can see almost all around them without turning their heads.

A gentleman who has examined the eyes of a fly, says, that the two eyes of a common one are composed of 8,000 little globes, through every one of which it is capable of forming an image of an object. Having prepared the eye of the fly for the purpose, he placed it before his microscope, and then looked through both, in the manner of the telescope, at a steeple which was 299 feet high and 750 distant, and he said he could plainly see through every little hemisphere, the whole steeple inverted or turned upside down.

THE OLD BARN AT HOME.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

Oh, the old barn at home,
Underneath whose gray eaves
Flocks of gay swallows built,
And where lay golden sheaves,
Where I played when a boy
Through the bright livelong day,
Comes in dreams to me now
Though I'm far, far away.

On its floor gathered round,
At the noon's sultry glow,
Ruddy cheeks, hardy hands,
All that health could bestow—
While the song and the dance,
And the old fiddle's tone,
Drove away every care
Till the noontide had flown.

In the proud city's whirl,
Where the mad crowd runs on,
Where the races for place
And for power are won,
Oft my thoughts wander back
To the old barn at home,
With its wide open doors
And its straw-mantled dome.

And a tear oft will fall
That I cannot restrain,
As I long to look on
Its rough timbers again—
On the bins heaped with grain,
On the smooth cleanly floor,
That are lost but in dreams
To my gaze evermore!

JOHN BROAD.

How calm the night was! The gray mists were lying over the river asleep. I could hear the roar of the waters faintly, as they came rushing down over the great rocks, and then gurgled and pelted on through the rocky river-bed beneath my window, the ripples white and gleaming in the starlight. It was late. I heard the whir of the old clock in the kitchen strike the hour of midnight. Kitty lay sleeping in the little white curtained bed beside me, her fair young face looking so white and pure like the foaming waters of the river.

I got up and took down the heavy braids of black hair that had been twined like a serpent's coils about my head. My glossy black hair was my pride, for in reality I had no beauty to speak of. A pair of dull, blue, lustreless eyes; a complexion such as the tawny daughters of the forest might be ashamed of; and my great broad hands and ungainly form. "Who could ever love me?" I asked myself. And yet away down in my heart, buried from the prying eyes of every one, I knew that there was one dearer to me than all the earth beside. And as if in answer to my thoughts, I heard a step upon the gravel walk, and peeping behind the curtain, I saw the tall form of Mr. Dalton coming up through the lilacs, that shivered as he passed and let fall their flowers at his feet unheeded. Then I heard his firm step upon the stairs, and the closing of his room door, and again all was still. Then I sat down by the window again, twining my long hair around my arms, and looking out to the great dim, dingy mill, where the watchman's light could be seen flitting from one room to another as he went his lonely round among the black and dismal wheels and beams of the machinery.

I was a weaver in the old mill, where, from the gray, misty light of the morning, till the great black curtain of night came down and shut us in, I had worked since I was a little, wee girl.

Mother was poor, and father died long, oh, long ago! so long that I could just remember when they had borne him away in that black-shrouded coffin; and then mother took me in her arms and kissed me and said: "Poor little Nettie has no father now!" I had made good wages, and we had managed to keep the old brown house where I was born. Mother wanted to make a lady of Kitty, and we had both worked the harder that we might send her to a boarding-school, and so "get the polish on," mother said.

And the spring before, when the flowers were budding around the old house, and the morning-glories had begun to crawl up and throw out their little arms and clutch the porch with their tiny fingers, and the warm breath of the South began to whisper through the great wide branches of the old gaunt elm that stood in front of the house, Mr. Dalton came among us.

He had come out from the city to get a breath of the fragrant air that played lazily through our valleys in the summer time, and galloped like mad over the wild hills, and threw the snow into great heaps, and froze our fingers, and painted our noses in winter. And mother took him to board, because he had fallen in love with the old weather-stormed house that had such an air of quiet good-nature about it. And we had given him the south chamber; and every day after the flowers began to open and show their little red faces, Kitty had plucked him a bouquet and placed it upon the broken stand in his room in the little vase that Uncle Robert had given her upon her last birthday.

We all grew to like him, he was always so agreeable. And he used to help Kitty with her lessons; and then in the evening, when the noisy old mill lay quiet in the soft moonlight, that would gild it till it seemed like some fairy castle, we would sit in the doorway, and he would sing to us in his clear, deep voice that would charm me into forgetfulness of self, till mother would come and tell us children that it was late, and we would get up and go to our rooms with the strange melody ringing in our ears.

I said we all liked him; but there was one, the fair sleeper, whose little heart was looking up to his and asking a return of the great, powerful love that it was pouring out. Her heart was such a one as never loves but once. Hearts are not all alike any more than heads. And with these thoughts I crept into bed beside Kitty, and lay and watched the great, laughing moon come up and peep in upon us, and play with her golden tresses that fell in ruffles of beautiful confusion down over the snowy pillow.

The old mill-bell was ringing when I awoke next morning, and I could hear the short, quick steps of the men and women hurrying on to their labors. Then I got up and kissed the rosy lips of the sleeper as they murmured in dreams, and went out and joined in the throng that was hastening to the mill. John Broad was standing in the door-way, with a great sunny smile running over his rough-hewn face, and a whole world of kindness beaming in his eyes.

"Good-morning, Nettie," said he, as I passed into the mill, and up the damp, creaky stairs to my work.

I answered him with a smile, for I knew that for years he had waited at the old mill-door in the morning till I came, and then would go to his work and be happy all day.

We had been children together, and many were the cold winter days he had taken me to school on his sled, and wrapped his cloak around me to keep out the frosty darts that were shooting around us in the still morning air. And John loved me then, and it had grown with him, although he had never told it to me.

Could I love him? I did not then, for I did not know how to appreciate him; but I learned after.

But John didn't wear the same happy smile that he was wont to do before Mr. Dalton came, and I've seen him pass our house of a Sunday evening and look up to the windows so mournfully. And sometimes he'd come round to the kitchen, and sit with mother till the sun would roll down out of sight behind the woods, and then he'd go on home over the little foot-bridge below the mill, stopping to look down where the little fish were darting about in the sun's good-night beams, and stealing at the same time a glance back towards the old house.

When I went home at noon, Kitty and Mr. Dalton were just coming into the yard from a ride off into the country.

"Oh, we've had such a splendid ride, Nettie!" she cried, as Mr. Dalton helped her out of the carriage. "We've been to N——; and oh, Nettie! see the pretty ring that Mr. Dalton bought for me," she continued, coming forward and putting her little arms around me and leading me into the house. "Is it not pretty?"

"Very," I replied. "An engagement ring, perhaps," and I looked up at Mr. Dalton who had followed us into the house. His face flushed slightly, but he said nothing.

"Oh, no, it's only a keepsake. Mr. Dalton is going home to-morrow, you know."

"Are you?" I inquired, turning to him as he sat looking out of the window like one in a dream.

"Yes; but I'm coming back again in the autumn," he replied, looking at Kitty and smiling.

I felt something strike my heart like a dagger. How deep it seemed to cut! Was I in love with this man?

All the afternoon, in the clash of the busy looms, I worked and thought. I had dreams, but then, why should I recount them? Why should I, with my great, coarse face, so unlovable, stand in the way of Kitty's happiness? Mother had wished Kitty to be a lady, and she would, now, for Mr. Dalton was rich. And so the long afternoon wore away, and we went out from the close, dusty rooms that were stealing the bloom from so many cheeks, and grinding the features down so thin and sharp.

Well, the bright summer passed, and the long, sad autumn evenings came, and the cold winds moaned around the old house and made the great leafless elm sigh and swing his gaunt arms wildly to and fro like some giant in despair.

And John, who owned a little farm over the other side of the mountain, and had Aunt Sally, as we used to call her, for a housekeeper, for she was always so kind to us when we were children, and used to give us such great plump rosy-cheeked apples—John would drop in of an evening, and sit down beside mother in the chimney corner, and talk with her in his great rough voice, never daring to look at me, as I sat at the table knitting. Sometimes he'd bring in a little white snow-flake of a letter for Kitty, and she'd run up and kiss his broad, shaggy face, and then trip out of the room, singing so cheerily, and go up to her own little chamber, and pore over the contents of the letter till bedtime.

But by and by the letters came less frequently, and when they did come, they were "short and cold," Kitty said. And often I would find her lying awake in the middle of the night, her blue eyes wide open, looking away off back to those happy days of the summer time, and the great tears rolling down her white cold cheeks.

Thanksgiving came, and John brought up a bouncing big turkey from his farm that he had "raised hisself, all on corn and sich like," and made mother a present of it. But it was no Thanksgiving for us, for Kitty was lying sick in mother's room, and the doctor came every day, and shook his head, and went away without giving us any encouragement.

Kitty received no letters then. They had ceased, and with them went her merry laugh and bright smiles. And she looked so sweet and sad, just as I've thought the angels did in their purity.

John came to the house a great deal after Kitty was taken sick, for there was so much that he could do to help us, and he would have run his great, thick, clumsy boots and himself, in fact, all to shoe-strings for mother and me. And one night, as he stood at the door with mother, I heard him talking about Mr. Dalton. I couldn't hear all they said, but John was very bitter against him; and then mother told him that that wasn't the right spirit, and that we should forgive as we would be forgiven. But John couldn't think so, and he went off growling to himself.

I don't know why, but I began to like John better after that. I used to compare him to Mr. Dalton. To be sure, he hadn't Mr. Dalton's handsome face and gentlemanly manners. He was very coarse and uncouth, you would say; but with his good-natured face and great swelling heart, that was almost too big for his broad, deep chest, I thought him more of a gentleman, and more worthy of a true woman's love than many others who make more pretensions. Then the snow came and covered all the fields, and shone all so white and radiant over on the mountain. And Kitty would look out of the window at the merry sleighing parties that went carolling by, and sigh, while the tears would gather in her great blue eyes, that had become so wild and sunken.

"She won't be with us a great while longer," said John to me one night, looking towards the bedroom door; and then he wiped his eyes with the back of his hand, and continued: "Well, I always thought she was a mighty sight too good for this rough world," and he lit his pipe while a tear run down and glittered in his beard; and then he bid me "good-night," and went out through the snow over the mountain.

And Kitty grew worse and worse, and the little face came to be like the snow—so white and cold-looking. And mother went about the house just like a ghost, and in the night I could hear her praying.

What a dismal night it was! The wind shrieked and groaned in the great wide chimney, and clattered the windows, and then went shrieking off down among the pines in the swamp. And little gray clouds were scudding across the sky, and the little stars sat shivering out in the cold. Kitty lay there so calmly watching them; her pale face looking ghastly in the flickering lamp-light. John sat there beside the bed, and mother was on the other side, with her face buried in her hands, and the great sobs heaving up from her heart. And by and by the moon came up over the pines, and looked in, and played with Kitty's hair as on that night so long ago, and he turned all the gold to silver. Then Kitty turned her blue eyes up to me, smiling, and seeming so happy, and when I put my head down on the bed, she whispered, "I am going, sister." And it seemed as if the Angel of Death came down and kissed the pale rosies from her lips. I laid my hand gently on her heart, but it had ceased to beat. And John came and put his arms around me, and drew me out of the room, leaving mother sobbing and kissing the cold lifeless lips.

That was a sad time for us. And, after the funeral was over and the friends had gone, John came and stayed with us, so that he might help me, for mother couldn't do anything then but sit in the chimney corner, with the great Bible lying open upon her lap, and cry. She had loved Kitty so much, that when she came to be taken away, she broke right down, and the great furrows in her face grew deeper and deeper every day.

I don't know how we ever got through that winter, and we couldn't but for John; for the hard times came on, and the mill stopped, and so I didn't have any work, and it had cost us, when Kitty was sick, all that we had saved before. But by and by the snows went away, all excepting some little patches that lay in behind the rocks and up on the mountain, till spring came and looked in upon them, and melted them with her soft eyes.

Mother grew somewhat better as the skies grew brighter; and she would sit and talk to John in the evenings, as she had used to do before the sad days came. And Sunday evenings we'd walk over to Kitty's grave, mother leaning on John's arm, and looking up to him with such a fond expression on her withered face as almost made me jealous, for I had cast out the old love then.

One warm bright morning, when the young grass was looking up at me with its dewy eyes, I had wandered down to the little brook back of the house, where the sunbeams were prying the white lilies open, and letting their fragrance gush forth and mingle with the breezes. The laborers were working away off in the fields, singing, while the ring of their hoes kept time to the melody.

I was leaning over the bank and looking down into the clear waters that reflected back my great ugly face, the ripples distorting the features, and making me look worse than I did, when I saw another face smiling up out of the waters, and then I felt a strong arm around me, and I looked up at John, and he kissed me for the first time in his life. Then John asked me something in so low a voice that I didn't hardly hear it; but I guessed what it was, and laid my head down on his breast, and heard his great heart beating against my cheek. And then we walked up to the house together, John's arm around me. And mother looked up over her spectacles when we went in, and smiled; and we went and knelt down beside her, and she placed her hands upon our heads, and whispered: "God bless you, my children."

HEROINES.

BY AUGUSTA H. WORTHEN.

Nor such commonplace affairs as Joan of Arc or Grace Darling, but the heroines of novels and newspaper stories—it is of their wrongs that I propose to treat; for them I offer my plea. Now the spirit of reform seems to be very active in the world. Reformers everywhere are so numerous, that it seems as if every kind of abuse and wrong-doing were in a fair way to be raked open. Almost every community can boast of one or more of those energetic individuals, whose special mission it is to right other people's wrongs. Yet I have waited in vain to see some bold spirit stand forth in defence of that class of unfortunates, whose name is placed at the head of this article. I do not use the term unfortunate without consideration.

Of course if these persons are, in any degree, ambitious of distinction, it must be gratifying to be brought before the public, attractive and beautiful as they are invariably made to appear, and, in most cases, dressed in costly and becoming apparel, for which they neither toil nor spin. Still further to encourage woman's vanity, there is the author ever at hand, ready to point out their manifold perfections. But can this alone be considered sufficient compensation for all they are compelled to suffer? I do not believe it can.

In the first place, it must become tedious to be obliged constantly to maintain that high standard of excellence which is expected from one who is always before the public. And it is really no light thing to fall alive into the hands of a story-writer; you can never exactly calculate the amount of misery he will bring upon your head; for he is both cruel and inconsistent. He singles out his victim, introduces her to the world, sets forth her merits, enlists every one's sympathies in her favor, and then proceeds to torment her in every possible way. For this purpose he employs the whole force of his ingenuity and malice. If she is rich, he squanders her estate—no reckless spendthrift could ever make money fly faster than he does. If she has a fond, doting father, ever ready to gratify her slightest wish, the author manages to obtain a private interview with him, and lo! The old gentleman's heart is turned to stone. Has she been left to the tender mercies of a guardian? Straightway, with the author's full knowledge and consent—nay, at his instigation even, he seeks to force upon her affections his graceless and unacceptable nephew. Now the author knows, even if the guardian does not, that her affections are no longer under her control, that she has already made choice of a lover every way suited to her taste; is it not the height of cruelty, then, for him to give his countenance to such a scheme?

He contrives to separate her from her lover, distracts her mind by whispering that he will probably transfer his affections to some fair one nearer at hand, and so the plot thickens. About this time various friends become distrustful, and give her the cold shoulder. One attached servant, however, remains faithful; without her aid our heroine would occasionally be brought to the level of a commonplace drudge.

You might suppose she had now suffered enough to render her perfect in all the Christian graces; but such was not the object of the discipline she has received. She never needed it, in fact, for she, unlike other mortals, was good enough to begin with. And yet the cruel author has not half done with her. Now, when she has so much need of physical strength to sustain her under her mental sufferings, he puts her on a short allowance of food. Not but that he makes a pretence of setting abundance before her, or sends her faithful servants to do it: good food, too, such as you or I could eat at any time, but the nicer it is, the less she eats of it. He won't let her eat; he only sets it before her to tantalize her.

If all that authors relate of their heroines be true, and I suppose it is, they never eat as much solid food as would keep a chicken alive. They take some tea, however; but they only swallow it: they never drink it as people do when they are dry. Their emotional organs are so continually wrought upon, that nearly everything chokes them.

I remember a story published a few years ago in one of the Weeklies, wherein the heroine suffered all manner of trials for more than five years, and during all that time I could not ascertain that she ate anything but "toast done to a turn." Sometimes she refused even that; but I never wondered much that she did—toast is good; but being the sole article on her bill of fare, I suppose she got tired of it. According to custom, the author made a show of offering various niceties for her acceptance; but she always sent them away untouched; he never meant she should eat them, and she knew it, and acted accordingly. It is quite probable that her faithful servant fared well about that time.

Semi-starvation is hard enough; but the measure of her physical sufferings is not yet full. With malignant ingenuity her tormentor now contrives ways to deprive his victim of necessary sleep. If the tea she has been permitted to take (for this very purpose, I have not doubt) does not prove sufficient, her many woes are sent to hold a midnight dance around her couch.

In ordinary cases, the endurance of months, perhaps years, of such persecutions would be considered sufficient apology for the loss of personal beauty. But this young woman is denied even the poor privilege of looking as bad as she feels. So under all her trials, knowing what is expected of her, the unoffending creature contrives to "look lovelier than ever." It is wonderful that she can do it—it seems impossible, nevertheless she does it.

I suppose there are some prosaic persons who will tell me that I am making a plea for mere non-entities—that these young ladies never had, and never will have any actual existence; but it is my opinion they are solemn realities. Still I do not think I should have spoken, if I had not perceived their condition to be every year growing worse. In former times, no matter how many tears were shed during the perusal of a novel of three volumes, the last chapter made amends for all. The old-fashioned novels always "came out well." Whatever trials the heroine had to bear, she had one thing at least to sustain her; she knew she might depend on a blissful marriage at last. This comforting assurance, no doubt, often kept the frail creature from fainting by the way.

But now the course of events is changed somewhat; the heroine never knows what to expect; she may marry, and she may not, and this distressing uncertainty is, we may presume, as hard to bear as any of her other afflictions. From a careful observation of different cases, I have arrived at the conclusion that heroines, as a class, have degenerated physically. They do not, on an average, live so long as in former times. When you read a modern novel, it is best not to risk your peace of mind by becoming much attached to the heroine; the chances are about ten to one that she will never live to see the end of it. Does not this show a great want of calculation in the writer? Why manufacture such a delicate piece of china, and then shatter it. Why assume the responsibility of conducting so frail a vessel, when he knows it can never keep together long enough to reach its destined port? Does he suppose it can be any pleasure to us to look on, and see it go down?

Setting metaphor aside, does not justice demand that in the case of these interesting young ladies, some milder form of treatment should be adopted! Yes, justice, for are they not invariably free from all offence, actual or intentional? Do they not, under all circumstances, preserve their spotless innocence! "Not to put too fine a point upon it," do they deserve the treatment they receive?

But supposing they do, ought we, the readers, to be made to suffer by it? It has been observed that the Esquimaux, in the frozen wastes of British America, can not strike his dusky mate but the whole world feels the blow; probably by a process similar to that the same individual employs in the management of his dog-team. He strikes the one next the sledge, who instantly takes the hint and bites his nearest neighbor, who bites the next, and so on till each one gets his share of "coercion."

Now the pernicious influence of the constant exhibition of literary cruelty must be wide spread and deep. Its hardening effect upon the already hard-hearted author is very apparent; he is never so well pleased as when he sees he can make you weep. Upon the reader the effect is always more or less painful—this rehearsal of sorrows we have no power to relieve. Why should we any longer disquiet ourselves in vain? Why be so prodigal of tears, whose saltness can avail nothing whatever? Would it not be better to strike at once to the root of the matter, by appealing to the author of all the trouble? He may not be entirely beyond our influence.

The spirit of the present age is opposed to cruelty, in all its forms. Its voice is everywhere heard pleading for the defenceless. Let us hope that even authors will hear it at last, that the gall and wormwood, upon which they mostly regale themselves, shall, at no distant day, be exchanged for the milk of human kindness. Will you tell me that we need sometimes to forget ourselves in the contemplation of other people's sorrows? Most certainly we do; but if the day of which I spoke should ever arrive, and we should find ourselves in danger of becoming torpid and unfeeling, for want of an object to call forth our sympathies, perhaps acquaintance with some destitute widow, or suffering child, or lonely old man, might supply the needed excitement. If we have a few surplus tears to shed, perhaps we might be moved thereto by the sight of misery in our own streets and lanes; and perhaps, who knows? perhaps your own kitchen servant may have some of the elements of the heroine in her rough composition.

THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN.

THERE is much clamor in these days of progress respecting a grant of new rights, or an extension of privileges for our sex. A powerful moralist has said that "in contentions for power, both the philosophy and poetry of life are dropped and trodden down." Would not a still greater loss accrue to domestic happiness, and to the interests of well-balanced society, should the innate delicacy and prerogative of woman, as woman, be forfeited or sacrificed?

"I have given her as a helpmate," said the voice that cannot err, when it spoke unto Adam, in the cool of the day, amid the trees of Paradise. Not as a toy, a clog, a wrestler, a prize-fighter. No, a helpmate, such as was fitting for man to desire, and for woman to become.

Since the Creator has assigned different spheres of action, for the different sexes, it is to be presumed, from his unerring wisdom, that there is work enough in each department to employ them, and that the faithful performance of that work will be for the benefit of both. If he has made one the priestess of the inner temple, committing to her charge its unrevealed sanctities, why should she seek to mingle in the warfare that may thunder at its gates, or rock its torrents? Need she be again tempted by pride or curiosity, or glowing words, to barter her own Eden?

The true nobility of woman is to keep her own sphere, and to adorn it; not, like the comet, daunting and perplexing other systems, but as the pure star, which is the first to light the day, and the last to leave it. If she shares not the fame of the ruler and the blood-shedder, her good works, such as "become those who profess godliness," though they leave no "foot-prints on the sands of time," may find record in the "Lamb's book of life."

TRANSPLANTED.

BY W. DEXTER SMITH, JR.

WHERE the violets are nodding,
Smiling in the gentle breeze,
Where the zephyrs sing sweet carols
As they dance among the trees—
Where the little songsters warble
From the dewy morn till night,
There we laid our darling Minnie Evermore from mortal sight.

She was fairer than the sunbeams
That our daily path illumine,
And her voice was like sweet music
In our home where now is gloom:
Angels saw our child, and, watching—
Beck'ning to our darling prize,
Bore her to their home in heaven—
To the land beyond the skies.

EVENING.

BY CATHARINE MITCHELL.

DAY declines;
The last bright tinges of the setting sun,
That robed in splendor the gray, rifted clouds,
And gilded the surrounding scenery
With crimson drapery fringed with burnished gold,
Have gently faded from the western skies;
The soft reflections from the greenwood side,
Seen in the bosom of the clear blue waters—
They, too, have vanished like a morning dream.

The winds are hush'd;
The shades of evening gather, dark'ning fast,
And o'er the highland floats a shadowy cloud,
Soaring away above the distant hills;
The feathered songster seeks her downy nest
In the dark pine that crowns its rocky height;
On yon tall tree that buds above the river,
Whose boughs seem shattered by the wintry storms,
Sits the lone night-owl, looking o'er the brake,
Where the mute partridge and his timid mate
Stand ready to conceal their little heads
Under the sedgy grass.

Time moves apace;
A dusky curtain droops around the scene,
Wrapping the forest tops in deepening gloom;
No moon breaks forth, no twinkling stars appear
To guide the weary traveller on his way,
And all is settled into murky night,
But soothing hope awaits the dawning light
To gladden nature with her cheerful beams.

THE PURSUIT OF WEALTH UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

A LIFE SKETCH.

BY ETTIE ELTON.

CHAPTER I.

DARK HOURS.

"I WANT a new carpet for this parlor," soliloquized Mrs. Peabody, as she surveyed the somewhat rusty ingrain, which had covered the same room for years; "and I want it to be Brussels or velvet; I'm tired of these cheap things. Yes, and a new set of curtains"—and at the same moment she put tidily back into their gilt loops the snowy muslins which graced her parlor windows. Then, turning to arrange the books upon the table, she continued: "And a book-case, too, and then a library—I'm heart-sick of waiting for wealth. The best I can do with books upon a table, they're forever askew and awry. I've had the promise of a wing on the north side expressly for a library; but when on earth he'll get around to build it Madame Prewster or some other prophetess will have to tell—I can't. Pity the old fables about genii weren't true, and a pity I hadn't an old lamp to rub. It seems as if some people have. Now there's the Dunhams; they hav'n't been in business any longer than Erastus, and they're living in grand style: furniture of satin brocatel, velvet carpets, gilt chandeliers—and the goodness only knows what they hav'n't got. Everything that heart can wish. And here I go, with bonnet out of fashion, trying to make it last two seasons; and when they are making up glacés and antiques by the wholesale, I am away in my back sitting-room, without even the help of a dressmaker, trying to conjure up something new out of old dresses that have been on the docket half a dozen years, turning them upside down, and down side up, and inside out, and outside in; then after all my economy, I have to hear the same old story. Whenever I ask for something I really need, Erastus will say: 'Oh yes, my dear, you need a great many things.' And then I know that at the close of business hours I shall have to be entertained with the information that our expenses for the last month have exceeded our income, and listen again for the ten thousandth time to the gentle hint, that 'if we ever lay up anything, it must be done while we are young.' If I did not know that all this is true, and that Erastus is the kindest and best man in the world, I'd flare up some time when I get so provoked at the presentation of these distressing ideas; but I know that if I should bluster around, and cry a little, I could get an entire new set of furniture, besides china and silver; but cry, eh! I'll not do that; and as to blustering, I hav'n't the heart to do it—he's so kind."

It is impossible to say how long Mrs. Peabody would have soliloquized thus, had she not been interrupted by the approach of her two little girls, just returned from school; and, as the little Della threw down her sunbonnet upon the nearest chair, she declared that she was hungry, and went hopping away to the kitchen, her golden curls dancing over her snowy little neck and shoulders, like a bevy of fairies on a moonlit evening in June.

Jennie, who had arrived at the dignified age of eleven years, sat down, and gravely inquired when dinner would be ready.

"Pretty soon," responded the mother. "But what makes you look so troubled, my child? One would think you had as many cares as a matron of forty."

"Well, ma, I never shall get through my arithmetic in the world; as sure as I live, I hav'n't recited this week; and to-day when I asked Mr. Birch to assist me, he sent me to that sleepy-eyed Hodge girl, and she told me a great lingo about multiplying the numerator by the denominator, and if that didn't get the answer, to try dividing the denominator by the numerator; and I did try them every way, but not a single answer could I get."

"Well, child, bring home your book to-night, and I'll help you out of your troubles."

Just then the little Della came tripping in, with a piece of cake partly in her hand and partly in her mouth, with a childish expression of thoughtfulness upon her face.

"Well, darling, what are your troubles at school?" said her mother.

"Nothing. Where's Kitty?" was the significant response.

"Nothing!" repeated the literary Jennie. "No wonder, for she hasn't read since I can remember."

"Why, what does it all mean? Go to school and not read or recite for a week! Money paid for tuition, and nothing received in return but the rent of hard seats! This is Western independence with a vengeance. Now, Jennie, do you tell Mr. Birch that I want you to recite every day. What in the world does he busy himself about?"

"Oh, he hears all the large scholars; and just before school is out every day, he tells us that he is sorry that he had to omit so many lessons to-day, and that next term he will have an assistant; but I'd like to know what we are going to do this term?"

"Well, Jennie, I'll go down this very afternoon, and see if I can't make some arrangement with your teacher; and go now, dear, and brush up a little for dinner."

The sound of "An' sure itsh dinner ish ready" now issued from a red face peeping in from the dining-room, causing the little feet to scamper in that direction, and soon all were seated at the table enjoying the repast as well as 'twere possible in the absence of the husband and father, who was gone to the great commercial city for a new supply of goods.

As the brightest month in the year has some cloud-darkened days, so there are days in the lives of all persons, even the most cheerful, when everything will seem to go entirely wrong; and the day in which our story commences was such a one to Mrs. Peabody. She was one of those happy dispositions whose lives are decidedly sunny. Naturally energetic, and rendered more so by the activities of Western life, she had learned to rise above the effeminate delicacy so common among the élite of American women; and while she mingled with them, a detestation of anything of its kind sprang up in her nature, and gave her a lofty independence of character which, mingled with a refined mind, and a love of the beautiful, cannot fail to command respect, even of the most fastidious.

But who, alas! are without their weak points? and on this day Mrs. Peabody seemed to predominate. She had been thinking for the last six months that, when her husband should make his next Eastern trip, their old furniture should give place to an entire new set, which should not only equal, but rival the "Dunham's." But alas! how were her hopes blighted when she was informed that their circumstances would not allow the exchange at present! She knew that her husband was judicious, and relied with implicit confidence upon all he said; and she well knew, too, the power of her influence over him; therefore, while her pride tempted her to persuade him to make the purchase at all hazards, her judgment bade her forbear; and it was in the conflict between these opposing principles in her nature, that we find her in the unpleasant mood of this morning. And now, as if Dame Fate would heap care upon sorrow, the deficiencies in the literary enterprise of Flintville present themselves to her for contemplation.

When Mrs. Peabody was Miss Janett Blake, she was a school-teacher—not one of those who flash around, comet-like, causing people to wonder why they were ever created at all, but one who seemed to be such by intuition. She taught because she could not help it. It was but a pastime for her to deliver to others the gems of thought which were so abundant in the casket of her memory. And now, that she was the mother of two charming daughters, she was both grieved and vexed to think that their education was almost wholly neglected in a school which was pronounced "good" by the ruling geniuses of the aspiring little town in which she lived.

The dinner was over, the children had returned to school, and Mrs. Peabody had taken her accustomed seat by the window, and resumed her work upon the little merino skirt she was embroidering for Della. Autumn winds were sighing; the silvery light of an October sun fell soft and beautiful upon the forest trees, decked as they were in a "garment of a thousand dyes." The purple dahlia bowed its head to the kisses of the breeze, and the weeping willow at the front door waved its pendant branches over the death couch of nature. All conspired to throw a shadow over the usually sunny heart of Mrs. Peabody; and she laid aside her work as if a new thought had burst upon her mental vision, donned her bonnet and shawl, and in a few moments stood at the door of Mr. Birch's school-room.

She was invited in, where were about sixty pupils of both sexes, varying in capacities from the child of five years, to the man and woman of twenty, all under the supervision of one inefficient teacher in the person of Mr. Birch. He looked perplexed when he saw her, and seemed confused while she talked of her anxiety in relation to her children's progress. He told her that he hoped to find an assistant for the next term to take charge of the ladies' department, and then ample justice should be done to all.

The present term was nearly closed, and Mrs. Peabody, moved with sympathy for the careworn teacher, resolved to wait patiently the arrival of that time; after which she would teach her daughters at home. She retraced her steps homeward, and was again seated at the north window of her sitting-room, plying her needle upon the beautiful merino.

What were all her reveries we do not venture to surmise; but we fancy she looked into the shadowy future, upon the picture of her little school, with mingled pleasure and pain. She well knew how it would rob her of her best hours, if she would do justice to their instruction, and she murmured, half aloud, that "the tax would be equally as great as the superintendence of twenty-five scholars. Why can't I," she mentally soliloquized, "take a situation in a school and done with it? Then I can be paid for my trouble. Ha, ha, yes; and then I can buy my own furniture." It was a passing thought, an ethereal castle, but such, alas, oft deceive their builders, and prove their subtlety when it is too late.

CHAPTER II.

THE AIR CASTLE BUILT.

THE shades of evening were falling upon the serene earth. Mrs. Peabody had drawn close to her side her darling children, and while the little Della nestled her head, covered with its rich golden curls, in her mamma's lap, and smoothed with one hand the Maltese kitten which stood purring at her side, Jennie read aloud in a clear, soft voice, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." Although Mrs. Peabody had read it over and over many times in her early life, yet the spectres of "Old Michael" seemed to loom up before her in the deep twilight of the distance. The elfin page and the wounded knight were all visioned in her fancy, and she felt a sensation of horror creeping over her.

A loud ringing of the door-bell seemed a fortunate change of subject, and the group awaited its answer by Katy in almost breathless suspense. What fireside is there that does not feel a sensation of deep loneliness when the "gude man's awa'?"

Could she have lifted the curtain of the future, she might have seen that, although no present evil would betide them, the events of that hour would be to her a source of lasting annoyance. Is it true, indeed, that "Coming events cast their shadows before?"

"Au' it's a gintleman, shure, as wants to see you, ma'am," said Katy, after showing the stranger a seat in the parlor.

Mrs. Peabody was astonished to find that her visitor was Mr. Birch. And after conversing briefly upon the fine autumn evening, he informed the lady that the object of his call was to inquire of her if she knew any one whom she could recommend to him for an assistant. Knowing that she was acquainted with many teachers, he felt that her recommendation would be a sufficient guarantee of their ability.

She hesitated. Her heart fluttered like a prisoned bird—her pride whispered of the old furniture, and quick, as if some fairy's wand had passed through the room, fancy painted marble tables, velvet carpets, and in the vision she was half bewildered. "I have been thinking of teaching, myself, this winter," she replied, half trembling at the confession of her distracted thoughts. "I do not know what Mr. Peabody would think of it; but this afternoon it has been running through my mind that I could, with the aid of faithful servants in the house, find time for six hours of teaching each day."

Mr. Birch looked both pleased and amazed at the unexpected announcement, and said: "Perhaps I can best secure your influence by engaging you as preceptress in my school. I would give you a partnership or a salary, as might best suit you. And if we could make the arrangement, I have no doubt but we would have at least a hundred scholars, and we would just run a partition through the hall, and give the girls one department and the boys the other, thus rendering it both pleasant and convenient."

A few words more and the terms were agreed upon—the bargain consummated; and Mr. Birch departed with the understanding that, unless Mr. Peabody should particularly object, the Flintville High School would commence its third term on the tenth day of October, under the supervision of Mr. D. M. Birch and Mrs. J. C. Peabody.

CHAPTER III.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE CASTLE.

"WELL," said Mr. Birch to his wife, on that evening, "if you'll believe it, I have engaged Mrs. Peabody to assist me this winter."

"Mrs. Peabody! what Mrs. Peabody?" exclaimed Mrs. Birch, half suspecting the truth, yet doubting the possibility of such an event.

"Why, Mrs. Erastus Peabody, of course; who else do you suppose? And now with her aid and influence I shall net a larger profit than I had before thought possible. Every dog has his lucky day."

"But you must remember she is to have half."

"Oh no, wife: she preferred a salary to avoid the trouble of collecting small debts; but sometimes it's more trouble to collect large ones than small ones. She didn't think of that, though, ha! ha! She thinks she's made a great bargain."

"But you did not hire her for a small salary, did you, Daniel?"

"Oh no, indeed. I've promised to pay her an enormous price—never said a word against it. But you know," said he, in a low whisper, "the money has to go through my hands. She'll draw in the pupils, that's my object."

But a few days more passed when, one sunny afternoon, Mrs. Peabody greeted her husband just returned from the city. She could hardly wait, for very joy, to tell him of her lucrative plans for the approaching winter, and yet she feared a little that he might seriously disapprove the measure.

"Why, Jannette, are you crazy?" exclaimed Mr. Peabody, after listening to the news which his wife related to him. "How do you think matters will be going on at home, when you are away? And how do you think your health will allow you to take any additional cares? You are always busy as a bee, and always in a hurry; and then to think of doing more, I'm astonished!"

"Don't you know, Erastus, that I can always accomplish whatever I undertake?" said she, her aspirations a little subdued at her husband's view of the subject.

"Yes, at the peril of your health. And then you will have no time for company, and no time to go out; why you'll die all wrinkled and careworn before another year."

"Oh, I will dispense with all other labor; you know Kate is competent to do all the housework, and I can hire all my sewing done for one quarter the money I shall earn."

"Are you sure you can keep Kate?"

"I have engaged her for a year; and Mrs. Bolingbroke will do my sewing for the winter, whenever I want her; and as to going out, I shall have more time than I have now; for any evening, after four o'clock, I shall be at liberty, as I have determined to throw off all the care of work, and devote myself exclusively to teaching, and to recreation out of school hours."

"Ho, hum! we'll see!" sighed out the perplexed husband, willing to end the discussion.

"Well, we will see," continued the persevering Mrs. Peabody; "that is, unless you put a veto upon it; for, mind you, I was not rash enough to promise unconditionally, and I am quite sure that when you find me supplied with a few hundred dollars of spending money, you will think quite favorably of the arrangement. Don't think that because the pale Mrs. Lowdon, and this, and that, and the other Mrs. Invalid, look as though in every sense 'woman is the weaker vessel'—I say, don't look at them and think that no one is able to do more than to sit by a ready-made fire, on a cold day, or fan themselves on a warm one, and dodge mosquitoes after sunset. It is a mistake. It is not so much a want of strength that incapacitates us as a want of energy."

"Very good; quite eloquent you have grown of late. I shouldn't wonder if some day you'd be off addressing these new-fashioned conventions, and advocating the rights of the down-trodden daughters of earth generally. Likely as not, some evening you'll come in from your office and find me darning the children's stockings. Wouldn't I be a model husband then? But without jesting, Jannette, I'll give you one gentle word of caution, and then you'll please to give me a little supper. I shall make no vetoes, but I want you to remember that old fable about the milkmaid, and don't reckon too largely upon green dresses."

CHAPTER IV.

TRIALS AND PERPLEXITIES.

"All is not gold that glitters."

It was a bleak December evening. The wind sighed and moaned, and howled piteously, but the blazing fire had warmed the sitting-room, and the silvery light of the astral shed a halo of cheerfulness within, yet Mrs. Peabody's heart seemed sinking with fatigue after the duties of the day. The great hall was already crowded with pupils; no partition had been put up according to agreement, and Mr. Birch was presiding over an indefinite portion of the school, while Mrs. Peabody was obliged to do the same. This was very trying to her, whose chief elementary principle was order. But she had learned long before that "what can't be cured must be endured," so she strove on with heroic patience to endure in silence.

This evening we find her seated, pencil in hand, by her writing-table, which was laden with heaps of papers called "compositions," written by pupils of almost every degree of capacity, and given to her for correction. She had marked out, and dashed, and interlined, and punctuated, till it seemed to her that no one had ever seen half the vexations that she had. Before her task was half completed, Mr. Peabody entered, and the clock had tolled the hour of nine. She withheld her accustomed smile, and went on scratching, and dotting, and dashing.

"Well, Jannette, what's the matter with you to-night. Upon my word, your face is as long as the Levitical law; and let me count, one, two, three scowls in that brow of yours. Come, put away those old papers and talk to me a little."

"Oh, don't trouble me now, Erastus, I want to finish this."

"Just then he drew away the paper playfully from under her pencil, making a long zigzag scratch from top to bottom of the whole document.

"You are forever hectoring me," she continued, a little peevishly. "I should think I had care enough, without being disturbed in this way."

"Well, my dear, I just want to ask you if this is the recreation you take out of school hours? I haven't seen you an evening this week without you were surrounded with papers enough to stock a lawyer's desk; and now here is something of another kind," and he drew from his pocket a letter addressed to Mrs. E. Peabody.

She recognized it from a lady friend, a cousin of her husband, and found that it contained the pleasing intelligence that she would be at their house the next week to spend the holidays.

Miss Florilla Danvers was a precise, quaint little maiden of about nineteen summers. In her father's house all went on with clock work regularity. Her mother was devoted to her domestic duties; indeed, so much so that scarce a nook in that great farmhouse but was looked after each day by her watchful eye. No wonder that Mrs. Peabody felt a sensation of dread creep over her at the idea of such company, when the keeping of her house was given up to Kate.

"What shall I do?" half soliloquized the troubled woman.

"Teach school; it's profitable business," added Mr. Peabody.

Just then a moaning from the little girls' sleeping apartment arrested the mother's ear, and she hastened to their bedside, to find the little Della groaning with the ear-ache.

"Take me up, mamma, I can't sleep," and she cried aloud.

The child was taken into the sitting-room, and countless restoratives applied without success, till the wearied mother sank down in despair. Long after the midnight hour was past, she watched over the little sufferer, till at length the pain ceased, and all were quietly at rest. But scarce had they fallen soundly asleep when the morning dawned. There was no respite for the school-teacher then. So she arose with a nervous headache, drank her coffee in silence, and at nine o'clock was again in the literary hall, in rather an ill plight for the day's labor. Everything necessarily went wrong. Big boys laughed and threw peanuts, and little ones pinched each other. Young ladies wrote billet-doux, and little girls made pictures on their slates. Nobody had their lessons, and more than twice she half resolved never to go there again. But this was Friday; the next day was the teacher's holiday, she would have some rest. So, in view of the morrow, she went home to tea, feeling better than in the morning.

"I'll tell you, Erastus, how I've planned it to be prepared for that cousin of yours," said Mrs. Peabody at the tea-table. "I'll turn pastry cook, house-cleaner, and Jack-of-all-trades to-morrow, and I can cook enough to last a week, besides putting things to rights."

"What a blessing it is to be able to make good calculations, Jannette."

"You always ridicule my plans; but I believe there is some truth in what Uncle Billy used to say, 'It's half in kalkilatin' right.'"

"And the other half is in making your 'calculations' work," rejoined Mr. Peabody.

"Well, you'll see."

"An' sure, missus, ye'd be willin' for me jest to run down the strate for a minit, wouldn't ye?" said Kate, interrupting them, as she approached with bonnet and shawl on.

"Why, Katy, can't you wait till the work is done? then you can go."

"Och, an' it's not Kathleen O'Brien that's afther walkin' the strates in the dark, sure it isn't. An' ye wouldn't be afther havin' yer maid to do a thing that ar'n't dacent. An' now, Missus Peabody, I must be off before the sun is down, or I can't go at all, at all."

"Well, then you must hurry back, will you?"

"An' it's I that will hurry. I'll be back agin in half an hour. Indade I will, ma'am."

But Kathleen's half hour was a long one. She forgot the "indacency" of being out till after dark, and did not return till most nine in the evening. Mrs. Peabody had placed the tea-things in the kitchen, and left them for her maidship to dispose of when she came back.

Kate didn't like that, and she made all things fly when she was performing the finale to her day's work.

The next morning found our "Jack-of-all-trades" in the kitchen, surrounded with butter and eggs, sugar and flour, lard and minced meat, sliced apples, etc. etc. Just after the breakfast things were cleared away, Kate appeared again before her mistress, attired for the "sthrate."

"What now, Kate, where are you going, in the morning, too?"

"An' shure, ma'am, an' it's Missus Spincer that'll be afther givin' me two shillin' more of a week than yerself, an' I tould her I'd come there this very mornin'."

"Why, Kate, what do you mean? Didn't you promise to stay with me a year?"

"An' ar'n't Kathleen O'Brien a poor girl—an' musn't she git all she can for the labor of her hands?"

"But why did you not tell me you were going away in time for me to find some one else? I can get plenty of help for less money than I pay you, and besides you know that my work is not quite equal to Spencer's Hotel."

"Och, ma'am, an' I never thought o' lavin' ye till the last evenin' when I called up to Spincer's to see Bridget O'Flaherty, an' Missus Spincer axed me what she would do for me, an' I tould her that I would be afther comin' this mornin', an' it's not Kathleen O'Brien that would break a promise ony how."

Mrs. Peabody was too indignant to reply; and according to her motto, to do whatever she might undertake, she told Kate to go; and upon looking in her porte-monnaie for the money to pay her, she found a sum not equal to the debt. Chagrined and vexed because Mr. Birch did not pay her according to agreement, she left her kneading-board and wrote the following:—

MR. BIRCH: I am in want of money. You promised to pay me in advance. Please send me five dollars by Jennie, and much oblige

MRS. J. C. PEABODY.

Jennie soon returned with a note, saying that Mr. Birch had not that amount by him, and that he would call up in the evening and bring it to her, if he could collect it during the day.

"Another promise made but to be broken," said Mrs. Peabody to herself, and then told Kate to call up the next week and she would pay her. But when her "maid-of-all-work" was really gone, she felt that she was brought into a strait narrower than she ever saw before.

The little girls looked up into her troubled face with their sweet blue eyes and said: "We'll help you, ma." And when she beheld such generous sympathy, all the yearnings of a mother's heart sprang up to meet it, and she scarce could tell why that silent tear escaped her eye, or why she could not restrain the emotion which fired her whole soul.

And it was really surprising to see how they dusted, and picked up, and put to rights, that whole house, equal to the best of parlor servants. And when dinner-time came, didn't they lay out that table with its snowy cloth and pure white dishes in better order than even Kathleen O'Brien could have done?

Notwithstanding the interruptions of half a dozen fashionable calls, and unexpected company to dinner, when night came, there were more cakes and pies, and lighter and whiter bread in that pantry than had been there at once for weeks before. But was all this accomplished without any weariness—any aching of limbs or any perplexities? Oh no; very weary was Mrs. Peabody that night; and when she sat down in her large easy chair on that eve of the blessed Sabbath, and listened to the rehearsal of the little girls' Bible lesson for the next day, she felt some heart-throbbings when they repeated, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Ah, there is no such consolation offered to those who are weary in their pursuit after the gilded follies of earth; none to those who faint in their search after "filthy lucre," and she felt as if she could turn aside from all else, and give herself up to the work which her blessed Master would have her to do. In that holy employment there are no perplexities of unfaithful servants, and when we are weary He "will give us rest." And that evening, when they bowed around the altar of prayer, it was to realize more than ever that "He is an ever-present help in time of trouble."

Not only Mrs. Peabody, but her husband looked sad. The time for jesting was now past with him. He had too much sympathy for her weariness for light words, and he felt, too, creeping upon him one of those distressing sick headaches to which he was subject; but how could he bear to have his already exhausted wife kept awake all night for his complaints! No, he would not; he could bear it alone for once. But the dark sunken eyes, hollow cheeks, and ashy paleness of the face, betrayed the approaching agony of the night. At midnight, the pains in his head were insufferable; but Mrs. Peabody knew just what would alleviate them. So she arose without a murmur, prepared a warm foot-bath and a soothing application for his forehead, administered an opiate, and when the clock upon the mantel struck out the hour of three they had just extinguished the night-lamp and prepared for a few hours' sleep. But his deep measured breathing fell upon her ear like a death knell; and while she nervously rested upon her sleepless pillow, dark visions of sick chambers, pallid countenances, half-closed eyes, and feverish brows, floated in a dreamy picture before her, e'en till the cock-crowing, when she sunk into a fitful slumber but for one short hour; then the bright sun looked down as silently beautiful upon the earth as if no suffering were here. It was the glorious Sabbath, and its sacred stillness brought a sweet feeling of repose to the wearied soul, which no elixir save that of Heaven can produce. The eye of faith stretched far beyond these mortal pains and tears, beyond the cares and perplexities of this life, to view that "haven of eternal rest," that Sabbath which hath no end.

"Mamma, who'll build the fire when Katy is gone," sung out a bird-like voice from an adjoining bedroom, which we cannot fail to recognize as little Della's.

A new trial now presented itself. The frost-paned windows told but too plainly of the chilling atmosphere. Her aching head and exhausted limbs shrunk from this unaccustomed task; but so glad was she to find her husband in a quiet sleep that she rose gently, lest she should awaken him, threw about her a warm wrapper, stepped into her velvet slippers, and glided out so noiselessly that one with open eyes and ears could scarce have heard a sound. Closing her own door, she stepped into the next bedroom and hushed the innocent prattle of the children, telling them that papa was very sick all night, and they must not disturb him.

"Does his heg-ate now?" anxiously inquired Della.

"I guess so, darling; but papa's asleep now, and you must be very still." And so they were very still, for it was Mrs. Peabody's fortune to have her children obedient.

In a few moments the bright fire was crackling in the grate; Billy, the canary, was singing a cheerful matin, and the little girls were performing their toilette by express permission that morning in the sitting-room. When all things had been duly put in order, the coffee and toast were prepared by Mrs. Peabody, the table laid out by Jennie in the most approved style, while Della counted the trees and birds, and little girls at play with dolls, in the pictures which Jack Frost had painted on the windows. Jennie could see old castles with ruined battlements, broken turrets, and moss-covered pillars, where Della could only see little girls with canaries upon their fingers. She could see rushing rivers and mighty cataracts where Della saw play-houses. But each could see what she did see so plainly, that mamma was called upon to explain the reason why they did not see alike. A question which older heads would like to hear answered.

Mrs. Peabody peeped softly in, to see if her husband was awake, just in time to find him removing the bandage from his forehead, when he exclaimed, "What are you doing up this cold morning, my dear? why did you not wait till I had made the fire?"

"You don't suppose I would let you get up in the cold after such a night as you had last night, do you? But how is your head this morning?"

"It is much better; I am able to take care of you, now."

"I am happy to say that I do not need any care at present. Breakfast is ready—I will warm your slippers for you, and I hope you will feel better still when you have taken a cup of warm coffee."

Soon all were seated around the neatly spread table, and Della very gravely remarked to mamma that she wished she wouldn't "get any more Katys," for she said it was "so clean and still when Katy was gone."

When breakfast was over, mamma was persuaded to seek repose, and the little girls would put away the dishes. Knowing that they were competent to perform the task, Mrs. Peabody was quite willing to intrust it to them, and yield to the importunities of exhausted nature for rest. She soon fell into a sound slumber, from which even the echoing church bells did not awaken her, and it was high noon ere she was aware that it was time for morning service.

When she awoke, she found her husband watching her with great anxiety, for he had discovered that a high fever was laying its burning fingers upon her, and he much feared the consequences. But she assured him it was nothing serious, only a slight cold from which she would recover in a few days. Colds never made her sick. She only feared her hoarseness would prove inconvenient in teaching. She declared that she was much refreshed by her long sleep, and was sure that the morrow would find her quite well.

CHAPTER V.

A WESTERN MINISTER.

THE hour for dismissal at the Flintville High School has arrived, and if you would see freedom—even as much as Fanny Fern would wish to see among children and youth—you should look in there. A score or more are rushing, stumbling, and stamping down the long staircase from the third story of the Dunham Block to the street. What care they for the frowns or threats of the dentists, doctors, and lawyers on the second floor? They are “out of school” now. Yet the long hall is swarming with a mixed multitude of dismissed pupils, some kicking at benches, some trying to find their books, some grown up lads and lasses enjoying tête-à-têtes in secluded corners, and by far the larger number seeking to promote confusion generally. Mrs. Peabody is sitting at her desk upon the rostrum in one end of the room, with her aching head leaning upon her left hand, while with her right she writes the first line upon a page in each of the forty copybooks before her.

An aspiring youth with a red head, a freckled face, and a green coat, presented himself with his writing-book, and asked her if she would please set him a copy.

“Mr. Birch will do that,” she replied.

“But I don’t like his copies, and the girls are a-beatin’ the boys all holler a larnin’ to write, an’ I don’t like that. There ’s a whole lot of boys that sit down yonder ’at are a-goin’ to git you to set all their’n, and I tho’t I ’d be ahead on ’em.”

Too much fatigued for argument, she accepted the book, and dismissed the boy in a hoarse whisper, and at the same time requesting him to go home, and to persuade the other boys to go down stairs immediately.

“Come, Bill, let’s go home. And, boys, look a-here,” he added, in an imperative manner, “Miss Peabody’s got the headache, and wants us to go home. Stop your ’rassinin’, Clare, and let’s go down stairs now, for the schoolmarm wants us to.”

This last argument was sufficient to take off another score; but no appeal was sufficient to break the game of wrestling between Mr. Birch and Clare—a tall stripling from Smithton, who was determined to “throw the master,” and then he would be ready to go home. A group of half a dozen gentlemanly young men, who had been gravely consulting together, now came up to Mrs. Peabody’s desk, and asked permission to speak with her a few moments.

They then proceeded to inform her that they had been trying to interest Mr. Birch in the enterprise of a public exhibition at the close of the term, which would occur in about two weeks; upon which occasion the young men should declaim, the young ladies read essays, and intersperse the exercises with a few pert colloquies and vocal music.

Mr. Birch had consented to this three weeks before, but made no arrangements to prepare them for the occasion; and they wished to know if she would not allow them to join the young ladies in their hour for practice, which they had been informed would be on the evening of the morrow. All arguments to convince them of woman’s incompetency to teach all branches of oratory failed, and she consented to their request.

By this time, Clare had been thrown by the “master” half a dozen times, and having let loose his grasp, was shaking himself like a whipped cur, “concluding to give it up.” Just then a burly fellow, known as Hank, walked up and said he’d “like to try it.” A vulgar shout rose upon the air, defaming the sanctity of the schoolroom, and cries of “Go it, Hank!” “Give it to him, and show him who’s master!” broke in mingled confusion upon the air, contrasting strangely with the conversation at Mrs. Peabody’s desk at the other end of the room.

Too much disgusted for endurance with the scene before her, she placed the unfinished copybooks in her desk, turned the key hastily, threw on her hood and furs, and went home.

Being late home that night, her newly initiated servant had made her debut at preparing supper alone, and she found the family, also the Rev. Mr. Crabbe, sitting around a tea-table which looked very unlike the one she was accustomed to see in that dining-room. The rag ends of half a dozen sets of dishes of all sizes and colors had been spread upon a brown cloth, and Miss Sally Bangs was doing the honors of the tea. While the salutations were being exchanged, Sally screamed out in a shrill fortissimo voice—“D’ye want to sit here?”

“Yes,” replied Mrs. Peabody, briefly.

“Wa’al, where shall I sit, then?” responded Sally.

“I guess you’ll find room in the kitchen.”

So Sally went to the kitchen, shutting the door with a bang, leaving Mrs. Peabody to arrange her own place at the table.

“You must enjoy excellent health, Sister Peabody, to be able to attend to your school,” remarked Elder Crabbe.

"My health is pretty good," was her reply.

"Well, sister, does thy soul prosper, even as thy body prospereth?" inquired the reverend Solomon.

She might have told him that if her faith was failing as fast as her bodily strength, she would soon be left to fall as far as Peter; but she forbore complaining, and gave an evasive answer.

Mr. Crabbe was an ascetic, unsympathizing man, who thought that what his constitution could endure, might be endured by every person. He had been reared in the rough climate of Northern New York, had, like David, spent his boyhood in watching his father's flocks upon the rocky hillside, and in his youth, like Cain, was a tiller of the soil.

If occupations have aught to do in moulding characters, it might be said that in this man the opposing dispositions of his two predecessors were strangely blended. A strong advocate of the Law of the Lord, yet he would almost slay the man who refused to partake of the gospel feast when bidden by him. When he took it upon himself to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ, his brethren in the ministry wisely (?) took into consideration that as his talents were small, and as he was disposed to use them somewhere, it was best to send him West, as "he would do very well there."

"O ye blind guides!" little do ye understand the wants of the West! Rather, when a man would stand on Zion's hill to proclaim good tidings of salvation, having upon his feet the sandals of ignorance, bid him come down from the mount, for it is holy ground. None are called there, not even to the West, who are not "wise as serpents."

But Elder Crabbe had called this afternoon to ascertain the reason why Mr. and Mrs. Peabody were not in their proper places on the Sabbath previous. When informed that they were absent on account of sickness, he added, with an unfeeling jest, that "A great many are troubled with Sunday sicknesses now-a-days. Oh, this is an age when we ministers have to do pretty much all the weeping between the porch and the altar."

Just then the clear voice of Sally broke forth upon the kitchen air: "Oh, I wish that I could marry," was the burden of her song—and as the minister was a widower, he might have taken the sentiment as a direct appeal to himself, and translated it into an inquiry from Sally as to "What she should do to be saved" (from being an old maid, I mean), which perhaps he did, as it had the effect to divert his attention from the subject upon which he was before conversing, and he began inquiring who "Miss Bangs" was, and why she had not been to meeting with them. So he must necessarily be informed that she had not been in their service but two days. And after some thrilling exhortations he took his leave.

"Why do you look so sad to-night?" said Mr. Peabody, when they were alone.

"Oh, I do not know as I am particularly sad, but I have been so much disgusted to-day with Mr. Birch, that I have almost concluded not to teach there another day."

"Why, what has occurred to-day, anything new?"

"It is new to me to witness such sights as I have seen to-day. It is new to me to be associated with a teacher who has not, and in fact deserves not, the respect of his pupils. If it were not for the reason that a large number have advanced their tuition, with the expectation of being under my instruction, I would never enter that school-room again."

"Well, how is it about these advance payments? Does Mr. Birch fulfil his promise in regard to payments?"

"No, indeed—that just puts me in mind—I sent to him last Saturday for money to pay Kate, and he promised to call up in the evening and pay me, but not a word did I hear from him until this morning, when he handed me the paltry sum of two dollars, which happened to be a little more than the amount of my indebtedness. He assured me that before the close of the term the whole matter should be made right—but what is his word—I'd—"

"Come, come, you're getting excited—poor Tray should not complain of his company."

"Job's friends were not more sure to remind him of his failings than—"

"Do you want me any longer?" squealed Sally, as she blustered unbidden into the sitting-room.

"Of course I do; why, what's the matter now?" exclaimed Mrs. Peabody, trembling at the prospect of being left servantless a second time.

"Wa'al, nothin', only if ye want me to work for ye, I reckon I'll set down to the fust table, coz I'm 'bout as good as any body, if I do work out, that's so."

"Why, Sally, you are not unreasonable enough to wish me to take the second table instead of yourself, when there is not room for all at the first, I hope?"

"Wa'al, not exactly that, but then I thought I'd jest ax ye 'bout it, coz ye see I want an understandin', for if I aint good enough to eat with ye, I'll be makin' tracks for home, that's all."

"We will understand each other better after a little, Sally; so now you be contented to stay with me till my school is closed, and if you are as good a girl as you are now, I will keep you longer."

"All I care is jest I don't want to be run over, and I won't, that's so."

"Oh, no indeed, you never shall be while you live with me," was the conciliating reply, while at the same time Mrs. Peabody was writhing beneath the crushing weight of Sally's impertinence.

The kitchen door was again closed, and above the din of rattling dishes, splashing water, and simmering tea-kettles, rose the shrill voice of our musical maid in the exquisite melody of—

"All around the vinegar jug,
The monkey chased the weasel."

WIDOWS: PART VI.

THE "WIDDER."

I never have changed my single lot,
I thought it would be a sin;
The inconsolable widder of Deacon Bedott
Don't intend to git married agin.

The Widow Bedott Papers.

THERE is no surer way of finding out what is esteemed of value in any community than by noting what is counterfeited there, either in the realm of matter or mind. Who pretends to be a mean, time-serving, office-seeking hungerer for a share of the public spoils? Who claims to be a mean man at a bargain, a grinder of the faces of the poor, a devourer of the portion of the fatherless? We find no aspirants for any such fame as this. "When one man want to rise, how him love the peop!" exclaimed the astonished Frenchman. Monsieur's observation was just, though his English was not particularly happy. It is the pure patriot, the large-hearted, liberal, high-minded man who is spied and counterfeited. The jewel and the gold, virtue and elegance have their "shams;" but nobody cares to imitate the shabby, or to pretend to wickedness. Even the hypocrite gives in his testimony to the beauty of holiness, and is, in his way, a preacher of righteousness.

We might write all day on the various kinds of whitewash by which the scamps endeavor to impose upon their fellow men; but we must confine ourselves to-day to female impostors of a peculiar class. We have to do with those who trifle with the tenderest sympathies of our nature, and are akin to the street-boy who tells a pitiful tale, that the stranger may be wiping his eyes while he picks his pocket.

Widowhood has its peculiar trials and sorrows, yet it has also its blessed privileges. The noble, the kindly, the loving of earth see in a true widow a sister—a helpless sister—to be sheltered and guarded, and gently led along her rugged pathway. The Widow is the special care of the Ever Merciful, Almighty Friend; she is the one human being to whom God is peculiarly pledged as Husband and Judge, Comforter and Guide. There is something desirable, then, even in the portion of the true widow. Hence it is that she has her counterfeits, as unlike the real mourner as is the gingerbread bird of the cake-shop to the robin at our window.

Widow is with us a sacred name; we do not care to designate by it anything that can win a smile, much less, curl the lip in scorn. It has been well remarked that "cant sayings are short cuts to express an idea, and slang words fill up the deficiencies of more elegant English." So widder has come to mean among us a something, a somebody, who either parades her sorrows for a purpose, or is no widow at all, but a thorough make-believe, an actor of an assumed part.

There are widders of all sorts, adapted to every stage of society, and unworthy of a place on any social platform.

There is the pretty, young widder, who wipes her eyes that innocent bachelors may look at her, and see how bright are those same eyes, and how the close quilling of her cap becomes her fair hair and tinted cheeks. Don't gratify her by a single glance! She neither deserves your sympathy nor your admiration.

There is that pertinacious widder, that haunter of offices, stores, studies, and all peculiar resorts of the lords of creation. She has a paper in her hand, stating that she has lost her husband somehow and somewhere, and so has a claim on the charitable. Don't be taken in by the sorrowful droop of her veil, or her lugubrious, dolorous aspect! She makes gain of her misfortunes, and a livelihood out of her grief! Knowing men shake their heads at her, and think her departed spouse had good riddance of her, and was fortunate in getting out of a world cumbered by her presence.

There is the French widder, a spinster really, who, being tired of the questionable honors of single blessedness, mysteriously absents herself for a time, goes, nobody knows where, and comes back "Madam," in deep mourning for a husband who had existed only in her imagination, as the tenant of her favorite chateau en Espagne.

There is the tramping widder, with a big bundle on her back, a big baby in her arms, and a big lie in her mouth. The bundle contains as good clothing as you have in your bureau; the baby, she borrowed (borrowing trouble, truly); the lie is a part of her natural dialect; she does not know now when she tells it—it would puzzle her far more to speak the truth. Don't give her a penny! Don't give her a hearing! Don't give her foot-room on your door-step!

There is the widder who is so hard to be comforted that she has to have her minister, or some unsophisticated Elder Sniffles to pour oil on her grief, and wipe away her tears. Shameless hypocrite! She wants a new husband! That is the only kind of comfort to dry up the fount of her sorrows! If she sends for you, my excellent bachelor friend, don't go unless your heart be mailed and guarded. She will find out your tender side, and get you to make love to her before you know it. Lend her sound, searching books to read, preach at her from the pulpit, if you please, but don't risk a conversation with her. She is a very Delilah, and even a Samson might be worsted in an encounter with such an adversary.

There is the hard-faced widder who keeps the boarding-house or the apple-stall, no matter which. She will make "a poor mouth," as the saying is, and tell of her children to be fed, and fairly compel you to let her have the best of the bargain in consideration of her peculiar trials. Don't have any dealings with her, but if you do, treat her as if she were a man, and a close-fisted one. She can look out for her own interest; she does not need your sympathy or your consideration. Perhaps she was young, honest and tender-hearted, once, but that was a long time ago, in the dim and shadowy past. Bygones, for her, will be bygones, and her second childhood will bear no resemblance to her first. There is no sweet, loving, kindly, liberal old age in store for her. Little grandchildren will never snuggle up to her side, or run to her as a city of refuge, where they will be safe from blame, no matter what peccadilloes they have committed. She will have all the loneliness and ugliness of old age, with none of the merciful alleviations Providence has associated with the down-hill of life. She will be a miserable, decaying ruin, beautified by no clustering mosses, and graced and sustained by no clinging vines! Alas for the widders, one and all, when they grow old!

We don't want to think about the widders. We don't want to write about them! It irks our very soul to know that they blot the fair face of earth! We cannot even bring ourselves to more than hint at the thinking, whispering, evil-tongued widder, who is sometimes tolerated even in select circles. We blush that she lives, and so let her pass.

We have done with the widders!

We would not for a moment cast a shadow of disrespect on the humble, unlettered woman, who styles herself a widder, and cares not whether Johnson or Webster would frown on her pronunciation. She but knows that the honest, hard hands of him who labored for her and her little ones, are folded over the broad bosom, that silent bosom, which lies so low, 'neath the green grass. She has shed her bitter tears, and moaned her moans of agony, and now she has rallied "to make good the room of him that's gone." She has talked cheerily to "the bairns," and "set the house to rights," and she is ready to face the world nobly, and welcome ceaseless toil without a murmur. She will deny herself food and raiment, rest and sleep, and yet smile on, while her children are rosy around her. Little to her will be privation and torture, if she can but "make ends meet," and "put a bit in the mouths of her boys and girls." She wants work, constant work; not for charity, not even for sympathy does she ask, but she does ask work of some kind, no matter how wearisome, no matter how scanty the pay! Let her not ask in vain! Find her out and keep her busy, ye daughters of luxury! Let her have the joy of honest independence! Give her a kindly friend to whom she may go for advice. Tell her you will care for her children if sickness should come—that they shall never want. Roll that great burden off from her mind. Yes, seek out the humble, toiling widow, and cheer her on in her path of loving self-denial. To aid her, comfort her, and eke out her scanty earnings. Ah! this is work on which is promised the blessing of Heaven!

Wo to the man, be he landlord or shop-keeper, who screws and pinches, and presses hard on these poor struggling women! The day will come when he shall render up his account! Miserable consolation, indeed, will be his petty, extorted gains, in that hour of crushing retribution!

A PARTY, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY MARY MAYFIELD.

"MARY," said my mother, rousing me from the pleasant reverie into which I had fallen, as I sat in the twilight of a November day gazing dreamily into the blazing fire that crackled on the hearth. "Mary, it is time to dress; your sister has gone to her room long ago; but what are you going to wear, may I ask?" added she, in a curious tone.

"I don't know; my blue silk, I guess," I replied dreamily, hardly realizing what I said.

"Well, I must say you seem very indifferent on the subject," she rejoined in a somewhat ironical tone, "more indifferent than young ladies even of twenty-five usually are. However, it is all the same to me; only go and dress now, for I have no notion of being kept waiting." So saying, she left the room.

I rose wearily from my seat and went to my room. Such words were familiar to my ears, so they produced nothing but a dull aching pain at my heart, far different from the keen agony they would formerly have inflicted, for my disposition was very sensitive, and unkind words caused me sometimes real agony. I felt, however, no remorse, for I knew that I had honestly endeavored to do my duty to my step-mother. When my father had brought her home, five years before, it had been a bitter grief to me, but I felt that it was my duty to submit with patience and apparent cheerfulness to what contributed to make him happy, and I had, therefore, although with a bursting heart, welcomed to our home, with all the cheerfulness I could, my step-mother, and the beautiful, but haughty daughter who accompanied her. To this daughter she was devoted; everything that Lucy wished must be done; everything that Lucy desired must be procured. This indulgence naturally made a haughty and imperious temper more haughty and imperious still, and it was often with a sigh that I contemplated a face so perfect, yet with all its sweetness marred by pride and self-will. Between my sister and myself there was no sympathy; she was fond of society, gayety, and dress. I was fonder of quiet, of my books and work. Truly I was not calculated to shine in the brilliant assemblages of the young and the gay; the face which was reflected in the mirror before me was pale and quiet, only unwonted pleasure lit up my dark, hazel eyes, and sent a flush to my usually pale cheek; my figure was slight and well proportioned, but not remarkable in any way. Just as I had finished dressing, and was turning away with a half sigh from the mirror, for I thought that there was no one now as there once was, when my own dear mother was alive, to take any interest in me, to care whether I looked well or ill, a knock came at the door, and on my saying "Come in," Jane, my old and faithful nurse, entered.

"Shure, Miss Mary dear, it's sorry I am that I could not come to you before, but the mistress and Miss Lucy kept me busy until now; but can I do nothing for you, Miss?"

"Nothing, thank you, Jane," I replied. "I knew that you would have come before if you could, for I believe you love me and want to please me."

"Indeed, and how could I help loving you, when I took you a little child, and have watched over you since, and will never leave you. Indeed, Miss, and it's only love to yourself that keeps me here, since your dear mother died. But shame on me for bringing tears to your eyes, and you going to a party. Let me get your shawl and hood, but first let me look at you;" and after she had regarded me silently for a few minutes, she said: "Indeed, Miss, an' you look real nice with your hair braided so handsome, and that blue dress is certainly becoming. I hope you will have a pleasant time, Miss Mary," added she respectfully and affectionately as she wrapped me in my shawl and hood, and lighted me down stairs.

I found my mother and sister in the parlor, adjusting their drapery before the glass. As I entered both looked up and scrutinized me attentively. "Well, Mary, considering all things, you'll do," was Lucy's remark as I approached her.

"Mary," said my mother, "I do hope you will make yourself agreeable to-night, and not cause people to remark on your worn and tired looks, for I do not fancy your father telling me again that I ought to have more regard for your health than to keep you up so very late because your sister is enjoying herself."

I was about to reply, when a servant announced the carriage. We drove off rapidly, and soon arrived at our destination. The house was one blaze of light, and the crash of the band showed, as children say, that the party had begun. The dressing-room was full of ladies, and amongst them I soon recognized my friend, Ellen Claymore.

"Good-evening, Mary dear," said she. "I am so glad we have both come at the same time, for we can go down together. But oh, I have something to tell you," whispered she, "only think, I heard our hostess say yesterday that she expected the great Mr. Sunderland to-night."

"Who is Mr. Sunderland, may I ask?" inquired I.

"Why, don't you know the great beau, the parti of the season! rich as Cræsus, accomplished, fascinating! Why, all the girls are crazy about him, and I tell you, Mary, I am going to set my cap for him in earnest. But come, Miss Mary, the field is ready, let us go down. How lovely Lucy looks to-night; she'll have the best chance of all," laughed the merry girl as we descended.

After paying our respects to our hostess, I sank quietly down in a sofa, while Ellen's hand was claimed by a tall youth in an irreproachable toilet, and she was soon whirling in the giddy throng. I had been seated quietly enjoying myself looking on, for some time, when I suddenly observed a gentleman standing not far distant whose eyes had been steadily fixed on me, but who immediately withdrew them as they encountered mine. He was surrounded by a knot of young men and one or two elderly ladies, and they seemed attentively criticizing the belles of the evening. I had turned to speak to a friend, when I heard the voice of Mrs. Saxton, our hostess, addressing me with "Miss Mary, may I introduce to you my particular friend, Mr. Sunderland?" I bowed, and uttered the usual assent, and immediately afterwards Mrs. Saxton approached, accompanied by the gentleman I had observed before. "Miss Mayfield, let me introduce Mr. Sunderland," and she vanished in the throng, leaving the gentleman standing before me.

"May I have the pleasure of dancing this Lanciers with you, Miss Mayfield?" said the gentleman.

I bowed and accepted, well pleased, and as the music struck up, at this moment we took our places. "Quite a brilliant evening," said my partner; "everybody seems to be here; do you not find it very agreeable, Miss Mayfield?"

"Yes, indeed," I replied, "more agreeable than I usually find these assemblages."

"Then you are not partial to them, I infer?" said Mr. Sunderland.

"No, I very much prefer quiet; my tastes and my health are both at variance with these amusements; but, to please my father, I go out. He is not pleased if I mope at home, as he calls it."

"Well, I agree with you in not liking balls as a general thing," said my partner; "and I admire your taste far more than that of the frivolous belles of the season. Do you know, Miss Mayfield, I have heard a great deal about you from a warm friend of yours, and—may I confess it?—it was in the hope of being presented to you that I came here to-night."

"Indeed," I replied, not knowing well what to say, as the quick color mounted to my cheek. Ah, reader, I was so unaccustomed to compliments!

The dance concluded, my partner led me to my seat, and at this moment Lucy passed us, on the arm of one of her ardent admirers—a young captain.

"Who is that lovely girl?" eagerly inquired my partner.

"She is my half sister—Miss Lucy Seymour," I replied.

"Can you not introduce me?" he asked, quite eagerly; and, as Lucy came towards me at this moment, I performed the required ceremony. He engaged her for the next dance, and they soon took their places. How lovely Lucy looked that night! Her golden hair hung in soft curls about her face, the flowing cloud of white tulle of which her dress was composed, half enveloped her slight figure, while her eyes were lit up with excitement, and the flush of pleasure was on her cheek. And Mr. Sunderland—I confessed to myself that I had never seen a handsomer man—and, as they stood side by side, I could not help thinking what a charming pair they would make. But I must not linger any longer over this evening, for I have yet a tale to tell. Contrary to my expectations, Mr. Sunderland again requested me to dance, took me down to supper, and finally conducted me to the carriage, and before closing the door, requested permission to call upon us the following day. My mother cheerfully assented, and he bowed and withdrew.

On reaching home, I retired immediately; but fatigued as I was, it was long before my eyes closed, and when they did, the image of Mr. Sunderland still reigned in my dreams. The next day he called, but his visit was short, and Lucy kept him engaged in an almost exclusive conversation. Day after day it was very much the same, yet at times I imagined his eyes rested on me, with an expression I dared not interpret, though I treasured it up in my heart. Soon my mother gave triumphant glances at Lucy when Mr. Sutherland made his appearance, and even my father began to rally her upon her conquest. And, must I confess it—all this made me very unhappy; day after day my manner became more cold, more distant to Mr. Sunderland, and heavier and heavier grew my heart.

"Dear Miss Mary," one day inquired my faithful Jane, "dear Miss Mary, what is the matter? You are as pale as a ghost; you are not yourself; you must be sick. Indeed, and forgive me, Miss, but you ought to see old Dr. Maxwell. You ought, indeed, and it's sad and worried I am this minute about you!"

Such exclamations greeted my ears almost daily as Jane helped me to dress, and even my father inquired anxiously if I were well, and where my appetite had flown.

"She must have change of air," he said one day to my mother, who coolly replied:—

"Really, Mr. Mayfield, you are entirely too anxious about Mary; there is nothing the matter, and she had better, at any rate, stay at home until after the wedding."

"But when is that to be?" asked my father. "Has he proposed yet? He has not asked my consent; they are not even engaged!"

"Oh, he may propose any day," replied she, somewhat confused, "and Lucy shall not delay long afterwards, if I have any influence. There is nothing so bad as long engagements for girls."

"Well, you know best," responded my father, as he left the room.

All this I had unintentionally overheard, as I sat in the next room sewing, for it had passed so quickly that I had not had time to come forward and announce my presence.

The next day, as I was sitting in the parlor vainly endeavoring to keep my thoughts fixed on the book I was reading—how well I remember it, "Carlyle's Frederick the Great"—a sharp ring came at the door, and before I could rise from my seat, the door opened, and a servant announced "Mr. Sunderland." I rose somewhat formally; he bowed and offered his hand. I could not refuse it, and my own, cold as ice and trembling, was held for one moment in that firm, soft clasp, and then slowly relinquished. He did not ask for Lucy, but I said:

"My sister, I regret to say, is out, and my mother also."

"Ah, indeed," he replied, as if utterly indifferent, and then, after a pause: "But, Miss Mary, I did not come to see either; I came to see you—to bid you farewell, perhaps for many years."

A pang shot through my heart at these words. "To bid me farewell!" I murmured, half inaudibly.

"Yes, farewell! yet, Mary"—and as I started—"forgive me, dear Mary, it is with you to decide. Say but that you will be mine, and I remain: if not, I go for years, perhaps forever!"

Astonishment, rapture, hope, fear, kept me speechless. I gazed at him in silence, utterly unable to utter a word.

"Speak, Mary! may I say dearest Mary!" he implored, as he took my hand. "It is cruel to keep me in suspense—tell me, dearest, may I hope?"

I raised my eyes to his. No answer was needed in words. I was clasped in a fervent, heart-felt embrace.

Some time after, my mother and Lucy returned.

"Has any one called while we were out?" inquired my mother of the servant.

"Yes, ma'am—Mr. Sunderland, and he is in the parlor yet, ma'am."

"Oh, very well. Lucy, dear," she whispered, "go in; I will come down in a few moments."

As Lucy entered, I had just withdrawn my hand from his, and, though blushing deeply, endeavored to appear composed. Mr. Sunderland, though somewhat embarrassed at first, soon recovered his usual ease of manner, and Lucy and he chatted gayly upon the standing topics of the day. At this moment the dinner-bell rang, and my father and mother entered the room together. As soon as the ordinary salutations were over, Mr. Sunderland took my hand, and leading me to my father, regardless of the astonished looks of my mother and Lucy, said, in a firm voice:—

"Mr. Mayfield, dare I ask a great favor of you? It is even this: to bestow upon me the priceless hand of your daughter. I know that I do not deserve her, but the effort of my life will be to make her happy."

My father's astonishment deprived him for a moment of the power of speech. "Why, I thought it was Lucy!" he exclaimed at length, looking at my mother. "But, Sunderland, my good fellow, I give my full consent and blessing; and I see by my Mary's face that she is well satisfied to have it so. God bless you both!" Thus saying, he kissed me tenderly, placed my hand again in my lover's, and hurried from the room to conceal his emotion.

Need I say more? Need I describe my mother's rage, Lucy's disappointment and chagrin, Ellen's playful reproaches at my carrying off "the parti of the season," or far happier still, my marriage soon after to him, whom I considered the noblest, the best of men? No more unhappiness now, no more pale cheeks and tearful eyes; and Jane, as she dresses me now, exclaims, joyfully:—

"No need of a doctor now, dear Miss Mary; as I have often heard my mistress, your dear mother say, 'Happiness is the best doctor!'"

ACTING CHARADE.—WEDLOCK.

BY A. M. DOLBY.

FIRST SYLLABLE.

ADOLPHUS RACKET, a happy bridegroom.
 BELINDA RACKET, his blushing bride.
 PENELOPE PONDER, } Belinda's bridesmaids.
 CLARISSA MILDMAY, }

Costumes.

ADOLPHUS should be attired in a black suit and white neck-tie; BELINDA as much like a bride as the properties of the establishment will admit; PENELOPE and CLARISSA in light silk dresses and white bonnets.

SCENE I.—ADOLPHUS RACKET having won the heart and hand of BELINDA MILDMAY, the happy couple have just returned from church, and are discovered in an ante-room with the two bridesmaids, PENELOPE PONDER and CLARISSA MILDMAY. Bride and bridegroom ascend to the breakfast. PENELOPE and CLARISSA remain in conversation.

Penelope. Dear Belinda! I trust she'll be happy. How lovely she looked at the altar! did she not?

Clarissa. Oh, charming! And how full the church was! By the way, did you see the Tomkineses in the rector's pew?

Pen. See them! Of course I did; for I looked on purpose to get a glimpse of Harry when Adolphus drew the ring from his pocket, and said so boldly, "With this ring I thee 'wed!'"

Clar. I thought Belinda would have broken down when she came to the "obey;" and I believe, after all, she only muttered the word.

Pen. Most likely! For my part I would never say it, whatever I might think! But, Clarissa, let us go, or they will have commenced the breakfast without us, and I promised Tom Sillaby to sit by him, to prompt him in a speech he has got up for the occasion, in which he intends to speak in the highest terms of bridesmaids in general, and me in particular.

Clar. Well, for my part, I think the kindest thing you can do will be to prompt him to leave 't alone; for I'm sure if that simpleton is to be our representative, I shall wish that Belinda had not made me a bridesmaid.

Pen. (Patronizingly.) My dear child! these things are entirely a matter of opinion; and as I have a great regard for Tom Sillaby, I hope you will on this occasion honor him by your attention, and believe him sensible at least, when he proposes the health of the bridesmaids, and extols the merits and graces of our sex.

Clar. (Scornfully.) Bosh! [Exit both.]

SECOND SYLLABLE.

BELINDA RACKET.
 PENELOPE PONDER.

Costumes.

BELINDA in morning-gown, PENELOPE in morning walking-dress.

SCENE II.—BELINDA discovered sitting alone; sadly and thoughtfully contemplating something she holds in her hand.

Belinda. Oh, how soon have all my visions of happiness disappeared! What could possess me to open his dressing-case? Certainly not curiosity, and most assuredly not with any idea of finding such a proof of his baseness as this! Oh, had I used the forbidden key, and discovered him a Blue-Beard, I could have borne it better! I wish dear Penelope Ponder would come, that I might confide this awful secret to her, and ask her advice. Would that I could burn this fascinating horror I hold in my hand; but no, it must be kept as a sad—sad—proof! (A knock at the door, when enters PENELOPE. BELINDA rushes to her friend, and they embrace. BELINDA in tears.)

Penelope. What, my dearest Belinda! and are you so soon unhappy? Pray tell me at once the cruel cause of all this?

Bel. (Hysterically, while showing lock of hair.) There, Penelope! foun—d in his dressing-case!

Pen. (With affected dismay.) What, a lock of hair, and not yours! Oh, Belinda, this is indeed a serious cause of grief! Have you demanded an explanation?

Bel. No, I could not; for I discovered it after he had left this morning. Oh, what shall I do? Tell me, dear Penelope.

Pen. Well, my dear! I would advise the most mature reflection before you mention to him what you have found; observe him closely, and if he cares much for this (sneeringly) treasure, he will soon miss it, and the fact will be evident in his manner; but (starting) Belinda, what horribly coarse hair! Why none but a Hottentot could have grown such stubble as this.

Bel. Ah, that's what makes the matter worse! I've always heard him say how he admired wavy hair; and you know, Penelope, that mine never would (mournfully) even crinkle without a world of plaiting.

Pen. Poor, disappointed child! I am grieved that I must leave you now: but act as I have told you, and to-morrow morning I will call after breakfast, to hear how this terrible affair progresses. [They embrace, and curtain falls.]

THE WHOLE WORD.

ADOLPHUS RACKET.
BELINDA RACKET.
PENELOPE PONDER.
CLARISSA MILDMAY.

Costumes.

ADOLPHUS in lounging-coat: BELINDA in morning-dress; PENELOPE and CLARISSA in morning walking-dress.

SCENE III.—BELINDA and ADOLPHUS sitting at breakfast. BELINDA sullenly turning over the leaves of a book. ADOLPHUS looks up from the newspaper, and says—

Adolphus. Well, Belinda, how much longer are you going to maintain this extraordinary manner? You are evidently put out about something, and I should uncommonly like to know what that something is; so will you oblige me by an explanation?

Belinda. No, Adolphus, I will not! it's sufficient for you to know that I shall never be happy again.

Adol. Well, that's cool, and more than "sufficient," seeing that I sought "wedlock" in the hope of securing your happiness as well as my own for life.

Bel. Don't tell untruths, Adolphus; you married me to make me the most miserable of wives, and you have succeeded.

Adol. Belinda, you are trying my patience fearfully, and I can tell you that it won't last much longer; and if you don't give me some opportunity of justifying myself, I shall be in a fearful passion directly. (Paces up and down the room.) No! (Raising his voice) Belinda Racket, passion's not the word: I shall storm with rage.

Bel. Ah, cruel man! just what I might have expected. (A knock at the door. Enter PENELOPE PONDER and CLARISSA MILDMAY. Both embrace BELINDA with tears of sympathy. BELINDA whispers to PENELOPE—) I'm so glad you have come, dear, for I do believe he was just going to kill me.

Pen. Have you shown him the proof of his wickedness?

Bel. No, I dared not!

Pen. Well, do so now, and we will help you to intimidate him. Oh (with a shudder) what a ruffian he looks!

Bel. Perfidious man! Does not that fill you with remorse? (Throws him the lock of hair.)

Adol. Where on earth did you get this from? Why, this is a piece of my poor pony's tail, cut off when he was shot, in remembrance of the many times he nearly broke my neck! Well, Belinda (laughing heartily), you must have been on the look-out for a trouble when you made one of this.

Bel. Oh how foolish I have been. Will you forgive me, Adolphus?

Adol. Well, yes; but upon one condition: that you promise to keep this relic of my poor old pony as a memento of the only cause of anxiety I ever gave, or mean to give you.

Pen. Well, now that you are restored to happiness, Belinda, I think I shall go home and reflect on the improbability of uninterrupted bliss, whether in married or single life. So come along, Clarissa, and we will meditate together.

Clar. Oh no, thank you. I'm not in a meditative mood! Nevertheless, I'll go with you, if it's only to put an end to this matrimonial scene.

[Curtisies, and the curtain falls.]

ARE you not surprised to find how independent of money peace of conscience is, and how much happiness can be condensed in the humblest home? A cottage will not hold the bulky furniture and sumptuous accommodations of a mansion; but if God be there, a cottage will hold as much happiness as might stock a palace.

MR. AND MRS. PIDGEON'S VISIT TO THEIR CITY FRIENDS, AS RELATED BY MR. PIDGEON.

BY EMILY B. CARROLL.

I HAVE a snug little place in the country of about one hundred acres. It is easy of access by steamboats, which come within two miles of the place, and at the landing stages are always in readiness to convey passengers to a frequented hotel, the road to which passes in front of our house. Being thus easy of access, our house is filled with visitors from the first of June to the middle of September, and in fact it is more like a country boarding-house than a private residence, only we never get any pay from our boarders. One year we had as many as twenty visitors at one time, including children and nurses, and at no time in the summer do we have less than eight. At the beginning of May my wife commences her preparations: every room is made as white as water, soap, sand, and whitewash can make it; carpets are taken up and mattings put down; feather beds exchanged for mattresses, white curtains put up at windows and around bedsteads, and a general fixing up ensues. An order for groceries—one would think sufficient for an army—is sent to our grocer in the city, and the preserve closet undergoes a thorough examination. Our house consists of a parlor, dining-room, library, storeroom, and kitchen on the ground floor; four bedrooms on the second floor, and two neat attic rooms; and every room in the house has been crammed full. Let me give you an account of last summer's visitors, merely premising that it is a fair sample of the four preceding summers.

It was near the close of a warm day in the beginning of June, and the sun was slowly sinking to his rest (ahem! that opens fine, I think; now if I can only keep on this way), when the stage might have been seen (and was seen by me, to my sorrow) slowly wending its way to our peaceful domicile. It paused at the entrance to the grassy lawn that sloped gently downward to the road, the door was opened, the steps let down, and a lady, large and stately, descended, and advanced leisurely to our abode. Close following on her footsteps came a youthful throng, of various ages and of various size, from the fair babe lulled in the nurse's arms, to the brave boy just thirteen summers old. (Bless my soul! I'm a poet!) Nearer she came, and looking on her face, I recognized fair Mrs. Spendergrass, and eagerly I ran to welcome her to our abode—the home of earthly bliss. I must give it up—I can't write poetry without telling lies to make up the lines. Truth to tell, Mrs. Spendergrass, with her tribe of children, was my special aversion. I don't believe a worse set of youngsters ever lived, and they made so much noise they nearly deafened one. However, I made the "best of a bad bargain," as the saying is; and forcing a ghastly smile, I escorted her and her army to the house, and went in quest of Rebecca. Now, Rebecca is one of the dearest little souls that ever lived, with not one particle of guile about her, and she is never happier than when she is entertaining a houseful of visitors, or friends, as she calls them; so, although Mrs. Spendergrass and her tribe had nearly plagued our lives out for two summers, yet she ran into the parlor and welcomed them all in a transport of joy, kissing every child twice, and giving a dozen extra ones to the twin babies. By the by, Mrs. S. only had one baby when she was here before; this time she has brought twins; I only hope that she won't bring triplets if she should chance to come again. Well, Rebecca flew about, had chickens killed and picked in almost as short a time as it takes me to write about it; and with her own dear hands she set out the table, and arranged the tempting fare upon it. Shall I describe one of our country suppers? Rebecca is a famous house-keeper, and rare suppers she can get, I tell you. We had snowy bread and light flaky biscuit, golden butter, broiled ham and chickens, with real cream gravy, ripe red strawberries, with real cream to eat with them, and preserved peaches and honey, to say nothing of tea and coffee—such as one seldom gets—and the dearest little wife in the world to sit at the head of the table. The dishes were filled up when we began supper, but there wasn't much in them when we were done, for the Spendergrasses have famous appetites. It took two rooms to hold them at night. Mrs. Spendergrass, the twins, and two other little ones occupying one room; the nurse and the two boys in the room adjoining, a trundle-bed having been removed to Mrs. S.'s room, and a cot put up for the nurse in the next room by Mrs. S.'s special request.

At breakfast, the next morning, she informed us that she wished her children to drink nothing but new milk, and as much of that as they wanted, as she had heard that it was so healthy, and she herself wished green tea in the morning and at dinner, black tea for supper, cocoa for luncheon at ten o'clock; and as she was nursing and very weak, she would like some of our currant wine every afternoon at four o'clock. Soup, she must have every day for dinner; but for the rest, she was very easily suited, and hoped that we would make no change in our domestic arrangements on her account. Now it was an easy matter to let her have as much tea, and cocoa, and currant wine as she wanted; but it was not quite so easy to manage about the milk and soup. We had four cows, but two of them gave very little milk, and the other two barely sufficed to keep us in milk and butter; and as for the soup, we were too far from the city to get fresh meat often, and it would not keep long in such warm weather.

Rebecca promised all Mrs. S. asked; but after breakfast she came to me in a great deal of trouble to know what she should do, as the young Spendergrasses would drink a gallon or two of milk a day. I told her to give them the skim milk, and they would never know the difference; and as to soup, she could give Mrs. S. chicken soup twice a week, and maybe she could concoct some kind of vegetable soup by the aid of the cook-books, and I would get fresh meat as often as I could. With a lightened heart Rebecca left me to attend to her domestic affairs; and I locked myself up in the library, hoping to have a little quiet, but very few moments there was an outbreak in the Spendergrass tribe, and at last I heard a scream from our own little ones, and heard our little five years old Freddy in high dispute with the Spendergrasses, and heard him say: "I'll tell papa you beat my little sister Minnie!" I hastened to the rescue, for little blue-eyed Minnie was the pet of our household, and I heard her sobbing violently—the little darling sunbeam whose every whim we had gratified. What was my astonishment to behold Mrs. S. sitting complacently in the midst of the tumult, and taking no notice whatever of the conduct of her children. Little Minnie held out her arms when she saw me, and I took her up and soothed her; but I saw red streaks all over her dear little fat arms, and saw a switch in the hand of one of the boys; so I could guess pretty well what ailed my little one.

Mrs. S. looked on smilingly. "I never take any notice of children's quarrels," she said, with an amiable little laugh; "the little things can manage better without our interference. My boys are perfectly delighted with the country," she continued, "they are very lively, spirited children, but there is not a bit of harm in them. My Andrew Jackson is quite a hero, but Henry Clay is more devoted to his studies. In fact we have feared he would injure his health by such close application, but I am happy to see his spirits have been most excellent since he has been here. My girls are wild little pussies, too; but I don't care how much they romp in the country, there is no one here to be annoyed by their noise. Have you any fruit ripe yet, Mr. Pidgeon? Ah! yes, there is that tree of June apples—will you be so kind as to send a servant to gather some for me? I am so fond of apples." Thus the lady rattled on without pausing for an answer till her final request.

Now we kept but two servants, and one of them was rather old, so I ventured to hint to Mrs. S. that perhaps her boys might like the sport of gathering and bringing her a basket of apples, as the tree was some distance from the house, and Molly and Kitty were busy. The boys set off in high glee, and taking little Minnie with me I returned to the library again, locking the door. The poor little thing soon fell asleep, so I laid her on a lounge, and covered her with my handkerchief to keep off the flies. The library adjoined a store-room that opened into the kitchen, so I could easily hear what was going on, and finding that Rebecca had work to do up in the chambers, I called to her that Minnie was asleep, and I would take care of her till she came down again. Minnie was in the habit of getting ravenously hungry and thirsty, when her mother found it most inconvenient to attend to her. Rebecca was very glad to hear that there was a chance for her to go on with her work, without interruption to baby. She had scarcely got upstairs when I heard the smooth voice of Mrs. S., in the kitchen. "Molly," said she, "I have three thin flounced dresses I want you to iron for me this afternoon. I have brought them rough dried, for I knew they would get tumbled so they would not be fit to be seen, so it was folly to iron them; also the children's white dresses I want ironed, and there are a good many little things I want washed for the babies, as soon as you can get time, for the nurse has no chance to do these things. And see here, Molly, I want the sheets, pillow and bolster cases exchanged on our beds twice a week, and let me have six clean towels every day—four fine, and two coarse ones, and put a large pitcher in my room besides the one that is there. Be sure to have my cocoa ready at eleven precisely," and the lady took her flounces out of the kitchen, leaving Molly to grumble after her for the next hour.

"Who she thinks goin' to wait on her, I'd like to know," quoth Molly; "you, white trash, thinks she can make me fly round arter her, but she's mighty mistaken—'deed is she. Why can't she iron her own fal-lals? She's none too good, dear knows she aint. Need n't think she's goin' to make this nigger fly round arter her, I've got 'nuff to do now, 'thout waitin' on her and her rips of chilluns. Catch me a roastin' my eyes out ironin' of her fooleries. I won't tech them, 'deed won't I."

"Shet up your mouth," growled Kitty; "'tend to yer own work, that's all you got to do."

"I aint agoin' to tech her things at any rate," persisted Molly; "didn't I work myself off'n my feet last summer, and what did she give me for it?—an old caliker bed gownd that I wouldn't bemean myself to wear. Poor, mean trash!"

I may as well say here that in the end Mrs. S. conquered, and the clothes were washed and ironed by Molly every week during her stay. Little Minnie at last woke up, and cried for her mamma, so I carried her to Rebecca, but she cried out, "For mercy's sake, Henry, don't bring that child here, for I'm too busy to attend to her now," so we wended our way back to the library, stopping first in the kitchen where we got a bowl of bread and milk, and for the first time in my life, I essayed to feed a hungry child. I succeeded beyond my utmost expectation, only choking Minnie twice, and not spilling more than half down her bosom, so, highly elated with my success, I began to feel amiable once more, and made no complaint at being kept waiting for my dinner, twenty minutes past the usual time.

After dinner was over I resigned my charge to Rebecca and settled myself down comfortably for the afternoon.

The next day Mr. and Mrs. Honeywell, and Mrs. Honeywell's two sisters came, and two days later Mrs. Register and her sick daughter. I engaged another servant, and every part of the house was crammed full, so we had to sleep on the parlor floor. Miss Register was quite sick and very weak, so every day she had to have boneset tea made for her, a new laid egg beat up with port wine, and a boiled chicken for dinner. However, she showed some gratitude, which was more than any one else did.

At last the summer came to an end, the last carriage load left the house, and weary and dispirited poor Rebecca went to work to clear up the house after them. Mrs. Spendergrass and her children had a great knack at breaking china and glass, and you could generally guess pretty well as to their whereabouts by the crash that followed their footsteps. I never saw one of them take up anything choice without apprehending its downfall, and it was very rarely my apprehensions deceived me. But I cannot begin to relate the damage done by our visitors—how they inked and greased our carpets, and curtains, and broke everything of a breakable nature—the pencil of Hogarth could alone portray such a scene of confusion as our house presented, after the departure of our visitors. My carriage horses were lamed, and the carriage broken. I had a great variety of choice fruit trees, and a great abundance of fruit, and had calculated on making a considerable sum of money from the sale of it, but our visitors carried off all that they did not eat, except what was put up for next year's consumption in the shape of preserves and pickles. We had scarcely a fowl left on the place, none in fact, but those that were too old to be eaten. The servants were completely worn out with waiting on the numerous wants of our visitors, and poor Rebecca looked like she had had a severe spell of sickness. Our little Minnie, from having no one to give her proper attention, ate so much unripe fruit that it caused her a pretty severe attack of dysentery, which left her pale and languid, and very unlike the little, fat, rosy, dimpled darling she had been heretofore. On the last day of August I mounted one of the working horses, and took refuge at a neighbor's house for a couple of days, hoping the worst of the putting to rights would be over by that time, but I was woefully mistaken. For a week after that time I could not stir outside of the library door without stumbling into a pail of whitewash, or a tub of hot water, to say nothing of pitching headlong over mops, brooms, etc. I pass over the details of the house-cleaning, merely remarking that Minnie was twice fished out of a tub of soapsuds, and Freddy, trying to discover a passage through the front hall, stumbled over a broom, and took a seat in a pail of whitewash, fortunately doing no damage beyond ruining a new pair of trowsers. At last order rose out of the chaos, carpets were tacked down, curtains put up, and once more I could go through the house without danger of breaking my neck.

Some time in September, I found that my business required my presence in the city, and as all our friends had given us pressing invitations to visit them, I concluded to take Rebecca and the children, and stay two or three weeks. Rebecca wrote to Mrs. Spendergrass, telling her she was coming to make her a visit, and would be there in two or three days. We went to the steamboat landing in our own carriage, because Rebecca had so many presents to take her city friends, I disliked filling up the stage with them. When we got to the landing Rebecca found an old friend of hers who resided there, and who insisted on our staying for the afternoon boat, instead of going in the morning as we had contemplated. She said the afternoon boat went for half-price. Now Rebecca is a great hand for saving a penny, so she at once set her mind on going in the afternoon boat, though it was much slower than the morning boat.

Well! we were now hospitably entertained, and at last safely embarked in an old rattle-trap of a boat, which, by the way, charged full price, having raised the fare that very day. We did not reach the city till dusk, and then a chilly, disagreeable rain had set in, but we took our seats in the hack with light hearts, feeling certain that in a few minutes we should be in the warm parlors of Mrs. Spendergrass, and partaking of a nice supper. I had an idea that the street in which the Spendergrass mansion was located was near the wharf, and so it afterwards proved to be, but the hackman, seeing we were from the country, had taken advantage of our ignorance of the city, to drive us through all the alleys and little streets he could find, till at last I poked out my head, and told him if he didn't take us to the place pretty soon I would get out and hunt it myself, so he pretended he had misunderstood me, whirled round two or three corners, and deposited us in front of a large, stately mansion where the Spendergrasses resided. To my dismay, the house was perfectly dark, and though I rang the bell till the knob came off in my hand, no one came to the door. At length an old woman who lived next door poked out her head, and told me there was no use in my "making that 'ere kind of a racket, for Mrs. Spendergrass had got a letter from some place, and had gone off to New York to see her mother, and tuk the children along, and Mr. Spendergrass had got the house locked up, and never came home till arter midnight," and with this agreeable news, the head was popped in again, the window slammed down, and I went back to the carriage in dismay, and found Rebecca weeping, and Minnie fretting to be put to bed. Just as I had proposed going to the nearest hotel, I felt my arm touched, and looking around I saw a gentleman holding an umbrella over his head, but hatless. In courteous language he invited us to enter his house, stating that his wife had been a visitor of ours, and had recognized us from the window, and wished very much to see us. Rebecca saved me the trouble of replying by at once availing herself of the invitation, and our host soon ushered us into an elegantly furnished parlor, where we were met, and warmly welcomed by a pretty, bright eyed little woman, whom we both recognized at once as Mrs. Howard, a lady who had spent a few days at our house about two years previous, and a distant relative of the Spendergrasses. She apologized as well as she could for Mrs. S.'s conduct, but we both felt that the house had been shut up to get clear of us. We learned afterwards that Mrs. S. was a miser at home, and prodigal as she was in dress, her husband lived a dreadful life with her; for she hardly allowed her family enough to eat while she spent countless sums on her own person. This only confirmed my previous suspicions. Mr. and Mrs. Howard treated us with the greatest hospitality, and after partaking of a superb supper, Mrs. H. took Rebecca up to a bedroom, furnished with a crib, cradle, and every comfort needed. The children were unrobed, and laid in their comfortable beds, and Rebecca arranged her hair, washed her face and hands, and, rested and refreshed, prepared to return to the parlor. As they were leaving the room, Mrs. Howard paused awhile by Minnie's cradle. She stooped down and pressed a loving kiss on the round, rosy cheek of the little sleeper. "I have lost my little one," she said sadly, while a tear glistened in her dark eyes; "dear little lambs, we do not know how dear they are to us till we lose them."

It was a chilly, rainy evening, but none of the outward discomfort reached us, as we gathered around the pleasant fireside. It was an evening long to be remembered by all of us. Our kind entertainers insisted on our making our home with them during our stay in the city; but Rebecca was fearful our other friends might feel hurt if we did not spend part of the time with them; so when we retired to our room that night, it was decided that I should go the next morning to call on our friends, and see who was most anxious to receive us, while Rebecca remained in her present quarters till afternoon. After a good night's sleep, and a first-rate breakfast, I started out on my expedition. The first place I went to was Mrs. Cameron's. I was admitted by a dirty looking girl, who ushered me into a small room on the landing, and just over the kitchen, as I discovered by the smell of cooking, and the sound of voices.

"Who is it, Biddy?" I heard Mrs. Cameron say.

"Here 's his name, mum, on this bit of paste-board," the girl replied.

"Mr. Pidgeon! oh, horrid! I do hope he hasn't come to stay here. I do hate to be plagued with company. Here, Biddy, just pin this collar for me, and bring me down my new cap—the one with the blue flowers."

I heard a door open and shut; but in a few moments I heard Mrs. Cameron open the door again, and say:—

"There 's nobody in the parlor, Biddy—where did you leave Mr. Pidgeon?"

"Sure I took him in the little room where the fire is; it was so cowl'd in the parlor."

"Mercy on the stupid girl!" I heard Mrs. C. exclaim, impatiently. "Go, Biddy, and show him into the parlor."

Mrs. Cameron received me with a face full of smiles, and made many inquiries after her dear Mrs. Pidgeon and the sweet children; but I presume it is hardly necessary to inform my reader that I refused all invitations to stay with her, notwithstanding that they grew very pressing, when she found that there was no danger of my staying.

I next went to Mrs. Lander's. She, too, received me with many smiles, asked where Rebecca was making her home, and invited us to come and take tea with her before we returned home. From there I went to Mrs. Bradley's. She regretted very much that some friends of Mr. B.'s were coming to make her a visit; otherwise, they would be so happy to have dear Rebecca make her home there; but the next time we came, we must be certain to make them a good long visit. I will not bore my reader with a full account of my visits to some three or four more of Rebecca's friends, none of whom showed any desire for our company, and I resolved to try only one more place, and if I had no better success there, I would engage board at a hotel. But Mrs. Register and her daughter at once insisted on our coming to them to make our home. Miss Register in particular seemed delighted to have the opportunity of returning our hospitality. She had regained her health, and looked so pretty and rosy, I scarcely knew her at first.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard were very sorry to have us leave them, and exacted from us a promise to spend a week with them before we returned home. In parting with them we presented them with some choice grapes and oranges raised in our own greenhouse, and some very fine peaches. We also carried a peck of the peaches to Mrs. Register, a bushel of very fine sweet potatoes, and a ham of our own curing. We were hospitably welcomed, and ushered into a handsome suite of apartments on the second floor, consisting of parlor, dressing-room, and bedroom. But our meals! Let me describe our first dinner, which was a fair sample of what was to come. It was set out in great style, and made considerable show, and we had five courses. In the first place we had a thin, watery kind of soup, tasting of nothing but salt and potatoes. A beef bone, with very little meat on it, and two dishes of watery vegetables made up the first course. Then we had a small piece of roast beef, or beef à la mode Mrs. Register called it; but it was so tough I gave it up in despair. There was a dish of pork chops, nearly all bone, a tough fowl, and some side dishes of badly-cooked beets and carrots, and sweet potatoes boiled till the water could be wrung out. Irish potatoes we had in various forms, omelette, balls, and plain mashed potatoes. The bread was sour—the butter strong. For our third course we had a hard, tough mass of dough, with raisins boiled in it, that Mrs. Register called cold plum pudding. The sauce tasted strongly of cheap brandy. Then we had rice balls, and some pies from the baker's. After these were removed, we had custard and cake—sponge cake like leather. To conclude, we had some of our own fruit, some bad almonds and raisins, and a bottle of cheap wine. Mrs. Register helped us with the greatest affability, and was as much at her ease as if everything was of the best. For supper we had smoky tea and weak coffee, some black-looking preserves, tough cake, a little cheese, sour baker's bread, and bad butter. But bad as the fare was, there was not enough of it, and I was obliged to go to an eating-house every day to satisfy my hunger. I smuggled in oysters to Rebecca every night, and kept her well supplied with cakes and crackers for the children. With many smiles and blushes Miss

Register informed Rebecca that she was to be married very soon to a young lawyer, and they were to spend a year or two in France and Italy. Her mother was to accompany them. I learned afterwards that they had been engaged for some time, but the mother had resolutely opposed the match on account of the poverty of the lover. This was what had affected Miss Register's health; and, fearing that she would go into a decline, her mother was at length forced to consent. From what I had seen of their mode of living, I had come to the conclusion that the Registers were in rather indigent circumstances, and really pitied Mrs. Register for striving so hard to keep up appearances, when she had not the means of living as she desired. Something of this I said to Mrs. Howard, when, to my great surprise, she told me that Mrs. Register was worth over a hundred thousand dollars, and had not a poor relative living. Her daughter had a snug little fortune, too, independent of her mother. So it was only meanness made her live as she did, for she did not spend one-third of her income, so Mrs. Howard informed me. "Her daughter is exceedingly mortified by her mother's conduct," continued Mrs. H.; "but see cannot get her to act differently. Her servants tell some ludicrous tales about her household economy." I felt really glad that her pretty daughter was going to get a good husband, for she is a good, sensible girl, and the Howards speak very highly of her lover. We spent a week with the Howards, and enjoyed ourselves extremely. In company with them we visited the different places of amusement, and went to see everything that was worth seeing. We parted from them with regret, for we had formed a strong friendship for them during our stay. We exacted from them a promise to return our visit next summer. With regard to our visitors of preceding summers, I fancy we shall not be plagued by many of them. We received a long and flowery epistle from Mrs. Spendergrass on our return home, expressing her great regret at being compelled to leave home, and thus missing our agreeable company. She sincerely deplored that she had not received our letter soon enough to delay her visit, and hoped that we would soon visit the city again, as she was very desirous to see us all. She would try to make us a long visit next summer—she enjoyed herself so much with her dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. Pidgeon. My sole answer was to send her an envelope containing the card of the proprietor of the nearest hotel, and a few lines saying that it would not be convenient for us to keep open house for our friends any longer. I have never had any reply to it; but we don't look for the Spendergrasses this summer. Rebecca was a little worried about what I had done, but consented to let me take my own way. Taking all things into consideration, I don't think we shall have much cause to regret "Mr. and Mrs. Pidgeon's Visit to their City Friends."

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Pearl the Ninth.—September.

SERENE September, goddess of the grain,
 With stately steps precedes the loaded wain;
 The grapes that ripen in the grange repeat
 The sounds that float across the fields of wheat;
 The birds that linger, chat among the sheaves
 About the shortened days and lengthened eves;
 And so the birth-month of the autumn brings
 Something of shadow on its golden wings;
 Some sad reminders of meridians past,
 Of days that vanish, months that do not last;
 And of that sure declining plane of years
 That slopes to a peninsula of fears,
 While on the further shore the surges beat
 And echoes from the "unknown sea" repeat.
 First of the "embers" of the fading year,
 And empress of earth's cornucopian cheer,
 With sad forebodings we the coming greet,
 And shape our plans life's altered views to meet.
 At first a golden glory covers all
 The face of nature; then, a sombre pall
 All slowly drops, and cloud and wind again
 Betray the coming of the "latter rain;"
 While here and there the green leaves change to brown,
 In sign of autumn's coronal and crown.

MARY.

(Resurgam.)

BY G. H. S. HULL.

LIKE some gentle streamlet murmur'ing
 Softly o'er its pebbly bed,
 Like the timid violet drooping
 Mournfully its downy head—
 As the cloudless sky of summer,
 As the stillly hours of night,
 Thus thy life-time—now thou'st left us,
 Glorifying in eternal light.

Yet it were not well to mourn thee,
 The surcharged heart its grief must bear:
 So pure thy life, so calm and holy,
 Angels love to have thee there.
 Then weep not, though the dearly loved
 Lies shrouded in the silent grave,
 Through life in Jesus' steps she moved,
 And worshipped him who died to save.

GROWING POOR GRACEFULLY.

BY MELICENT IRWIN.

GROWING poor, is harder than the actual being so. "Poverty is not so terrible a thing when we once get down to it," said a witty and sensible old lady, speaking from the riches of her own experience. Admired for her beauty and her wit as a Washington belle in her younger days, after-years, though full of trials, loss of property among them, had not taken away the life sparkle. Her hearty welcome and lively sally were genial and enlivening ever. The ordeal had been safely passed; for poverty is not unlike certain cutaneous diseases. It is not dangerous unless it "strikes in." Sometimes the system is strengthened ever after. But this is the very point, to "get down to it!" Transitions are always more or less dangerous. Since long-kept as well as quick-made fortunes are ever in jeopardy, and there is never one so poor that he cannot be poorer, it is well to know how to make the descent with least awkwardness, to say nothing of insurance from dislocations. It will not do to ignore the step, affecting still to keep the level by "keeping up appearances." You remember the story of De Stael, whom the choice Parisian coterie awaited with flattering expectation, the empressment of whose entrance taxed even Parisian politeness to repress a smile. The effort of the many to "keep up" is no less ridiculous in effect than the forgetfulness of Madame in raising her dress before instead of behind, as she blandly made the awkward descent at the entrance de la salon. There is nothing undignified in coming down stairs, only do it naturally, and don't put any airs on about it. Poverty is a word we use here relatively of course, and according to specific signification. The lady who, obliged to curtail expenses, takes a less eligible suite of rooms, and writes home she is reduced to a miserable pittance for pin-money, naming a sum that some of our industrious well-to-do people would consider a snug fortune for life, really suffers. Needless, and wickedly we may say, but, remembering the power of education, no less really. Whether dwelling in white-washed or frescoed walls, that man is poor whose wants are beyond his income.

There is a great deal of sentimentalism in the talk about sneers at poverty. Poverty of pocket is much less often in reality subject of ridicule than poverty of soul. People will be apt to think of you pretty much as you think of yourself. If because you cannot entertain as you once could, cannot dress, come, and go, you show solicitude lest you should be neglected; if you take friends to task, and ascribe to unworthy motives what may or may not have been meant for slights; if you endeavor to enlist their sympathies by recounting your own disadvantages, ten to one they will drop off. Naturally enough you will have driven them away. If, on the other hand, you meet them as of old; if you do not let a certain scantiness begotten of circumstances creep into your manner; if they find the same sunshine about you as of old, do you suppose they will mind a few inconveniences? Not they. Live on the surface. Do not let life narrow down. Do not let the necessary carefulness "strike in," my friend. There are some who, out of their largess of life, and a natural appreciation of the beauty of harmony, are led easily on. We know one, the daughter of one of our well-known artists. She had known wealth and luxury. When through misfortunes their house grew small (the frame had been that of one of their barns), the hospitality of its inmates gave its low rooms elastic properties; beds could be extemporized; welcomes were always waiting. Incidents of loss suggested by need of some accustomed article were told with irresistible humor, some unconsciously turned sentence perhaps giving a gleam of the pathos that lay beneath. The world was met frankly, with as little parade of loss as concealment. Once within the small, plain house, bare even of blinds, the harmony of arrangement, the charm of presence, made one forget they were not entertained in the former handsome home. And why not?

I have not a doubt in the world that though Mrs. Gustavus d'Orville has a conservatory and an elegant silver service, if your mind has congeniality with hers, if your welcome is cordial, if your muffins are nice, and your coffee is clear in its amber stream, your simple china and your fragrant hyacinths in their crystal vases will give none other than pleasant impressions for the lady to take away with her, and she will have been charmed with her entertainment. So if you do not envy your friend her superior elegancies when she returns the compliment, I see no reason why you may not have all the enjoyment of mutual regard and intercourse. There is a great deal of moonshine about different circles, social barriers, etc. And probably for many a long day to come there will be.

Surroundings influence spirit, we know, and we long to have grace, and fitness, and the poetry of convenience about us. But the best gifts are every man's. We can all have God's pure air and sunshine free. That is a great deal. With a moderate share of labor we can all command most scrupulous neatness. If we cannot go abroad from place to place, which in this beautiful world is a deprivation, surely we can have plainer furniture, less variety in toilette, more simple food, and let the life of the busy, toiling, suffering, achieving world in upon us through books and papers. Put aside a pleasure of sense, and buy a picture, and forget the want in training a plant.

"Ah, yes!" somebody says; "but starting poor in life, knowing what you have, and where it is, being able to make calculations to advantage, and harmonize expenditures is less vexing to the soul, is different from 'growing poor'—the subject you started with. To have the incomings barely sufficient for supporting foundation of a system long maintained, whose superstructure there is no means to patch up; to be living in a tumble down house, perhaps without ability for repairs; to be obliged to give up the gardener, when the flower-beds of course will give themselves up to weeds; to be obliged to part with the carriage for maintenance for the horses—to have everything generally disjointed and of non-correspondence!" It is some shades worse, however. Break up the "establishment," and try life compact and unhampered on the small capital of the remnant. Discharge every claim and begin anew. And especially if you have a youthful family, do this for their mental health, and for the engraving of just ideas of expenditure and living. Or if, as is often the case, entangling claims prevent this course, move into the cheeriest, best preserved part of the house, that perhaps has been hitherto shut up, and make all there as beautiful as possible. Level the flower-beds save only a border somewhere in sight, that you can enjoy and care for yourself, and let the fresh green grass God provides spread its emerald mantle. Away with pretension of any kind! Well-kept grass is better than weed-choked flowers. To grow poor gracefully is to bring our wants within our income. Reach out and bring them in, as did Noah his dove, till the waters abate, and you shall ride safely, even over the mountain tops. There is one temptation. You can no more grow poor gracefully, by making of debts, than you can go down stairs gracefully on stilts. Part with everything rather than bear the weight and palsy of debt. And we do not mean large incumbrances alone, but small debts, and "so convenient, you know," will be like a swarm of stinging insects buzzing about your ears. People will know you are on stilts all the time. Do not flatter yourself they will think that it is your natural height. You may hate to come down. It would have been better if you had never accepted such support. But how much freer you will be on your own footing! You will feel a divine right to what you do have, and a new sense of property in terra firma, the free air, and sunlight, and God's beauty lying all around you.

GOSSIP ABOUT GLOVES.

From the very earliest times gloves were used to preserve the hands against thorns; and in 814 they were distinguished by pairs. In the ninth century they had become so universal that even the church thought them a necessary article of dress. Strutt thinks they were introduced in the tenth century; while in the thirteenth century ladies commenced wearing them. In the seventeenth century a pair of gloves cost 30s; in 1604, the gloves and garters given away at a wedding amounted to 1000*l*. Disraeli says, "that at the sale of the Earl of Arran's goods, April 6, 1759, the gloves given by Henry VIII. to Sir Anthony Denny, were sold for 38*l*. 17s." At the battle of Agincourt, the young warriors wore ladies' gloves and garters on the helmet; but when fashion declined, it fell to coxcombs and servants. Gloves in the reign of Elizabeth were very dear, in consequence of being perfumed with a scent recently brought from Italy. Sir Thomas More, soon after he decreed in favor of a Mrs. Croaker against Lord Arundel, received from the lady a pair of gloves with forty angels (or "glove money") inside. "It would be against good manners," said the Chancellor, "to forsake a gentlewoman's New Year's gift, and I accept the gloves; their 'lining' you will be pleased otherwise to bestow." Again, challenging by the glove continued down to the reign of Elizabeth, as appears by an account of a duel fought in Tothill-fields, in 1571. Among the objects of antiquity at a late exhibition might have been seen various gloves, the most conspicuous pair being those given to Bishop Juxon, by Charles I. on the scaffold at Whitehall, Jan. 30, 1649, and just before the ill-fated king delivered to the "good bishop" that memorable word "Remember!" the meaning of which all later historians have been unable to explain.

RITA'S MASTER.

BY MARY W. JANVRIN.

"I'm sorry you're going, master!"

The words ended in a gusty little sob, followed by another and another in quick succession. Then a rain of tears dropped from the pair of dusky eyes half hidden behind the tall desk in the old school-room.

The "master," a slight, handsome youth of twenty-two, with high intellectual forehead, and deep gray eyes, started quickly from the tall desk whence he had been laying out a pile of books to be brought back no more to Wheaton school-house, the scene of his past winter's labors, let fall the lid, and, coming round to the little midnight-eyed girl, who had crept up so noiselessly, drew her gently toward him. Seating himself in the chair upon the platform which had been his throne during his potentateship, he caressingly stroked the cloud of dark curls, and lifted the little tearful face underneath to his own.

"Why, Rita, I thought you had gone home with the other scholars!" he said gently.

"But I couldn't, master—I felt 'so bad and sorry!" she sobbed.

"And what makes you so sorry? because I am going, little Rita? Your school will commence again in a few months, and you will have another teacher as good, or better, than I, I dare say!" he said in a low, soothing voice.

"Oh, no, I shan't! I never did have any teacher so good as you, and I won't have another!" persisted the little ten-year-old girl. "Nobody is so good as you be, Mr. Lockwood!"

Bayard Lockwood smiled. Such utter faith in his "goodness," as little Rita Warner so passionately avowed, was not exactly in keeping with the customary unbelief of suspicious human nature.

"And why do you think I am so 'good,' Rita?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't think, I know!" replied the child, eagerly. "Didn't you make the great boys and girls ashamed to make fun of me when I wore my old frock and leather shoes? Didn't you give me a nice geography and Testament all to myself? Didn't you send mamma such great sweet oranges when she was sick? and then didn't you take ever so much pains to help me in my lessons, and praise me just as much as Grace Ordway, when I had a perfect recitation?"

"Well, and why shouldn't you have the same credit as Grace Ordway, or any other scholar, and more, too, if your lessons were as well, or better prepared?" asked Mr. Lockwood, quite amused.

"I know I ought to; but the other teachers never used to do so, because Grace has got a rich father, and I'm only a poor little girl!" This reply was given with a flash of Rita's black eyes that told how keenly she had felt the injustice of the fact she uttered.

"How do you know that was the reason, Rita?" asked the young man, surprised at her discernment.

"I can't tell how, but I do know it!" persisted the girl stoutly. "And I told mamma of it, but she said I mustn't mind, but must try to learn all I could, for learning was better than money or fine clothes."

"Your mother was quite right. And it made you feel better, didn't it?" asked the teacher.

"Well, a little bit," replied Rita, slowly; then she added inquiringly, "I hated the teachers just the same, though, but I tried to put 'em down under my books when I was studying; and when I saw how proud and grand the rich girls felt, I said, easy to myself: 'You've got the nicest frocks, and kid boots, but I always have the best lessons, and p'raps when I am grown up, I can teach school and buy mamma and I as handsome clothes;' and I mean to do it, Mr. Lockwood!" she said.

"And a brave teacher my little Rita will be, I'll venture to predict!" said the young man, stroking her head. "I shall hope to hear of her success when her school-days are over. I shall never forget you, Rita!"

This recalled those thoughts of parting, which their conversation had momentarily driven from the girl's mind. Her exquisitely chiselled scarlet lips quivered, a scared expression leaped into her dark eyes, "like brown birds flying to the light," and her delicate little hands clung beseechingly over Mr. Lockwood's arm. It seemed as if she would have held him by her tiny strength; then, of a sudden, she burst into tears.

"Don't feel so badly, my dear!" said Mr. Lockwood, touched by her distress. "I must go away now from Wheaton. I have got my own studies to attend to, in the great school, called a college, I left, to come and teach this winter vacation at Wheaton, for I am forced to keep school to help myself along, as you are planning to do one day, Rita. I must leave you now; but I shall not forget any of my scholars nor you, of all others, Rita; and we shall meet again some time; and, meanwhile, you must continue the same studious girl as ever, and hold out in your purpose to get an education, remembering that 'learning is better than houses or lands!' I shall not forget you, little Rita."

"Oh, I'm afraid you will! and then I should want to die!" sobbed out the child passionately. "I won't let you go! there'll be nobody else left to love me!" And she wound her slender arms about his neck, and pressed her wet crimson cheeks to his.

Bayard Lockwood was struck by this utter devotion and abandon of the girl's nature. He suffered her vehemence to spend itself; then unclasped her arms, put her a little from him, and surveyed her thoughtfully.

Rita could not comprehend this, and thought she had offended him.

"Have I made you angry with me, master?" she asked, apprehensively.

He did not answer, for he was studying her as he never had before. For the first time, it flashed over him that that poor child was richer in her dower of beauty than any pampered scion of wealth or aristocracy in the old town of Wheaton. Her soft cheeks were crimson as the heart of the tender damask rose; her lips, sensitively working, were finely cut and scarlet; her low, broad white forehead was shadowed by a cloud of purple-black curls; her arching throat was graceful as a young swan's; her form was lithe and symmetrical; she was all grace and beauty, from the crown of her little head to the curve of her slender Spanish instep, not hidden by the thick leather shoes she wore.

"She will be beautiful and talented!" he said, mentally, "and with that strong, rich nature which is so royal a gift to woman, if it does not lead her to unhappiness. She will be submissive to those she loves, and proud and defiant to those she hates. Kindness will win her; coldness, or patronizing airs will harden or rouse, but never crush her. She will be unlike other women—superior to them in gifts, and, if good influences sway, in disposition; Heaven shield her from the contact of unkindness!" Involuntarily his arms had gathered her to his breast.

Rita looked up after she had nestled there a moment. "You aren't angry with me, sir?" she asked, timidly, but with a happy smile.

"No, my dear child. What made you think that?" replied Bayard Lockwood, gently and caressingly, smoothing back her curls.

"Because I was naughty, and spoke as I ought not to," she said, humbly. "I am sorry to let you go, my dear master, but I'm going to be willing now, and be always a good girl, and remember all you have ever said to me when you're away. And I've got something I want you to let me give you to remember me by: it's all my own—to do as I please with. I worked it for you." And she drew from between the leaves of her geography a pretty book-marker, with the words "Remember Me" neatly wrought in blue silk. "Now, you will keep that in your Bible to think of me by, dear master," she said, coaxingly, laying it between the leaves of the book she took up as she spoke.

"I thank you, Rita!" said the young man. "I shall not forget you. You are a good little girl, to think of me thus; and I know you will never cease to remember your teacher, nor strive to press onward in your studies. But it grows late, and your mother will be wondering what keeps her daughter. Now good-by; and God bless my dear little Rita!" and he drew her to him, and pressed a kiss on her pure young forehead.

The gray twilight of a March afternoon was settling over the old school-house when Bayard Lockwood turned the key for the last time, left the door-step, and bent his way to the substantial farm-house where he had boarded during that winter term at Wheaton.

"And now, ho for the welcome halls of old Dartmouth again—and next July for my graduating honors and the valedictory!" he said in triumph, as that evening he packed his trunk, wherein, among his books, he had carefully lain away his Bible, with Rita's gift between its leaves.

And poor little Rita! she, too, had lain aside her school-books, eaten but little supper, and gone to bed early, to weep herself asleep, with her crimson cheek wet against her pillow.

Ten years may be long in slipping on the thread of Time; but once told, they seem like the beads the nun has counted upon her rosary.

They had been ten short years—and one, a saddened one, for its memory was marked by a slender white headstone in the Wheaton church-yard to the orphaned Rita Warner.

At twenty, she was a child no longer; but a woman, gifted and beautiful; young, beautiful, and standing beneath the blue sky of that clime where art and beauty are ever vernal, though old Rome lies buried—Italy. And what had brought the little school-girl of that distant New England country village to the Old World?

The question has a very common answer. Rita's beauty was not so valuable a possession as her talents; they had served her need when she came face to face with the hard, cold world. Like many another, whose brain must coin their bread, Rita had accepted her fate. She was governess in a purse-proud, parvenue family; and they, to "finish off" their eldest daughter, had come abroad to make the grand tour; and Rita, with her two young charges, had accompanied them.

Florence Ambler was haughty, superficial, but, unfortunately, beautiful; unfortunately, because, in her case, it was the soulless beauty of the statue, or the exquisite porcelain shrine wherein burns no lambent flame. She was soulless, heartless, insipid. There was a brother—the eldest of the Ambler family—who had followed his relatives abroad, through France, Germany, and now to Italy, solely for the purpose of persecuting the beautiful governess with his devotion. It had never been conceived by Frederick Eustace Ambler that so humble a personage as his younger sisters' teacher would not feel honored by the offer of his heart and hand. It was Rita's greatest trial—to endure his constant attentions; and it was the terror of both Mrs. Ambler and Florence, lest Frederick should actually propose to "the governess." "What would the world and their set at home say? A teacher! She should never have accompanied them, had they foreseen this; but then, Fred might have decided to stop at home, too: they would dismiss her now, but her services were really so valuable—she understood French and German so well that she was really of use to them, and now, she was equally familiar with Italian."

And so they concealed their ire; and Florence took it as her especial cue to promote an acquaintance between her brother and a handsome young Boston belle who was also "doing the foreign;" and Mamma Ambler kept Miss Warner busy with extra studies for Misses Hattie and Grace, while she felicitated herself upon her management. But "l'homme proposes, and l'Dieu disposes." They might have spared themselves their manœuvring.

One day, the Juno-looking Roman matron who rented suits of apartments to her lodgers came into the morning parlor of Mrs. Ambler. "The invalid Signora in the apartment above, Miladi, is taken sick—veri sick, with hemorrhage, I believe you call, of the throat. Her maid only, and leetel child, be with her; the Signor being gone to walk. It is veri sudden; will not Miladi, or the young Signora, come up?"

"Me, mamma? I'm sure the sight of blood would make me faint on the spot! I could not go for the world! You must, mamma!" exclaimed Florence Ambler, who sat trifling over a few sketches an artist acquaintance had brought in.

"But really I am so unused to illness! It must be that frail young lady I noticed a morning or two since—the new arrivals. Her husband was bringing her up stairs in his arms. He was very distingué looking. Really, you had better go up, Florence! They may be people of rank," urged Mrs. Ambler.

"The Signor is veri noble, and his poor lady veri beautiful; but the Roman winter will not find her here," said the matron shaking her head. "She is fading. A good many Inglesse come to die in Italie."

At the first words, the governess had risen from her books at a table in the farther corner of the parlor; and now came forward.

"Madam, if I can be of help, show me to the lady's rooms!" she said decidedly.

"Signora is veri compassionate!" answered the landlady, leading the way from the apartment.

"Teachers have nerves!" said Florence Ambler, settling herself again to the Views of Rome by Moonlight. "I dare say she will make herself useful."

It was a sad scene that presented itself, and enlisted her womanly sympathy, when Rita Warner entered the suit of apartments, one flight above, on the stone staircase. The rooms were handsome, and richly furnished; and the articles of travelling gear lying around, half unpacked, betokened wealth on the part of the new-comers; but a young and exquisitely beautiful woman, pale as marble, and with her rich morning robe stained with a crimson tide, lay back on the couch, supported by her maid, while a lovely boy of two summers looked on in childish alarm.

"Mamma is very sick, and papa isn't here, lady," lisped the boy, as Rita entered. In a rapid tone, the maid explained that her mistress had suddenly been attacked; that her master had only gone into the street to mail letters home to America, and would return presently. "The ladies were kind to come—would they assist her in making her mistress comfortable?"

With rapid movement, Rita gently drew off the morning-robe, and replaced it by a fresh wrapper; bound up the long, silky hair which had escaped from its comb; then seated herself by the side of the couch.

The invalid lady, who had been watching her with her lustrous blue eyes, reached out her hand, and said, in a sweet whisper: "I thank you, gentle friend! Do not be alarmed—I am not. These attacks are not new to me: but I wish Bayard had been with me. But hark! he is coming!"

There was a step on the marble staircase; the door opened. "Bayard!" She knew him; but she had changed, and she was glad Bayard Lockwood did not recognize her.

"My wife! Alice!" and he came forward and bent over her with tender solicitude. "This was sudden."

"Yes, very sudden, Mr. Lockwood. You had but just left. This lady was so kind as to come in with the landlady," said the maid, in explanation.

Mr. Lockwood expressed his thanks by a courteous bend of his head; then again bent over his wife, who lay like a tired child, holding his hands fast within her own.

"Send for a physician!" he exclaimed, turning to the landlady, who immediately departed with his order.

"And, in the mean time, let me take away your boy till his mother is better," said Rita, in a calm voice.

"Thanks!" said the gentleman, without turning. "Walter, go with the lady."

"And leave manma?" asked the little fellow, sweetly.

"Only for a few minutes!" said Rita, gently, drawing him away from the apartment.

A year had passed; and Mrs. Ambler and her elegant daughter sat in a dressing-room of their sumptuous home in Boston. Frederick had lounged in, and now sat buried in the depths of a velvet chair, intent on studying through the open door the governess, who was with her young charges in the adjoining school-room, much to the annoyance of his mother and sister. The bell rang, and a servant brought up a card.

"Bayard Lockwood."

"Ah! that distingué gentleman we met in Rome last year! His poor wife! I sympathized so with him. Go down, Florence! Your morning negligé is very becoming."

"But, if you please, ma'am, the gentleman asked for Miss Warner."

Mrs. Ambler thrust the card back into the servant's hand as though it were a red-hot coal. Florence darted a glance of rage and hate toward the school-room.

"I'm sure, mamma, I never fancied him; he must have low tastes, to keep up an acquaintance with a teacher."

"A deuced talented and handsome fellow—and dangerous for a rival! One of the first lawyers in the city, they say, sis!" said Frederick Eustace Ambler, nervously.

"A 'rival!' My son forgets of whom he is talking in the presence of his lady mother and sister," said Mrs. Ambler, icily.

Frederick Eustace only answered by a cool glance; then, with rueful and anxious countenance, vanished from the room.

"Deuce take my chances with the proud little iceberg, if that splendid fellow comes here!" he exclaimed, as he walked down stairs.

Meantime, Rita Warner's light feet had pressed the roses of the Persian carpet in the sumptuous drawing-room below; her white hands were snatched to be held in a strong clasp; and the crimson roses of her childhood were flaming anew upon her cheeks under a tide of burning words.

"Rita, hear me now," began Bayard Lockwood, rapidly. "A year has passed, and I may speak freely. What must you have thought of me all those years? I was almost stunned when I met you there in Italy; but that was too solemn an hour, beside Alice's death-bed, to speak of the past. But, Rita, I always loved you! Those were precious letters that passed between the young school-girl and the law student in the four years that followed my leaving Wheaton; and, so sure as One above knoweth all hearts, I loved you, and meant, when the struggle was won, to ask you to become my wife. But Fate came between us. Alice's father, the Judge with whom I studied, was my benefactor; and his only child—frail as a rose-leaf—loved me. He came to me with this: It lay in my power to make her happy, perhaps to prolong her life. I was bound to him by gratitude; I could not refuse him. I became Alice's husband; for three years I shielded her most tenderly; she grew weaker—I took her to Italy. You know the result. Neither the soft sea-breezes of the Mediterranean, nor the mild airs of the Roman Campagna could restore her. She died, as she had lived, mild, beautiful, and believing herself beloved, in my arms. She was a frail, loving child; and I wept over her tomb. But, Rita, it is no wrong to say that she never filled the deep places of my heart; you know for whom they are now opened. Little Rita, you were once my scholar, be my teacher now, and learn me the lessons of perfect happiness. My boy is motherless—my home is desolate: come!”

He stood before her with outstretched arms.

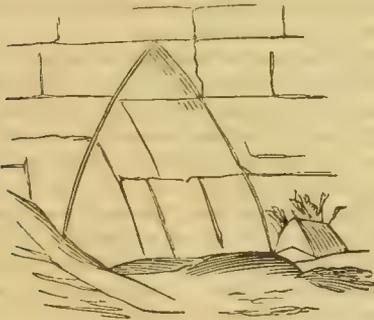

And Rita went and nestled in their clasp, murmuring, with crimson cheeks and dewy eyes, “My dear master!”

PRACTICAL LESSONS IN DRAWING.

FOURTH LESSON.

HERE is another example, composed of straight and curved lines, but differently arranged. In drawing this, commence by making a faint horizontal line upon the paper; then place a dot at a proper distance above, for the centre part of the arch; from this dot draw the right-hand curved line until it meets the horizontal one, then place another dot a little above the horizontal line, at nearly the same distance as the height of the arch from it, and draw two parallel curved lines close together, from the top of the first curved line to the dot you have just placed on the paper. You have now formed the outline of the arch. Draw a horizontal line from each side of the top of the arch, and at the respective distances draw other lines parallel to it; then draw perpendicular lines between the horizontal ones, and you will now have formed the masonry. Sketch in the lines of the two banks, commencing with the left one, and afterwards sketch in the stones on the right of the base of the arch. At rather more than half the length of the left-hand curved lines place a dot, and another at about two-thirds the distance from the base of the right-hand curved line; connect these two dots by a curved line, and then sketch in the masonry of the archway, as in the example. All that now remains for you to do is to fill in the shading, which is done by marking short parallel strokes at equal distances from each other, as in the example before you.

Fig. 15.

The next object that you are required to copy is a pyramid, and you observe that the first example is sketched only in outline, in order that you may clearly understand how it is done.

When you have drawn the outline correctly several times, you may commence the next example (Fig. 17), which, you observe, is carefully shaded by drawing fine perpendicular parallel lines between the transverse lines, and all of them at equal distances. The shading at the base is drawn in a similar manner; the only difference being that the lines are horizontal, instead of perpendicular.

Fig. 17.

The next example is the outline of a pillar with a millstone resting against it (Fig. 18); and when you have sketched this, it must be filled in the same as the other example (Fig. 19), which shows the same objects shaded, according to the method we have already pointed out. The weeds and grass require a few extra touches with an HB pencil, and the outline should be strengthened in the dark parts.

Fig. 18.

Fig. 19.

Practise these examples frequently, particularly the weeds at the top of the pillar, and the shading.

When you are able to draw these examples as they are represented here, draw them backwards; in other words place the millstone on the right instead of the left of the pillar.

Draw examples 17 and 19, and shade them as if the light was on the left.

THERE scarce can be named one quality that is amiable in a woman, which is not becoming in a man, not excepting even modesty and gentleness of nature.

ELLEN JAYNES'S RESOLUTION; A STORY FOR WIVES.

"WHY don't you ever clean your boots before you come into the house?" said Ellen Jaynes to her husband. "I had just nicely arranged the room, and settled down to my sewing as you came in; now there it is all to do over again. Just look at the dirt—from one end of the room to the other, and, I suppose, it is the same thing in the hall. Dear! dear! I am so discouraged and tired out with brushing!"

"And so am I discouraged and tired out with such a continual fret—fretting every time I come into the house. Don't you ever get tired of scolding?" was the provoking response of the gentleman.

"I do get tired of speaking to you about things which make me such a deal of trouble; and yet you never seem to mind them at all."

"Speaking in the manner you do will not have that effect; of that you may be assured."

"You are just so provoking as that; you never seem to care how much I go through!" Here the tears began to flow.

"What a confounded scene about a few tracks on the carpet!" ejaculated the incorrigible Mr. Jaynes, with vigorous emphasis.

"It 's not that alone. You know very well, Charles, that I wouldn't mind it for once; but it is so continually. You never seem to care how hard you make my work. It is the same in everything; and, Charles, why won't you be a little more particular? Why need you make so much work, when I am trying so hard to keep things in good order?" The shower was fast becoming a flood: Mrs. Jaynes produced her handkerchief, and began afresh. "Oh, dear! the trial of living with such a careless person! It would have been so much better for me if I had never met you!"

But Charles had departed, shutting the door with a tremendous bang, leaving his better half to have her cry out by herself. And cry she did for a time, with all her might, fully convinced that she was the most miserable, unlucky, and unappreciated of all housekeepers; then she began to think what is the use of all this; nobody cares about my tears; I am only making myself sick for nothing. So she bathed her eyes, brushed her carpet, and resumed her sewing. But she was not in an amiable mood—not by any means repentant nor forgiving, certainly not cheerful—I am sorry to say, not even peaceful; but very much inclined to let her grievances be made manifest.

Accordingly they were hardly seated at the dinner-table before she commenced.

"Did you see Parker about that wardrobe this morning, as I requested?"

"No, hadn't the time!" was the encouraging response.

"Hadn't time! You never have time to attend to my wishes. You could have found time if you had chosen. If you cared a straw for your wife, you would attend to her wishes a little. Well, did you go to the stove store to see about having that stove cleaned? It is almost impossible to bake in it, as I have often told you."

"No; I did not."

"For mercy's sake, Mr. Jaynes, when will you attend to it?"

"I can't say; anything else wanted?"

"Yes. Did you call at Lovell's to see about matching that oilcloth?"

"No."

"Yet I asked you to be sure and recollect it the last thing this morning. Was there ever such a careless man before? I never saw anything like it."

Mr. Jaynes continued his dinner in apparent unconcern, and his wife relapsed into silence. Just as he was leaving the dining-room, she started a new theme.

"Charles, Mrs. Dutton has been in this morning. She says they are going to the White Mountains next week. Why cannot you take me off for a little journey! I should like the change; I think it would do me good."

"Take you a journey, after the complimentary things you have said to me this morning! I shall be very likely to do so. A pleasant trip I should have!"

"That will do for an excuse; you never do take me anywhere. There 's the Duttons have been away every summer; and Mrs. Dutton says her husband would not think of keeping her at home all summer. She was surprised when I told her that I had never been away from home a week at a time since I was married."

"Very likely"—in a tone of irony, and Mr. Jaynes left the room.

Now Ellen Jaynes was not disappointed in the least at the result of her application. In fact she did not expect her husband to grant her request, and it is doubtful whether she would have gone had he given his consent, for she well knew their means would not allow such expensive indulgences, and Ellen was a prudent, economical wife. But she wanted to show her husband what other men did for their wives, and what he did not do.

Ellen Jaynes was a woman of good principles and good feelings, though she had an irritable, nervous temperament. In the good old times, such were called "cross;" now, it is genteelly "nervous." Well, Ellen Jaynes was very nervous; she had also a great regard for trifles, and very little power to adapt herself to circumstances. She had, too, a vivid imagination, and having but limited opportunity for studying her husband's character before marriage, she had invested him with all possible excellence; thought she had found a man to reverence, lean upon, look up to in all things. Of course she was bitterly disappointed.

Charles Jaynes was a man of good natural abilities, and could render himself very entertaining and agreeable when he chose; but he had few of those domestic qualities which make up the model husband. He was not tidy in his habits, was often thoughtless and inconsiderate, and rather selfishly fond of his own ease. Such a character was the very antipodes of Ellen, who was possessed of much energy of character, and very industrious withal. As I have said, she was bitterly disappointed; and, though she loved Charles, lamented her mistake in marrying him, with many secret tears. She would, probably, have been quite as miserable with any other husband, unless she had governed her own temper; as it was she endeavored to perform the duties devolving upon her faithfully; yet she was often troubled by the delinquencies of her husband. They irritated her; she would find fault and complain, which did not improve matters. Such a course never does. So the years rolled on, and things grew worse and worse. The husband's love grew cold, and he became more and more inattentive, while the cares of the wife kept increasing, and in like ratio, her fretting and fault-finding. A deplorable state of things most assuredly; yet is it very uncommon?

After the conversation we have recorded, Ellen had so far freed her mind that there came a reaction, and we find her now in her own room, repentant and sorrowful.

"I am sorry I was quite so cross. I said some things I wish I could take back; but Charles does try me so. He is not what I expected; but that can't be helped now; he is my husband, and I might as well make the best of it. I am so miserable, so unhappy, and it grows worse and worse! What a life we are leading! It is all wrong—wrong. We are to live together till death; it were wiser to make the best of my lot. After all, things might be worse. Charles is temperate, and honest, and virtuous; but who knows how long he will be, if we go on in this miserable fashion? I will begin to reform; God helping my efforts, I will subdue my unhappy temper. Fretting at Charles only makes him worse. I will try what patience and cheerful endurance will accomplish." And so Ellen Jaynes formed her first firm and good resolution, and what was better still, she began at once to fulfil it. Very many good resolutions are made—very few are kept; but this was kept.

At the tea-table Ellen made her appearance becomingly dressed (she was a comely woman), and with a cheerful face; but Mr. Jaynes's brow was clouded, and he was not to be drawn into conversation. It required quite an effort to look and speak pleasantly in the morning, for the husband still remained moody and silent; but she remembered her good resolution, and she kept it.

In the forenoon he came into the sitting-room of an errand, again with dirty boots; but this time Ellen did not seem to notice them. "I declare I am hungry," said he, carelessly, throwing himself into a chair in a lounging attitude, which was the special detestation of his wife.

"And wet, too, I perceive," said his wife, kindly; and, rising, she went quietly from the room and returned, bearing a plate with a tempting lunch in one hand, and a brush in the other. The former she placed in her husband's hand; with the latter she brushed the drops of rain from his neck and shoulders.

"Why, Ellen, what does this all mean?" And Mr. Charles Jaynes looked up at his wife in unaffected astonishment.

"I was afraid you would take cold," was the pleasant answer.

He took the plate in one hand, while the other drew the face of his wife down to his for a warmer kiss than she had received for five years. "This seems like the good old times, don't it, Ellen?"

"I wish they would come back again!" was her answer, as she returned the kiss.

After he had gone, our heroine brushed up her carpet cheerfully; somehow it did not seem much of a task, although there were certainly more spots than the day before, as it had been raining ever since. The door mat was not neglected again that day, and the wardrobe came home in the afternoon, likewise the desired oilcloth.

Ellen kept her resolution, though many times sorely tempted—for the habits of years are not so easily broken up, and Charles many times muddied the carpet, turned the new wardrobe inside out in search of some articles which were never there, and forgot many errands, important though they were. But she was determined to be patient: many a murmuring word was denied utterance by firmly closed lips. Many times did she pray for strength and self-control; but she achieved the greatest of all victories—she conquered herself.

At the end of the month, Mr. Jaynes said to his wife: "Come, Ellen, pack your trunks, and we will pay your father and mother that long-talked-of visit. I have made arrangements in my business so that we can have a nice long vacation, and we will throw care to the winds, and have a famous time of it."

"Indeed, dear Charles, I should like to go; but, after all, we don't need to go from home in search of happiness, do we?"

"Like the Duttons, for instance," said her husband, with a mischievous smile.

"Ay, the Duttons," with an answering smile.

"Nevertheless, we will have our journey, though. You have been such a dear, darling wife lately that my own home seems a paradise!" And the husband's face was very near hers as he finished speaking—very near indeed.

TWILIGHT MUSINGS.

BY ESTELLE BEATRICE.

In the purple sheen of the sunset's glow,
When the rosy shadows now come, now go,
And over the heavens in their beauty flow—

When the glowing west is all sown with fire,
My heart it is filled with a wild desire,
In reverence to bow and to tune my lyre;

Until with sweet accents, both flowing and free,
I sing of the beauty my ravished eyes see
On the quiet land and the rolling sea.

Broidered with silver and braided with gold,
The burnished clouds lie heaped fold on fold,
Till they melt away in the distance cold.

One little cloud, like an angel's sweet smile,
Or like some mystic enchanted isle,
Lies in an amber sea floating the while.

The dewdrops fall in soft, silent showers,
Reviving the hearts of the drooping flowers,
Like golden memories of happy hours.

Violet, amethyst, purple and gold,
All blend their bright beauty, now faint, now bold,
As wider and wider each cloud is unrolled.

Adown the hills the white mist is trailing,
Through the blue sky the fair moon is sailing,
Afair in the forest the night-bird is wailing—

I close my lattice with whispered prayer
That He who hath made this world so fair
May keep me always in His loving care.

BRAIDING PATTERN.

PATCHWORK.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT,

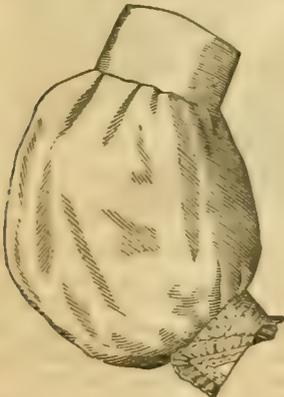

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

The Central Park Jacket.—A very graceful combination of the jacket and vest, the jacket part consisting of a short polka, which rounds up to the vest in front, deepens to a point behind, and is laid in flat plaits at the back, surmounted by square pocket lappets. The sleeve is a variation from the plain coat sleeve, formed by the insertion of a full gore at the back. The trimmings consist of a narrow quilling, headed by a pretty border done in braid. The vest is fastened down the front with flat steel, jet, or gilt buttons, according to the material of which the habit is composed. Gray, à la militaire, is in favor this season, or dark United States blue.

Undersleeve.—A plain sleeve gathered into a cuff, which is cut pointed, and the points turned back, as in the Byron collar.

Empress Sleeve.—This sleeve has two seams, and the upper half is cut longer than the other, and gathered about half the length of the sleeve. The centre of the upper half is caught up slightly with a band. There is also a side cap cut nearly a half square, the longest side set in with the seam inside the arm, and the point reaches to the seam at the back of the arm, where it is fastened by a bow.

Clotilde Sleeve.—This is a plain flowing sleeve, and is caught up at each side in plaits, about half way from the seam to the outside or centre of the sleeve. The plaits are fastened by ornamental buttons, and the edge finished with a handsome jet gimp. The band is attached only at the seam, inside of the arm and at the back of the sleeve. This exhibits the puffed laced undersleeve to advantage.

Child's Combination Jacket and Cape.—This pretty little waist, a combination of cape and jacket, will be very much worn this season, in silk, dimity, or any pretty light material, in place of the sack so long worn as an extra cover for the neck, when low dresses are worn, or when additional warmth is needed.

GLOVE TRIMMING.

An ornamentation of this description may be used to trim gloves either for morning or evening wear, selecting the colors accordingly. It certainly is more appropriate for an evening toilet, but where the glove is somewhat short on the back of the hand, which is very frequently the case in dark gloves, a glove trimming like this would not be at all objectionable. It is composed, for white and light-colored gloves, of puffed tulle, mounted on a piece of elastic large enough to fit the wrist comfortably, and finished off in the centre with a thick wreath of very tiny ribbon bows, with two ends of wider ribbon to make a pretty finish to them.

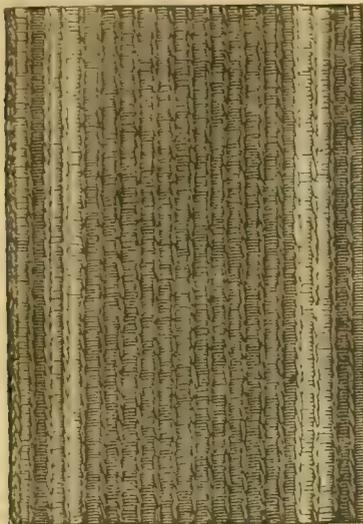

This wreath of bows should be made up on a piece of ribbon or stiff net before it is mounted on the wristlet, as it can be so much more easily arranged when off the elastic. For dark gloves the net should be black, and the ribbon should match the color of the kid.

GENTLEMAN'S BRACES IN CROCHET SILK.

Materials.—Black, red, and two shades of gray crochet silk; some fine white cord.

THE pattern is worked in double crochet over fine cord. Each row is fastened off, and a fresh one commenced at the other end. Four shades of silk are required to make these braces, but only one shade is worked at a time. The outer stripe is in red silk, the second in black, the third in dark gray, and the fourth in light gray. The twelve centre rows are in scarlet, and the last four rows are the same as the first four, to form a border on each side. These braces, being sufficiently firm, as they are worked on cord, would not require lining.

COLLAR IN WAVED-LACET BRAID.

Materials.—Waved lacet-braid; cotton, No. 24 and 34.

DRAW the pattern on paper and gum a piece of muslin at the back, then sew the braid firmly on the pattern; in the diamonds, work rosettes of point d'Angleterre; commence by working one stitch in the diamond where the braid crosses to secure it, cross to the opposite side, then back again to the other side, twisting the thread six or seven times round the first thread; then run the needle along the back of the braid, dividing the spaces into eight parts. When the last is worked, finish it in the centre, which will leave half a thread single; work one stitch in the centre to secure them, then work round by passing the needle round one thread and under the second, then round the second and under the third; repeat this till you have gone round six or eight times, then twist the thread three times round the single thread, and fasten off.

Fill all the spaces at the edge with thick buttonhole stitch, then work round the outer edge of the diamonds with one rather loose buttonhole stitch and into it one tight; then work round the inner edge of the top in the same way, connecting the pattern wherever it comes close. When this is done, work bars of thick buttonhole to connect the wide spaces.

For the edge, work one rather loose buttonhole stitch, and into it work four tight ones. Repeat this all round the collar.

For two or more rows work the loose stitches into the ones of the previous row, and the tight ones as before.

Cut the stitches at the back, and remove the collar carefully from paper. Half the collar will make a cuff.

LITTLE BOY'S BELTS.
IN PLAITED WORSTED CORD.

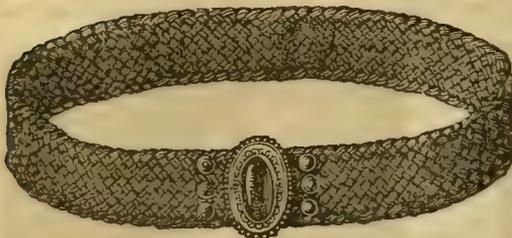

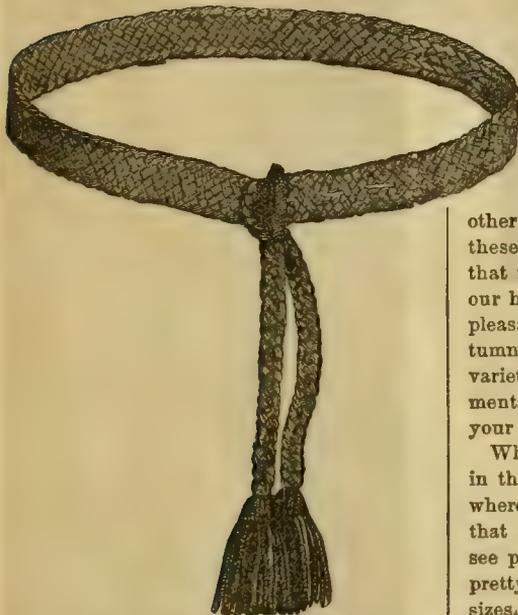

Fig. 2.

THE belt Fig. 1 consists of a plait of twelve, plaited in double cord. It is fastened in front with a buckle, to which the ends of the belt should be firmly sewn. We give an illustration of the belt complete, and also one showing the arrangement of the plait nearly full size. Each length of cord should be cut one yard long.

The belt Fig. 2 is arranged with two ends, ornamented with tassels, and has three buttonholes in the band to allow of its being let out or taken in, as may be required. It is fastened by means of an oval button, which can be put into either of the buttonholes. The plait is composed of eight pieces of double cord, each one and a half yard long, and when that portion of the belt is reached where it is necessary to make the buttonholes, the plait should be divided, and two plaits of four made, then the plait of eight resumed. The method of making the buttonholes will be clearly seen by referring to the illustration, which shows the plait entire and divided.

These belts may be recommended for their solidity, the cheapness of their material, and the small amount of trouble occasioned in the working of them. Made in bright scarlet cord, and worn over Holland dresses or tunics, these belts would be both pretty and suitable.

RUSTIC ORNAMENTS.

PICTURE-FRAME OF OAK LEAVES AND ACORNS.

EVERY autumn we have delightful summer-like days, when a ramble over the hills or in the woods affords much enjoyment to those who admire the beauties of nature, or can appreciate fresh air and healthy exercise. Another inducement for young ladies to go on these rural walks is that much can be found that may be manufactured into ornaments for our homes. Then make it the aim of these pleasant, health-giving rambles to gather autumn leaves, acorns, cones, and mosses of all varieties, and beautify your homes with ornaments which are none the less beautiful for being your own handiwork.

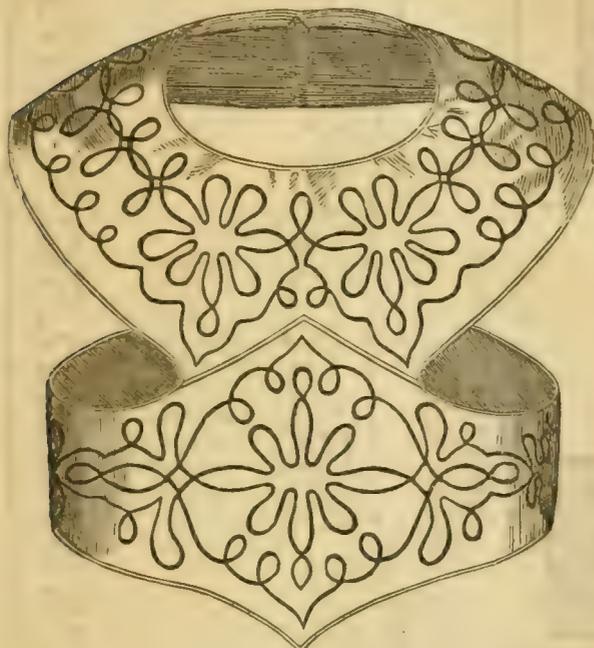

When the leaves are falling from the trees in the month of October, go into the woods where there are large oaks, and among others that are scattered around your feet, you will see perfectly fair and smooth oak leaves, of a pretty brown color, and of various forms and sizes. While you are looking about for some of the best of these, you will find a variety of acorns also. Press the leaves, and dry the acorns, and you have materials for a picture-frame. They should be fastened to the frame with glue. If you make an oval frame, arrange them in form of a wreath. If a square shape, have it smooth and stained before putting them on.

Commence by placing a small-sized leaf rather more than a third of the length of the side from the corner, and with the stem toward the corner; then two more on to and each side of that; lay a small acorn on the first leaf, the point toward the point of the leaf, and the stem under the two others; then two or three larger acorns, two or three more leaves, and so on. Put a group of the largest acorns at the corners, and fill in around them with small-sized leaves.

The leaves should not be fastened on flat, but bent and raised a little from the frame, and the whole arranged in a graceful manner. Varnish with furniture varnish.

This makes a handsome frame, and is a good imitation of leather-work, requiring but little time for its execution.

CHILD'S BRAIDED BIB AND BAND.

The band and bib are cut out of one piece of Marcella, and the band buttons at the side. The bib portion may be lined and quilted if liked; it then protects the fronts of the little frocks more effectually. The design may be reproduced either in white or scarlet braid, the former being the most suitable color for babies' wear.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

SNOW-DROP.

White silk half twist is the best material for this flower, but it can be done in white split Berlin wool.

Six petals are required for each snow-drop: three small ones in the interior of the flower, and three larger over these.

Cast on four stitches, knit and purl alternately six rows plain, knit and purl six more rows, increasing one stitch at the beginning of the first and second, the fifth and sixth rows, then knit and purl alternately eight rows without increase, and then begin to decrease one at the beginning of each row, till only four stitches remain; cast them off.

The small petals are knitted as three in one. Cast on six stitches.

Purl one row, make one stitch, knit two, repeat through the row. All the back rows are purled. Make one stitch, knit three, repeat through the row; continue thus to increase at the beginning, and knit one stitch more each row between the increase, until you have seven stitches knitted between each, then purl one row, knit one plain row and purl another, after which, knit eight stitches, turn back and purl them, knit four stitches, purl them back. Break off your silk about a yard from the work, gather the four stitches together, and fasten them; thread a needle with the silk left, and take a stitch or two down the side of your work, till you bring the silk before the four remaining stitches, knit these, and purl them back; gather them together, and fasten as the last; bring the silk down to the next stitch, knit eight stitches, and proceed exactly as before with them, as also with the next. Sew a wire along the edge of the top with split wool just as for the Fuchsia. Embroider some little heart-shaped marks as in the natural flower, place the three exterior petals over these, and cover the stem with green, making it much thicker near the flower.

The buds must be made of silk or wool, as the flower. The smallest require eight or ten stitches to be cast on. Knit and purl a small piece, sufficient to cover a little bud of cotton wool, which must be fixed on a bit of wire, and covered with the piece just knitted.

The largest buds will require a few stitches to be increased, in order to make it wider at the top. The leaves are very simple, the shape being much like blades of grass.

Cast on four stitches, and knit and purl alternate rows, till a sufficient length is done: gather the stitches at each extremity, and sew a fine wire neatly round.

PATTERNS FOR NETTING OR CROCHET.

Figs. 3 and 4. Borders.—These patterns will be found particularly useful, as they are designed with angles. They have the advantage of being adaptable to any grounds with which it may be desirable to combine them.

POINT LACE.

15.

13. Brussels Lace is a succession of rows of Brussels edge, worked alternately backwards and forwards.

14. Venetian Lace. Rows of Venetian edge, which should be worked all one way from left to right.

15. Sorrento Lace, same as Sorrento Edging, may be worked backwards and forwards.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

VEAL CUTLETS AND BACON.—Purchase a few trimmings or cuttings of veal, or a small piece from the chump end of the loin, which you can cut up in thin slices, and after seasoning them with pepper and salt, and rolling them in flour, they are to be fried in the fat that remains from some slices of bacon which you shall have previously fried; and, after placing the fried veal and bacon in its dish, shake a tablespoonful of flour in the frying-pan; add a few drops of ketchup or vinegar, and a gill of water; stir all together on the fire to boil for five minutes, and pour this sauce over the cutlets. A dish of cutlets of any kind of meat may be prepared as above.

BOILED SHOULDER OF MUTTON WITH ONIONS.—Put the shoulder of mutton to boil in your two gallon pot, with a handful of salt and plenty of water, allow it to boil gently for about two hours, and when done, and placed on its dish, smother it over with the following sauce: Chop six or eight large onions, and boil them with a pint of water for twenty minutes, by which time the water must be reduced to half a pint; then add two ounces of butter, a pint of milk, four ounces of flour, pepper, and salt, and stir the sauce whilst boiling for ten minutes. A shoulder of mutton for boiling is all the better for its being salted for two or three days previous to its being cooked.

STEWED STEAKS.—Fry the steaks brown over a very brisk fire, without allowing them to be hardly half done, and place them in a saucepan with onions, carrots, turnips, and celery, all cut in pieces about the size of a pigeon's egg; season with thyme, pepper, and salt, and two ounces of flour; moisten with a quart of water, and stir the stew on the fire till it boils, and then set it by the side of the fire on the hob, to simmer very gently for an hour and a half. It will then be ready for dinner.

BEEFSTEAKS, PLAIN.—When you happen to have a clear fire, the steaks may be cooked on a gridiron over the fire; the steaks must be turned on the gridiron every two or three minutes. This precaution assists very much in rendering the meat more palatable and tender, as it is by this frequent turning over of the meat while broiling, that the juices are not allowed to run off in waste, but are reabsorbed by the meat. When the steaks are cooked, rub them over with a small bit of butter, season with pepper and salt. A little chopped shallot, sprinkled over steaks, imparts an extra relish.

VEGETABLE PORRIDGE.—Scrape and peel the following vegetables: Six carrots, six turnips, six onions, three heads of celery, and three parsnips; slice up all these very thinly, and put them into a two gallon pot, with four ounces of butter, a handful of parsley, and a good sprig of thyme, and fill up with water, or pot liquor—if you happen to have any; season with pepper and salt, and put the whole to boil very gently on the fire for two hours; at the end of this time the vegetables will be done to a pulp, and the whole must be rubbed through a colander with a wooden spoon, and afterwards put back into the pot and stirred over the fire, to make it hot for dinner.

TO BOIL FISH.—Put the fish on in sufficient water to cover it, add a small handful of salt, and, providing that the fish is not larger than mackerel, soles, or whiting, it will be cooked by the time that the water boils. Yet it is always best to try whether it requires to boil a little longer, as underdone fish is unwholesome. Boiled fish requires some kind of sauce. Try the following, viz. :—

Parsley Sauce.—Chop a handful of parsley and mix it in a stew pan with two ounces of butter, two ounces of flour, pepper and salt; moisten with half a pint of water and a tablespoonful of vinegar. Stir the parsley sauce on the fire till it boils, and then pour it over the fish, drained free from water, on its dish.

SHARP SAUCE FOR BROILED MEATS.—Chop fine an onion and a small quantity of mixed pickles; put these into a saucepan with half a gill of vinegar, a teaspoonful of mustard, a small bit of butter, a large tablespoonful of bread-crumbs, and pepper and salt to season; boil all together on the fire for at least six minutes; then add a gill of water, and allow the sauce to boil again for ten minutes longer. This sauce will give an appetizing flip to the coarsest meats or fish when broiled or fried, and also when you are intending to make any cold meat into a hash or stew. In the latter case, the quantity of water and crums must be doubled.

TO STEW CELERY.—Take off the outside, and remove the green ends from the celery; stew in milk and water until they are very tender. Put in a slice of lemon, a little beaten mace, and thicken with a good lump of butter and flour; boil it a little, and then add the yolks of two well-beaten eggs mixed with a teaspoonful of good cream. Shake the saucepan over the fire until the gravy thickens, but do not let it boil. Serve it hot.

POTATOES.—Many good cooks are bad managers of potatoes, and this esculent, which in most houses is served every day, and which is so popular in many families as to be often the only vegetable at table, requires much care in the cooking. The great fault in cooking potatoes, whether they are steamed or boiled, is allowing them, when they are cooked, to sodden in the moisture still hanging about the vessel in which they have been cooked, or in the steam which they give out. If they are boiled, as soon as they are cooked enough they should be taken out of the saucepan (an iron pot is best for the purpose), which should be emptied and wiped out dry; the potatoes being then returned to it will dry and become mealy. If they are steamed, take the steamer off the kettle as soon as the potatoes are cooked enough, and place it on a hot plate, in a side oven, or anywhere else where they will keep very hot, and where they will dry. The grand items with potatoes are, develop their mealiness by allowing the moisture to evaporate, serve them very hot, and serve but a few at a time, so that relays of hot dishes of them may be ready to go in with every fresh course with which they are at all likely to be required.

SOUPS.

LETTUCE SOUP.—Cut up the white parts of two or four lettuces as needed, a quart of stock, free from fat, and boiling; into this throw the lettuces and a small onion, chopped very fine, and a teaspoonful of salt; let it boil twenty minutes; thicken with two tablespoonfuls of flour, first rubbed smoothly in cold water, and a little soup added to it, then strained before putting it to the soup, then throw in a small bit of butter not larger than a walnut; let the whole boil up once, and serve.

RICE SOUP.—Wash two tablespoonfuls of rice in warm water, take a quart of boiling stock, throw the rice into this, with a little salt and four allspice corns, and simmer half an hour.

SOUP FOR INVALIDS.—Two pounds of beef from the shin cut into very small pieces, and without a particle of fat, and the half of an old fowl, two large carrots, and four white portions of leeks, a bunch of winter savory, and a little salt; to these ingredients put two quarts of cold water, and let it simmer four hours; then strain it, and when cold take off the fat. Warm it for serving, by putting the soup in a cup with a cover, and standing it in a saucepan of boiling water sufficient to reach nearly the edge of the cup.

ONION SOUP.—Peel and wash a pint of very small silver onions; take a quart of milk and a pint of strong beef stock; let both boil, then throw in a teaspoonful of salt and the onions; the soup must not be allowed to stop boiling, and must be kept very fast boiling. In a quarter of an hour the onions will be done. Take two table-spoonfuls of arrowroot, mix smoothly with a little cold water, then add some of the boiling soup, stirring the arrowroot all the time, then throw the latter into the remainder of the soup, and serve with small squares or dice of toasted bread.

This soup is mild and exceedingly restorative.

TOMATO SOUP.—Cook eight or ten tomatoes in boiling water with a little salt; peel, mash, and strain them, add a little pepper, butter, and a little flour; mince a few shreds of shallot very fine, throw this with the tomatoes into a quart of boiling stock; let it boil ten minutes, and serve without straining.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

SPONGE-CAKE.—Take six eggs and divide the yolks from the whites, and beat each separately for three-quarters of an hour; grate the yellow rind of a lemon, and mix well with ten ounces of sifted loaf-sugar. Now add this to the yolks of the eggs, and mix well together; then add the whites, and mix; then dust in six ounces of flour which has been well dried before the fire. Now only just mix all together without beating, as, if beaten, it makes the cake heavy. Bake in a well-buttered tin and quick oven for an hour, but put it in the oven the instant it is made; and, when baked, turn it upside down, half in and half out of the tin (or it will be heavy), and let it stand an hour in a warm place.

APPLE CAKE, with custard sufficient to fill twelve custard-glasses, or a good sized dish.—Pare, slice, and core a sufficient number of apples which, when prepared, shall weigh three pounds; add to these a pint of cold water, and boil till to a pulp; then take three-quarters of a pound of loaf-sugar, well crushed, all but eight lumps; on these lumps rub off the yellow rind of a lemon. Now these lumps may be broken; strain the juice of the lemon, add to the sugar, and throw all into the apple pulp, and boil all together on a tolerably quick fire for an hour, stirring it all the time. With the purest salad oil, oil a mould before a fire thoroughly; then turn the apple into a mould, and, when cold, turn it from thence into a glass dish.

FOR THE CUSTARD, which will fill a large dish, or fill twelve custard-glasses.—Four eggs, whites and yolks; an ounce and a half of loaf-sugar; a pint and a half of milk; a small stick of cinnamon, and a quarter of the very thin yellow rind of a lemon, and six drops of almond flavoring. Put in a saucepan a pint of the milk, the cinnamon, lemon-peel, and sugar; let it boil till of a good flavor. Break the eggs into a jug, add the remainder of the milk, and beat well to a froth; take the hot milk and pour to the eggs, beating the latter all the time. In another jug drop the flavoring; now strain the milk and eggs back into the saucepan; let it slowly thicken over the fire, stirring the whole time; the instant it thickens sufficiently, lift it off the fire, for here the danger of curdling begins; and should such arise, it can be remedied by instantly pouring it through the fine tin strainer into the jug with the flavoring, and then instantly through the strainer again into another jug, thus pouring it from jug to jug till the custard is cold. This process must be observed in every case, only that if not curdled, it need not be poured through the strainer after the first time of pouring off after it is boiled. Now pour the custard around the apple cake—not on it.

SMALL TEA CAKE.—Seven ounces of flour, four and a half ounces of butter, three ounces of white sifted sugar, the peel of one lemon, the yolks of three eggs, worked well together, rolled into small rolls, and pressed on one side with a knife, and then baked.

PLAIN POUND CAKE.—Stir one pound of melted butter and one pound of sugar well together till it is quite light and white; then add ten eggs, one pound and a quarter of flour, a handful of currants, and the same of raisins, a little citron and orange-peel. Bake in a tin form lined with paper, and bake for two hours.

AN APPLE ISLAND.—Make some good apple-sauce, which has been flavored with lemon and clove; beat it up very fine with loaf-sugar enough to taste sweet; add two glasses of sherry; then beat the whites of four eggs separately till they are of a light froth; strain them into a large basin; beat them up again; now add two table-spoonfuls of cream, or a little milk, and a quarter of an ounce of isinglass dissolved in a little water, and add to the milk and egg froth; beat it well up; take off the froth with a spoon, and lay it on an inverted sieve over a dish; when sufficient froth is made, beat the remainder up with the apples till the whole is very light and frothy; place the apples piled high in a glass dish; pour some cold custard round out on it; then take off the froth, and put on the top of the apples.

MADEIRA CREAM.—Take seven or more sponge-cakes, split them in halves, line a glass dish with the pieces; mix together two wineglassfuls of Madeira wine or sherry, and one wineglassful of brandy; with a teaspoon pour a little of this mixture over the layer of pieces; on this again put a layer of raspberry jelly, which can readily be made by putting a pot of raspberry jam in the oven; in a few minutes it will be warm, when the liquid, which is the jelly, can be strained from it, and poured over the pieces. Now put the other layer of pieces, soak this with wine as before, but omit the raspberry. Make a custard as directed for boiled custard; when cold, and just as the dish is going to table, pour the cold custard over, and sprinkle some ratafia on the top.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO CLEAN AND POLISH TABLES.—Wash the dirt and stains from the mahogany with vinegar. Then use the following furniture oil: Let one ounce of alkaneet root and one ounce of rosepink be well pounded together, and mixed with one quart of cold-drawn linseed oil. Rub on the oil, wipe it off immediately with a fine linen cloth, and polish the table, or whatever it may be. When the tables are in good order, the oil need not be used often.

TO PRESERVE FLOWERS IN WATER.—Mix a little carbonate of soda in the water, and it will keep the flowers a fortnight.

TWO WAYS OF WASHING BLACK LACE.—Carefully sponge the lace with gin, or, if preferred, with green tea, and wind it round and round a bottle to dry, as if touched with an iron it would become glossy and have a flattened appearance. Some persons fill the bottle with warm water, which causes the lace to dry more quickly. It must on no account be placed near the fire, as it would lose its color, and have a rusty appearance.

Or:—Scald some bran with boiling water, and dip the lace up and down in the bran and water when warm, and when clean, squeeze the water out, and shake the bran off. Lay it out, and pull out the edges, etc. Iron it between linen on a blanket, so that the iron does not glaze it. Or if lace is dipped in cold milk, and ironed in the same way, it will be found to clean it equally as well.

TO RESTORE A CRUMPLED BLACK SILK DRESS.—Sponge the silk with spirits of wine, diluted with a little water. Then iron it on the wrong side, keeping a piece of muslin between the surface of the silk and the hot iron. This will succeed perfectly with a black silk.

COLOR FOR WICKER BASKETS, OR ANY SMALL ARTICLES OF THE KIND.—Dissolve one stick of black sealing-wax and one stick of red in two ounces of spirits of wine. Lay it on with a small brush.

STAINING WOOD.—To stain wood to imitate dark mahogany, make a decoction with a quarter of a pound of madder, one ounce of logwood, and two quarts of water. Wash the wood over with the decoction several times, allowing it to dry thoroughly each time. Then slightly brush it over with water, in which pearlsh is dissolved, in the proportion of a quarter of an ounce to a quart. For the color of light mahogany, make the decoction in the same manner, but using, instead of the logwood, two ounces of fustic, or half an ounce of yellow berries, and brush on the liquid while boiling hot. The tint may be varied by varying the proportion of these ingredients. For wood which is already rather brown a good staining liquid may be made with dragon's blood and turmeric in spirits of wine.

TO IMITATE GROUND GLASS.—If one ounce of powdered gum tragacanth, in the white of six eggs, well beaten, be applied to a window, it will prevent the rays of the sun from penetrating.

APPLE WINE.—Pure cider made from sound, dry apples, as it runs from the press. Put sixty pounds of common brown sugar into fifteen gallons of the cider, and let it dissolve, then put the mixture into a clean barrel, and fill the barrel up to within two gallons of being full with clean cider; put the cask in a cool place, leaving the bung out forty-eight hours, then put in the bung with a small vent until fermentation wholly ceases, and bung up tight, and in one year the wine will be fit for use. This wine requires no racking; the longer it stands upon the lees the better.

CRYSTALLINE POMADE.—Mix four ounces of oil of almonds, four ounces of best olive oil, one ounce of spermaceti, two ounces of castor oil. Melt these in a covered jar by the side of the fire; then stir in seventy drops of the following perfume, which should have been previously kept in a stopped phial. Then pour it into your cream jars, cover, and let it stand till cold. A cheaper perfume than the following, such as bergamot or almond flavor, which some people like, may well be used; but the subjoined is the best: Mix together, and shake well in a stopped phial, eight drops of oil of cloves, twenty-five drops of English oil of lavender, one drachm each of essence of bergamot and essence of lemon, and ten drops each of the oil of cassia and otto of roses.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

In answer to a request, a correspondent has kindly sent us the following receipt for "Old-fashioned Wedding-Cake, raised with yeast."

Take two pounds of best wheat flour, and make dough as for bread or biscuit, with rich milk, and yeast sufficient to raise it. If it is made like biscuit, there will be a little shortening; if like bread, it will be without. It is of little consequence. Whilst the dough is rising, prepare a pound and a half of currants, nicely washed and dried, also a pound and a half of raisins, the seeds to be taken out. Two pounds of best sugar, pulverized and sifted, and one and a half of butter that is not too salt. The butter and sugar should be rubbed or worked together when the dough is very light; the butter and sugar should be mixed with the dough, and also the yolks of twelve eggs well beaten. This now should be worked together, with one or both hands, from three to six hours—the longer the better. This should now be set away to rise again, generally through the night; when it is again very light, you add spices to your taste. The old spices were cinnamon, nutmeg, and mace, freely; and cloves and allspice, sparingly. Sometimes rose-water, orange-water, or grated orange-peel, or fresh orange-peel chopped very fine, or a preparation of peach-stones, in any way. A few pits of meat of peach-stones, pounded and sifted, are an improvement, if very nicely put in, and in very small quantity; but, as too much is very objectionable, it had better be left out altogether, except in very skilful hands. These spices are now to be added, and one gill of best French brandy, or a glass of brandy, and a glass and a half of wine. This now goes through another process of working, as long as before—as long as you have time or strength. During this working process, you will add the whites of the twelve eggs, beaten as light as it is possible to make them. Work these a long time, and before you have done working, put in a teaspoonful of saleratus, dissolved in vinegar; work it in rapidly whilst it is effervescing, and beat it all thoroughly together. Now, if it is very light, put the dough into pans, which should be hot and nicely buttered, and set them where they will rise again. Your fruit should in the mean time have been prepared: the citron, by cutting in small pieces; the raisins and currants should have been swelled in a small quantity of warm or hot milk, and dried on a sieve. When your oven is ready, and the cake ready to go into it, put the fruit on the top of each cake (it is better to mix the raisins and currants before), and if they do not sink, press them gently with a spoon just below the surface, and put them immediately into the oven. I will not add to the length of this by giving directions about baking, but I should be glad at this point to put it into the hands of my old servant, who will make a good thing of anything she bakes; for it is not too late now to spoil it by baking it badly; but I have learned by experience that, if a woman does not know how to bake, it is of little use to give her instructions. I will, therefore, close, after I have added that this is a richer cake than is often made in this way, and that one-half or three-quarters the quantity mentioned here, to the full amount of flour, viz., two pounds makes an excellent cake, and is far less injurious to digestion.

WOMAN:

IN HER MARRIAGE RELATION.

For the woman is the glory of the man.—1 Cor. xi. 7.

THAT "the Fall brought mankind into an estate of sin and misery" is a true and graphic stating of the catastrophe.

What myriad forms of wickedness and wretchedness have, for nearly six thousand years of development, worked only to mar the beauty and perfectness and destroy the goodness and happiness of humanity! Have not the greater portion of those sins and woes, fertilizing earth with human blood, and darkening heaven with idol worship, thus making life in this world so miserable and so sorrowful, been the result of the fatal blight which disobedience to God's law brought on the marriage relation of the sexes?

Consider how great was the change! The husband and wife, judged separately and condemned by Divine mercy as well as justice, to different forms of suffering as punishment for individual sin, could no longer become in the sense of mutual love and trust in God, and consciousness of perfect love and confidence towards each other. This Eden unity was not possible when the wife was placed under the rule of her husband.

Had Eve been created inferior to Adam in mind, heart, and soul, where would have been her punishment? She would naturally and inevitably have fallen into this inferior condition. But if her nature was more refined than his, more spiritual—a nearer assimilation with the angelic, then to become subjected to the coarser, earthier, more sensuous nature of man, would be a sad and humiliating lot. Much did she need the gracious promise of God that her Seed should at last triumph over the tempter who had wrought her woe; and that, although she must bear oppression and endure sorrow, yet she should not fall into the utter depths of sin; there should be "enmity" between her nature and the Spirit of Evil.

Moreover, that the woman did at the creation hold the sovereignty of earth in equal trust with the man is as surely true as that, after the Fall, her husband was permitted to "rule over" her. God gave them joint dominion (see Gen. chap. i. 28); but Eve sought to be wise above her human condition. By this door sin had entered Eden. The effect of sin was to separate the creature from the Creator. The earthly triumphed over the heavenly; the sensual over the moral. Man, with the strong arm, and stern will, and fierce passions, would, of necessity, bear rule; and that woman, with the promise of redemption "hid in her heart," was subjected to him, could not separate her happiness from his, but must, in humility and self-sacrifice, work out the moral sense of her sex through the physical strength of his, was the only way of improvement and salvation for the race. Even the Lord God, reverently speaking, could not have ordered the destiny of the woman otherwise, without destroying or circumscribing man's freedom of will, which doctrine lies at the foundation of humanity, "made in the image of God."

Yet Jehovah, by His special and moral providences,* could help the woman against her natural enemies—Satan and wicked men. This God has done from the day He made the promises of salvation sure to her in her glorious Seed. In the fulfilment of these promises the Bible is a record of God's tender care over woman, particularly in her marriage relation.

The Eden law of union—one man with one woman—was not only made sacred by Divine institution, but it was woven into the natural laws of humanity, so that the proportion of the sexes to each other should be equal through all time. Polygamy and its kindred iniquities was and is the sin which most completely mars the image of God in man's soul, inclining him to idolatry, and every "corrupt imagination" and evil work; because it destroys more surely than any other sin the moral power and influences of woman. Here the whole scope, and strength, and subtlety of Satan's temptations on the sensuous nature of men, have been put forth, and God's help to the woman only could have saved the race from utter corruption and total extinction.

We have seen how the Almighty helped the weakness of the first woman against her natural enemies—Satan and his seed—by giving to her keeping the immortal destiny of her husband and sons in the hope of the Redeemer.

Woman was again helped when the Flood swept away the ungodly from earth, and thus restored the sanctity of true marriage; no polygamist was permitted to pollute the Ark. Also the special providence that shortened man's life most wonderfully increased her moral influence in the family. Allow ten years as the period of childhood, when the mother's authority over her sons predominates; then compare the length of Noah's life with that of Moses, and it will be clear that woman's power was greatly augmented when man's life was shortened from 950 years to 120 years.

When the Hebrew race was chosen to perpetuate a nation whence the mother of the MESSIAH was to have her origin, what special manifestations of God's grace we see in the protection of women from the selfishness and the lusts of men! Thus Sarah was saved from the Egyptian king, and Rebekah was kept from Abimelech; Leah, the hated but still the lawful wife of Jacob, was the mother of Judah, from whom "Shiloh" came.

The special providence of God had also kept the idolatrous Egyptian nation clear from polygamy—the only instance on record of the descendants of Ham living under the true law of marriage. Was it not wonderful that the sojournings of Jacob's posterity four hundred years in the land of Ham should thus be safe from those evil examples and polluting sins which made the nations around Canaan and throughout all the East, then as now, seem fitted only for destruction?

* We term it a moral providence where Divine interposition has evidently been exerted to advance the moral condition of an individual or a people, giving the succession to Jacob; saving and training Moses, and preserving the Jews under Abasuerus were each and all moral providences.

And when the Decalogue was thundered from Mount Sinai, how the hearts of the women must have swelled with thankfulness to God who compelled men to obey His moral law as strictly as they enjoined its rules on the women!

The special laws of Moses are full of tender touches that show our heavenly Father's love and care for his dependent daughters; some of these will be noted in our last paper. Yet we will add here that from Moses to Malachi the Old Testament laws and precepts sustained the Eden marriage relation as God's holy ordinance, and secured to the women of God's chosen race, compared with the women of all heathen and Gentile nations, inestimable privileges and blessings.

And when, at the close of four thousand years, the moral sense or instinct of woman was nearly darkened, God sent forth His "true light," constrained men to see, and thus saved the race. The blessed Saviour reaffirmed the marriage law of Eden in a manner which shows it had never been set aside, that it could not be abrogated without destruction to all social, moral, and religious improvement.

The Apostles taught the same precepts of fidelity and purity in the family relation, and St. Paul, in his Epistle from which we have quoted, illustrates the strength and beauty of Christian piety in the sexes by declaring that man is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

Let us reverently examine the meaning of this wonderful and divine declaration.

An image is something visible; the glory of God, which men see, is in the things He has created and in the laws by which these are governed: consequently to create or make and to govern by right laws is to show forth or be the "glory of God."

Man is the maker or creator on earth: he has the constructive genius and the originating understanding which, combined with his physical strength and power of will, was to subdue the earth and make laws for its government. True, he cannot absolutely make or create a single particle of matter; but he can, by new combinations, create innumerable differences in the particles of matter, and make, apparently, new elements and new things. Man, therefore, represents on earth the Creator's glory.

But to create or make out of God's work new things is not man's greatest glory; to reach the highest elevation, he must worship God in spirit and in truth.

Woman cannot create or make like man. She has not his constructive genius, and there is an organic difference in the operations of their minds. That she reasons intuitively or by inspiration, while he must plod through a regular sequence of logical arguments is admitted by all writers on mental philosophy. There is another difference however, which has not been noted. Woman never applies her intuitive reasoning to mechanical pursuits. It is the world of human life, not of inanimate things that she would move. Hence she works on mind, and for immortality; worshipping God in spirit and in truth; and thus showing forth the beauty of moral goodness, she becomes the "glory of the man."

Hence it is sure that those who are seeking to elevate woman through industrial pursuits and competition with men in the arts will never succeed. The wife cannot work with materials of earth, build up cities, mould marble forms, or discover new mechanical inventions to aid physical improvement. She has a holier vocation. She works in the elements of human nature: her orders of architecture are formed in the soul—obedience, temperance, truth, love, piety, these she must build up in the characters of her children. Often, too, she is called to repair the ravages and beautify the waste places which sin, care, and the desolating storms of life have made in the mind and heart of the husband she reverences, loves, and obeys. This task she should perform faithfully, but with humility: remembering that it was for woman's sake Eden was forfeited, because Adam loved his wife better than his Creator; and that man's nature has to contend with a degree of depravity, into which the woman, through the grace of God, has never descended.

Yes, the wife should be humble. She is dependent on her husband for the position she holds in society; she must rely on him for protection and support. She should look up to him with reverence as "the Saviour of the body," and be obedient. Does any wife say that her husband is not worthy of this reverence? Then render it to the office with which God has invested him as head of the family; but use your privilege of motherhood to train your sons so that each one may be worthy of love, reverence, and obedience from his own wife. Thus through your sufferings the world may be made better. Every faithful performance of private duty adds to the stock of public virtues.

And man—should he not bear himself humbly, from the remembrance that to woman's loving care he is indebted for preservation during helpless infancy; that his mind took its impress from her daily teachings; from her example he derives faith in those affections and virtues which are the life of the soul; that "God has chosen the weak things of this world to confound the things which are mighty," and given to woman the moral sceptre under which every man must pass before he can be prepared to enter heaven.

Humility is a Christian virtue equally needed by both sexes. Each sex having different endowments to which the other must give honor, all cause for boasting is removed from both: each should seek to promote the other's happiness and glory, then the true happiness and glory of both would be won.

OUR NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared; for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength.—Nehemiah viii. 10.

Thus commanded the inspired leader of the Jews, when they kept the "Feast of Weeks;" in a time of national darkness and sore troubles shall we not recognize that the goodness of God never faileth, and that to our Father in heaven we should always bring the Thanksgiving offering at the ingathering of the harvest?

Wise lawgivers and great patriots have acknowledged the salutary effect of appointed times for national reunions which combine religious sentiment with domestic and social enjoyment; thus feelings of benevolence are awakened, and gratitude to the Giver of all our blessings is seen to be the great duty of life. Owing to the different economy of different churches, among Protestant denominations, except the Christian Sabbath, all our religious commemorations are partial and local.

Can we not, then, following the appointment of Jehovah in the "Feast of Weeks," or Harvest Festival, establish our yearly THANKSGIVING as a permanent American National Festival, which shall be celebrated on the last Thursday in November in every State of our Union? Indeed it has been nearly accomplished. For the last twelve or fourteen years, the States have made approaches to this unity. In 1859 thirty States and three Territories held the Thanksgiving Festival on the same day—the last Thursday in November. It was also celebrated that year and the following on board several of the American fleets—ships in the Indian Ocean, the Mediterranean, and on the Brazil station; by the Americans in Berlin at our Prussian Embassy; in Paris and in Switzerland; and American missionaries have signified their readiness to unite in this Festival if it should be established on a particular day which can be known as the American Thanksgiving.

Then, in every quarter of the globe our nationality would be recognized in connection with our gratitude to the Divine giver of all our blessings. The pious and loving thought that every American was joining in heart with the beloved family at home and with the church to which he belonged, would thrill his soul with the purest feelings of patriotism and the deepest emotions of thankfulness for his religious enjoyments.

Would it not be of great advantage, socially, nationally, religiously, to have the DAY of our American Thanksgiving positively settled? Putting aside the sectional feelings and local incidents that might be urged by any single State or isolated Territory that desired to choose its own time, would it not be more noble, more truly American, to become nationally in unity when we offer to God our tribute of joy and gratitude for the blessings of the year?

Taking this view of the case, would it not be better that the proclamation which appoints Thursday the 26th of November (1863) as the day of Thanksgiving for the people of the United States of America should, in the first instance, emanate from the President of the Republic—to be applied by the Governors of each and every State, in acquiescence with the chief executive adviser?

STANZAS.

BY L. S. D. L.

Og! let me rest in a shaded nook,
With the green boughs arching o'er me,
And losing my sense in some witching book,
Forget the sad life before me,
And the hum of the drowsy droning bee
Shall teach me to idle the hours;
And the perfume that comes o'er the scented lea
Shall be sweeter than jasmine bowers
And the gentle sigh of the low west wind
Shall plead like an earnest lover,
Till the charm of the book is gone from my mind—
As I carelessly fold its cover,
And dream of a voice that is sweeter far
Than the tone of that zephyr lowly—
Ah! I worship "a bright particular star,"
And the beaming is pure and holy.
But alas! for love, and alas! for me,
The disk of my life is clouded;
And 'neath the boughs of the drooping tree,
I know that my grief is shrouded.
And I weep my tears like the falling rain,
And I give all my fruitless sighing
To the low west wind that taught me to plain—
Will it tell Him I'm slowly dying?

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD"—Among the absolute necessities of life we must reckon the pen. There is no interest in our business, no article of service or of ornament in our hands that we might not dispense with more easily than with the pen. In this little helper we hold the power of consolation to the afflicted, and of conversation with the absent; it is the regulator of daily routine, the interpreter of domestic affections, and the souter of individual cares and heart-sorrows. It is the supporter of law, the counsellor of duty, the expounder of the world's doings in its record of daily news; essential to the heart of the lover and the hand of the warrior, to the officer of justice and the teacher of Divine Truth. The pen is an institution. Therefore a good pen is of inestimable importance to all who write.

After nearly two years' experience of their merits we can conscientiously commend the gold pens of Mr. A. Morton, 25 Maiden Lane, New York, as the best and most perfect writing instrument we ever used.

"FAITH."—This new and beautiful engraving of Palmer's celebrated statue has been lately published in Boston, by the well-known firm of J. E. Tilton & Co. We do not know a more charming picture for the family room than this perfect work.

THE WIDOWS OF THE WAR.—We have seen it stated that nineteen thousand widows have (or had some months ago) applied for pensions at the War Office in Washington. What sorrows and sufferings are here recorded! The greater portion of these women are made widows in their youth. God only can know the grief of these life-mourners.

WHITESTOWN SEMINARY.—We have before us the Catalogue of this remarkably flourishing institution, now numbering over four hundred students of both sexes. The success of this plan of education deserves particular notice, which we hope to give before this year closes.

ERRATA.—In the last number, p. 186, second column, third line from the close of the first article, for "Men" read "Me."

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Lost and Won"—"Forsaken"—"Sabbath Morn"—"The Vesper"—and "Sibyl."

These articles are declined, for want of room in some instances, in others for want of finish. Many articles are marred by the haste or carelessness of the writers. As we can only accept a very limited number, those who favor us with their productions should make these perfect as possible: "Linden Hall" (when we need prose the writer will hear from us)—"I want to go Home" (we are sorry to decline this, but it is a memento for the home circle, not for the world)—"A Remembrance"—"Woman"—"My Own"—"A Hard Case"—"The Last and the Best"—"Critics and their Mistakes"—"In the Vapors" (the writer can do better—we are not now "in need")—"Example better than Precept"—"Sonnet"—"The Gathering Storm"—"A Plea"—and "War."

We have other MSS. on hand to be noticed next month. The author of "My Friend," etc., can have manuscript by sending to Mr. Godey, 323 Chestnut Street.

Miss K. E. Story respectfully declined.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

It has been truly said of the Americans that they are a "fast people." They come into the world in a hurry, pass through in a hurry, and die in a hurry.

How shall the tide of death be checked? How shall the stamina and vital resistance of our population be increased? This, we repeat, is to be done by the diffusion of sound hygienic knowledge among the people. And women must be the principal agents in this great health reform. They must correct their own bad habits of living—the work must begin at home; the fountain must be purified before the streams of health can flow out for the healing of the nations. Then may woman go forth as a missionary and preacher of health. Then with the personal charms with which nature has so richly endowed her, and with these charms all glowing in the radiant beauty of blooming health, she will be able to present in herself an argument so conclusive of the benefits of obedience to physiological laws, that her precepts will be irresistible. Then, with the aid of the press, by daily social intercourse, by visiting the poor and the sick, and by united organized systematic effort, the physical and moral regeneration of the world may be accomplished. In this way only may we hope for physical regeneration; and we might add that without this all hopes of a moral millennium are vain and delusive. For while God continues to operate by ordinary natural laws, we cannot with any show of reason expect a moral, without a physiological millennium. These must go hand in hand. A people besotted by sensual indulgences—a people who live in habitual violations of the laws of their being, can never attain to the highest point of Christian perfection. To believe otherwise destroys the unity of design which is the beauty, glory, and perfection of the works of the great Creator. If this doctrine is not true, then the conclusion is, that all are not “parts of one stupendous whole;” and that the grand machinery of the universe would work just as well if one great link were stricken out.

HOW TO MANAGE CHILDREN.

When a child is hurt, never hush it up; it is an inexcusable barbarity; it is fighting against nature; it is repressing her instincts; and for the same reason, if physical punishment is inflicted on a child, never repress its crying; it is a perfect brutality. Cases are on record where children have been thrown into convulsions in their efforts to silence; and very little less hurtful is it to hire them to silence. A thousandfold better is it to soothe by kindly words and acts, and divert the mind by telling stories, or by explaining pictures, or by providing with new toys. We have many a time, in our professional experience as to sick children, found more benefit to be derived from a beautiful or interesting toy, than from a dose of physic. The greatest humanity a mother can exhibit in respect to her sick child is to divert it, DIVERT IT, DIVERT IT, in all the pleasing ways possible, as we ourselves, who are larger children, feel sometimes really sick, when a cheerful-faced and much loved friend has come in, and before we knew it, we had forgotten that anything was the matter with us.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

FROM PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE CASTLE'S HEIR. A Novel in Real Life. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of “Verner's Pride,” “East Lynne,” “The Channings,” etc. Of the many works from this lady's pen, “The Castle's Heir” is one of the best. It is similar in character to “Verner's Pride,” which it equals in interest. The story opens with a catastrophe, and the results of this catastrophe are sufficiently important to engross the reader's attention through two volumes, when everything ends happily.

FROM J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE BOOK OF DAYS. A Miscellany of Popular Antiquities in connection with the Calendar, including Anecdote, Biography and History, Curiosities of Literature and Oddities of Human Life and Character. Part 14 received. Price 20 cents.

CHAMBERS' ENCYCLOPÆDIA. A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People. The best Encyclopædia published. Part 63 received. Price 20 cents.

AT ODDS. By the Baroness Tautphœus, author of “Quits,” “The Initials,” etc. The sale of this work has been immense. Everybody that has read the “Initials,” and who has not, should have a copy of “At Odds.”

LOST AND SAVED. By the Hon. Mrs. Norton, author of “Stuart of Dunleath,” etc. Mrs. Norton has written a brave and excellent book in extenuation of the errors of a certain class of unfortunates, and in condemnation of the treatment which they receive at the hands of society. It is in the shape of a novel, with well devised plot, and original and well-drawn characters. We trust its readers, while they are absorbed in the story, will not entirely overlook its moral.

FROM FREDERICK LEYPOLDT, Philadelphia:—

“WHO BREAKS—PAYS.” By the author of “Cousin Stella,” “Skirmishing,” etc. This is the first volume of a “Foreign Library” which Mr. Leypoldt proposes to issue, and if this be a fair sample of the works of which it will be composed, it promises to be a valuable addition to our literature. “Who Breaks—Pays”—the title quoted from an Italian proverb—is delightfully written. Though a love-story, the struggles for Italian independence in 1848 are incidentally introduced, the author being evidently a warm espouser of republicanism.

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

JOURNAL OF A RESIDENCE ON A GEORGIAN PLANTATION IN 1838, 1839. By Frances Anne Kemble. This book has not been recently written to please popular sentiment; but is a transcript of a journal, in the form of letters, addressed by the author, then Mrs. Butler, to a friend in the north, during her residence on her husband's plantation on the coast of Georgia. Mrs. Butler went to the South possessing all an Englishwoman's hatred of slavery, and her experiences as an eye-witness and as a veritable mistress of a plantation, only served to strengthen her feelings of repugnance to the whole system.

MEMOIR OF THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE LATE HON. THEO. FRELINGHUYSEN, LL. D. By Talbot W. Chalmers, a minister of the Collegiate Church, New York. The life of this eminent politician and Christian gentleman will find many interested readers among members of all parties, as with it is interwoven much of the political history of his time. The title-page is faced by an excellent steel engraving of the subject of the memoir.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the author of “The Morals of May-Fair,” “Creeds,” etc. An English story, the interest of which turns upon Gifford Mohun, a country squire of irreproachable descent, refusing to marry Jane Grand, to whom he is engaged, because there is found to be a stain upon her father's name; and, after years spent in the wildest dissipation, being entrapped by the wiles of the daughter of a deceased gambler.

SCIENCE FOR THE SCHOOL AND FAMILY. Part I. Natural History. By Worthington Hooker, M. D. This book treats of the laws which control the operations of nature, in a style easy of comprehension and entertaining. Its pages are filled with numerous illustrations.

THE ELEMENTS OF ARITHMETIC. Designed for Children. By Elias Loomis, LL. D., Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in Yale College, and author of “A Course of Mathematics,” etc. This book is designed for the training of the very youthful student

In mental arithmetic. It is very thorough in its method, and we cannot doubt that the pupil who masters it will be prepared in a superior manner to undertake the study of arithmetic in its higher branches.

WILSON'S PRIMER MARY SPELLER. By Marcus Wilson. A simple and progressive course of lessons in spelling, with reading and dictation exercises, and the elements of oral and written compositions.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia.—

IN THE TROPICS. By a Settler in Santo Domingo. With an Introductory Notice by Richard B. Kimball, author of "St. Leger," "Undercurrents," &c. This is a rose-tinted picture of life in the West Indies. It details the experience of a New York clerk, who, being tired of city life, sought himself a home in the island of St. Domingo, and, with very little capital as a basis, in the space of a single year, paid for a farm of forty acres, built a small cottage, besides doing many other notable things, all from the products of his own industry aided by modern farming utensils. If we are to believe him, the climate of this portion of the tropics, at least, is the most healthy, vegetation the most generous and luxurious, landed proprietors the most gentlemanly and open-hearted, and the blacks the most faithful and obliging, of any in the world. The author says: "Under the warm sun of the tropics white workmen and machinery will yet open the grandest field of civilization ever realized."

ROCKFORD; or, Sunshine and Storm. By Mrs. Lillie Devereux Umsted, author of "Southwold." Mrs. Umsted has written an attractive story, but not one possessing high literary merit. There are certain specimens of what the worthy "Country Parson" would call "veal" in her style, and much that is intended to be sprightly is really tame. However, the red-haired young lady, with her quartette of lovers, makes a very passable heroine, and will find numerous sympathizers. By the way, let girls with Auburn locks take courage. Red heads seem likely to become the fashion, if authors can make them so; for during the last few weeks we have read of scarcely less than a dozen heroines—every one of them beauties—who possessed this peculiarity.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia.—

A GLIMPSE OF THE WORLD. By the author of "Amy Herbert." This anonymous author has acquired a reputation as an excellent writer of semi-religious novels for the young. The present work is of this character. The story opens with its heroine still in the school-room—an awkward, unlovable girl in appearance, yet at heart full of generous qualities. Girls will be especially pleased and edified with this story.

THE NATURAL LAWS OF HUSBANDRY. By Justus von Liebig. Edited by John Blyth, M. D., Professor of Chemistry in Queen's College, Cork. In this work Baron Liebig gives the public his mature views on agriculture, after sixteen years of experiments and reflection. The fundamental basis of this work is that the food of plants is of inorganic nature, and that every one of the elements of food must be present in a soil for the proper growth of a plant.

THE HOLY WORD IN ITS OWN DEFENCE. Addressed to Bishop Colenso, and all other earnest seekers after truth. By Rev. Abiel Silver, of New York, author of "Lectures on the Symbolic Character of the Sacred Scriptures." The Rev. Mr. Silver attacks Bishop Colenso from the point of view occupied by members of the New Jerusalem Church. His aim is to prove that the scriptures bear evidence within themselves of their divine origin. The "science of correspondences," as promulgated by Swedenborg, is made a strong point in his argument.

A CRITICAL HISTORY OF FREE THOUGHT IN REFERENCE TO THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. By Adam Storey Farrar, M. A. Michel Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. This book comprises eight lectures preached before the University of Oxford in 1862. Their author, before thought was ever given to the writing of these lectures, spent much time in a careful examination of free-thinking—using the term as applied to religion—in its various forms, that he might be the better prepared, in understanding the points from which it is attacked, to defend the Christian faith. He enters deeply and thoroughly into his subject, and leaves no error uncorrected, no sophism unexposed, and no difficulty unexplained.

WHAT TO EAT AND HOW TO COOK IT. By Pierre Blot, late Editor of the "Almanack Gastronomique," of Paris, and other gastronomical works. This book contains over one thousand receipts, systematically and practically arranged. These receipts include the simplest and most inexpensive, as well as the most difficult dishes. It is, therefore, a book suited to the wants of every grade of establishment, and will, as it deserves, have extensive sale.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston:—

TALES AND SKETCHES. By Hugh Miller, author of "The Old Red Sandstone," &c. Edited, with a preface, by Mrs. Miller. This is not only an excellent book but exceedingly interesting. The notices of the Scottish poets Burns and Ferguson are beautiful. The Tales which follow and complete the volume are life-like pictures of manners and characters. The stories of the supernatural are told with a simplicity far more exciting than anything which can be wrought out with ornate sentences and stilted expressions. This work will be a favorite home volume for family reading.

THE STORY OF MY CAREER, as a Student at Freiberg and Jena, and as Professor at Halle, Breslau, and Berlin. By Heinrich Steffens. Translated by William Leonhard Gage. This is a translation from the German, or rather it is the conversations of a prosy German work into piquant, pleasant English. One of the old classics, Addison, we believe, recommended reducing bulky quartos to their quintessence. This rule has been followed most successfully with the book before us. Leaving out the prosings that swell the work to ten large volumes in the original, the editor has given us a very interesting little work in which we are brought into the society of Goethe, Schiller, Fichte, Schelling Müller, and many other German celebrities, among these we must not omit Blucher, under whom Steffens served in the campaigns of 1813 and '14. He tells the story of the battles of Marengo and Austerlitz, and records the flashing transit of Napoleon the 1st through the history of Germany at that period. It is a book to be very popular now in our country.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia.—

WEAK LUNGS, AND HOW TO MAKE THEM STRONG. By Dio Lewis, M. D. A book like this is worth a dozen treatises on medicine. Its prescriptions, which consist in temperance, pure air, and exercise, if faithfully followed, are, without doubt, such as will benefit consumptive invalids, as well as correct a tendency toward consumption and many other diseases. It is a trite proverb that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and if people wish to act upon it, we know of no better way than to procure this book and follow its advice.

OUT-DOOR PAPERS. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. This is a book similar in tone, though different in character, from the one just mentioned by Dr. Lewis. It is a collection of essays which appeared originally in the Atlantic Monthly. Though treating of various subjects, they nearly all bear upon the imperative necessity for air and exercise to develop men and women as they should be, both physically and mentally. The essay entitled "The Murder of the Innocents," is well worth the consideration of every parent and teacher in the land.

From LORING, Boston, through F. LETPOLDT, Philadelphia:—

FAITH GARTNEY'S GIRLHOOD. By the author of "Boys at Chequasset." The author says: "I began this story for young girls. It has grown, as they grow, to womanhood. It is a simple record of something of the thought and life that lies between fourteen and twenty." The thoughts, aspirations, and troubles of girlhood are described with surpassing truthfulness. A religious tone pervades the whole work, which does not prevent the style from being lively, with occasional touches of quaint humor.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

Our September number commences with a plate entitled "A Happy Party," which for elaborateness of engraving, perhaps, has never been surpassed. Independent of the engraving it is a truly beautiful scene. We wish the juveniles of our subscribers many such happy parties. The landscape in this picture is admirably engraved.

Our Fashion-plate—and we cling to this title, "Our Fashion-plate"—is a specimen of gorgeous coloring, never surpassed. If we could only find room for the many letters upon the subject of our fashion-plates, we should be pleased to publish them. Those from dress-makers we particularly appreciate, because they best know, or ought to, what is preferred and what is not, what is fashionable and what is not. We can find room for only one:—

"Living in a town not exactly a city, but almost, I find your Lady's Book a most unerring guide to the prevalent fashions. If I happen to suggest anything that is not in Godey, I am immediately set right. I have taken several other magazines, and I find from results that yours is the only true guide to the prevailing fashions."

"Shaving for a Beard." A humorous engraving, especially addressed to those who wish to indulge in shaving. No reference to the Board of Brokers.

New Styles for Sea-shore, Country, and other Bonnets. We ask especial attention to the great variety we offer in this number.

Brodie again contributes one of his specialties; and Brodie is celebrated the Union over for his cloak and mantilla fashions.

Headresses are also given in this number, entirely novel.

"Husks."—We concluded this admirable story in our last number; and competent critics, and our general readers say—and their opinion is worth a thousand of others—that nothing from the pen of any American author has ever equalled the last portion of "Husks." We think so, too, and without putting our opinion in opposition to others, we still think it is worth something; and we say that "Husks," as an American novel, has never been surpassed, indeed we may say equalled. Numerous have been the requests to copy it, such has been its popularity, but our answer has invariably been that the copyright is the author's, and she should benefit by it. "Husks" in book form would sell well, and we recommend the author to publish it in that form. Next month we will commence a new story by the author of "Husks," Marion Harland, which will run through two numbers, October and November, and in December number we will publish

A CHRISTMAS STORY, BY MARION HARLAND.

YOUNG LADIES SEMINARY FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS.—Mrs. Gertrude J. Cary, Principal, No. 1617 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa. The nineteenth session of this school will commence September 14th, 1863.

The course of study pursued embraces the fundamental and higher branches of a thorough English education. Particular attention is given to the acquisition of the French language, and a resident French Teacher furnishes every facility for making it the medium of daily intercourse. Mrs. Cary gives personal attention to the instruction of her pupils, aided by experienced lady teachers, and the best professional talent in the city. It is her constant endeavor to secure an equal development of body, mind, and heart, and the formation of habits of neatness and industry.

Mrs. S. J. Hale, Rev. H. A. Boardman, D. D., Rev. J. Jenkins, D. D., Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, D. D., Louis A. Godey, Esq., Philadelphia; Rev. J. N. Candee, D. D., Galesburg, Ill.; Louis H. Jenkins, Jacksonville, Ill.; Rev. George Duffield, Jr., Adrian, Mich.

Circulars sent on application.

Our readers have lost a valuable contributor. Mrs. Lucy N. Godfrey, the author of "Aunt Sophie's Visits," died at her residence in Bethlehem, Vt., on the 21st of May last. All who know her unassuming character, and the rich treasures of her soul, will cherish her memory with fond affection. We think we have one or two articles from her pen still unpublished.

The Portland Trumpet wants to know why worn-out editors are not sent abroad by the patrons of their paper for the benefit of their health. Ministers frequently are.

We thank Mr. A. I. Mathews, of New York, manufacturer of Venetian Hair Dye and Arnica Hair Gloss, for the following, in answer to a correspondent:—

NEW YORK, June 20th, 1863.

EDITOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK—SIR: I notice in the July number, "A subscriber wishes to inquire the best mode of making paste for scrap books, to keep them from being so stiff."

If he will use a paste made of glue and sugar, two parts of the former to one of the latter (by weight), dissolved in sufficient water to make it quite thin, he will have the desired article. It should be prepared in a water bath, like an ordinary glue pot, and used warm. White glue is preferable.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

The Musical Monthly.—The sixth and seventh numbers of this new and popular periodical are now ready, containing a variety of delightful music, which, if purchased in the regular way, would cost nearly the price of a whole year's subscription to the Monthly. A new composition by Brinley Richards, Warblings at Dawn, quite as beautiful and effective as his famous Warblings at Eve, is given entire in the seventh number, in addition to the Gilt Edge Polka, and an exquisite new ballad; the price of the whole being but 25 cents to those who subscribe by the year. The sixth number contains an equal amount and variety of the very best piano music.

To those who at the outset doubted our ability to give so much music regularly at the price, we would say that so far from failing in our terms, we intend if possible still further to increase the amount. The Monthly is already established upon a firm basis. No one need hesitate to subscribe in the fear that the work will fail. Those who delay may lose the early numbers, as we shall not print more than are actually needed. That the work will be one of permanent value there can be no question, and the outward beauty of the publication must make it an ornament to any piano or centre-table in the land. Subscriptions are still received at $3 00 per annum, and the back numbers will be sent if desired. Single numbers are 50 cents each, or any three numbers will be sent as samples for $1 00. All communications, subscriptions, etc. must be sent addressed J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

New Sheet Music.—H. M. Higgins, Chicago, one of the most enterprising publishers in the West, has just issued, at 25 cents each, Vesper Bells Polka, a beautiful composition; La Serena Polka, by Anguera; La Consuelo, pretty Valse Espagnole, by the same; Elsinore, Grand waltz by Schirner; Venona Waltz by Lampard; Volunteer Guard's Quickstep, same popular composer; Nightingale and Emma Mazourkas, both by Herman Schirner, and both very pretty. Also, by the same, a brilliant and showy transcription of the Alpine Horn, intended for advanced performers; this is a fine, showy piece, price 35 cents.

The same publisher issues several fine songs and ballads by the favorite song writers, J. P. Webster, Towne of the Continental Vocalists, and others. A Sunbeam and Shadow, 25; Wouldn't You Like to Know? to poetry by Saxe, 25; Scott and the Veteran, 30; and Brother and the Fallen Dragon, 35, are all fine songs by the former. Mr. Towne's new compositions are Old Friends Meet Together, 25; The Plains of Tennessee (On Picket Guard at Stone River), 25; and Under the Ice, a fine quartette, 30. My Valley Home, and Twilight Musings, are two beautiful melodies by Frank Howard, each 30. I've been dreaming of You, Jessie, is a touching ballad by W. S. Pitts, 25 cents. We can commend any of these songs and pieces to our musical friends.

We can, as usual, send any of the above pieces to any address; also the following new pieces: Moss Basket Waltz, a very graceful and pleasing Valse Souvenir, by Sara L. Cassidy, 25. Musings at Twilight, charming nocturne by Fritz Spindler, 30. An Alpine Farewell, nocturne by Riche, 25. March Militaire by Glover 30. And a beautiful new edition, in colored wrappers, of Brinley Richards' celebrated melody, Warblings at Eve, 35.

All orders must be addressed, to Philadelphia, to
J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

A WAG a few years since procured some eye-wash of a quack oculist in this city to be applied to a glass eye which he wore. The oculist, not being very sharp-sighted, discovered there was some defect in the eye, but thought it so trifling that he warranted a cure or no pay. The wag took the wash and departed. In a week or so after, he returned with the empty vial, and apparently in great distress.—“Oh, doctor! doctor!” said he, “your stuff has wholly destroyed my eye!” at the same time opening the lids of the empty socket with his finger, to the horror of the gasping and staring oculist.—“Is it possible? can it be possible?” exclaimed the eye-tinker. “I never knew my medicine to operate so before. Well, my dear sir, I can do nothing less than return you your money.” “But you must do more, sir. What is five dollars to be compared with the loss of an eye?” replied the wag. “If you will give me two hundred dollars, I will sign a pledge never to expose you, but if you do not I will prosecute you forthwith, and you are a ruined man.” The quack forked over a cheque for the amount and the fellow cut stick.

THESE lines are respectfully dedicated to an unknown friend, who has sent me Godey's Lady's Book for the past year. I certainly do appreciate the kindness, and when I peruse its pages, I cannot refrain from feeling a sense of gratitude to that unknown friend, whoever it may be.

Dear nameless friend, to me unknown,
Thy kindness has to me been shown
By sending, on its peaceful way,
This monthly—best of all the day.

I love to turn its laden leaves,
And view its precious golden sheaves,
So full of grains of priceless lore,
To enrich the mind with heavenly store.

Each picture, leaf and word is dear,
Because I see in fancy there
An image of the one who sends
This monthly to a grateful friend.

Kind giver, may the months to come,
Find still this token in the home,
And she who reads will ever pray
For numerous blessings on thy way. ****.

A REMARKABLE instance of the advantage which medical men may derive from chemistry has been published in the reports of the hospital H tel Dieu, at Paris. A young student wrote a thesis in which he showed that gangrene and deficiency of oxygen were to be regarded as cause and effect. Dr. Laugier, surgeon-in-chief of the hospital, having a case of spontaneous gangrene under his care, proceeded to test the theory. The patient, a man of seventy-five years of age, had the disease in one foot, one toe was mortified, and the whole member was in danger. The diseased part was inclosed in an apparatus contrived to disengage oxygen continuously, and in a short time the gangrene was arrested, and the foot recovered its healthy condition. A similar experiment tried upon another patient equally aged, was equally successful, from which the inference follows that treatment with oxygen is an effectual remedy for a disease which too often infests hospitals.

ORIO.

WE had a large party at our house, and mamma made some cakes taken from Receipt Department, and I am delighted to tell you that I heard several ladies say that they were the best cakes they ever tasted. We have been obliged to furnish many of our friends with the receipt.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.—Several very brilliant and animated balls have taken place lately, and a few more are talked of for the close of the month. Several marriages are on the tapis, marking the close of the gay season. Upon the occasion of one of these, which is to take place in a few days, the Hôtel de Castellane was thrown open for an evening reception, of which the signing of the marriage-contract was to make the principal fruits. To give your readers some slight idea how differently most of the important acts of life are carried on in this country from what they are in our own, I am tempted to ask them to follow me for a while into the handsome saloons of this modern nobleman's residence, which some years ago acquired a well-deserved celebrity from the artistic taste which presided over and directed its fetes, still remembered in the higher circles of Parisian society.

The Hôtel Castellane contains on the ground floor a handsome suite of reception rooms, known under the names of the marble saloon, the statue gallery, the tapestry saloon, etc. etc., fitted up as the various names import. All these were thrown open to the numerous but chosen guests, who were on that evening to sign, or witness the signature of the marriage contract between Madlle. de Castellane, the young and charming daughter of the house, and the bearer of an illustrious name, well known in French annals. The trousseau of the bride, provided by the parents of the young lady, the Corbeille de mariage, presented by the bridegroom, and containing, as usual on such occasions, the most magnificent shawls, laces, and jewels, and the various wedding gifts offered by relatives and friends, were all laid out for inspection (and, doubtless, admiration) on tables in the various saloons above spoken of. The care with which the various articles had been classed, so as to accord best, or form a striking contrast with, the locale in which they were placed, showed no small skill of arrangement on the part of the designer. Thus, whilst the various articles of linen, displaying marvels of embroidery, fine stitching, and elaborate workmanship, were exhibited in a plain, large saloon, rather austere fitted up with Gothic furniture and carved woods, the diamonds, pearls, and other jewels heaped on the fair bride, sparkled in the tapestry chamber, amid profusions of laces for flounces, shawls, robes, bridal veils, and a thousand other articles of female wear, the brilliancy of the gems, and light, exquisite texture of the laces, relieving, and at the same time showing off, the rare and precious hangings of the room. Rich shawls, furs, and velvets, the contents of the Corbeille, were laid out in the Statue Gallery, as well as many articles of massive plate, presented to the young couple by wealthy relatives on either side. The richest silks, satins and brocades, in such abundance as to make one wonder when such things could be worn out, were thrown in heaps on the divans, causeuses, and tables of a beautifully fitted up modern drawing-room and coquetishly furnished boudoir adjoining. Amidst these costly adjuncts to a French marriage in high life, where the contracting parties are rich, the friends and acquaintances invited, wandered for a couple of hours, admiring, examining, and commenting on all this luxurious display, and no doubt pronouncing the bride a most enviable being, and the whole affair a most happy one.

Meanwhile in an adjoining room, a massively fitted up library, sat the Notaire (the same identical Notaire, we have all seen some time or other in any French cau- deille and comedy), with the marriage contract, the object of the evening's reunion, before him, passing the pen from one gloved hand to another, sparkling with gems, the one important fact of the evening, though perhaps the least regarded, being the signature to be affixed to this document. As a matter of pride, the family on such occasions invite the highest and most distinguished persons among their circle of acquaintances to perform this act, and many of the best known names in France were collected together in the Hôtel Castellane on the evening in question for this purpose.

Great excitement and curiosity prevail in private circles here on the subject of three representations got up for charitable purposes by Mme. Tascher de la Pagerie, to be given at the hotel of the Countess de Meyendorff. These are to consist of a series of tableaux vivants, the subjects taken from some of the best-known works of great artists. Most of the leading beauties of the day, foreign as well as French, are to take part in these tableaux, which are being got up with the greatest care and minute attention to all the details of the originals. The first of these soirées takes place this evening, and it is said that nearly as many tickets of admission have been already refused as the saloons of the hotel are capable of admitting. The rush for the second soirée may therefore be expected to be tremendous.

The Prince Imperial, now seven years old, is a fine boy, bearing a marked resemblance to his mother about the lower part of his face, of which the upper portion, however, is broad, and cast more in the Napoleonic type. He was dressed in a black suit of knickerbockers of rather a sombre aspect, with a small straw hat edged with blue, and a knot of the same colored ribbon. The Empress, whose toilettes are universally allowed to be unrivalled for good taste and elegance, was draped in a bright blue silk dress, made exceedingly ample and sweeping out at the back into a half train; the only trimming consisted in five rows of white taffetas at the lower part of the skirt, which was also repeated on the basquines of the body, and edged the round cape, or collet, worn loosely over the shoulders, and which was of the same color and material as the robe. A blue bonnet made of crape, and unrelieved by flowers or feathers, completed her costume. But I should not say completed, for it was evident the most novel and important item, not only in the fair wearer's, but in her attendant ladies' eyes, was the natty, zephyr-like parasol, carried in the Empress Eugenie's hand, and which, composed entirely of white marabout feathers, looked as if every puff of wind would blow it away and dissolve it into air.

One day, in a trial for petty larceny before the Tribunal Correctionnel of Paris, a handsome young lady, smartly and stylishly dressed, was called upon to appear as a witness. The presiding Judge asked her for her name, and then put the usual question concerning her profession. "I faint," answered Madame, in her weakest though most silvery tone. The gallant votary of Themis told an officer of the court to bring her a chair, and allowed her sufficient time for recovering. Then, "Be not afraid, Madame," said he: "and please to tell me, before you are sworn, what is your profession." "I faint," again bashfully whispered the pretty witness, in a scarcely audible voice. This time the vice-president sent for a glass of water. The interesting dame sipped it slowly, then, bowing gracefully to the Judge, she looked at him, seemingly waiting for further questions. And again she was required to state her profession. Wondering and thoroughly amazed, she replied, "But, Monsieur le President, I had all ready twice the honor to tell you that my profession is to faint." "To faint!" exclaimed the Bench, with one voice. "Can that ever be a profession?" Madame answered in the affirmative, and explained that she earned a livelihood, and not a respectable one either, by sitting every evening, in a most fashionable dress, in a prominent balcony-stall at the Theatre de la Porte Saint Martin, and appropriately fainting away, out of sheer emotion, at the tragical moment pointed out beforehand by the author of the play. She added that her services were highly valuable, and that the manager had never had to complain of the impressive manner in which she, for one, performed her part.

All the old residents at Saratoga, and not a few of the visitors, know Tom Cammel, a genuine son of Africa, who possesses in a large degree all the peculiarities of his race, including a strong vein of wit and a hearty love of the bottle. On one occasion Tom was hired by a gentleman residing in the environs to take off some dead branches from the trees on his lawn. Tom had been imbibing a little, and went to work accordingly; coolly seating himself on the outermost end of a large limb, and sawing away vigorously at the portion next the trunk. By and by down came limb, Tom, and all, tumbling in company. Some persons near by, on seeing the fall, ran to the aid of the sable functionary. Tom's first remark was—

"Is dar any lawyer 'mong dese gemmen! 'Cos if dar is, dis nigger wants to make his will."

That Tom not only survived, but recovered his bodily and mental powers may be inferred from the following, which took place a few months after his fall. It was on one of those excessively warm days of the past summer that Lawyer B. met Tom in the street. Now everybody has a word for Tom, and the latter is never backward in replying.

"Terribly hot weather this!" said the gentleman. "How do you stand it, Tom?"

"Oh, massa," said Tom, stepping one side, taking off his hat and making a low bow, "don't speak a word 'bout it. I 'se most as brack as a nigger myself, al-ready."

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Publishers of this city, have issued a catalogue of the works they have published. We advise all who want good, and at the same time cheap reading to send for a catalogue.

MATCH MANUFACTURE.—So extensive a branch of industry is match manufacture, that in London alone one saw-mill is pretty nearly always at work in cutting up large timbers into splints, 5,000,000,000 of matches yearly being produced in the metropolis. The cases for the matches imported by one of the merchants weighed 400 tons annually. The greatest seat of match-making is, however, located in Austria. The principal makers were well represented in the late Exhibition; but the scale on which their works are carried on almost defies belief. M. Pollak at Vienna, and M. Furth in Bohemia, employ together about 6,000 persons, producing the amazing number of 44,500,000,000 matches annually. The low price at which they are produced is equally startling. M. Furth sells boxes, each containing eighty matches, at one penny per dozen. M. Harris, of Suhl, sells 1,400 splints for a farthing; and De Major, of Moravia, sells a case of fifty boxes, each containing 100 lucifers, for fourpence.

Looking over "Godey" for March, 1862, and in the "Arm-Chair," I saw a notice, asking some of your subscribers for a receipt for "skeleton flowers or leaves." Though I am not a subscriber, I am partial to your Book, and get it often, therefore I take the liberty of giving you a receipt which I think very good for skeletons.

The leaves or flowers are to be placed in a small quantity of water until they are completely decomposed. (Warm weather is to be preferred.) They are then to be taken out of the water and laid on a marble slab or flat surface. Clean water is then gently poured in a small stream over them, and thus the decayed particles are washed away, leaving behind only a series of woody fibres, or sap vessels, which constitute a beautiful network, particularly in small leaves. This operation being performed, they should be placed in the sun, and when dry, may be fixed with glue on a background of black velvet and placed in a glazed frame or glass case, as taste may direct; a beginner should commence the experiments with the largest leaves, as with them failure is less likely than with more delicate ones.

MRS. ELLIOTT.

A STATISTICIAN has been calculating the chances of widowers getting married as compared with those of bachelors. It appears that according to marriage registrations the chances are three times greater of widowers between the ages of twenty-five and thirty getting married than those of bachelors; five times greater between the ages of thirty and forty-five, and eleven times after the age of sixty. The chances, it would appear, of bachelors getting married, rapidly diminish after the age of thirty.

MUSIC RECEIVED from Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, New York, and O. Ditson & Co., 277 Washington Street, Boston, Massachusetts:—

A collection of songs, quartettes, by J. Dayton, Leader of Band First Conn. Artillery.

Morning Dreams, a collection of popular songs, with brilliant variations for the piano-forte, by Mrs. Parkhurst.

Foster's Melodies, among which are, "When this War is Ended," "There's Plenty of Fish in the Sea."

We find two sentences which may comfort some of the homely women.

"A woman," says one, "can only be beautiful in one style, she may be charming in a thousand."

"A woman," says the other, "may lose her beauty with her youth; her thousand superior charms she may retain to old age."

DEAR SIR: Please ask some of your correspondents for a receipt for cleaning lace veils, and oblige a

HOW TO COLOR THE PHOTOGRAPH.—Messrs. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have just published a little manual on the art of painting the photograph, which is for sale at the bookstores, or will be sent by them, post-paid, for 10 cents.

The same publishers are about publishing a capital story for the boys, by the author of "Father Bright-hopes." It is to be called "The Drummer Boy," and is a true historical account of "The Burnside Expedition." It will be illustrated by F. O. C. Darley, and issued in the Messrs. Tilton's well-known attractive style.

We believe that all ladies take an interest in dress, and to cater for that taste we give the following description that they may see how the ladies on the other side of the water adorn their persons. The occasion was her Majesty's Drawing-Room Reception.

Duchess of Northumberland.—Train of blue Ottoman, lined with white glace, and trimmed with point lace and blue velvet; stomacher of magnificent diamonds; dress of poult de soie, trimmed with velvet and point lace. Headdress, feathers, point lappets, and diamond tiara.

Duchess of Buccleugh.—Train of green gothic moire, lined with white glace, and trimmed with thulle and Brussels lace; skirt of green poult de soie, trimmed with thulle and Brussels lace. Headdress, feathers, lace lappets, and tiara of magnificent diamonds; necklace, etc., of diamonds.

Duchess of Roxburghe.—Train of green satin, lined with white glace, and trimmed with Brussels lace; dress of green and white thulle over glace, trimmed with Arum lilies. Headdress, feathers, and lappets; ornaments, emeralds, and diamonds.

Mitchness of Huntly.—Train of gray poult de soie, lined with white, and trimmed with Brussels lace; dress of gray thulle over glace, trimmed with Brussels lace and white Bengal roses. Headdress, feathers, and lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

Countess Constante Grosvenor.—Train of white satin, trimmed with a trellis-work of blue velvet and bunches of chestnut blossom; dress of white thulle over glace trimmed with blue velvet and blonde. Headdress, feathers, thulle veil, and diamond ornaments.

Countess of Ashburnham.—Train of black poult de soie, trimmed with thulle; dress of black silk, trimmed with thulle and white roses. Headdress, feathers, and thulle veil jet ornaments.

Countess of Bradford.—Train of green gothic moire, lined with white glace, and bordered with point lace and plaiting of green velvet; dress of green crape over glace, trimmed with point lace and velvet bows. Headdress, feathers, and lace lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

Countess of Zetland.—Train of violet poult de soie, trimmed with point lace and violet velvet rosettes; dress of white crystallise, trimmed with point lace and violet velvet. Headdress, feathers and point lace lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

Countess of Gainsborough.—Train of black silk, trimmed with thulle and ribbon; dress of black thulle over silk, trimmed with bows of white terry velvet and black lace. Headdress, feathers, and lappets; ornaments, sapphires, and diamonds.

Countess of Dalkeith.—Train of white and silver moire, lined with blue glace, and trimmed with blue and silver; skirt of blue thulle over glace, trimmed with magnificent Brussels lace. Headdress, feathers, and silver veil; ornaments turquoises, and diamonds.

Countess of Rother.—Train of rich white poult de soie, lined with glace, and trimmed with Brussels lace and bands of satin; skirt of white satin, with flounces of Brussels lace, ornamented with bouquets of cerise rosebuds and jasmine. Headdress, feathers, and Brussels lace lappets; ornaments, diamonds, and pearls.

Countess of Kinnaird.—Train and corsage of richest maize poult de soie glace, lined with glace, and richly trimmed with black Brussels lace and ruches; petticoat of same glace, trimmed with Black Brussels lace, bouillons of thulle illusion, and ruches. Headdress, black lace lappets, feathers, and maize roses, with magnificent roses.

Countess of Brandon.—Costume de cour, composed of a magnificent brocade moire, lined with white glace, and trimmed with bouillons of thulle and lace; white poult de soie petticoat, with handsome lace flounces looped with frans. Headdress, splendid tiara of diamonds, plume, and lappets.

Countess of Yarborough.—Train of white crystallise silk, lined with poult de soie blanc, trimmed with rich Brussels lace and blue velvet leaves; corsage to correspond, ornamented with diamonds; jupe of white glace silk, covered with thulle and a tunic of Bruxelles de dentelle, trimmed with festoons of blue velvet leaves. Parure of diamonds, and ostrich plume.

Countess of Liebfeld.—Train and corsage of black gros d'Afrique, lined with black satin, trimmed with ruches of satin and silver braid; jupe of black satin, covered with volants of thulle, with trimmed tunic en tablier, ornamented with bouquets of epis d'argent and black grass. Tiara of diamonds, ostrich plume and silver veil.

Countess Caudor.—Train of rich black moire antique, lined with black tafetas, trimmed with white glace, covered with black guipure lace; corsage drapée; jupe of black tafetas, covered with volants of black thulle de Lyons; tunic of guipure lace, ornamented with bouquets de satin, and bouquets of white lilac and black velvet leaves. Tiara and necklace of diamonds, ostrich plumes, and lace lappets.

Countess of Tankerville.—Train of superb black crystallise silk, lined with black satin, ornamented with bouffants de thulle attacher par des étoiles de jais; corsage studded with diamonds; jupe of black satin, covered with bouffants de thulle, with tunic relevée par des étoiles de jais. Parure of diamonds, ostrich plume, and thulle veil.

Countess of Durham.—Train and petticoat of primrose glace, ornamented with thulle bouillons and rich Brussels lace, festooned with blue convolvulus and brown grass. Headdress, plumes, lappets, and blue convolvulus; ornaments, diamonds.

Countess of Ely.—Train and bodice of green glace, lined with white glace, and trimmed with thulle; petticoat of green glace, with guipure lace tunic, ornamented with rice flowers. Headdress, feathers, lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

Princess Countess Waldgrave.—A train of the richest white velours royal, lined with pink tafetas, very elegantly trimmed with pink and Brussels lace, bouquet of moss roses and ivy, corsage parfois to correspond, with lace and diamonds; skirts of white and pink tafetas, covered with magnificent Brussels point lace, flounce, and bouquet of moss roses and ivy. Coiffure of ostrich feathers, lace lappets, and diamonds; parure of diamonds and pearls.

Viscountess Palmerston.—Train of violet crystallise, lined with white glace and trimmed with black lace and Brussels, dress of violet crape over glace, trimmed with black and white lace. Headdress, feathers, and lace lappets; ornaments, diamonds.

Viscountess Camberwell.—Dress of white moire, trimmed with borders of gold moire; tunic of gold moire, covered with white thulle, looped all round with white and gold cord and tassels; train of white moire trimmed with bouillons of thulle and gold Indian embroidery, fastened on the shoulders with diamonds. Headdress, feathers, lappets, and diamonds.

THE CREDIT SYSTEM.—A beautiful girl stepped into a shop to buy a pair of mitts.

"How much are they?"

"Why," said the gallant but imprudent clerk, lost in gazing upon her sparkling eyes and ruby lips, "you shall have them for a kiss."

"Agreed," said the young lady, pocketing the mitts, and her eyes speaking daggers; "and as I see you give credit here, charge it on your books, and collect it in the best manner you can!" So saying, she hastily tripped out at the door.

CHESTNUT STREET FEMALE SEMINARY, English and French Boarding and Day School.—The twenty-seventh annual session will open Wednesday, September 9th. Particulars from circulars. Address Miss Bouney, or Miss Dillaye, 1615 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $2 00. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

A LADY that would please herself in marrying, was warned that her intended, although a good sort of man, was very singular. "Well," replied the lady, "if he is very much unlike other men, he is much more likely to make a good husband."

Remark now with what extreme facility the whole coheres into a glass; but the glass is transparent and colorless. Do not fail to observe during this operation the evolution of bubbles from the fused mixture. The bubbles are of carbonic acid, liberated from the carbonate of soda by means of the silica, or silicic acid, which takes its place. Also, do not fail to observe the yellow tinge imparted to the blowpipe flame, in consequence of the presence of soda-salts (borax and carbonate of soda). Our glass is colorless; and remember that only calcigenous metals, as a rule, are able to color glass. At present, we have none of these in our bead.

577. Fuse the bead in its platinum loop, and, when fused, dip it into a few particles of iron rust; then melt all together in the hottest or reducing portion of the blowpipe flame. Remark that no longer have we a colorless but a colored glass; and the color very much resembles that of which the so called black bottles are made. Try now the effect of the external or oxidizing flame, and observe how the former blackish-green tinge verges toward yellow and red, owing to the formation of red or peroxide (rust). Repeat the latter portion of the experiment, with the addition of a very minute bit of nitre to the bead, and remark the increase of redness or peroxidation. Iron is the only metal which behaves in this way; and by these characteristics may it always be known.

578. Strike the loop with a hammer, break the glass, and make in the empty loop a bead of melted borax. The bead is colorless. Dip it when hot into just one small particle of copper (got by filing or scraping a penny, for example). Heat the mixture in the oxidizing or outside cone, and observe the blue tinge. Now heat it in the inner flame, and observe how the blue tends towards red. The change, however, may be more readily effected by adding to the cupreous bead the minutest portion of tin-foil. This appearance is characteristic of copper.

579. Repeat the experiment with some compound of manganese, say black oxide, which is the most common ore of the metal. In the outer flame, a violet tinge results; in the inner flame, the bead becomes colorless, especially if tin, as in the last experiment, be added.

580. Gold, although it yield such an exquisite ruby color to glass, cannot be got, at least practically, to yield the same color in blowpipe operations. The chief blowpipe information derivable for this metal consists in obtaining it on charcoal in a metallic state; a similar remark applies to silver.

581. Take a little red lead (oxide of lead); mix it with borax and powdered charcoal, and a little tallow oil, or spermaceti from the candle; apply the reducing flame, and observe the metallic lead.

582. We shall conclude these few remarks on analysis by the dry or igneous way, by sketching out the process by which an ore of gold, silver, iron, copper, and silica—the usual constituents of gold quartz—may be worked. Premising, however, that hitherto the process of amalgamation has been more generally followed in the obtaining of gold than the process of smelting.

583. Into a Wedgewood mortar—or still better, one of agate, if you have one—put a few grains of silica, i. e., powdered flint, add about three square inches of gold leaf, a spangle of copper and of iron, and about one square inch of silver leaf; rub all well together. Now we may suppose this mixture to be auriferous quartz in powder, and the problem given of removing the silver and gold. How are we to do it? Firstly, the process of amalgamation will answer, and possibly it may be the best. Suppose, however, we have no mercury, nor can obtain any. Suppose the moist plan, for some reason, ineligible—how are we to get out the silver and gold? In the first place, it is evident, we must reduce the compound by fusion to a liquid state: we must use a flux. What shall it be? Why, supposing expense to be no object, we have already proved that carbonate of soda, or still better, a mixture of this with borax, is an admirable flux for silica. Another consideration now arises—the precious metals being in exceedingly small quantity, will, when fused, be difficult to collect; hence, they must be diluted. Lead is an excellent diluent for gold and silver; combining with these metals, when all are fused in contact, no less readily than quicksilver in the cold. Shall we use metallic lead for this purpose? We might, but red lead (oxide of lead) evidently admits of more ready incorporation, and the lead which it yields is pure; we will use red lead, therefore. But to our flux we must now add charcoal to assist in the removal of oxygen from red lead. Therefore, our mixture will be composed of gold, silver, iron, copper, silica, and lead, and charcoal; to which we will add oil or tallow, sufficient to make the whole coherent, and proceed as directed before. The resulting metallic globule, which will be more or less perfect according as you are more or less expert, will contain the whole of the metals, in combination with lead. From the mixture, all, except gold and silver, are separable by cupellation, and gold and silver must be separated by the moist processes already enumerated.

584. In concluding these remarks, we will add that the quantities, and the nature of the fluxes used, are a matter of judgment. As to quantity, the "rule of thumb," as it is vulgarly called, is alone brought into requisition. To use the blowpipe well requires great tact and experience; but the portability, the almost universal applicability, the power of this elegant little instrument, fully recompense the chemist for the time he must expend in order to become an adept at its use.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Address of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co's; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Calvertwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR SEPTEMBER.

BALL PLATE.

Fig. 1.—White crêpe dress, over white silk, with six wadded puffings on the edge of the skirt, separated by thick ruchings of pink silk. Down each breadth of the skirt is a graduated piece of white silk trimmed with pink silk ruchings, sewed on in waves, with sprays of roses caught between the waves. The corsage is plain, with a long point both back and front, and trimmed with roses and pink ruchings. The hair is rolled and heavily braided. The coiffure is of tufts of roses caught on to branches of the wood twined to form the wreath.

Fig. 2.—Pearl-colored silk dress, trimmed with one deep flounce laid in very heavy box plaits, with three rows of black trimming lace passing over them. The corsage is straight round the waist, and finished by a black lace sash fastened at the back by loops and long ends. The corsage is in folds, in the Savigny style, and trimmed with black lace. The coiffure is composed of tufts of ivy, with berries.

Fig. 3.—Plain white glacé silk dress, with corsage pointed both back and front. The bretelles cross at the back, and are finished with long streamers, the same as in front. They are of pink silk, richly embroidered and trimmed with a narrow fluted pink ribbon. The edge of the skirt is cut in shallow waves, and finished with a quilting of pink silk. Linked rings ornament the skirt at the distance of every half yard. The coiffure is of pink velvet and ostrich feathers.

Fig. 4.—White silk dress, with five narrow flounces pinked on the edge. The cloak is of crimson velvet, elegantly embroidered and trimmed with black. The coiffure is of cherries, with their foliage.

Fig. 5.—Light amber-colored satin dress, finished at the edge of the skirt by a narrow black lace flounce, and having cordons of black lace leaves down each breadth. The coiffure and mantle are in one, being the Spanish capuchon. It is trimmed with a black and white lace ruching in the coronet style, and tufts of carnations at the side. The ends can fall in the mantilla style, as represented in our plate, or they can be carried to the back and fall as a black lace sash.

LATEST STYLE OF RIDING-DRESSES.

(See engravings, pages 208, 209.)

WE present our readers with two views of a novel and stylish riding habit. It is made of black cloth, trimmed with a fluted worsted braid and large gilt buttons. The sleeves are close, and made with a gauntlet cuff. The habit is made with revers, and very short in the waist, in order to show the white cashmere vest trimmed with a fluting of the same. A black velvet belt encircles the waist, and is fastened in front by a large gilt buckle. The cravat is of scarlet velvet, worn over a standing linen collar. The hat is of black felt, trimmed with a black feather and a scarlet bow. The hair is caught up in an invisible net, the exact shade of the hair.

LATEST STYLE OF BONNETS.

Fig. 1.—Fancy cuir-colored hat, made of cactus braid. It is trimmed with black velvet and field flowers, and has a very deep fall of black lace over the brim.

Fig. 2.—Fancy hat of white chip, bound with black velvet and trimmed with velvet, plaid ribbon, and a black feather. This hat also has a deep fall of black lace.

Fig. 3.—A lavender silk drawn bonnet, with black lace fall over the curtain. The bonnet is of the Marie Stuart shape, and has a fall of black lace drooping over the front. The trimming, both inside and out, consists of black velvet and Magenta roses.

Fig. 4.—Cuir-colored diamond chip bonnet, with a silk cape of the exact shade. The outside trimming is of cuir-colored flowers, of a darker shade than the bonnet. Inside are pink roses, black velvet, and blonde lace.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

OUR readers must not expect to find in our present Chat any very great novelties, as we are in the dead season of invention. Too late for summer and too early for fall fashions. It is impossible for us to predict with much accuracy what fashions will be adopted or rejected, as the public, and especially the feminine public, is so very capricious.

In our last number we spoke of the Yak lace, as a novelty lately introduced in Paris. The oddity of the name excited our curiosity. As we have been enlightened as to its origin, we share our knowledge with our readers, supposing that they feel as curious on the subject as ourselves.

The lace is made from the heavy fringes of hair taken from the sides of the Yak, or Grunting Ox of Thibet; so called from the peculiar noise it makes, which is said to be like the grunt of a pig. The white bushy tail of the Yak is in great request, we are told, for various purposes, and forms quite an extensive article of commerce. Dyed red it is formed into those curious tufts which decorate the caps of the Chinese, and is used in India as a fly flapper, under the name of Chourie.

We have seen mantles made of this lace in the principal shops of New York and Philadelphia. Though a woollen lace, it resembles Chantilly, and is most beautifully fine. We think these mantles, though quite expensive, promise to be a favorite wrap.

White cashmere shawls and talmas, richly trimmed with guipure lace, and ornamented with leaves, palms, and medallions of lace, are among the richest styles to be found at our French modistes.

Many black silk wraps are ornamented with large metal buttons, but we prefer those trimmed with black buttons and chenille fringe.

Scarlet and blue cloaks continue the rage, and will be fashionable throughout the fall. Some of the prettiest we have seen were from the establishment of Brodie, of Canal Street. The very elegant ones are of a fine scarlet cloth, with hoods lined with a quilted white silk or satin. For children, however, we think fannel quite as pretty and much less expensive.

Another pretty fall wrap is a checked black and white circle, with scarlet lined hood and trimmings of scarlet.

Uniformity of color is one of the principal characteristics of a fashionable toilet at the present day. In Paris, ladies adopt one color for bonnet, mantle, dress, gloves, hoods, and parasol. Frequently, also, the petticoat is of the same color.

As the dress for the street is generally looped up, it is necessary that the jupon should be prettily ornamented. Buff, mauve, gray, and violet are some of the favorite colors, and jean and reps favorite materials, both it is said washing well. With us the black and white striped petticoats, with a brilliant bordering, are very fashionable for travelling and ordinary wear.

Our correspondent tells us that, in Paris, white petticoats are only worn with thin dresses. In this country it is different, for no matter how elegant the material or decorations of a colored skirt, it is not considered suitable for a nice dress. The newest white skirts are braided with a black worsted braid. There is a deep hem round the edge, and above it the braiding design is carried up in pyramidal designs. Another style is to have a narrow ruffle on the edge of the skirt, trimmed and sewed on with a black braid. The ruffle should be fluted, and the effect is very pretty.

Very little fulness is worn round the hips. Crinoline is worn small, and both dress skirts and petticoats should be slightly gored.

A new skirt, christened the "Princess of Wales," is made plain in front like an apron; a founce, which commences at the sides, is full on round the back, and a second founce, quite on the edge, forms a train, and holds out the dress. This is said to be an excellent contrivance and already adopted by the Empress.

A new style for silk dresses is to have the front breadth of a different color. For instance, a white silk crossed with black threads, has a front breadth of sea-green silk, sloped in the tablier style, and edged with flutings of woollen lace and ribbons. Instead of the corsage buttoning up in the usual style, the latest mode is to button it from the right side to the left shoulder. This is novel and pretty.

Princess cloth may be noticed among the new fabrics of the fall season, which will undoubtedly be regarded with favor. The original color is silver gray, a favorite shade with the Princess Alexandra. It is, however, made in all the new and fashionable colors.

A very beautiful dress of this material was made recently by Mme. Demorest, of 473 Broadway, whose distinguished taste we have occasion so often to mention. The color of the material was the very lightest gray. The skirt was made en traine, and trimmed with bands of velvet set on in a wavy border, several inches from the bottom, and extending up in a sort of pyramidal fashion upon each breadth. The velvet bands were one half inch wide, and edged with a narrow guipure lace. A trimming to match extended up the high body, which was deeply pointed in front. At the back was a small basque, formed of three pointed straps of velvet, the centre one being longer than the others; these were held together by buttons, and had a very pretty effect. The sleeves were à la Condé, and trimmed to suit the corsage.

Another rich robe of silver motré, dotted with black, was cut in small scallops all round the bottom of the skirt, and trimmed with a fluting of velvet. A sash, embroidered with jet beads, was tied at the side. The corsage was scalloped down the front, and left sufficiently open to allow the white muslin, or lace chemise, to be visible underneath. Down the front of the skirt, and on the corsage, were graduated fans of the material, tied with a black velvet ribbon in bows and ends.

A novelty brought out by Mme. Demorest is the bonnet protector; a covering made of a new waterproof material. It is very convenient for travelling, as a protector against either dust or rain.

Suits for travelling are still made of elastic or Spanish linen, a new material this season and very serviceable.

Alpaca will be worn throughout the fall, as it is a pretty serviceable material, and susceptible of much ornamentation.

As some of our readers doubtless are economically inclined, we will describe two dresses which have lately come under our notice. One was a violet silk, rather short in the skirt, and being slightly spotted in the front breadth. The skirt was cut off three inches from the edge, and muslin inserted to make it the proper length. Over this was a band of black silk, with the edges cut in turrets, and finished with a black velvet with a white edge. A tablier of black silk half a yard wide at the bottom, gradually sloped up to the waist, and enlarged again to the shoulders. This was also cut in turrets, and edged with the velvet. The sleeves were of the coat form, and trimmed with epaulettes and cuffs.

Another dress was of black silk, with three founces on a very narrow skirt. Pointed pieces of black alpaca were inserted between each breadth. The wide founces were cut into narrow ones, which were fluted, and arranged in pyramids upon the pieces of alpaca. One narrow founce edged the skirt all round, and each founce was headed by a band of cuir-colored braid. Thus two quite stylish dresses were made out of comparatively worthless ones.

Swiss bodies are still worn, but the greatest novelty is the Hussar sash, which describes a point in front, and a sort of basque at the back. It is made of two colors, and the seams are studded with small round silver, steel, or gilt buttons.

Hair cloth is now woven of different widths and colors, intended especially for the facing of dresses.

A new style of net has been introduced. It is made of hair the exact shade of the wearer's. It is netted over a fine mesh, which makes it almost invisible and very durable.

Elaborate coiffures still continue fashionable; the principal styles being short frizzed curls, crêpe bandeaux, and rolls. Many have adopted the Princess Alexandra style of hair dressing. The hair is carried off the temple à l'Impératrice, with two long ringlets behind the ear, which fall on the neck. This is a simple and pretty style. Another arrangement is to erect three rouleaux of hair, one above the other, at each side of the head; to place bows or flowers in the centre, between the rouleaux, and then to arrange bows of hair and ringlets to fall low at the back. Black lace barbes, trimmed with birds or flowers, are very much worn, and when well arranged, form a charming coiffure.

Plaid or Tartan ribbons are coming in fashion, and will be much employed both for the trimming of dresses and bonnets this fall.

The change in fashions is nearly always very gradual, and this month it is not very decided. In another month we shall have fairly entered on the autumn, and we shall be able to announce more positively in what mould of fashion the grande monde will be cast.

GODDEY'S FASHIONS.

THE LESSON ON THE FLAGEOLET.

Autumn Schottische.

COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK,

By GEORGE E. FAWCETT.

PIANO.

First system of piano music, 2/4 time, key of D major. Treble and bass staves. Dynamics: f.

Second system of piano music, 2/4 time, key of D major. Treble and bass staves. Dynamics: p.

Third system of piano music, 2/4 time, key of D major. Treble and bass staves. Dynamics: f and p.

Fourth system of piano music, 2/4 time, key of D major. Treble and bass staves. Dynamics: f.

AUTUMN SCHOTTISCHE.

First system of musical notation for 'Autumn Schottische'. It consists of two staves: a treble clef staff and a bass clef staff. The key signature is one sharp (F#). The music begins with a piano (p) dynamic. The right hand features a melodic line with eighth and sixteenth notes, while the left hand provides a harmonic accompaniment with chords and single notes.

Second system of musical notation. The notation continues from the first system, maintaining the same key signature and piano (p) dynamic. The melodic and harmonic lines are clearly defined.

Third system of musical notation. The piano (p) dynamic is indicated at the start of the system. The right hand has some slurs and accents, and the left hand continues with its accompaniment.

Fourth system of musical notation. The piano (p) dynamic is indicated. This system includes a fermata over a measure in the right hand and a crescendo hairpin in the right hand.

Fifth system of musical notation. The dynamic changes to forte (f). The right hand has a more active melodic line with slurs and accents, and the left hand continues with chords.

Sixth system of musical notation. The dynamic changes back to piano (p). The right hand features a triplet of eighth notes. The system concludes with a double bar line and the instruction 'D.C.' (Da Capo) written twice.

OCTOBER WALKING SUIT.

Dress of dark cuir-colored silk, with a fan trimming of black silk on the edge of the skirt. The wrap is of black gros grains silk, made to fit the figure, and with coat sleeve. It is richly braided with narrow black velvet. The bonnet is of cuir-colored silk, trimmed with black velvet and feathers; the inside trimming is pink roses.

OCTOBER WRAP.

Dress of violet poplin, trimmed with black velvet and crochet trimming. The wrap is of black cloth, caught up in the Spanish style on the left shoulder, with a very elegant crochet ornament. The bonnet is of violet velvet, trimmed with mauve and violet ribbons, and flowers.

THE CORDOVAN.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

We know no more beautiful style, especially for a lady of fine figure, than that depicted above, made, as the subject from which our picture is taken, in velvet of the finest description, and elaborately braided. The same mode is made in cloths, in which it appears to great advantage, and, of course, with much less cost. Fitting so accurately, it displays the tournure most beautifully.

LONGMEAU JACKET.

(Front and Back view.)

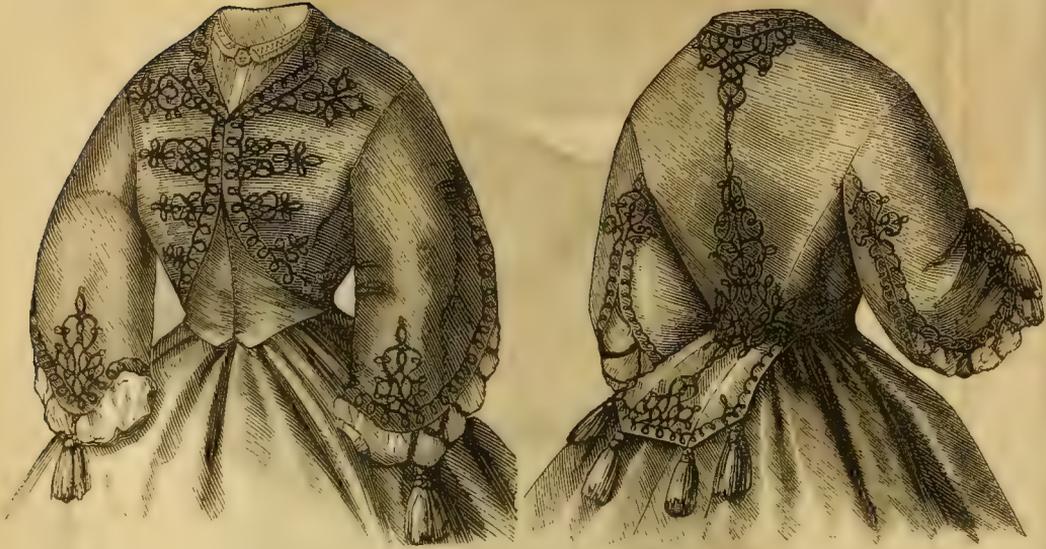

The jacket is made of gros grains black silk, bound and trimmed with cuir-colored braid. The vest is of cuir-color silk, braided with black. The cuts are also of cuir-color, braided with black. The tassels may be either of black or cuir-color, as taste may dictate.

NEW STYLES FOR CORSAGES.

(Front and Back views.)

MOUSQUETAIRE BODY.

This jacket may be of the same material as the skirt, or else of a rich black silk. It can be braided with cord, velvet, or braid. The Zouave sleeves are slashed to the elbow, and kept in place by a lacing of cords. The vest should be of silk, and of a color to contrast well with the jacket.

THE DAGMAR JACKET.

This jacket is made either of lace or muslin, and worn over a Garibaldi waist of some bright colored silk. Our engraving represents a jacket woven in shape, but the same style can be very easily made up, and will be quite as pretty.

FRENCH CORSAGE.

(See Fashion department.)
(Front and Back view.)

LADY'S PURSE.

(See description, Work department.)

FANCY WATCH-CASE.

This case is made of scarlet cloth, with applications of black velvet. It is richly braided and chain-stitched with gold-colored silk, and ornamented with jet and gold beads.

BRAIDING PATTERN.

FANCY APRON, WITH POINTED GIRDLE.

Made of oair-colored silk, richly trimmed with different widths of fluted black velvet and black woollen lace.

GODEY'S Lady's Book and Magazine.

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER, 1863.

LEAH MOORE'S TRIAL.

BY MARION HARLAND.

[Entered, according to act of Congress, in the year 1863, by LOUIS A. GODEY, in the clerk's office of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

In writing the history of the married life of my very dear and lamented friend, Leah Moore, I am moved, I trust, by no revengeful spirit towards the authors of her unhappiness; still less am I actuated by any delusory hope that word or lesson of mine, be it conveyed directly or under the guise of fiction, may succeed in exciting contrition in the bosom of the principal agent in the evil work it is my task to portray. I would do simple justice to one of the noblest hearts that ever loved and suffered wrong through that love—justice denied her by society and her own household, and which I alone, of all living who knew her, can fully set forth. Nor, I may say here, would I ever have lifted my pen to the mournful undertaking had not Rumor, cruel and regardless of the sanctity of the grave itself, been busy with the name and story of her who has passed beyond reach of its attacks. Yet the tale has its moral, and may not be spoken altogether in vain to some thoughtlessly-sinning lover of admiration; some not quite wanton trifler with another's happiness.

It was not thought strange that Leah and I were intimate associates—bosom friends at school, although I was in my seventeenth, when she reached her fourteenth year. Nobody called her a child, even then. She was tall for her age, with a womanly air, equally removed from formality and forwardness; a diligent student, an exemplary pupil in deportment, and, as I can best testify, a deep-hearted friend. The eldest of four children, her mother's confirmed ill health had early cast upon the devoted daughter duties and responsibilities that would have been deemed onerous by many of twice her years, and to this circumstance she probably owed her early maturity of mind and manner. She was considered and described by most people as prompt in judgment and self-reliant in an unusual degree. The few who studied her more thoroughly, and arrived at a just conception of her character—and the number of these was indeed small—discovered, to their surprise, that she possessed neither of these qualities, detected a diffidence with regard to her own opinions, a trembling sensitiveness to the sentiments and tastes of those she esteemed and loved, seemingly at variance with her apparently ready decisions and resolute action. She was strong-minded, without being conceited or wedded to her conclusions; independent, without a tincture of arrogance. It is not the most tender hearts—those whose structure is most exquisite and delicate—that are, in popular parlance, "worn upon the sleeve." The tulip and rose, dahlia and hollyhock flaunt, expand, and glow upon the outer border of the parterre, and invite the look and touch of passers-by. The violet and anemone seek seclusion and shade. To her father, Leah was a companion and co-adviser; to her sister and brothers, a judicious guardian and tender nurse, whose steady, active kindness won for her both respect and affection; but the invalid mother alone fathomed and appreciated the wealth and passionate earnestness of her innermost nature.

A year after I left school for my own home and friends, I received a letter from Leah, imparting the not-unexpected intelligence of this parent's death. The epistle was brief, and in some sort calm. There were no hackneyed phrases of resignation—it would have been unlike her to employ such; no declamatory bursts of grief or professions of inconsolable anguish—only one sentence, over which the hand had faltered—one which, coming from most women, would have meant little more than met the eye—that yet gave me a glimpse into the sorrowful depths of the veiled heart. “I cannot trust myself to attempt to tell even you, Maria, of my unutterable loneliness. Pray for me, that my strength fail not.”

Strength! That was her first, her abiding thought! strength, to be expended for others' good!

I paid her a visit the ensuing winter, and found her serene, busy, outwardly cheerful; the nominal, as she had been so long the virtual, mistress and controller of her father's establishment. In private, and to me, she was the stricken bird, pining ceaselessly for the warmth and shelter of the parent wing. Then passed six years, in which neither of us looked upon the other's face. To her they brought many and various cares; the employments incident upon her position as a housewife and a daughter; the claims of society; the occasional anxieties of sickness among the different members of her family—of all these her letters to me treated; none of them great or startling events, yet all combined sufficing to keep her from the fulfilment of a long-cherished, oft-attempted scheme of visiting me. To myself, the same cycles were crowded with fate; bore in their bosom orphanage, and another bereavement, whose shadow lay deeper and darker than the deaths of father and mother—selfish griefs, with which this narrative has nothing to do.

At last, after an infinite deal of hope deferred and frustrated endeavor, Leah came to me. She was a tall, finely-proportioned woman of two-and-twenty, with noble, thoughtful features; a countenance that kindled into rare and sudden brightness in animated speech, and took, in converse with such as she liked and loved, a winning gentleness, indescribably fascinating, that suited well the softened, sweeter modulations of her voice. She speedily made herself popular in our quiet inland town, and in the dwelling, now inhabited only by my widower brother and myself, the remnant of a numerous and happy household, she was a perpetual solace and delight.

“You have grown younger, instead of older, with the passage of time, Leah—more joyous, rather than graver,” I remarked one night, as we sat over our chamber fire, after our return from a small evening party, given expressly in her honor. “I wished I dared repeat to your ears some of the many compliments to your ‘engaging affability,’ your ‘ready wit,’ and general brilliancy, which were confided to me by rapturous admirers at Mrs. Townes’.”

“Do you intimate that the chrysalis of school days has become a butterfly?” she asked, coloring, yet with a brighter smile.

“Or that the bird of Paradise has unfolded her wings?” returned I, in a like strain. “One would say that you had found the Fountain of Life and Perpetual Youth, and drunk copiously therefrom.”

“I have!”

Her look was too earnest now for smiles, yet her face grew more radiant; her eyes overflowed with gladness. I gazed at her in dumb amazement, too stupid to read at once her meaning.

“Here is the token that I have tasted—drunk abundantly of it!” She raised her hand, upon whose third finger sparkled a diamond, as it were a crystallized drop of spray from the fabled fount. “I have longed to tell you all about it ever since I have been with you. Will you let me do it now?”

She sprang up; extinguished the light, and, sinking upon the cushion at my feet, wound her arms about my waist, and in low, hesitating accents, that soon became full and melodious, revealed the precious secret. I had heard the name and something of the character and standing of her betrothed before she mentioned him, but never from her lips or in connection with herself. Charles Moore was a young lawyer of talent and enterprise, for several years past a resident of her native place. His fine abilities in his profession, his personal attractions and social qualities had been favorably spoken of in my presence by more than one acquaintance of his and my own, and I was thus prepared for her description of the means by which he had won her. I took verbal exception to but a single item of her portraiture.

“He is very unlike me!” she said, laughingly. “But I cannot say that I consider that an imperfection.”

“I do,” rejoined I, bluntly. “What constitutes this dissimilarity, may I ask?”

“You will change your mind when you hear. He is as sanguine of temperament as I am despondent; charitable in judgment where I would be censorious; gentle and forbearing when I would, in like circumstances, be captious and severe with my best friends; frank and enthusiastic, while I am reserved and calcutiating. Ah, Maria! when you see and know him, you will acknowledge what I confess hourly to myself—that he is far too good and noble for poor faulty me; will wonder with me at the strange taste—the only instance of bad taste I ever observed in him by the way—that beguiled him into selecting me as his lifelong companion.”

“Never! were he the immaculate conception of all the virtues and graces you have enumerated!” I asserted, obstinately.

She shook her head, with a confident smile. “Again I say, only wait and see! I am striving to adapt myself to his wishes—to what I know he would like, although he has never suggested, however remotely, a criticism of what I now am—”

“I should think not, indeed!” interrupted I, impatient of this uncalled-for humility, which, I could yet see, was unfeigned. “I should dislike him on the spot, withhold my consent, which, of course, is indispensable to the consummation of the contract, were he to attempt any such remoulding process.”

“There is no danger! He is as blind to my imperfections as another too partial friend, not a hundred miles away; generosity that incites me to renewed watchfulness and endeavor after conformity to the right standard. I am conscious of my deficiencies, although he may be ignorant of them. God knows how constant and fervent is my prayer that I may make him as happy as he deserves to be. If the power is denied me, I shall find death very sweet!”

It was unfair, while it was not perhaps unnatural, that I should from this conversation conceive a faint and secret prejudice against the much-lauded lover, which the encomiums of his fiancée could not remove. My impulses were strong, my conclusions quickly established to my own satisfaction, and, as may be supposed, I often erred in both. Leah was my dearest friend; and, if not absolutely faultless in my eyes, occupied too lofty a stand in my regard, was too far superior to the ordinary run of women, for me to entertain, with tolerance, the thought of this stranger, who, I doubted not, had fifty foibles to her one, suggesting amendments in disposition and manner; remodelling, where he should have rendered only delighted approval. I said nothing of this discontent, however, while she went on with the details of their present plans and painted their hopeful Future. Her sister, Pauline, two years her junior, was to be married at the same time with herself to a gentleman from the far West. The brothers, now almost young men, were in college, and the father was to reside with Leah and her husband.

“It is a sunny picture!” she said, musingly. “Indeed, Maria!”—lifting her face, whose expression of perfect trust and happiness I could discern even in the uncertain fire-light—“my love has been cloudless from its dawn until now. We have had no rough seas, no storms. It is all sunshine.”

Was it for me to cast a shadow of doubt or misgiving upon the heaven of this joyous confidence—this blissful serenity of love which comes to so few souls, unshadowed by sad memories or sadder forebodings? I hoped with and prayed for her.

The marriage took place at the appointed time, and I went, summoned by the bride, to pass the fortnight preceding the ceremony with her. Upon the evening of my arrival I was presented to the bridegroom expectant. Despite my preconceived intention to criticize narrowly, and, if needful, condemn unsparingly, he conquered prejudice and disarmed censure in the course of a single interview. He was a fine-looking fellow, six feet tall, with black hair and eyes; his physiognomy indicative at once of intellect and amiability, and his frank, courteous bearing bespoke him, in heart as in demeanor, the thoroughbred gentleman. But his principal passport to my favor was not in these external advantages, or in the flattering interest he exhibited in myself. It consisted in his silent yet expressive devotion to the object of his heart's choice; his unobtrusive watchfulness of her every motion; the respectful attention lent to her slightest word; his manifest pride in, and admiration of her.

“I like him! fully as much as you can desire!” was my report to Leah when she came to my room after his departure, anxious to gather my impressions of the hero of her drama. “My mind is quite at rest since I have seen you together. He is one in a thousand, for he appreciates you.”

“Overrates, you should say! My great fear is lest he should awake some day.”

Which fear had no place in my visions of their united lives.

I was her first bridesmaid; gave her up to him—not gladly; I was not heroine enough for that—still without an envious murmur at his happiness or a prophetic thought of evil for her. Providence—so said the horoscope cast for her by my loving imagination—had decreed to her a lot rich in life's choicest blessings. So far as mortal could judge, she deserved the gift, and I felt assured would make right use of it.

Our correspondence was continued regularly after her marriage—an instance of friendship's fidelity that would have surprised me in any other of my whilome school-fellows—which was so in keeping with Leah's character and conduct, that it awoke no wonderment. Now and then her letters had, as an appendix, a note from Mr. Moore, often lively, always kind. He seemed to desire me to understand how heartily he indorsed our intimacy, and certainly succeeded, by so doing, in showing me how fully he entered into all that gave his wife pleasure. They had been married but half a year when there came a black-sealed letter, not only superscribed, but written wholly by him, informing me of the death of Leah's father.

I was not wounded that she had not herself communicated with me at her mother's decease, which was, from the very nature of her circumstances at that period, and the peculiar affection existing between parent and child, a heavier stroke than this, understood and admitted the excuse her husband made for her silence, viz., that she was too "much overcome by her grief to undertake even this trifling exertion." There existed no longer the necessity for stern self-control, for resolute calmness and vigorous action that had nerved her upon the former occasion. Sorrowful she might be and doubtless was, but lonely-hearted and self-dependent no more. There is sweetness in the woe that is wept out upon a stronger and a sympathizing heart. It is solitary and unshared anguish that blights and kills. Leah's womanhood grew richer and fuller beneath the cloud. True, I could only trace the change by means of her letters, but these were frequent and long, and with her, the pen was a more ready and eloquent vehicle of thought and feeling than the tongue.

Two more years went swiftly by, and by the mysterious sort of fatality that had already kept us so often asunder, when we earnestly desired and persistently sought the society of one another, we had not met for a single hour. As the third winter of her wedded life approached, she redoubled her solicitations for my company, and making an extraordinary effort, I conquered fate itself, and set out upon the long-contemplated trip. The distance was not formidable, the route direct, and I encountered no difficulties by the way. It was a raw, disagreeable afternoon, threatening an easterly storm, when I found myself near my journey's end, and my musings, insensibly to myself, at first took the line of the sky and atmosphere. I dwelt perversely, and especially upon the idea that Leah's part of our correspondence had not of late been sustained with her accustomed spirit. The intervals of silence had been of greater length, her communications shorter, and, I fancied, less free and candid than of yore. There was no diminution of regard for me implied by these alterations. Of this I was assured in so many words by herself, and I rested implicitly upon her assertion. She had never expressed herself more warmly with respect to this point than in her latest epistle, an answer to mine settling the time of my arrival. Her health would not allow her to go much into society this winter, she wrote; her husband's increasing practice frequently called him away from home for several days together. I could and would do her good by coming; she longed for me, and could not brook further disappointment.

"I had not supposed that any amount of bodily weakness could make her nervous or low-spirited," I said to myself, in ruminating upon these signs of the times. "And if it has, Mr. Moore's temperament better fits him to become a restorative than does mine. It is gratifying to one's vanity to be thus importuned; but I hope Leah does not pine for me while he is at home. He is grievously in fault if she does."

A sombre meditation upon man's waywardness and selfish absorption in worldly cares and business profits was seasonably interrupted by our stopping at the depot, in the busy and thriving town which was the terminus of the railway.

My foot had barely touched the platform when my hands were seized in a fervent grasp; Leah's voice was bidding me a joyous welcome, and Leah's face—the dear, old familiar features and smile—was looking full into mine. Gloom and saddening fancies fled apace at sound and sight of these. Flushed and eager, she drew me out of the noisy crowd towards a pretty, stylish carriage standing near, seated me therein, demanded my checks, and sent them off by the servant before I could utter more than a word of greeting. It was this never-failing presence of mind—this energetic mode of action that gained for her the reputation of coolness and independence. To me it was very delightful, for it was characteristic of her, and her alone. My first connected sentence was one of expostulation.

"You should not have come out this damp evening. I could have found my way to your house without subjecting you to this needless risk."

"As if I would allow that! Charles is not in town; he is off upon one of his stupid court circuits, or he would have robbed me of the pleasure of meeting you. As to risk, that is all nonsense. There is nothing in such weather as this that can harm a well person, and to-day I am in unusually fine spirits and health."

She looked well and bright. I noticed this more particularly when she came to my room to see if I needed any assistance in making my toilet for the evening. I was already dressed, and there was still half an hour to spare before tea-time. She had laid aside her hat and cloak; her eyes were full of happy light; her cheeks almost rosy. I was half angry and quite ashamed of my ridiculous imaginings concerning her unhappiness.

"This," she said, unclosing the door of an apartment that adjoined mine upon one side, and her chamber on the other, "is my 'snuggery'—our family sitting-room. When I have stranger guests, it is my custom to keep this door of communication locked. You will always be welcome in the sanctum. We shall have many long delicious talks together here, morning, noon, and night. I have hoped for them hungrily! This is your chair. It has been ready for you—yawning vacantly to receive you for two months, you naughty girl! Try it!" She forced me gently down into a low lounging-chair beside the cheerful fire, and took another close by for herself. I pronounced the elastic cushions only too luxurious, and thanked her for this proof of kindly affection.

"I need not ask who is the proprietor of that!" I continued, pointing to a larger and taller fauteuil shrouded in gray linen.

"It is Charles' especial resting-place. No one sits in it while he is away, and it is never covered when he is in town. I worked it myself, and would have done the upholstering, if I had known how." She removed the cover and displayed the rich and elaborate embroidery of the seat, arms, and back. "The foot-stool matches it, you perceive."

"And you can find time for fancy-work amid all your serious duties!" I exclaimed. "It must have taken months to complete that."

"It consumed only the spare moments of a few weeks—scraps of leisure that would otherwise have been wasted. I should have felt amply compensated for years of labor by the sight of Charles' surprise and pleasure at the unexpected gift. I have enjoyed few happier moments than those I tasted upon the Christmas evening—a stormy one—when, arrayed in the dressing-gown and slippers that accompanied the chair, he first ensconced himself within its friendly embrace, lighted his cigar, and entered upon a genuine old-fashioned fireside chat. He is eminently domestic in his tastes, appreciates these 'small, sweet courtesies' of home-life, and is so grateful for each and all of them that I would be very unkind were I to omit them. And while we are speaking of him"—as if her tongue were liable to wander to any other theme—"while we are speaking of him, I must not forget to deliver his message to you." She drew a letter from her pocket, handling it very carefully—one would have said tenderly. "I only received this to-day. It is not so long as are mine to him; but its superiority in quality overbalances that shortcoming. He is engaged in an important and tedious suit in L——, and has not a minute that he can call his own. This was dashed off in the court-room. Poor fellow! but he knew how anxious and disappointed I would be if he did not write. He says: 'I shall think of you and Maria on Wednesday night; shall sympathize with my whole heart in your happiness at the reunion with your old and tried friend. Tell her how sincerely I regret my inability to join with you in her reception, and how great will be my pleasure at meeting her at last in our own home. Do not be so well satisfied with her society as to anticipate my arrival on Thursday with distaste.' The rest you would not care to hear." She broke off, laughing and blushing.

"You would not care to read aloud, you mean! He would not have written that last saucy sentence, had he not felt very sure how unnecessary was the caution. You are a happy woman, Leah, in having your husband in love with you so long after the wedding-day!"

Was it another of my absurd fancies, or did a slight spasm of pain shoot across her features—her eye grow momentarily dim? Whatever it was, it was gone in a second.

"You are right! The lines of my life have fallen in pleasant places. My joys are real and abiding—my sorrows, the phantoms of my undisciplined imagination. I shame to own it, Maria, but I am wickedly unreasonable, foolishly exacting at times, even with Charles. I am trying to overcome this unworthy propensity; to bear in mind that every man in his position and with his temperament, has other claimants upon his time and thoughts besides his wife, let her be ever so dear. It is one of my failings that I want to be everything or nothing to him!"

"The wife of a distinguished literary man, who was a most affectionate husband withal, once confessed to me that, during the twenty years of her otherwise happy married life, she had been at some seasons the victim of violent and angry jealousy. Her rival was one not easily gotten rid of, and seductive as obstinate. It was her husband's library," was my response.

"Good! I must tell that to Charles! He has a sort of study—a 'den,' he calls it—in the third story, where even I am not welcome at certain hours. I sometimes fairly detest the tobacco-scented, book-littered place. He always reminds me of Robinson Crusoe and his inner cave, when he withdraws to this retreat. I tell him that he would pull the staircase up after him if he could, as Robinson used to do his ladder, so great is his dread of intruders."

Just then I heard the sound of the piano from the parlors below, a fashionable variation of a popular air, well and boldly played.

"You have company, then?" I said.

Leah looked annoyed, although she tried not to let this appear.

"Only Janetta Dalrymple—a cousin of Mr. Moore's, who is passing the winter here."

"You have not mentioned her in your letters, I think."

She paid no attention to the remark.

"She has been with us nearly three months. Her mother died a year and a half ago, and her father was married again in six months to a young, giddy girl. Janetta's home being thus rendered exceedingly unpleasant, after a great deal of uncomfortable feeling upon both sides, she left it and went to live with her married brother. His wife died last September, and he went abroad almost immediately, committing Janetta to our care until he should return. Brother and sister are the only children of Charles' favorite cousin—a lady who was a second mother to him in his boyhood, and he is naturally desirous to testify his grateful recollection of her kindness by doing all that lies in his power to serve the surviving members of her family. Have you observed that portrait?"

It was an excellent likeness of her father, hung upon the opposite wall over against my chair. I arose to examine it, and, if she desired to prevent further inquiries respecting her husband's relatives, her end was gained. I did not give Miss Dalrymple another remark or thought until we met at the tea-table.

She was shorter than Leah, reaching scarcely to the shoulder of the latter; plump and fair-skinned, neither pretty nor yet plain; an unremarkable-looking girl at first sight, and dressed rather carelessly in deep mourning. She said little while we were at supper, merely replying to the ordinary courtesies of the meal, but it was evidently the taciturnity of indolence or nonchalance, not of diffidence. Indeed the impression left upon my mind by her countenance and demeanor was that of very cool self-satisfaction and self-possession, diametrically opposed to anything like timid or bashful reserve. I conceived the notion then that she could talk well and fluently if she considered it worth her while to make the exertion.

Upon leaving the supper-room, Leah addressed her more politely than cordially. "It is raining so heavily that we shall hardly be interrupted by company this evening. Miss Allison and myself will spend it in the sitting-room up stairs. Will you join us?"

"No, I thank you, Cousin Leah! This wet night is a genuine godsend to me. I shall practise steadily until bed-time. I am ashamed to say that I have not learned nearly all the new music which Cousin Charles kindly gave me to cheer my lonely hours while he should be away. He will think me sadly ungrateful, will scold me roundly, I am afraid."

Leah bit her lip and led the way up stairs. We were hardly seated when the piano broke out into brilliant music. With a movement like a shiver of petulance or disgust, Leah rang the bell.

"Catherine!" she ordered the servant who answered it, "go down and close the parlor doors softly, so as not to disturb Miss Dalrymple. Do it without attracting her attention, if you can."

The girl performed her errand faithfully, for the music, muffled by the closed doors, poured on in a continuous stream, as though the performer had neither stirred nor looked away from her notes.

"Now, we can talk in something like comfort!" Leah ejaculated, drawing her chair nearer to me and the fire.

She had never been more than a tolerable musician, neither her ear nor her touch being very good; but I knew that since her marriage she had striven to cultivate her taste and increase her skill in the accomplishment to please her husband, who was a passionate lover of the art, and devoted to its practice. Ignorant that I was trenching upon a delicate subject, I said:

"Have you paid much attention to music lately? You should be a proficient by this time, having proved yourself to be an exception in this respect, as in the matter of embroidery, to the generality of married ladies. Both occupations are with you a labor of love—both pursued with an object."

"I rarely play now," she rejoined, gravely. "I am not strong enough to attempt very diligent practice. Janetta is a better performer than I, and I have given this part of Charles' entertainment over to her."

If practice makes perfect, Miss Dalrymple might well be the unrivalled mistress of the finger-board. We talked until the small hours were in upon the midnight, and she played all the while, with no more interruption than was necessary in laying down one piece of music and taking up another. I ceased to marvel at Leah's nervousness at the commencement of the performance. If this were the order of exercises to be observed upon every rainy evening, I should certainly put up my petitions for a dry winter.

CHAPTER II.

MR. MOORE was expected home in the evening train, on the day succeeding my arrival, and long before the hour of his coming the house wore a holiday aspect. It was hard to define the precise features of the change that had come over the premises, for all had been neat, and fresh, and tasteful before. Leah was a model housewife, taking great pride and pleasure in all that appertained to this office, and as she passed from room to room, rearranging furniture, polishing a glass here, and adding a flower, or other trifling decoration there, she appeared to scatter light and bloom from her own countenance; sung at her work as blithely as any bird. Dusk found her in the handsomely furnished parlors, illuminated as for a host of visitors. "Charles has a horror of gloomy rooms!" she explained, as she kindled another burner in the chandelier. "He is too cheerful himself to like darkness or an uncertain light."

She had laid off mourning for her father. "Charles never liked to see her wear black; it was too sombre for her complexion." Her dress to-night was one which, she proudly informed me, was his choice and gift, a bronze-colored silk, heavy yet soft in texture, and relieved at throat and wrists by crimson velvet ribbons. The laces of her collar and undersleeves were daintily fine; her headdress, lappets of black lace, "picked out"—to use a technical term—with crimson in the crown-piece, became her admirably. She looked and moved the dignified, comely matron, the happy wife. Again and again her watch was consulted as the important hour drew on—impatience that, it was evident, would grow into uneasiness if the train were delayed five minutes beyond its time. "Hark! I hear wheels!" She raised her finger and listened.

They came nearer and nearer, and, as they stopped in front of the house, she glided swiftly and joyously into the hall. I sat still in the back-parlor, knowing that the meeting would be robbed of half its sweetness by the presence of lookers-on, however friendly. I was, therefore, not too well pleased when Miss Dalrymple's voice made itself heard most loudly in the little bustle of greeting, and surprised at seeing her enter the room with her cousins, equipped in hat, cloak, and furs, and glowing from the cold air of the rainy outer night.

"James was my only accomplice," she was saying, in high glee. "I stole down to the stable while he was getting the carriage ready to go to the depot, and offered myself as inside passenger. I knew that I should be refused permission if I applied to head-quarters. Don't look so serious, Cousin Leah, please! The rain didn't hurt me one bit, and, after all, it is not much more stormy than it was last night, when you drove down yourself to meet Miss Allison. Was I very wicked, Cousin Charles? I did want to see you so badly!"

"Nonsense, child! Who thinks of scolding you?" Mr. Moore had welcomed me with cordial grace, and now turned to the questioner, who had fastened herself upon his arm. "And yet I am not sure that you do not merit a whipping for exposing yourself upon this inclement night. Let me see, are you wet?" touching her cloak. "Indeed, Nettie dear, this is not safe! Your clothing is very damp. Run away and change it. Had you rubbers on?"

Janetta put out a pretty little foot, smiling wilfully. It was covered by a thin-soled gaiter.

"Was there ever such another imprudent creature!" exclaimed her cousin, frowning. "Is there a fire in your room?"

"No; the register heats it sufficiently for a warm-blooded animal like myself."

"Leah, my love, cannot one be kindled there at once? It is dangerous for her feet to remain in this state! Those contemptible little shoes must be soaked, in only crossing the sidewalk. The pavements are flooded. Merely changing her gaiters will not do. Her feet should be well heated besides."

"Janetta had best get on dry stockings and slippers, and go down to the kitchen fire," Leah returned, coldly. "I cannot spare Catherine at present to light another in her chamber."

"There is no need! I had forgotten the sitting-room grate. Be off, you madcap! Put on other foot-gear and hurry down to the fire."

Janetta made him a low courtesy, and danced away, singing:—

"Oh, Willie, we have missed you, Welcome, welcome home!"

"It is pleasant to be at home again!" said Mr. Moore, looking fondly down at his wife. "And how have you been, love? You are looking uncommonly well."

"I am very well, thank you!" was the reply, in a quiet tone. "Will you go up to your room now? Supper will soon be ready."

I saw him encircle her waist with his arm as they passed into the hall together.

He was undoubtedly an affectionate husband, and, so far as I was able to judge, worthy of the love she lavished upon him; yet I was provoked by the farce I had just witnessed. If the "child" and "madcap"—who was by the way twenty-three years of age, Leah had told me—if the "imprudent creature" chose to imperil her health and sacrifice her comfort to the whim of meeting her favorite kinsman ten minutes earlier than she would have done, had she stayed at home like a sensible woman, Leah's practical suggestion was all the notice her folly deserved. For my part, I could have boxed her ears soundly for her officiousness, in the first place in cheating the waiting wife of her right of receiving the earliest greeting, and for her ridiculous trifling afterwards—the sensation she had created, engrossing him so completely that he had not had an opportunity to inquire after Leah's health until the vital subject of the wet shoes was disposed of. Nor did I relish the thought of her intrusion upon the twain in the cozy "snuggery," whither I knew that Leah would repair with her husband so soon as the needful changes were made in his travelling-dress. After a separation of more than a fortnight, it seemed but fair that they should be allowed five minutes undisturbed tête-à-tête.

In these circumstances I was glad that the supper-bell rang promptly at the usual hour. It was not responded to at once, it appeared; for a second and sharper summons soon tingled through the hall. Thinking it possible that I might be the delinquent, and that I was supposed to be in my chamber, instead of awaiting the arrival of the others where they had left me, I repaired to the dining-room. Leah only was there, arranging cups and saucers upon the tea-board before her, with flushed cheeks and brow slightly contracted in pain or impatience.

"I thought that I was the laggard so importunately summoned," said I, as she glanced up nervously.

She forced a smile. "Oh no! take a seat! The others must be in presently. Catherine, you had better go up and tell Mr. Moore that we are waiting. The oysters and steak will be spoiled. Perhaps he did not hear the bell."

Several minutes more passed in uneasy silence, and Miss Janetta's high, gay tones were heard upon the staircase and along the passage. She entered, hanging upon Mr. Moore's arm, after a fashion she particularly affected with him, both hands clasped over her support, and face upturned, as a sunflower turns its disk to the sun.

"Cousin Leah, I am afraid we have sinned unardonably at last. The truth is we were so busy talking that we did not notice the bell. Cousin Charles has been away so long that I had a thousand things to tell him and to hear. And after Catherine called us, he was in the midst of such an interesting story that we really forgot her and supper. Do forgive us this' once, you dear angel of punctuality!"

Leah said nothing, and Mr. Moore looked surprisedly at her grave face. Janetta hung her head as if abashed, and there was an awkward pause, broken at length, awkwardly, too, I doubt not, by a question from myself to the gentleman of the party, concerning his late trip. He took up the thread I threw out with alacrity. He was a rarely agreeable man in conversation, sprightly and sensible, with much ready humor, as well as fine feeling. The talk was kept up with considerable spirit between us two until Miss Dalrymple rallied from her embarrassment, real or feigned, and Leah had fought successfully her fit of displeasure or discontent. Janetta had made a becoming toilet in a marvellously short space of time—one that offered a striking contrast to the dishabille of the previous evening. Her hair waved in a cloud of ringlets, crisp and smooth, despite the unfavorable dampness of the air; and her black silk dress, with its bands of crape, made her skin seem transparently clear and white. She wore short sleeves—a favorite custom with fine pianists, I have remarked—and her arms showed round and fair against her dress. She had a good color, and as she gradually brightened up under the influence of her cousin's lively chat, she looked really very pretty. Her coming out from under the shadow of Leah's disapprobation was adroitly managed; her appealing, deprecatory tone and expression as she ventured, after an interval of cowed silence, to address the mistress of the house; her obvious anxiety to show her every attention that she could contrive, and the shy, child-like questioning glance from time to time at Mr. Moore, as asking his countenance and advice, were wonderful and interesting to behold, even while I had but a glimmering consciousness of their intent.

When we arose from the table, Mr. Moore allowed his cousin and myself to precede him to the parlors, and tarried behind to speak with his wife. Miss Janetta's liveliness vanished rapidly as minute after minute went by without their reappearance. She pretended to peruse the evening papers, skimmed a column in each, threw them down, and walked to the window, drummed a polka with her fingers upon the sash, yawned, sighed, and sauntered back to the centre-table where I sat, sewing.

"I wish Charles would come in! I am dying to hear the rest of the story he began before supper."

"He is with Mrs. Moore, I suppose," I answered.

"Oh! of course! and there is no knowing when they will get through their affectionate confabulation. Why is it that all married people are selfish, I wonder?"

"Perhaps because they have a better right than others to the monopoly of the society of those whom they love best."

I made the observation very innocently, in fact, thoughtlessly, supposing her to be more in jest than in earnest, but chancing to raise my head as I said it, I was startled at the strange change in Miss Dalrymple's countenance. Anger, scorn, inquiry glared upon me for a second from eyes I had not thought capable of such intense expression. It was suppressed before I could quite credit the evidence of my own senses, and saying carelessly: "Perhaps so; but it is in very bad taste, to say the least of it." She tossed her head and went to the piano.

She had played for fifteen or twenty minutes when Leah entered alone. All trace of unpleasant feeling had passed from her sparkling face. In her hand was a small box, or morocco case, which she held towards me, with a proud smile. "Would you like to see my present?"

It consisted of bracelet, brooch, and watch-chain, exquisitely manufactured of dark hair, linked and banded with gold; each article marked "C. H. M. to L. M."

"It is his own hair, I suppose?" I said, admiringly.

"Certainly! and therein lies the charm of the gift. If he were not a very Absalom in the luxuriance of his locks, he would have come home to me a shorn lamb."

"Miss Dalrymple!" I had to call twice, the piano by this time fortissimo. "Excuse me for interrupting you, but do come and look at this beautiful gage d'amour! This is not much like an almost three-year-old husband, is it?"

She could not, in decency, refuse to obey the summons, or I believe she would have done so, but she drew near slowly, and surveyed the jewelry with a curling lip. "They are handsome!" she said, after a momentary examination, giving back to Leah the casket I had laid in her unwilling hand. "I congratulate you upon the valuable acquisition to your jewel-case."

Anything more dryly frigid than her voice and manner, it is impossible to imagine. Her affectation of regarding the intrinsic worth of the ornaments as their only claim to the recipient's notice, was inimitable.

"Is the girl obtuse or malicious, or meanly and preposterously envious?" I speculated, in inward indignation.

Leah smiled contemptuously, and began trying the bracelet upon her arm.

"Was there ever a better fit?" she said, as her husband came in.

"There is nothing miraculous in that! You speak as if I were not expected to know the precise size of your arm by this time. You do not understand the clasp, I see. Let me fasten it."

He shut the spring; raised the hand adorned by his gift to his lips, half in mock gallantry, half in real affection, and while Leah stood smiling and blushing, like a maiden receiving her first love-pledge, he removed the pin she wore from her collar and substituted the new brooch, then detached the gold chain from her watch and hung the hair one in its place.

"Now that you are arrayed to my satisfaction, if not to your own, your ladyship must tell me what you think of a trifle I have in my pocket for Nettie. Nettie, child!"

She had feigned not to see or hear anything of the little love-scene which had just transpired, and now threw him a glance over her shoulder—still seated upon the piano-stool, striking aimless, random chords upon the instrument. He had to go to her, for she did not offer to move. Opening a case, similar in appearance to Leah's, he displayed a set of jet ornaments which I saw, at a glimpse, were far more costly than the hair trinkets.

"Not for me!" she ejaculated, when he put them into her lap.

"Why not for 'me!'" rejoined he, smiling at her incredulous, startled air.

"Because—because—nobody ever thinks of doing such things for me, now-a-days! There was a time—" She burst into tears.

Much moved by her distress, Mr. Moore laid his hand upon her bowed head.

"There, dear! Think of the true friends who are still spared to you! Why, Nettie, I shall esteem myself a cruel bungler if you are so overcome by such a trivial token of my affection."

"You cruel! you, the kindest, best, most generous of men!" catching his hand and pressing it first to her heart then to her lips. "I should be ungrateful, indeed, were I to refuse to acknowledge and value your goodness! Forgive me, Cousin Leah! I know you must despise me for my weakness—that I am a silly baby in your sight, but I was so astonished and so pleased—"

"And so tearful," interposed Mr. Moore, "that you have not given my poor toy a second look."

He took up a bracelet. She extended a plump white arm, and smiled an entreaty through her tears. He responded by clasping the jet circlets—there was a pair of them—upon her wrists, dropping upon one knee to effect this. The pin he would have let her settle herself upon her bosom, but there was some trouble about the catch, and when she had worked away at it for a moment he had to come to the rescue. Lastly, he suspended the earrings from the pink lobes of her small ears, and she ran to the mirror with a show of childish delight that highly amused and pleased the donor.

"What a monkey you are!" he said, tapping her cheek, as she stood gazing up at him, her eyes hardly dry, while her features were wreathed with grateful, loving smiles. "One would think that I had done you some mighty service—saved your life, or something of equal importance."

"I wish I could thank you," she returned, with passionate earnestness. "Only tell me how I may, in some way, prove my gratitude for your constant benefits to a poor, homeless orphan."

"By being a happy girl! That is all; unless it be by showing that you have been an obedient one during my absence. How about that formidable batch of new music? If you have learned it all, I have a further supply for you in my trunk."

"For Miss Janetta Dalrymple—the reward of good conduct and diligent application to her studies!" That was the way my school-prizes used to be labelled," laughed the young lady, going back to the piano.

Mr. Moore made a brief apology to Leah and myself; begged that we would not allow the music to be any bar to our conversation, and followed flute-case in hand.

While the performances went on we sat by the table, busy with our needles, and, contrary to his injunction, were silent, more through disinclination to speech, than any scruples of politeness.

It was no hardship for me to remain a mute listener so far as my individual self was concerned, for Miss Dalrymple played remarkably well, and Mr. Moore was a flutist of no mean ability; still, I could not recollect that I had ever enjoyed an entertainment of this kind less. If this were a specimen of the Moores' usual evenings at home, it was not a matter of surprise that Leah should often be lonely, and sigh for some friend or companion of her own. To the gentle-hearted Griselda, held up for the admiration and imitation of wedded dames, by the model tales and essays of man's and spinsters' composing, it would have been an easy cross—if it deserved to be called a cross at all—this open neglect of herself and marked preference for the society of another upon the evening of the reunion, to which she had looked forward with eager desire for more than two long weeks. But Leah was no Griselda. She was a loving, and because a devoted, an exacting wife. Her husband was the sun of her world, and she demanded equal constancy in him. I did not imagine then, nor do I really believe, now, that he was inconstant, even in thought, to the matchless woman he had freely chosen to be his life's helpmeet; but I did think him strangely, if not selfishly thoughtless, and ridiculously fond of the fussy little piece of cousinship, who was so crazy about him. There is no accounting for tastes, especially a man's tastes, but I could not see how he could do more than barely tolerate the companionship of this girl when he contrasted her with his truly dignified and fascinating partner.

Musing thus, I looked across the table at Leah. Her work had fallen to her knees; her hands were folded above it, and her regards were bent upon the pair at the piano. The gaze of weary wretchedness thrilled and appalled me, so fixed and despairing was it, and to me so unexpected. Strong-minded and clear-judging woman that she was, she must have suffered much, and that not without cause, before yielding to the conviction that, it was plain, now possessed her soul. Never in my life before had I hated any one with the energy that, at that instant, moved my soul against Janetta Dalrymple, and almost as heartily I despised the vanity or undue partiality of him who thus consulted and ministered to her vagaries and sentimental impulses, instead of watching first and always the deeper, more even current of the mighty flood ever flowing towards him, and him alone, from his wife's true, noble heart.

I must have made some involuntary gesture of hand or head, for Leah turned suddenly and caught my eye. She grew deathly pale, and drew her breath in with a gasp of alarm or hysteric emotion, then with a powerful effort, for which I honored and loved her the more, she spoke collectedly.

"I am not well. I am afraid that I have over-exerted myself to-day. I feel, at times, such nausea and faintness, and my head throbs violently. I suppose prudence would dictate that I should go to bed without further delay. What do you think?"

"Unquestionably you ought. It is wrong for you to sit up a minute longer than is absolutely necessary, if such are your feelings!" I replied, decidedly, as I knew she meant I should. "Shall I go up with you?"

"By no means! I had rather you stayed here and made my apology for taking French leave. Good-night!" She leaned over my chair and kissed me—an icy touch, that made me shiver. "Don't disturb them," she whispered, seeing me glance towards the unconscious performers. "I often steal away without their knowing it. I am frequently sick and worn out by evening; but this will not last forever, I hope. For the present, a good night's rest is the best medicine for me."

It was a full half hour before Mr. Moore looked around and missed his wife.

"Where is Leah?" he asked.

"She was seized with sudden faintness some time since, and obliged to retire," I responded, very gravely.

"Is it possible? Why did not she tell me of it?"

"I wished to do so, but she would not allow it."

Before the words were out of my mouth he had vanished, and I heard his fleet, light step go up the stairs, taking two at a bound.

"She wasn't much sick, was she?" queried

Miss Janetta, turning the leaves of her music-folio.

"She looked very ill. She is subject to these attacks in the evening, she says. What do you do for her at such times?"

"I! She never complains in my hearing, except of being tired and sleepy; but I thought that was to be expected"—with a disagreeable smile. "Moreover, she does not fancy my music very much, I imagine, and would be glad of any pretext for interrupting it."

"Would it not be more kind, if that is the case, to deny yourself the gratification of practising so much in her presence?" I was provoked into saying.

The girl's impertinent tone, and total disregard of the comfort and feelings of her hostess, above all, her sneering disrespect, nettled me beyond endurance. She drew herself up with an assumption of offended dignity.

"You lose sight of the fact that I play to please my cousin, and at his express request, Miss Allison. I presume that his wishes, as master of this house and my guardian, are entitled to some consideration."

I had thrown down the gauntlet, and she had not hesitated to pick it up. From that moment I understood that she recognized in me Leah's partisan and, as a consequence, her own enemy, and whatever semblance of civility we might maintain in the presence of others, our swords were always unsheathed to each other's eyes. Less than three minutes had elapsed when Mr. Moore came running down stairs.

"She is sleeping quietly and soundly," he reported. "I hope it was merely fatigue. She will overwork herself! We will try that duett once more, Nettie. I am fearful that you find our music a bore, Miss Allison; but we will not tax your patience much longer. I only want to conquer an obstinate passage in a piece we have been playing. It is one of my idiosyncrasies that if I fail to master any portion of a composition, I am haunted by it incessantly, until I can attack it again."

"Perseverance is the secret of most successes in this world," was the only and very lame truism that arose to my tongue. Presently I ventured to add: "There is no danger that the music may awaken Leah, is there?"

"None whatever! Her room being in the back of the house, the sound of the piano is scarcely audible there. She would not mind it, if she heard it ever so plainly."

I saw Miss Dalrymple hold down her head to conceal a smile. She had the coolest, most intolerable, and unanswerable sneer I ever saw upon woman's face. Heaven forbid that I should ever behold it upon another's!

"Put your foot upon the soft pedal, Nettie," Mr. Moore had the grace to say.

"Certainly, if you wish it; but it will spoil the effect of the finest passages."

She contrived to do this so effectually that the recommendation to subdue the volume of sound was soon revoked.

"My fingers ache!" was her complaint when the duett was finished. "Sit down!" drawing a chair close to her side. "I have something to show you—something which I am too stupid to comprehend. I want the aid of your quicker brain."

It was an obscure passage in a piece which she was a long time in finding. The interim was passed in low and, to me, inaudible dialogue. Mr. Moore had to lean forward to read from the sheet when it was finally produced, and it was perhaps an unconscious action on his part, throwing his arm about her waist as he bent over. Her head drooped sideways until her cheek almost touched his, and her curls mingled with the raven profusion which poor Leah had likened to Absalom's.

"Why 'poor Leah?'" I asked myself, in severe candor. This girl was Mr. Moore's cousin; he regarded her as a sister. She had peculiar claims, by reason of her loneliness and affliction, upon his compassion and affection. There was nothing covert in his fondness—no thought of evil, or it would not be so openly manifested. My notions were perhaps prudish, old maidish, for I was fast growing into an old maid in years—and why not in overstrained notions of propriety also? But these self-chidings and efforts after charitable judgment could not blind my mental and moral perceptions to one fact: Mr. Moore's feelings for and conduct towards his petted cousin gave his wife keen pain; and, if he were aware of this, his present behavior was reprehensible in the highest degree. Leah might be sensitively jealous beyond reason; but she was his wife, fond, faithful, and self-sacrificing; and as such, her whims should have the weight of laws with him.

The knotty musical point required a great deal of discussion, carried on in the same confidential undertone, varied by an occasional coquettish laugh from Miss Dalrymple. Had the talkers both been unmarried, I should have esteemed my position as third person embarrassing and indecorous, and beat an early retreat. As it was, I stood, or rather sat my ground, and read a late periodical. At last, the prolonged conference was ended by Mr. Moore's removing the little hand that had, unintentionally, doubtless, stolen up to a resting-place upon his shoulder, and saying, more loudly than he meant to, "Come, darling! this is selfish in us!"

He quitted her side and came forward to my table, again apologizing for his apparent neglect of me by representing his passionate love of music.

"Leah tells me that I am music-mad, and I think, in my sober moments, that she is right. Then follow resolutions of moderate indulgence in future—a praiseworthy intention, forgotten the next time I see or hear an instrument."

This was probably true. I had seen and heard of the like instances before, and I told him so, without suggesting that there might be weakness in the infatuation. From this we rambled to other topics, Miss Janetta taking little share in the conversation; and at the close of perhaps a quarter of an hour, she remarked, with amiable reluctance, that it must be growing late. We all arose at this; she returning the scattered music to the folios with diligent haste, and Mr. Moore assisting me to gather up the various implements of feminine industry that lay upon the table. Some of these belonged to Leah, and I stopped in the sitting-room, on my way to bed, to leave them there.

The door leading into her chamber was ajar, and as I struck against a chair in the dark, she called, faintly, "Catherine! is that you?"

"It is I, dear Leah! How do you feel now? Have you had a refreshing sleep?" I said, going up to the bed, and laying my hand upon her hot forehead.

"I have not slept at all! My head aches too badly!"

I expressed no surprise. I could understand the reasons that had induced her to feign slumber to her husband. He should not suspect that heartache, and not bodily ailment kept her awake.

"What can I do for you?" asked I.

"Nothing—unless you will be so kind as to bring me the bottle of volatile salts I left in your room this morning. I mistook you for Catherine, and wished to send her for it."

I rejoined that she should have it immediately, and went in quest of the desired article, which I remembered having seen that evening, not where she believed she had left it, but upon the parlor mantel. The stair carpet was thick, my slippers light, and, without a thought of making a stealthy descent, or a suspicion that my coming would be mal apropos, I reached the lower rooms unheard by the cousins—had passed the threshold before I noticed them, or they perceived me.

Mr. Moore stood in the centre of the apartment, his arm closely enfolding Janetta's form: her head lay upon his bosom; her hands were clasped behind his neck, and at the moment of my entrance he stooped to kiss her, with a murmur of inarticulate fondness.

"Oh! the rapture of having you home again! I have been so desolate—so weary-hearted!" burst from her lips.

The "rapture" was arrested by the sight of the intruder. Her exclamation of dismay; her breaking away from his embrace; the crimson tide that deluged her face, were proof sufficient to convict her of unworthy, if not guilty sentiments in maintaining her share of this questionable intimacy. Mr. Moore reddened slightly, but without losing his self-possession.

"Have you lost anything, Miss Allison?" he queried, politely.

I walked straight by him to the mantel.

"Leah asked me to bring her this smelling-bottle."

"Ah! is she awake and sick?"

"She has had a miserable evening." I did not care in what sense he took my curt rejoinder.

"Indeed! please say that I will be up directly—so soon as I can lock up the house," going towards the windows to shut the blinds. "I should have been with her long ago, had I not hoped and believed that she was asleep."

He was in earnest, now, with his preparations for retiring, for the clatter of bolts pursued me on my upward journey, and it was to overcome this noise that Miss Dalrymple raised her voice to an imprudent pitch. I could not avoid hearing the uncomplimentary observation uttered in blended anger and alarm.

"Now there will be mischief! The prying, tattling old maid came back on purpose!" and the beginning of Mr. Moore's reply, spoken in calm decision:—

"I have done nothing wrong—"

Here I passed beyond hearing.

AFTER TEN YEARS OF WEDDED LIFE.

BY JOHN CALVIN GITCHELL.

THIS autumn night is strangely dark
With heavy clouds and sleety rain,
While through the trees, frozen and stark,
The wild winds moan as if in pain.

VOL. LXVII.—26

And in our room the lamp burns low,
While restless shadows glide about;
And on the hearth a feeble glow
Warns that the fire is dying out.

But that may die, for I am warm
With ever-glowing love-lit fire,
And have encircled by my arm
All that my soul, of earth, desires.

Darling Lizette, the ten years past,
Since you became my wedded bride,
Have known but few cold shadows cast
Upon our outward flowing tide.

Before you told in words your love,
And promised only mine to be,
There was no hand that could remove
The veil of gloom that covered me.

My life had seemed one long dark night,
With scarce a single cheering ray,
But you brought in the God-sent light
Which rounded to the full-orbed day.

I heard no more foreboding sounds
From night-birds in dark cypress trees,
But walked in gardens without bounds,
And drank life's wine without the lees.

It was enough: and I was saved
From selfish thoughts of gloomy things—
It was enough that you had waved
Love's wand about me, for life's straits

Gave out the music that you sought,
A seeming echo to your own,
And I found bliss such as, I thought,
No other one had ever known.

How much I thank you it were vain
For me to tell, and call up tears
Upon this night of sleety rain,
That marks to us ten wedded years.

But when this fearful life has fled,
And I have done with "staff and rod,"
I only ask that you may tread
With me the pathway of our God.

"PEACE."

BY J. E. W.

Upon two cold white hands
Rested an aching head,
And I heard two pale lips murmur
"Oh God, that I were dead!"

From two soft dark eyes
I saw two tear-drops fall,
And I heard the night wind whispering
Among the pine trees tall.

* * * * *
I saw two pale hands crossed
Upon a still, cold breast—
And on a pure white brow
A wreath of snowdrops rest.

One heart had stilled its aching,
One soul knew no more pain,
And I knew that my great loss
Was her eternal gain.

THE SISTERS' SCHOOL.

(See Steel Plate.)

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

THERE were a meeting-house, a town hall, and all the other important buildings that made up a New England village in the latter years of the past century in the little town of Greenhaven; but the interest of the village centred very much in a tiny cottage, half hidden by the vines clambering over porch, roof, and windows, which stood back from the main road, and nestled in a little grove of tall trees. Throughout all Greenhaven, and for several miles around the village, the little cottage was well known as the "Sisters' School;" and loving hearts prayed for the orphan girls, whose sad story was "familiar as a household word" round every hearthstone.

Long years before our story opens, the little cottage was the home of Joseph Halcomb and his gentle, blue-eyed sister Patience. He had been an ambitious, daring man; and at the age of seventeen had quitted his quiet country home, his pale, loving sister, and the monotony of life in the colonies to cross the ocean and seek his fortune in the busy whirl of London! Ten years later he returned, with a blooming wife, whose romantic story soon kept the gossips busy. An English heiress, some whispered of noble blood, she had eloped with the handsome American to the bleak climate of Vermont, to find, alas! an early grave in the colonies. The tiny baby she laid with dying hands on the gentle breast of Aunt Patience, was too feeble a tie to bind the father's wandering inclinations. Again he left home, again married; but warned by his sad experience, did not bring his wife to his home. It was twelve long years before he returned there, a second time widowed, bringing to his sister's care another motherless girl of eight years, whose rich brunette complexion, large black eyes, and heavy tresses of jetty hair, told of the Southern blood she inherited from her mother, as truly as her half sister's blue eyes and flaxen curls bespoke her English parentage.

From the hour when Isadore's bounding footstep first crossed the threshold of her quiet home, Aunt Patience led a martyr's life. The sampler which little Mary had perseveringly worked from the big blue A to the variegated Z was to Isadore's volatile fingers an impossible task. She could sing like a mocking-bird, danced like a sylph, chattered French or Spanish with her indulgent father, and won every heart by her lively loving manners; but demure little Mary's domestic habits, her neat sewing, her quiet pretty manners, and sweet, gentle voice found no imitator in this free, wild child. Yet from the hour when their father clasped them together in a tender embrace, the two girls loved each other with a passionate fervor, increased and strengthened by their total dissimilarity of character.

Sheltered in this quiet home, Joseph Halcomb seemed at last content to rest, and Patience was flattering her sisterly heart with this hope when the Revolutionary War broke out, and called the wanderer again from home. Year after year rolled by, and as the children grew from childhood to womanhood, the villagers made them the heroines of Greenhaven. Their beauty, and the name their father was winning in the defence of freedom, made them objects of much love and pride; and when peace was proclaimed, the joy in Greenhaven was subdued by the news of Colonel Halcomb's death. Safely passing through many battles, whose names are now familiar to every schoolboy, he died of fever, far away from his New England home, none the less a martyr that the roll of musketry did not sound his death knell, or the gleaming sword release his life blood.

The blow was too severe for the loving sister's heart that had borne so bravely the dreary years of separation, and Aunt Patience laid down her burden of life just as Mary entered on her twentieth year.

The fair gentle niece who held the dying hand, that had acted a mother's part throughout her young life, was one of those lovely graceful flowers that are found still nestling on the bleak New England shores. Tender, self-devoting, and humble, her soft blue eyes were filled with the earnest light of a pure womanly nature; her sweet mouth seemed made for none but loving words, and even her quiet, neat dress spoke of the refinement and modesty that were inherent in her nature. She was of a small but exquisitely moulded type of beauty, with a pale yet clear complexion, that told in its ever-varying color the susceptible heart that throbbled under the gentle, graceful form and face. In direct contrast to her sister, Isadore had grown to sixteen a tall lithe figure, slender yet graceful in every outline, with a rich dark complexion, large black eyes, that would melt with pathos or flash with excitement as the mood prompted her; glowing cheeks, and a wealth of lustrous black hair that she utterly refused to cover with the cap that custom had made necessary for the village girls. Restless and bright as some tropical bird, her grief for father and aunt far exceeded her sister's in passion and violence; but the color came to her face, the spring to her step, and the light to her eyes, long before Mary's lip smiled, or her voice lost its sad cadence.

From the hour when the villagers followed Aunt Patience to the grave, they seemed animated by one spirit of rivalry to outdo each other in kindness to the orphans. No voice but was loving, no hand but was stretched forth in sympathy, no eye but rested tenderly on these beautiful young faces. There was no property left for them but the little cottage, and taking loving direction of their affairs, the friends decided that the sisters should open a school.

Some ten scholars were immediately entered, and the labor of drilling these young minds was before them. For Mary the task was a congenial one, and her patient care carried little brains through A, B, C; little fingers over seam and sampler, winning love from even the most stubborn rebel of the lot. But Isadore fretted under the bondage. The stated hours wearied her with their monotonous regularity, her own aptitude in study made her impatient of stupidity, and it needed all Mary's gentle persuasions to keep her to the task.

"Another dreary day in this treadmill!" she said, impatiently, tossing aside the blotted copybook of one of her hopeful pupils. "Come, Mollie, put by your sampler, doom all the false stitches to oblivion, and come out with me."

"Where, Dora?"

"Anywhere! I am pining for the air, for freedom and exercise. Heighho! This is a dull life, May, and one may well sigh, as little Jennie did to-day, for 'something to happen.'"

"Something to happen?" said Mary, inquiringly.

"Some excuse for a holiday. She was sick for a ramble, a game of romps, or some excitement; so I promised all sorts of liberty should follow a good lesson to-morrow. She can only study under stimulus. Mollie, I want to sing."

"Oh, Dora!" and Aunt Patience only six weeks dead."

"I know it; but the music chokes me. I must let it out; so I am going to the woods for a serenade with the birds. Don't look so shocked, Mary; there is no sin in it."

"But if anybody hears you?"

"I'll go too far for that. Will you come?"

But Mary had copies to set, samplers to correct, and sums to revise; so Isadore rambled off alone. The long summer afternoon was drawing to a close as she reached the cleared recess in the woods which she delighted to call her own. There she had been accustomed to spend long hours, conning some French, Spanish, or English work taken from her father's stock, or lying idly on the grass, watch with an artist's eye the shifting clouds and waving branches above her head. Reached only by a difficult, and in many places dangerous path from the village, the spot was rarely visited by the villagers, and the more easily travelled road leading to the same nook from the town of Newkirk was too little used to excite any fear of intrusion there.

With all the delight of a child out for a holiday, Isadore threw aside her hat, and drew in deep inspirations as she stood shaded by the trees, yet in the open space some enterprise had cleared and deserted. Her dark homespun dress, and narrow white ruffle, served but to heighten her rich beauty, and as she flung out her arms in the glad graceful action of freedom, her pose was the perfection of statuesque beauty. Music lighted her face, graced her attitude, played in her smile as she began to sing. No words sprang to her lips, but the gush of free, wild melody bore the burden of a Spanish air she had heard her mother sing. Varied by the brilliant execution of a passionate lover of music, carried out on the air by a voice whose wonderful power and freshness stood bravely the open air test, the melody danced from the graceful air to imitations of every bird that sang around her. The round white throat and rich lips seemed inspired with the very spirit of music; and song after song, trill following trill, the mocking-bird's rich notes quavering to the cuckoo's call poured from her voice till, laughing, wild with a sort of delirious excitement, the songstress threw herself on the grass to rest after her free burst of passion.

She was still lying there, her head pillowed on her round white arm, her heaving chest and quivering lip marking her exhaustion, when, looking up, her eyes met another pair looking down at her. The intruder wore a dress strange to her, and a look she had never met before. Blushing deeply, she sat up.

"You will pardon my intrusion," the stranger said, courteously; "but I lost my way here about an hour ago. I was directed from Newkirk, and told the shortest way to Greenhaven was through this wood; but it is a perfect labyrinth to me. Hearing your voice, I ventured back from a fruitless quest after a path to inquire my way."

"The road to Greenhaven is but little used," said Isadore, pointing to a rock that stood at some little distance from them. "You will find it after you climb the rock."

"Then you are from Newkirk."

"No; from Greenhaven."

"But"—and he looked at the formidable mass of stone towering far above his head—"did you climb these?"

"Oh, I'm a country girl, and do not fear a scramble. You are a stranger here?" she added, with a child's frank curiosity.

"From Lincolnshire, England. I am here to seek some relatives of my father. My name is Harrington."

"Harrington! Why, Mollie's mother was named Harrington."

"Perhaps you can direct me," he said, eagerly. "I am seeking Miss Halcomb."

"My name."

"My cousin, then!" he said, holding out his hand to meet hers.

"No, I think not, but Mary's; so it is all the same." And there in the quiet twilight she told her own story and heard his. In all the long years that had elapsed since her father's first marriage, the father of the runaway bride had been unforgiving, and inquired nothing of her fate, but now his death had released the brother, and he had caused the traces to be recovered, and sent his son to bring the child of his sister to her English home.

It was a long tale, as the young man pictured his father's anxiety to see the child of his only sister, and dwelt on the various incidents of his own voyage and delays in finding the village. Night had set in when their long walk brought them to the cottage door, and again the tale was told for Mary. When, at last, the newly-found cousin left them to seek accommodations at the village inn, the sisters wore out the night hours in talk over the story.

"You know, Dora," Mary said, with an earnest tone that was not less resolute because low and deep, "that I will never leave you. What! go away to England! to a home of luxury and love, and know you are wearing out your life in work that is utterly distasteful to you?"

"But, Mollie dear, I should give up the school. I could never manage it alone."

"But how could you live? You do not like sewing; and there is nothing else."

"Nothing!" It was a long deep sigh that echoed the words. All the proud longing of young genius, the half-understood yearning after the higher developments of an almost masculine intellect, the craving for the paths, in these latter days opened so freely for woman's steps, spoke in that sigh. If she could not sew nor teach, she must live upon charity or starve. All her arguments were vain to move Mary from her resolution, and the morning found them both still waking, still talking.

The news that some grand English gentleman had come to claim the child that the village had so cordially adopted spread like wildfire through Greenhaven. The Revolution was too recent, its scenes of blood too new for this news to be grateful, and all day the little school-room was besieged by visitors, imploring Mary not to leave them to go with the Tory.

Black looks followed him as he passed through the village; but peace was proclaimed; he had come on a strictly personal and private errand, and there was no excuse for molesting him. The impression against him lost some of its bitterness when it was found he was to be the guest of the village pastor; but there was no effort made to render his stay either long or pleasant.

Evan Rayberg, the minister of Greenhaven, was a man whose thirty summers set lightly on a tall erect form; a face of manly beauty; a soul and heart full of high and ennobling impulses. Six months only had he filled the place left vacant by his father's death, when Harrington came with letters from the mother country to claim the hospitality of the parsonage. These letters, addressed to his father, made the stranger a sort of trust to the young man, and his earnest efforts were given to supply the place of the lost host to his guest.

"I am in an awkward dilemma, Evan: give me your sage advice," said Edward Harrington, as, after a visit to his cousin, he came into the pastor's study.

Evan looked up with a questioning face, and rolled an arm chair toward his guest.

"You see my directions were to find this cousin, and then write home for some of the older members of the family—my aunt most likely—to come over here to accompany us to England; but an unforeseen and stubborn difficulty arises—the young lady won't go."

A flash of light passed over Evan's face, but only for an instant. "Surely you have used every argument," he said in a low tone.

"All in vain. It is very provoking! That lovely, delicate girl, heiress to a noble name, to wealth and comfort, is lost in this dull village, fretting out her life and beauty over stupid brats of girls, who cannot appreciate her angelic patience and sweetness. I—" and he hesitated a moment, "have half a mind to tell you all my father's plans."

There was no answer, no attempt to force the half unwilling confidence; but Evan's lip grew pale, and his hand trembled as he listened.

"My father wishes me to marry my cousin, that the estate need not be divided, but descend unbroken to his grandchildren. There! the murder's out. I am here on a courting expedition to that dove and beauty, and—" but here his confidence ceased. There was another secret that he kept for his own. After a few moments of silence, he said: "Evan, you are her spiritual director, and all that sort of thing, will you use your influence to persuade her to go to England. Persuade them both. My father will gladly welcome Isadore, and Mary has a right to invite any guest."

"I will try."

"Try!" he whispered, as Edward left the room. "Try to do what? To tear away from my lonely life the one hope that makes it sweet. To send from my loving eyes the face that has been my beacon light for years. Oh, Mary! my love! my life! must it be my voice that sends you away—my counsel that parts us. Yet what have I to offer to balance these promises made you? Only a loving heart, my bird, my darling!"

It was a long, long time before the messenger was calm enough to attempt his errand. From the time when his hand had led the fair-haired child from the church to her own home, when Aunt Patience had let him take her pet for rambles, berrying, or nutting, to the days when his college lore was brought to aid the good old dame in Mary's simple tasks; from her childhood to this winning maidenhood, her face had been his dream and hope. Her soft blue eyes raised with the fervor of religious enthusiasm to him week after week, had made unconsciously the dearest spot for his eyes to rest. He loved her. With all the energy of a strong nature, reserved, studious, and shy, he had poured out his whole heart in his love for his young parishioner.

With a calmness that surprised himself, he placed before her every argument that could influence her. He pleaded her uncle's love for her mother; the shortness, probably, of the old man's life; he urged upon her the family pride, outraged by her present occupation; he even, trying to cover his own agony, hinted at her cousin's love.

"You wish me to go!" she cried, at last. "I have heard no word from any other friends but regret; all, all have urged me to stay, and you whose—"

Over face and throat the crimson blood flushed, as she stopped, and after a moment, in which she vainly tried to recover calmness, she left the room, sobbing violently.

To see her so moved and not comfort her, to keep from pouring forth his whole heart required all Evan's self-control; but he subdued the impulse.

The whole interest of the village seemed clustering round that little cottage, where little faces looked anxiously at "teacher," and little voices interrupted the spelling with interested questions about her stay or departure.

Edward Harrington was a constant visitor. His plan of courting seemed to have matured, for every day found him at the cottage; scarcely had the last footfall sprung over the door-step, the last dinner basket gone down the lane, when his voice rung out its word of greeting, and his handsome face peeped in at the door. The charm of his bright face, and frank, hearty manner, his vast fund of travelled information, his anecdotes, his earnest interest in all their pursuits, made the hours fly; and Mary, though her heart ached over Evan's absence, yet lent her sweet voice, and gentle quiet converse to help the time pass.

To Isadore these evenings were pure enjoyment. All her own childish recollections of foreign lands, the months spent in England, the rapid passage through France and Italy, when she was but a child, the long years in Cuba, all were recalled with a vivid memorizing that surprised herself. Prompted by his more recent recollections, her rich voice filled the cottage with songs in Spanish and French; and often, from one word or phrase, a whole conversation would follow in one of these tongues, while Mary sat thinking and longing. Listening for a footstep that never came, hoping for a voice whose music never reached her now but from the pulpit, wearying for the counsel and sympathy never before denied her, she was growing paler, sadder, frailer, but always patient, never whispering, even to Isadore, her secret and sorrow.

As the weeks followed each other, Edward's anxiety to persuade his cousins to accompany him to England seemed to fade away. No longer did he paint in glowing words the picture of the home that waited her; no word of impatience at his long detention escaped him, and as Evan marked his buoyant step, his bright face, ringing voice, and long, long visits to the cottage, he wrapped his own misery in a deeper reserve, and studied far into the sleepless nights to forget. At last the blow fell.

"Evan!" the cheerful voice jarred on his ear as he sat writing, "I am going home."

"Home!" Evan's heart throbbed as if bursting.

"But before I go, I want you to do me one last favor. Give me the right to place on my forehead, 'Here you may see Benedick, the married man.'"

"Married!" Poor Evan could not command more than one word at a time.

"Yes, she is mine. There is to be no wedding fuss. This evening, in the presence of a few old friends, she will be my wife, and we leave to-morrow for Boston, to sail next week for home. Her sister goes with us. You will perform the ceremony, Evan?"

"Of course."

The calm tone conveyed no hint of the breaking heart. With the quiet of utter hopelessness, the pastor made his few simple preparations, and was ready when Edward came for him in all the finery of a bridegroom.

The long walk was taken in silence, and the little group in the parlor greeted the pastor with quiet respect. There were no festive preparations. The villagers felt the loss of the sisters as a calamity, and the prejudice against English blood helped the sadness. There was a stir near the door, and Edward Harrington stepped forward to take a veiled figure on his arm.

Why did the flash of joy burst over Evan's face? His whole frame dilated, and his voice, in its few preparatory words, rang out with its old musical cadence. Close beside the bride stood another pale lovely girl, in a soft white dress, but unveiled, and the bride clinging shyly to Edward's arm was Isadore, not Mary.

The vessel that bore them over the waves to the English home did not take from Greenhaven the heiress of Harrington's name and honors, but the blue-eyed girl, closing the school and cottage, went to make her home in the parsonage, its loved and honored wife.

POLITENESS, like running water, smooths the most rugged stone.

A DISH OF FOIBLES.

BY MRS. C. B.

MY FAIR READERS, I am no philosopher nor a disciple of Aristotle, but, believe me, a humble cuisinier, who, in an obscure corner of this great kitchen, has concocted a dish, which, if it pass the editorial chair, may be placed on the table and prove nutritious and succulent. I humbly trust it may not be taken off (what a cut for a caterer!) an untasted dish.

A Dish of Foibles! But what are foibles? Are they vices, errors, or follies? It is said that foibles never make their appearance till the fiftieth year, after the impetuosity of youth and the passion of manhood have been fused and cooled, and the man issues from the caldron of experience no longer a pupil, but a master in human nature.

Thus being begot by age and wisdom, why should we say they are depravity? For, though to a bystander Mr. Bronte standing at his back door and shooting off pistols at the air must have looked vicious, yet in reality there was neither vice nor folly in his flashing off wrath with his trigger. What a philosophical foible! And I recommend every family in Christendom to have a back door and a back yard that when black humor comes on, the unfortunate one may retire and shoot his spleen at an Aunt Sally. We reproach a man for a foible. We confound a foible with its step-sisters, and in one breath talk of obstinate prejudices, senseless foibles, and foolish weaknesses. Now I deny that a foible is ever ill-natured, or has one particle of malice or hatred in its being. They are commonly the heritage of the good and honest ones. They play on truth; and I never remember to have seen a foible that was not in some way connected with love and generosity.

Now my grandfather (an old Tory) has a prejudice, while my godmother had a foible. Just note the difference. The old gentleman has an obstinate hatred to anything French, especially a French word; and lately a favorite niece wrote to his honor of her approaching marriage, and in relating family matters, used the word trousseau. The old gentleman grumbled, wiped his glasses, and wondered what Jane's trowsers had to do with Paris and marriage settlements; but a sudden light broke on his mind; and he was just bursting out in an invective against the war and the cotton trade when some one present relieved him of his apprehensions that there was a scarcity of shilling cotton in the market, and informed him that

"dear Jane had used the trousseau in place of the English phrase 'wedding outfit,' which last was not considered elegant or suggestive." But shades of the Trojans! the storm was frightful. Alas for poor Jane! It is feared by the whole family that his will was altered that very night. At all events his manner has so changed to her that she thought it of no earthly use to call her first son Abinidab.

Now this is an ignorant, self-willed prejudice. A writer in a late number of "All The Year Round," in an article "Pet Prejudices," has shown us the faults of his family; and from my grandfather's disposition, it is evident that in character he is closely allied to the same family. Now this was not the spirit of the philanthropic foible of my godmother, who, to the day of her death, believed in the efficacy of "patent medicines."

In the days of her sponsorial duties, as I stood before her to repeat "I believe in God the Father, etc.," I remember along with a bag of sugar-plums was a larger bag at her side containing Morrison's pills. She always carried a dozen boxes about with her in case of any unforeseen accident, or, if she met anybody ailing, or stepped into a poor man's house where there was sickness; so that along with her injunctions to keep closed windows and the patient warm, she could leave some pills. She was always true to pills; but considering that the world was growing older and wiser every year, she was always adopting new makers. Thus she went from Morrison's to Brandreth's, and then to some Indian ones, and so on. As regards sarsaparilla, or anything in a bottle, being a teetotaler, as the Americans say, she avoided them, having no confidence in anything to be drunk. But at length she anchored on Holloway's pills and ointment, and it was a beautiful sight to see the peace and comfort which the reading of his pamphlet afforded her.

Probably if her life had been spared she would still take his pills and sound their praises. But a cruel Providence deprived her both of pills and life. Being up in the country one season, she was more than usual liberal with her pills amongst the country folk. And, alas! one day she fell and broke her leg; inflammation set in; she was out of pills—the last box was gone, and she was bled. She never recovered this clinical blow, but sickened and died, and to the last lamenting the untoward providence.

Here lies I and my three daughters,
Killed of drinking Cheltenham waters.

If we'd stuck to Epsom salts,
We'd not been lying in these ere vaults.

Old Epitaph.

I grant that a foible is a little awkward, and is certainly a grotesque phase in one's character; but still it is an essential part of age, and is as attractive as the rosy cheek of an apple, which never shows itself till it begins to ripen. It is one great charm in the works of Charles Dickens that his characters have foibles, and they are not kept in the green-room, or seen peeking out at the side of the drop, or merely walk across the stage, or play short parts, but they are as visible as the foot-lights, and like them throw a warmth and glow on the stage; they are no stock actors, but stars, and we never fail to call them out to receive our bouquets and plaudits.

I should not acknowledge that man as my friend or neighbor who did not firmly believe in the identity of good old Mr. Pickwick and Aunt Betsy Trotwood. A man can be laughed at without being ridiculed; but biographers forget this, especially if they have a hero for a subject.

What a strange book a collection of foibles would be. We have books of witticisms and jokes. Men of learning and erudition have edited "Jack the Bean Stalk" and "Robin Hood," and latterly much research is going on in old graveyards to rescue quaint inscriptions and half erased epitaphs; and will no antiquarian come forward with his manuscripts and show us that he has "eyed nature's walk?" The compiler of such a work must be both an old and a new school historian; for, while like Macaulay he believes traditionary lore and loves the quaint nooks and quiet recesses of human nature, he must have Buckle's research and perseverance; and if he pursues that gentleman's method by statistics, he will be enabled to lay down the foibles to come; he can calculate the number that will have foibles, and the subjects that will be most popular, and if he strictly keeps to the inductive method, even a Socrates need not sneer.

I might multiply foibles. I might delineate the matrimonial foible of an old lady whose loving disposition manifests itself in making sheets and pillow-cases for her daughter Susan, aged forty, who, she thinks, will soon be led to the hymenial altar, "for did not Benton borrow a book of Susan last week?"

But I forbear, remembering the author who, Mirabeau says, read an article on ennui before the Academy of Science, in Berlin, which put them all asleep.

THE PURSUIT OF WEALTH UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

A LIFE SKETCH.

BY ETTIE ELTON.

CHAPTER VI.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS.

It was midnight at Flintville. The silvery queen looked calmly from her ethereal throne upon the still earth, while the spotless snow sparkled in her bright rays like a world of diamonds.

All eyes were closed to this scene of beauty ; all ears were deaf to the puffing and snorting of that iron steed rushing on with his mighty train of chariots, laden with hundreds of dozing passengers, too intent on haste to spend the night in wooing "tired Nature's sweet restorer." Some seemed groaning in the fierce grasp of Somnus, while others were so weary of the world that even life itself seemed but a dream ; but the long shrill whistle and "Flintville" rung in at the door, aroused some from their half waking slumbers, and one little maid with jet black eyes and hair, a little dishevelled from the night's journey, inquires, "Flintville, did he say? Ah, that is where I am going to stop, and in the night, too. Oh, that is so bad for me, and all alone, too!" she continued, half to herself. By this time she had buttoned her furs, taken satchel in hand, and finding that her veil was all right, and her porte-monnaie safe in her pocket, was just stepping from the platform when a gentleman offered his assistance to her in alighting, whom she discovered in the moonlight, by the word "Baggage" on his glazed cap, to be the agent for Flintville.

"Where will I find a carriage, sir?"

"Not here to-night ; they don't run to the night trains. Where do you want to go?"

"I have a friend in town, but I want to go to a hotel to-night, and find my friend to-morrow."

"Well, it's quite a piece to a hotel," said he of the shining cap, and walked on to the baggage-room, leaving our fair friend in the moonlight alone.

"What's to be done now?" soliloquized she ; "this is a beautiful arrangement ; no carriages, long way to a hotel, oh dear ! well, I can sit in the ladies' department of this institution free of charge. If nothing worse happens, I'll be thankful. Quite an adventure this ; pity some knight or genii shouldn't appear to me!"—

"Wish to go to a hotel, ma'am?" said a gentle voice behind her.

"No, sir!" was the brief reply from the half frightened girl, who, after all, was not so willing to receive aid from some mysterious source, and she stepped hastily into the sitting-room.

"Only a little after one ! I can't stay here till morning. Will you please inform me if you know a Mr. Peabody's family in Flintville?" said she, calling quite loudly to the baggageman, who was busily engaged in shutting doors, extinguishing lamps, etc.

After a few minutes' pause he replied, gruffly, "I know E. Peabody, a merchant. Is it him you want to find?"

"Yes, sir. How far do they live from here?"

"Not very far. Why did you not tell me of that before? I saw his wife's brother around here a few minutes ago ; he would have shown you right there."

"His wife's brother—Harry Blake ! How should I know in the dark? Well, it is too late now ; he's gone. Pity we live in such a suspicious world ! Strange we can't know when our friends are near us. But, sir, if you will be so kind as to conduct me to their house I will pay you for your trouble."

So with a guide, as crusty as the snow beneath her feet, she walked tremblingly on, she knew not whither, but much to her gratification found that her friend's residence was not more than five minutes' walk from the depot.

"Some one is coming up the walk, Erastus. I guess it is Florilla. Light the lamp. There's a ring at the door ; hurry. What ails the matches? There, now, I'll just slip on my wrapper, and you need not get up at all."

"Florilla, is it?"

"Does Mr. Peabody live here?"

"Yes ; who wishes to come in?"

"Your old friend Dell—Dell Dalton ; don't you remember me?"

"Why yes, indeed ; come right in. How you surprised me ! I was not looking for you.

Cold, isn't it? Here, take this easy-chair, and we'll soon have a fire; the coals are still burning."

"I'm not very cold; but, oh dear, we've had such a slow journey, four hours behind time. I would have been here at early evening if the cars had been on time. It's too bad to disturb you so late at night."

"Oh no, not at all; I'm so glad to see you. Why did you not write me that you were coming?"

"I did not decide to come till last Monday, and then I thought it would be a pleasant surprise to come all unexpected and—but dear me, I began to think it was not quite so funny, I've had such a time."

"Any trouble to detain you so late?"

"Oh no, nothing but slippery tracks, waiting for trains, and so on. I really began to think we never should get here; but as everything finite has an end, so had our journey. But the way I sat there roasting between a red hot stove on one side and the fattest old judge you ever saw on the other! If it had not been for the cooling influence of an old maid opposite, I think I should have been boiled. But the old maid was useful, notwithstanding her mullien-stalk appearance. I wish you could have been there to laugh with me. I dared not tell all my funny thoughts to the old judge, lest she should prove to be his sister Patience."

"Very thoughtful you were; improved some, I guess, of late. Strange, isn't it, how many pleasing and annoying circumstances attend us even on a short journey!"

"I've been from north to south, from east to west, to boarding-school, Saratoga, and Niagara, and never had such a mixture of the provoking, pleasing, and amusing dished out to me before; and last of all, that baggage-man, what kind of a compound do you call him?"

"What baggage-man—Mr. Muggins? Have you had an interview with him?"

"I don't know whether his name is 'Muggins' or 'Dubbins,' but it is the only man I've seen in Flintville save one, to be sure, who I was led to guess afterward was your brother Harry. But didn't I jump beautifully when he spoke to me, if it really was him; I wish I could have known it, and thus escaped the protection of that Mr. Vinegar—what do you call him?"

"We expected Harry home to-night from Chicago. He came upon the same train with you, did he?"

"I don't know about that, only some one asked me if I wished to go to a hotel, and it frightened me half to death; and that is all I know about it, except that long after he was out of sight Mr. 'Baggage' said it was your brother."

Thus the friends went on chatting till the clock reminded them of the hour of three, when they parted for a little repose.

"Della Dalton!" said Mr. Peabody; "what sent her here!"

"Why, she has come for a visit, the same that all our friends come for. She's a pleasant girl; I wish I had time to enjoy it. I tell you now, Erastus, I'll manage to bid adieu to that school before long."

"Well, then, try to sleep an hour or two under the castle of hope. Maybe you'll have pleasant dreams."

Aurora, in her garments of rubies and gold, tarried not for the sleepers to finish their sleep, but with all her brilliant train climbed o'er the eastern hills, bathing nature in a sea of light which made her look a thousand times more glorious than the most skilful artist can depict. Strange, indeed, that these indescribably beautiful pictures, thrown out to us from the pallet of the Almighty, can be gazed upon as they are without emotion—strange that myriads of human beings, professed lovers of beauty, should rise from their pillows daily to look upon such scenes, but to complain "They came too soon."

But, as the Peabody family gathered that morning around the breakfast-table, there seemed no difference of opinion among them in regard to the fact that their slumbers were not half ended.

"We are expecting Cousin Florilla Danvers in every train. I really thought you were her last night," remarked Mrs. Peabody. "You are acquainted with her, are you not, Della?"

"Florilla Danvers? Why, yes, indeed; is she coming here, too? I had not seen her for some time before I left home, and she is such a quiet little body she never would hear of anything like gossip by accident."

"It would have been pleasant for you to have travelled in company. I had a letter, more than two weeks ago, saying that she would be here to spend the holidays, and here it is just the day before Christmas, and not a sign of her coming yet."

"I should have enjoyed her company much, but if your visitors should increase in a two-fold ratio till holidays are over, I am afraid you will be taken captive by them. Did Flora know that you were teaching?"

"I think not."

"Janette keeps that matter from her friends pretty well, I assure you," chimed in Mr. Peabody.

"I hope you don't think I am ashamed of it. No, indeed; I had much rather have the name of that than follow the example of Mrs. Slacker, wrap myself in silk morning-gowns, and lounge upon velvet sofas, wondering 'why respectable people will suffer their daughters to teach music' and the like of that, until my husband is obliged to suspend payment. I never could realize, Dell, that honorable employment is less respectable in woman than in man."

"Nor I either, Mrs. Peabody; but I am wondering how in the world you can get along with housekeeping and teaching, besides entertaining company by the wholesale, and only one servant."

"I tell you, Dell, every woman can render herself four times as useful and not a whit the less happy than custom generally allows, if she only has the disposition."

"Well, I was just thinking of Harvey Jones' wife. You knew Harvey was married, did you not?"

"No, indeed; who did he marry?"

"Nobody you or I ever heard of. She came from down east somewhere. Harvey saw her, fell in love at first sight, and in a few weeks they were married. She claims to have been educated in wealth and indolence; her parents are both dead, her father having become bankrupt just before his death; but the query of it is, she has not one relic of ancient grandeur; her wardrobe is almost shabby, and not an ounce of table silver, or any of those choice things, which always descend from mother to daughter, has she got, notwithstanding only two members of the once wealthy family are left. Now, you know Harvey is not wealthy. It is true he has a lucrative trade, but it takes something more than a man's earnings to support servants and purchase costly clothing and furniture. Mother thinks they'll fall through before long."

"That's really a pity for Harvey; I always thought him a fine fellow."

"So did every one; and he was doing so well before he was married. All his friends are sorry for him; but I was thinking what ambition can do, and what a frail bark woman is without it. Now, Mrs. Jones is a sweet little woman, as the saying is, but she is so totally destitute of ambition that it really seems hard for her to do for herself what devolves upon every animate object."

"There's Florilla, I declare!" exclaimed Mr. Peabody, peeping out of the window just in time to see a lady alight from the 'bus; and all sprang from the table and hastened to welcome an additional guest.

Even Mrs. Peabody seemed delighted to see her, apparently forgetting at the time that so many duties were crowding upon her.

The pointers upon the dial plate already indexed the hour of eight, and scarcely had the sounds of salutation died away when in came the little Della, dancing and spitting her little fat hands, exclaiming: "Mamma, Uncle William's come! Uncle William's come!"

Another excitement, another rush to the door, to discover that, sure enough, there were horses covered with jingling bells, and a sleigh laden with the precious burden of Uncle William's family. These were always welcome visitors, and as the cheery "Good morning" and "How do you do" mingled in the sweet cadence of friendship, the future seemed lost in the abundance of present enjoyment.

We will now introduce to our readers the Rev. William Brightman and family, relatives of the Peabodys, whose home is not more than half a score of miles from Flintville. You will discover in the person of this clergyman quite a different specimen of the ecclesiastical order from that of Mr. Crabbe. With a heart overflowing with cheerfulness, friendship, love, and every other good thing, he would have given you such a hearty shake of the hand before I could have finished this long presentation that you would have remembered it as long as you lived; and he would have declared that he was glad to see you, without reference to your name or denomination.

In the enthusiasm of this morning's surprise party Mrs. Peabody began to fear that, for once, she should be late at school; and as she saw the sands of time falling more and more rapidly, she felt that she was trying to be more useful to the world than she at that moment desired to be, and it was with almost heroic courage that she summoned resolution to take leave of her guests. Halting at the kitchen door, she gave orders for dinner, telling Sally to be a good girl, and cook it nicely.

"I'll try to be just as good as I kin, that's so"—and Sally quickened her pace, echoing to the closing door—

"Mother taught me how to sew, Father bought the needle."

CHAPTER VII.

THE ESCAPE.

"TAKE this seat," said Miss Danvers, assuming the character of hostess at the dinner-table, at the same time directing Mrs. Peabody to the right of the one she was used to occupy. "I take the liberty of presiding to-day; you look too tired to pour coffee for a table of twelve."

"Taking great liberties, Miss Flora," playfully suggested Miss Dalton; "and now I'll just tell our true hostess, not you, indeed, what has been done here to-day. Now, to proceed to the narrative. Miss Florilla Danvers has been guilty of great improprieties in the family of the Peabodys. At nine A. M. she observed the exit of the lady of the house, after which she proceeded to the kitchen with great impunity, and after some exertion on her part, and much more on the part of Sally, the maid, succeeded in preparing the dinner before us, and is now serving it up with great applause."

A shout of laughter prevented the eloquent Dell from giving a further recital of events, and Mr. Brightman suggested that Miss Dell Dalton be requested to deliver an oration at Dunham's Hall this evening, in connection with the grand exhibition of the High School taught in said hall. But, like a good singer, the strong-minded Dell of course declined, and the conversation turned upon the prospective exhibition, which, while a subject of mirth to the many, fell with crushing power upon the anticipations of Mrs. Peabody.

"This is too short for me, and too tight," said Jennie, just issuing from her chamber, holding in her hand a crumpled dress of white muslin which had been packed away since the last summer.

The excitement of the coming evening, and the important part she was to act in the snowy robed group, called the "Sister Band," had quite stolen away her appetite; and after hastily disposing of a dish of soup, begged excusing from the table to examine her wardrobe for the necessary toilet.

A cloud of anxiety passed over the mirth-lighted face of the mother, as she mentally strove to devise a plan to do half a day's work in just no time at all. Mrs. Bolingbroke, her engaged seamstress, was out of town for a week's visit. She could think of no one else who would or could do the pretty job. If she had been Mrs. Cooper, she would have sunk down in despair, but that wouldn't do for her.

"Where there's a will there's a way" had always been her motto, and should it fail her now?

Dinner was soon over, and Jennie was dispatched to the shop of the village milliner; but she declared she could not be troubled with such little jobs—there was no profit in them. Jane Smith and Anna M'Ulver were both engaged; so she must give up finding the help she so much needed.

A few hours of deep anxiety have passed, during which time a thousand unexpected cares have presented themselves for attention. The last rays of the setting sun have passed from off the tall church spire, and though nature is serenely calm and beautiful, yet in many homes in Flintville all is excitement, hurrying to and fro, gay young misses striving to put on their prettiest in the least possible time; country lasses, "working for their board," hastening the tea-things by, while all the little boys and girls manage to fill up all the spare time and room with curious questions and their almost ubiquitous presence.

Just at this hour Mrs. Peabody was hastening home when she was accosted by Nellie Gray, with the interrogative assertion: "Then we can't speak the Sister Band to-night, because Jennie says she has no dress to wear?"

This came like an arrow to the heart of Mrs. Peabody, and she replied, abstractedly: "I'll see that Jennie's dress is ready."

But how was she to see to that at that time of day, within one hour of the time appointed for the grand exhibition, and then Mr. Birch had not attended to the hanging of the curtains, and she had been detained an hour with that job, and finally left it for the boys to finish. Perhaps it would not be done right, and then she would have to do it over; she must hasten back again as fast as possible. By this time she had entered her own home, so deeply absorbed in thought that she scarce could realize where she was, or what she was doing.

Presently a little fairy form, clad in a robe of snowy whiteness, so neatly fitting and so beautiful, with her sash of delicate blue falling from her waist, and her rich brown hair so smoothly plaited, and flowing over her shoulders, that our heroine might have fancied that some kindly spirit had by magic transformed her child, her darling Jennie, into an angel. Could she really believe her eyes? How, and by whom was this accomplished?

"Cousin Flora did it all, mamma! You didn't miss me at recess; I ran home so fast for her to measure me"—and a merry little shout rose from half a dozen voices.

"I beg leave to state that Miss Flora didn't do it all," playfully contested Miss Dalton. "If you'll believe it, Charley Blake, the mischievous elf, has been here half the afternoon, helping her to pull out the basting threads, hold scissors, etc. etc. Mrs. Peabody, it will never do for you to suffer Miss Florilla Danvers to play lady of the house any longer. Something serious will come out of it, I fear."

"It is a fearful and momentous question left for the wise and judicious Mrs. Peabody to decide upon," exclaimed Mr. Charles Blake, who was half hidden in the folds of a heavy window curtain by which he had been sitting. "And, lest the verdict be not rendered in favor of my client, the defendant, I will take my departure, and spare myself and her the mortification of witnessing the decision." So saying, he bade the ladies "good-night," and departed, not forgetting, however, to call at seven to escort them to the general place of resort for that evening.

An hour passed by. Brilliant lights shone from the windows of the Dunham Hall. The centum of pupils were already there, seated on either side the rostrum, with as much ambition, mingled with glowing expectation, throbbing in their young hearts as ever pulsated in the bosoms of Grecian students, when assembled in their national Athenæum. Long rows of seats were left vacant for spectators. Little thoughtless boys and girls, whose eyes had never yet been charmed by laurel wreaths, were playing "hide and seek" among their shadows.

Presently Mr. Thaddeus Graves called the attention of the audience by a tinkling of the teacher's bell, and said:—

"Fellow Students: It becomes us this evening to conduct ourselves with the most unwavering propriety. We shall be subject to the criticism of a large crowd of spectators, with no teacher to govern or direct us but the gentle whisperings and subduing influences of our preceptress. Without any feeling of treason in my heart, I am fearless to say that Mr. Birch has no heart in this matter. We have prepared our own declamations, and subjected them to a lady for criticism. We have compiled our own compositions, and submitted them to the same person for examination. And this evening, all unaided and undirected by the Principal of this school, we have prepared this room for the occasion; and now, for our own sakes, and for the sake of her, whose untiring efforts for our interest have buoyed up our sinking spirits, let us act the part of men and women."

Shouts of applause arose from the little audience, a quietus had fallen upon the "hide and seekers," and all seemed to feel their individual responsibility to preserve order. Just then a lady came up the aisle with a hasty step, and all rose to greet her. She had taken off her hood, and was holding it by one string, and the full blaze of light shining full in her face revealed traces of anxiety which we cannot easily describe.

"Where's Mr. Birch," said she, earnestly.

Cries of "We don't know," "He hasn't been here since school," and "I don't believe he'll come at all," mingled in a confused reply.

The audience now began to assemble. The seats were soon filled. Sleigh loads with jingling bells and merry voices, and shouts of laughter came from the neighboring villages until every vacant spot was filled with persons, sitting or standing, eagerly awaiting the opening of the exercises. Last of all Mr. Birch made his appearance, coming slowly and disinterestedly through the crowd, pausing now and then in his way, to talk with this one and that. Weary with waiting, Mrs. Peabody approached him and said that it was already half an hour past the appointed time, and that it was very important that the exercises should commence immediately.

As usual he vacantly assented to her proposals, and ascending the rostrum called out in a cracked voice to the audience for order, announcing at the same time that the pupils of the school would proceed to entertain them for a short time with some original essays and declamations.

The call to order was unavailing, and Mr. Birch considered the case hopeless. A stampede of boys from the neighboring schools, unable to procure seats in the crowd, were entertaining themselves with rattling their boots in every variety of style, producing a very unharmonious confusion.

"What shall we do?" said Mr. Birch, despairingly.

"I will obtain some one here to make announcements, etc., and you, if you please, go down to the other end of the room and try to preserve decorum there."

"I will assist you if you wish me to," said Mr. Thaddeus Graves.

"With much pleasure I accept your offer," said Mrs. Peabody, rejoiced to make so good an exchange.

His call to order was effectual, and the evening passed off delightfully, all the exercises being performed to the entire satisfaction of the audience. Mothers went home astonished at the rare buddings of genius which they had for the first time discovered in their gay, thoughtless daughters; and fathers declared that there were materials in that school for future statesmen. They "always knew their boys were smart," but they never thought they were such orators. Old Mr. Pincham said that Fred. should make a lawyer; and Father Straightface thought that Sammy would make a good minister, "if he should happen to have a call."

"Them little girls did look purty in their white frocks and blue ribbons," said Mrs. Hodge. "I 'most wish I had o' let Anne been in that piece, but the truth is I don't 'prove o' wimmin's speakin' in public; but then they looked so kind o' angel like when they spoke o' faith, and hope, and love, and all them. I 'most wish I'd o' let Anne jined that piece."

"It wouldn't 'a' been a bit o' hurt in my opinion," said old Mrs. Jarvis. "I never seen any kind of a speakin' school 'twas so good as that, and I've been to a good many on 'em tew, in my day."

"Well, Jannette, you've done it up right this time," said Mr. Brightman. "I enjoyed that entertainment—there was something original about it, and all the students were so earnest in their attention, and so correct in their deportment. But what did you do with that wooden machine I saw around there at the commencement of the evening, in the person of Mr. Birch?"

"Sent him down to the lower end of the room, where he wanted to be, and where we all wanted he should be," said Mrs. Peabody, irritated with herself that she should ever have had any business connection with him; "and now I've done with that school. I've seen it safe through one term, and now I'll leave Mr. Birch to guide his own ship."

"But what will you do for money these hard times?" retorted Mr. Peabody.

"I'll try to collect what is due to me and go without the rest."

"My wife is a very ambitious woman. No description will do justice to her aspirings after 'the wherewith' to fit up our mansion elegantly last fall. But for the last three months I've not heard a word about new furniture."

"The wise grow wiser from experience," said Mr. Brightman: "but I have learned that with whatsoever I have therewith to be content."

"And I have learned that my pursuit after wealth has been attended with too many difficulties for profit, and that woman is fulfilling about all her mission when she attends well to her domestic duties and makes home happy. If she would do more, let her efforts be put forth for the relief of the suffering, and let the wealth she would acquire be gained upon the principle of the old maxim, that 'a penny saved is worth two earned.'"

These grave conclusions were all cut short by the arrival of the young ladies, accompanied by Mr. Charles Blake, all in high glee in reference to a miniature which had escaped its hiding-place about the person of Miss Dalton, and fallen into the hands of Charley, he declaring that he would never give it to her until she told him the name of that beautiful face. Dell poutingly declared that it was her cousin; but Charley persisted in wanting to know the name of the favored cousin, which she as positively declined giving. At last he delivered the treasure into the hands of Flora, commanding her not to let it slip till she had received the desired information.

During this confab Mrs. Peabody had taken from her pocket a couple of letters which had been there, still sealed, since the reception of the evening mail, this being the first leisure moment she had had to peruse them.

"Come, Charley, away with your nonsense, and listen to the news. Here's a letter from brother John; he is to be married to-morrow morning and take the first train for Flintville. Frank Lucas and his wife are to accompany them. Finely prepared we are to entertain a bridal party! And that wife of his I've never seen; likely enough she's some execrating little miss, who will turn with disgust from the customs of western life."

"He's a smart boy," said Charley; "never even told the name of the favored one, and here only yesterday I had a letter from him, and he never hinted such a thing. I believe he is playing a joke."

"No, he isn't; there's truth in this letter, and I am almost vexed with him for taking me so by surprise."

"Never mind," said the girls, "you shall at least have the assistance of two very accomplished maids, and we'll have a good time out of it too."

"Now I'll read this second epistle; no doubt it is the announcement of some other distingué. As I live it is," said she, after a moment's silence. "It is from Mrs. Ray, she that used to be Addie Snow, the most intimate friend of my girlhood. I've not seen her for the past six years, and this letter inquires of me if I am to be 'at home' on New Year's day, and goes on to say that she 'designs calling on me upon that day if agreeable.'

"And that's the very day before your school commences again," said Della. "I really do pity you, Mrs. Peabody."

"Well, then, if you do, you must help me to make my escape from my engagement there, by taking my place the next term. I've been waiting for a favorable opportunity for making you the offer, and now you have it."

"Oh, I can't do that; I'm not competent; besides, what would mother say?"

"We'll write to her at once and find out; and as to your competency, what is that diploma good for if you are not competent to teach a Flintville school? So you will agree to it, providing your mother and Mr. Birch raise no objections?"

"I'll think about it. If I could only succeed as well as you can"—

"I want you to succeed better in one thing. Tell Mr. Birch before you enter the school that he must pay you each week in advance, or you will not teach; and then the day he ceases to fulfil his part, just leave him to his fate."

In due time the arrangement was made, and on the second of January Miss Dalton became Mrs. Peabody's successor.

For two weeks the stipulated sum was paid, but the third week Mr. Birch saw fit to suspend. With true decision, Miss Dalton left the school at once; and scarce one moon had waxed and waned when the principal theme of gossip for the people of Flintville was, that the school in Dunham's Hall had dwindled out—the pupils at that time numbering less than a score.

The last we heard of Mr. Birch he was perched upon the summit of a load of household furniture on his way to Peg Town, having arrived at the sensible conclusion that he had had no "call" to teach, and was about to enter into an establishment for the manufacturing of shoemakers' pegs. Mr. Peabody was pursuing him with an officer, hoping to secure the amount of his indebtedness to Mrs. Peabody. Upon examination they found that his principal stock consisted of rickety furniture, a broken stove, and a gold watch, which "turned out" to be pure brass. So the gentlemen permitted him to depart in peace.

Miss Dell Dalton has ceased quarrelling about the miniature, having taken the substance in lieu of the shadow, and is now on her way to Scotland, enjoying a bridal tour.

The case of Florilla and Charley is still pending.

Mrs. Peabody's furniture is still the same, and she, relieved of the anxieties incident to the pursuit of wealth under difficulties, wears the sunny smile of earlier years, and avows that in her school days she dearly learned that "contentment is great gain."

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Perch the Truth.—October.

OCTOBER, with his glory, crowns the earth,
And every movement proves his royal birth;

For him the wood-nymphs twine their coronals
Within the circle of their forest halls;

The Oreads from the grotto and the grove—
Sea-nymphs that through old ocean's caverns rove,

Give welcome to the month of changing leaves,
Of harvest plenty and of golden sheaves.

On Nature's bosom rests the weary year,
In the last quarter of her journey here,

Weighted down with all the wealth the autumn yields,
Yet proudly pointing to the woods and fields,

And saying: "These I freely give to man,
And bid him take its blessings while he can;

"For after me there cometh one whose hand
Shall be laid heavily upon the land:

"The swallow, lingering through these autumn hours,
Shall seek a home amid earth's warmer bowers;

"And only here and there a flower remain
As sad reminders of lost Flora's train;

"And in the air th' ominous sounds be heard
Of dropping nuts and leaves by squirrels stirred;

"All tokens of the coming of the day
When Nature, in her desolate array,

"Awaits with patience, through experience tried,
The hour that hails her as the Winter's bride."

Although this knowledge brings its present pain,
A panacea for our grief remains

In Memory, within whose magic hall
We stand, and see upon the pictured wall

October recollections made replete
By all in life deemed true, and pure, and sweet.

Now come the lengthening eves that once would bring Familiar faces round the household ring,

And as the nuts and apples were passed round,
And pleasant converse added social sound,

The genial moments swiftly sped along,
And in their passing by our hearts grew strong

To stem the current of whatever fears
Or trials shaped themselves about our years:

And while our faith uplifted hearts and hands,
Our life was beautified by its demands.

THE VILLAGE WITH ONE GENTLEMAN.

A PARLOR DRAMA.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

Dramatis Personæ.

MR. BROWN.
MRS. VANE.
MRS. DIX.
MISS MATILDA DIX.
MISS BARNABY.
MISS FRANCENA BARNABY.
MISS ISABEL SMITH.
MISS HANNAH STAPLES.
MISS SUSAN LANES.

NOTE.—This little drama, which was written expressly for parlor acting, is very easily performed, since it requires no scenery, and very little change of costume.

The play, though no very great trial of dramatic power, is a test of dramatic skill, and requires to be well studied, and to be acted with much attention.

If the characters of MRS. DIX and MRS. VANE are sustained by young ladies, they should wear matronly caps, and all the garb of middle age.

The other characters, of course, should be differently attired in the monologues, and in Scene VII., where each young lady will endeavor to sustain her part by her dress: MISS HANNAH STAPLES dexterously plying her knitting-needles, and MISS SMITH flirting with her fan.

MR. BROWN'S role is, perhaps, the most difficult.

SCENE I.

Matilda.

Yes, mother, all's ready; don't think, for a minute,

I'd let that raw Irish girl's fingers be in it.

The tables are set, and the guests are invited;

Five girls—and some twenty, I know, will feel slighted—

Six ladies in all; and there's only one beau,

Though I've thought of each man that the village can show,

From the minister down to the barber's apprentice,

And the lawyer's poor son, who is non compos mentis.

I'm sure if another young man were in town, I should be most happy; but then Mr. Brown is so very pleasant—

Mrs. Dix. Matilda, the tarts

Need jelly; the cookies, the rounds, and the hearts

I've set in the cupboard—

Matilda.

Yes, mother; I hear,

I know all about them, but one thing is clear—

Though all want to know him, as far as I see, There's no one but us who has asked him to tea. They say he is shrewd, and he can't have the blindness

To pass by, unnoticed, our evident kindness. He'll see, as a friend, that I wish to receive him,

Of all of a stranger's dull hours to relieve him; He'll see we wish well for his future and present,

And kindness, you know, is to every one pleasant:

I'm glad that he hasn't been asked through the town—

I'm sure his first hostess must please Mr. Brown.

SCENE II.

Miss Barnaby (sola).

Yes, he will be there, and I think I shall go; I wish to discountenance folly and show.

I know there is much that is wrong in society, But I shall behave with the strictest propriety.

They say he is, truly, a worthy young man;

If virtue can please him, I think that I can.

I know he is thoughtful, I'm sure our opinions

Will be quite in common; I think, on swift pinions,

The hours hasten by, and we ought to improve them;

I think we have errors and ought to remove them;

I think that a withering blossom is beauty;

I think life's chief mission is doing one's duty;

I think joy is transient and fame is a bubble;

I think all things earthly are mingled with trouble.

I'll tell him my views, and I think I can show

That each tempted young person should learn to say "No;"

And that Virtue on Folly can look with a frown:

Yes, I'll go—and I think I shall please Mr. Brown.

SCENE III.

Miss Francena Barnaby (sola).

Yes, he will be there, and I think I shall go.

They say he's well read, and I'm sure he will know

What I have endured, in this village a denizen,
With my passion for poetry, my worship of Tennyson.

I wonder what style he prefers? the Miltonic,
Cold, calm, and serene, or the glowing Byronic,
All thrilling with feeling—so wild, so delightful!
Perhaps he likes Shelley—but that would be frightful,

For I hav'n't read it; I'll ask if he's seen Miss Edgeworth's last novel—Miss Muloch's I mean—

I mix up names strangely; we'll speak of Longfellow,

We'll talk about Shakspeare, the dusky
Othello,

The fair Desdemona—oh, that will be charming!
The day will have moments well worthy embalming!

I am sure I shall show, by my fine conversation,

I have more general knowledge, more real information

Than all of the other young ladies in town:

Yes, I'll go—and I think I shall please Mr.
Brown.

SCENE IV.

Miss Isabel Smith (sola).

Yes, he will be there, and I think I shall go;
And I'll wear my new dress though the neck
is so low,

And my mother will think I should dress in another—

But I say I will wear it in spite of my mother!
My mother is always afraid I shall hurt
Mrs. Grundy's opinion of me if I flirt!

It is always, O dear!—though I scarcely have met

With a soul in the village with whom to co-quette;

But he will be there ('tis a terrible pity
My bracelet is broken, I want to look pretty),
And I'll trifle with him till I meet with another,

For I say I will flirt, just in spite of my mother;
And, really and truly, I don't care a copper
If people do say my behavior's improper.

Though they say he is sober, I guess he can see some,

And, probably, he will be looking at me some;
And I am determined to wear my new gown:

Yes, I'll go—and I think I shall please Mr.
Brown.

SCENE V.

Miss Hannah Staples (sola).

Yes, he will be there, and I think I shall go,

Though I really can scarcely find time to bestow;

But I'll take my work with me; they say he is sensible,

And all indolence, surely, he'd deem reprehensible.

The others may keep their hands folded while chatting,

I'll work while I talk and get on with my tatten;
For though they may flirt with the gay while they're tarrying,

The woman a gentleman looks for, in marrying,
Is not some one that merely can dance and embroider,

But a woman to keep the whole household in order.

Now, when I took tea there, Miss Barnaby's bread

Was as vinegar sour, and as heavy as lead;
But my cooking—I'd like to see piecrust that's whiter,

Or bread that is sweeter, or fresher, or lighter;
And I could not keep count of the joints I have roasted—

In all household affairs I am thoroughly posted;
And though I'm not boastful, nor anxious to show it,

I'm perfectly willing, I'm sure, he should know
it;

And since practical thoughts must awake his attention,

It would only be fair to myself, just to mention,
That I know sugar's up, and that butter is down:

Yes, I'll go—and I think I shall please Mr.
Brown.

SCENE VI.

Miss Susan Lanes (sola).

Yes, he will be there, and I think I shall go;
All the rest will be trying some graces to show.

He will surely be shocked at that Smith girl's proceedings,

And what will he care for Miss Barnaby's readings?

And her sister he'll think the absurdest and oddest

Of creatures—but I shall be shrinking and modest;

And I've heard that a gentleman's highest felicity

Is in mingling with ladies of charming simplicity.

He, at least, will perceive I am quite unassum-ing,

Like the daisies one finds in the meadow lands blooming;

And I'll softly glance up, and I'll meekly look down :

Yes, I'll go—and I think I shall please Mr. Brown.

SCENE VII.

(Mrs. Dix's parlor. Company assembled.)

Miss Matilda.

Pray, sir, do you find yourself comfortably seated ?

And do take a fan, for the room is so heated ;

'Tis the first time you've mingled in village society,

And to meet with a stranger is quite a variety.

Miss Isabel Smith.

Yes, we're glad you have come just to break the monotony ;

'Tis a place that's good only for studying botany.

I am terribly sick of this miserable town :

I think it is horrid—don't you, Mr. Brown ?

[Mr. Brown tries to speak.

Miss Estlin.

Not horrid ; I think it is wicked to grumble ;

I wish, for my part, to be thoughtful and humble ;

I am sure it would be a most pleasant community

If the people all lived here in quiet and unity :

Since from duty, so often, we've all of us swerved,

It is better, far better than we have deserved.

Miss Hannah Staples.

Yes, there are some things quite pleasant in living up here ;

Now one's eggs and one's butter are not half so dear

As they are in the cities below us I'm told ;

And then they're much better ; now father has sold

A great many eggs at just ninepence a dozen—

Mr. Jones bought them all, to send off to his cousin—

And I think that you cannot find milk in the town.

Like the milk of the country—do you, Mr. Brown ?

[Mr. Brown tries to speak.

Miss Matilda Dix.

Is the room light enough ? I am really uncertain.

If it pleases you, sir, I will lift up the curtain.

Miss Francena Barnaby.

I, too, love the country. 'Mid tumult and traffic,

One fails in the city to list the seraphic,
Melodious breathings of poetry. I know

No bliss like communing with Byron and Poe,
They seem, in their genius, of fate so defiant ;
And then I love, too, the calm measure of Bryant ;

And Shakspeare, I never should weary of reading ;

And Milton, that poet all others exceeding—

I should love to have seen them, those bards of renown :

I am so fond of poetry—aren't you, Mr. Brown ?

[Mr. Brown tries to speak.

Miss Susan Laves.

I'm timid ; I shrink from the world's gairish frown,

And I cherish seclusion—don't you, Mr. Brown ?

[Mr. Brown tries to speak.

MISS ISABEL SMITH and MISS FRANCENA BARNABY speak together.

Miss Isabel Smith.

Well, I like the city. Oh, balls are entrancing !

For I have an absolute passion for dancing !

But, all of last winter, I had to sit waiting,

For there wasn't one beau just to take me out skating !

When I bought my new skates, I was such a great dunce !

I should, really, have liked to have tried them just once.

Miss Francena Barnaby.

I don't care for skating ; such noisy enjoyments

Don't please me as much as serener employments ;

I love to be bound by some writer's soft fetter—

Miss Barnaby.

Yes, bound by a novel ; 'twere very much better

If people read less, and thought very much more.

Miss Matilda Dix.

Mr. Brown, is there not a strong draft from that door ?

[Mr. Brown tries to speak.

MISS F. BARNABY, MISS H. STAPLES, and MISS J. SMITH all speak together.

Miss Francena Barnaby.

Well, I own that I like a good book to peruse
Best of all things, unless 'tis to quietly muse

O'er the pictures that spring under fancy's light touch,

Though I never write poetry—at least, sir, not much.

Miss H. Staples.

Well, I do not read much ; I'm not fond of rhyme,

And the household affairs take up most of my time.

Miss J. Smith.

Mr. Brown (oh, excuse me!), are you a relation

Of Miss Brown that lives down by the Nottingham station?

She's a very nice girl—not so horribly prudent—

And they say she's engaged to a Hanover student.

Miss Barnaby.

I think, until people are fairly united,

It is well not to say that their vows have been plighted;

For hearts they are fickle, and students at college

Have often more classical learning than knowledge

Of what is becoming—

Miss F. Barnaby.

I think 'twould be pleasant

If one, now and then, in this wearisome present,
'Mid people whose hearts seem as frigid as zero,
Could meet with some knightly and worshipful hero.

MISS J. SMITH, MISS H. STAPLES, MISS M. DIX, and MISS S. LANES, all speak together.

Miss J. Smith.

O dear! for a hero, I'm tired of waiting;

I'm content with a beau that will take me out skating

In winter, and boating, perhaps, in the summer—

I don't mean a hint, though, at any new comer.

Miss H. Staples.

These heroes, I think they are very unstable;
The woman that wins one will find he's unable—

Miss M. Dix.

Mr. Brown (oh, young ladies, I owe an apology!),

We've some very fine specimens here of geology.

Miss S. Lanes (aside).

I see I'm unnoticed, at least by the guest—

I mean to be noisy as well as the rest.

SCENE VIII.

(MR. BROWN'S boarding-place. The parlor.)

Mrs. Vane.

You've returned, Mr. Brown; but you look rather weary;

I'm afraid that, by contrast, our rooms will look dreary.

Mr. Brown.

Look weary! I'm glad to get back here at all;

I've left both my gloves and my cane in their hall.

Five ladies, I think, to their homes I've escorted—

Perhaps I can tell when my thoughts are assorted—

I think there were five, I can count up no more,
But I feel as though I had been home with a score.

Mrs. Vane.

Well, you take it, at least, with most doleful sobriety;

You, at least, had a chance for the charm of variety.

Mr. Brown.

Yes, madam; five ladies in unison chattered;
Of all kinds of learning and knowledge they snattered.

They glanced and they simpered, they smiled and they flattered,

Their words, like the rain in the thunder-storm pattered;

And one was domestic, and one was romantic,
And one she was terribly stiff and pedantic,
And one was excessively frisky and antic;
Between them, among them they've driven me frantic—

Pray, give me the camphor and let me lie down.

Mrs. Vane.

Oh, pray, take the rocking-chair, dear Mr. Brown.

I really am shocked at your dismal confession;
I hope that to-day will not leave an impression
To render your stay in the village less pleasant.

Mr. Brown.

Oh, madam, if some one would make me a present

Of all of the village, its valleys and mountains,

Its pastures and woodlands, its rivers and fountains,

Its orchards of plenty, its meadows of grain,
Its stores and its dwellings, I would not remain.

Mrs. Vane.

Mr. Brown, I am sorry; I've done what I could.

Mr. Brown.

O bless you! I know it; your heart is too good
To ever offend one, my dear Mrs. Vane;

For your sake I would be most glad to remain.
The house work, like magic, beneath your direction,

Goes on, and my linen's done up to perfection.
Such peace fills your dwelling that if I need never Pass over the threshold, I'd stay here forever.

I leave you, indeed, with the truest of sorrow,

But really I cannot stay over to-morrow;

I'll pitch my lone tent by the waters of Marah ;
 I'll dwell in the midst of the sandy Sahara ;
 I'll join the wild crowd when they'll all overlook me ;
 I'll go where the sun is so hot it will cook
 me ;

I'll roam where the lions and jackals will meet
 me ;
 I'll go where the people will sit down and eat
 me ;
 But never, so long as my name shall be Brown,
 Will I live as the only young man in the town.

THE MODERN CINDERELLA; OR, THE BLUE-SPANGLED SLIPPER.

BY METIA VICTORIA VICTOR.

At a masked ball, given this past winter by a wealthy family residing between Fourteenth Street and Central Park, amid the clash and sparkle of conflicting splendors, one lovely vision floated serene. Her dress may have been intended to represent Sunrise, or the Star of Dawn, or Morning, or any pretty fancy of the early day. A large star, formed of a magnificent diamond, set in a circle of silver points, glittered over her brow ; as for the gold of sunrise, nature had furnished that in a fleecy cloud of shining curls. The rest of her dress was a roseate, misty robe floating over a rich blue underdress. However, it was not her attire, though that was indescribably aerial and graceful in its effect, which attracted attention. It was the evident youth and beauty of the wearer, who, though her face was concealed, betrayed those charms in her fresh complexion, and shoulders ; in the bare round arms, dimpled as a child's, in the brightness of her hair, and still more in her movements. That a beautiful face must accompany these was inevitable ; and it was in human nature that the necessity for glossing at the precise character of its beauty enhanced the interest of beholders.

To have so much revealed and so much kept back was maddening to the curiosity of some of the more susceptible cavaliers who hung upon her steps. If the seraphic star floating about in her pink cloud was at all susceptible of human vanity, she must have been flattered by the constant appeals for her hand in the dance, and by the attentive suite of courtiers who followed her from room to room. Among those so favored as to have had the felicity of dancing with her whose movements were like those of the breeze or clouds, was a young man dressed in the costume of Feramorz, the poet whose kitar bewitched the soul of Lalla Rookh in her journey through the vale of Cashmere. This dress, it will be remembered, "was simple, yet not without some marks of costliness ; and the ladies of the Princess were not long in discovering that the cloth, which encircled his high Tartarian cap, was of the most delicate kind that the shawl-goats of Thibet supply. Here and there, too, over his vest, which was confined by a flowered girdle of Kashan, hung strings of fine pearl, disposed with an air of studied negligence ; nor did the exquisite embroidery of his sandals escape the observation of these fair critics, who, however they might give way to Fadladeen upon the unimportant topics of government and religions, had the spirit of martyrs in everything relating to such momentous matters as jewels and embroidery."

This modern Feramorz seemed in every way the fit representative of the poet-prince in disguise ; his figure was fine, and his manners full of the grace of high culture. That the expression of his countenance was hidden by his mask was not sufficient to conceal the sort of infatuation which the sight of the lovely unknown inspired in him. A hundred trifling gestures spoke as eloquently as words. When her hand met his in the dance, it was almost impossible for him to resist the desire to press it to his lips in the purest homage ; but he was too scrupulous of the proprieties on the occasion of a private masquerade to allow his feelings to tempt him to infringe the strictest rules. For one thing he waited with fiery impatience—for supper, when the esquette of the ball required that all masks should be removed.

He hovered continually about the Star, that he might follow her to the supper-room, and be near her when the full light of her beauty dawned upon the scene. Presently she seemed conscious of his watchfulness, and to make an effort to escape him. For a short time he lost her ; he was uneasy, unhappy. The signal for supper had half emptied the ball-room ; he hurried through the parlors, the little boudoir at the end of the larger apartment, out into the hall, looked up and down the stairs and flower-wreathed corridors, just in time to see a figure, enveloped in a long black cloak and hood, stealing unattended out the front door. It might have passed for some nun or friar to an ordinary observer; but the keen eyes of Feramorz were not to be deceived. Something in the step, and then a half glimpse of a spangled blue slipper convinced him that his morning star was setting forever, unless he boldly followed in pursuit of the fair masquer who thus strangely glided from the ball, alone, and obviously to escape the necessity of revealing her identity.

Hardly had the door closed after her when it was again thrown open, and he sprang out on the pavement in time to see the cloaked figure take refuge in a plain, close carriage, which was driven rapidly away. Heedless of the fact that he had no cloak to cover his fine array, and that the night was chilly, Feramorz, guitar in hand, looked about him for some means of following the fugitive. As it was too early for the masqueraders to be leaving, only two or three carriages were drawn up in the vicinity, and these of course were waiting for their legitimate occupants. Here was a dilemma. However, in the colored person who was nodding on the seat of one of these, he recognized the coachman of a friend, and resolved to press him into the service.

"Hallo, Cæsar! wake up! I want you to follow that lady—that coach, I mean, which has just driven off"—and he sprang inside.

"Tank you, massa, I isn't a hack," replied Cæsar, majestically. "Dis 'stablishment belongs to missus, and you'd bettah git out, quick."

"Pshaw, Cæsar! I know your mistress and you, too. I'm Philip Van Pearse. Mrs. Flowerdelis would be happy to oblige me with the loan of her carriage a few moments, if she knew I wanted it. She has just gone to supper, and will not require it for an hour yet. Come, my boy, keep up with them, and I'll give you a dollar."

Cæsar felt a gold coin (don't be incredulous; Feramorz most likely brought it with him from that magic oriental country where gems and gold still circulate at par) pressed into his hand through the little window beside him, and overcome by the bribe, started his fine pair of coal-black steeds after the retreating vehicle, which, to the young man's surprise, kept on its way down town until far past all fashionable quarters.

"Perhaps it is going to some of the hotels," he thought. But no; it kept on until it turned off Broadway, along Prince Street to the west, finally bringing up before a rather dilapidated three story brick on Sullivan. The house did not seem to be a tenement house, and the locality, though shabby, was not at all disreputable.

Just as Cæsar brought his horses around on to this street, the first carriage drove off; Feramorz saw the door of the house open, as if the couer had been looked for; there was a faint gleam of gaslight from the hall, the door was shut and all was dark. Springing out, he ran up the steps and took the number of the place by the light of the carriage-lamps: it was all he could do. He felt surprised, ashamed, almost suspicious, and doubtful if he should pursue the adventure further; when, returning down the steps, he saw something glittering on the sidewalk, and picked up a spangled blue slipper.

This little silken article, its white satin lining yet warm with the foot which had worn it, thrilled him all over with joy. It brought back to him, as vividly as if he still clasped her hand in the dance, the whole aspect of the beautiful unknown; the purity which seemed to emanate light from her; the freshness of youth and innocence in the complexion, in the manners; the girlish music of the voice which had ventured a few "low replies" to his endeavors to draw her into conversation. With this in his hand, he bade Cæsar drive back, while he relapsed into a dream over the lost slipper from which he hardly cared to be aroused by his return to the masquerade. Thrusting it beneath the "vest confined by a flowered girdle of Kashan," he removed his mask, and resumed his place in the gay company.

When Philip Van Pearse attended his lady mother to their home, when the masquerade was among the things which were, and the garments of Feramorz were cast wearily over a modern chair, the silver spangles rose and fell with his breast, as he dreamed a kaleidoscope dream of the ball ending with the rise of the Star of Dawn, the light from whose eyes fell on him like sunshine, warming him through and through with their thrilling power.

In fact the sun was rather too bright upon his face as he sprang out of bed at about eleven o'clock A. M., remembering, as he went to his breakfast, that to-day he was to be at the Hudson River Railroad Depot at a little before three to welcome and escort to his mother's a young lady third cousin of his, whom he had not seen since she was a little girl, but with whose parents Mrs. Van Pearse had spent the month of August, and who was returning the hespi-tality shown her by a cordial invitation to the daughter to come and enjoy some of the gayeties of city winter life.

He inwardly voted it a nuisance that he should be obliged to play the polite attendant, through the very best part of the season, to a little country girl; and now he felt positively out of humor to think that he must go to the depot, when his mind was bent in another direction. He had resolved to call at the three story brick on Sullivan Street, on one pretence or another, and find out who lived there. He was naturally bold and dashing in his actions, and now, fortified by the slipper, which at worst he could make an excuse out of, as wishing to return it to the owner, he was bent upon satisfying his eager curiosity.

He felt quite relieved when told by his mother, who came to him at his solitary breakfast to make the announcement, that the expected guest had arrived by an early train, and was now in her room, resting after her journey.

"Be sure and return to lunch," added Mrs. Van Pearse, when she saw he was going out. "Annie's a sweet girl; I know you will like her; and she's rather sensitive, and might feel hurt if you were not here to welcome her."

"I've no doubt she's sugar itself, mother dear, you praise her so much: but I shall not want any lunch, after breakfasting at this hour, and I have an engagement which will keep me until dinner time. Make my excuse to Miss Sumner, if you please, ma chere mère." And the wilful son hurried off.

Not that he was usually disrespectful to his mother, or unamiable to any one; Philip was rather above the average of his class of young men in moral and mental qualities; but he had been told that this Annie Sumner would not be a bad match for himself, inasmuch as she was pretty, and educated, and the heir to any number of acres whose western boundary was defined by the lordly Hudson, and upon which a castle and other improvements already stood.

Mrs. Van Pearse had seemed charmed with this young relative, and for almost the first time in her life had suggested to her son that she should contemplate a matrimonial alliance with satisfaction. Of course, this had the opposite effect from the one wished. Philip had been too much flattered to be pleased with the idea that it was going to be a good thing for him to meet this young lady—it might be a good thing for her, if he should happen to be pleased, which was not at all probable, etc. etc., with the abominable masculine self-conceit, so much worse than feminine vanity.

The first stage which passed the corner took Philip down town, within convenient walking distance of Sullivan Street. A few minutes later he was pounding away at the old-fashioned brass knocker of the brick house, which he saw by the daylight to be more neatly kept than most of its neighbors. He was somewhat confused when the door was opened by a silver-haired Quaker woman of the most sedate and respectable type of the middle class of society. He made a profound bow.

"Excuse me, madam, but your daughter, who was at Mrs. Jonquil's fancy ball last night, lost—"

"I have no daughter; and, if I had, she would not go to the world's balls. Thou must be mistaken, young man."

"The young lady who boards or resides with you. She lost an article of dress which I should be most happy to return to her."

"There is no young woman in this house. Perhaps thee is mistaken in the number," and she began gently to close the door.

"No, no," uttered Philip, hurriedly; "this is the place. I saw her come in, and took the number. Are you the only occupants of the house?"

"John, and I, and the handmaiden who serves us!"

The handmaiden! He thought of Cinderella. He was so sure of what he had seen that he stretched out his hand to prevent the closing of the door.

"This servant of yours. Perhaps she is the one I am in search of."

"Here she cometh from the grocery store. If thou speak with her, let it be in my presence."

He looked, and saw a stout, chubby German girl coming up, her bare red arms loaded with brown paper parcels. The ridiculousness of his fancy that that ethereal creature whom he had touched on her flight, might have been given to cinders and servitude, and of the whole of his proceedings smote him forcibly. He bowed hastily to the Quaker dame, and with a crimson face hurried off, without waiting to try his slipper on the fat foot of Christina.

Here was mystery. He could have persuaded himself that the whole scene of the previous night had been an illusion, were it not for the tangibility of the blue silk and spangles, which gave great warmth and protection to his breast from the winter air, by being placed in the inside pocket of his overcoat. He would not be baffled as long as there was anything more to be done. He went to Mrs. Jonquil's to pay his respects, and to ask her if she knew what one of her guests it was who wore the diamond star. Mrs. Jonquil replied that she did not; that she herself had been curious to ascertain who it was, but that she did not see her at supper nor after. Then he asked if she had friends in Sullivan Street. She stared at him, as if doubting his sanity, and said "No" very decidedly. Mr. Van Pearse had a mind to tell her what had caused him to ask the question; but in view of her great gift for disseminating useful knowledge, he concluded to retain his secret.

Certainly, it was strange. No one could have been admitted without a card. The dress of the fair unknown was as costly as it was becoming. The diamond forming the centre of the star was of itself a little fortune. For such a star to set in Sullivan Street! Philip went home, so busy with conjecture that he had forgotten the existence of their guest, until he entered the house. The sable servant who took his overcoat and hat in the hall suggested:—

"Massa bettah step up to his room and brush hisself. Dar's very nice young lady in de parlor."

Philip gave a little scornful laugh; but, nevertheless, sprang up the stairs two at a time, and made a rather careful toilet.

"Really," he observed to himself in the mirror, "where Hannibal condescends to admire, my judgment will, doubtless, approve. He's no mean critic of the people who honor this mansion by their company. He's quite a connoisseur of female beauty and dress, though he likes a little too much style."

Putting on an air of cordiality to atone for his late appearance, he descended to the drawing-room, and was introduced to his very remote relative, Annie Sumner. The perceptible curiosity in the eyes of these two, who had heard so much of each other, gave place, in his at least, to pleasure and admiration. His anticipated trial of being compelled to do the dutiful to a country cousin melted into the possibility that he might even be proud of the task.

She had that air of purity and seclusion that violets always wear; a freshness, a fairness indescribable, unmarred by bashfulness. She met his glance with a full, quiet look not in the least timid—only maidenly. An abundance of bright wavy hair, the loveliest complexion of lilies and roses, a sweet mouth, sweeter eyes—Philip was charmed. As he looked at her, she reminded him of the beautiful unknown. Her complexion and hair were of the same order. She was not so perfect; oh no! Her face had not that dazzling perfection which he had no doubt was hidden under that detestable mask. That seraphic being had fairly floated upon the air, so light was her step, so aerial her motions, while this lovely guest was only quietly graceful and fair. If it had not been for the blue slipper, he might have been more delighted than he was; that had woven about him such a blinding tissue of splendor that he could no longer see clearly into everyday matters.

During the dinner and the pleasant evening at home which followed, Philip was forced to make himself agreeable by the piqueing spirit and vivacity of their guest. He was surprised at the wit hidden within her sweetness like a bee in the heart of a rose; he prided himself in refined and delicate repartee; but he found in her his match. There was an archness in her laughter which was enchanting. He no longer wondered at his mother's liking, nor at the enthusiasm of sable Hannibal; the young girl had powers to win love and admiration freely. Overflowing with the happiness of youth and health, unspoiled by the follies of fashionable life—here was his ideal maiden found at last. That he did not fully appreciate her was owing to the infatuation which had taken possession of him.

"It is really too bad that you were not in town sooner," he remarked among other things. "We should have been so pleased to have taken you to Mrs. Jonquil's masquerade last night. It was a very successful affair for one of the kind. I should have thought, mother, that you would have written to hasten Miss Sumner's visit."

"Your mother was telling me about it before you came home. It must have been charming. I understand that the Vale of Cashmere contributed to the array of guests—a young poet, the sweetness of whose kitar bewitched the souls of all the veiled beauties who listened. I should, indeed, have liked the privilege of hearing him."

The mirthful side glance which shot through him from Annie's eyes, as she said this, made him feel uncomfortable. There was a good deal more in her look than in her words. It would almost seem as if she had known or suspected what a fool he had made of himself.

Ten days flew by. Never was there a man more agitated by conflicting sentiments than Philip. He was charmed with his Cousin (he had got so far as to call her cousin) Annie.

When in her presence he was sure that he was getting madly in love with her. But as soon as he was alone in his room, out came the little slipper from his inside coat pocket, and he lost himself in dreams over the unknown, exquisite being whom it was impossible for him to forget. He dared not speak to Annie of love, for he was morally certain that if any chance threw the loser of the slipper in his way, he should yield to her influence, even if plighted to another.

There was a fine struggle between imagination and reality. On the one hand, mystery, novelty, adventure, to excite his fancy to the utmost; on the other, the actual presence of the sweetest, brightest of girls, whose silvery laughter, flashes of wit, delicious singing, and transient tears, to say nothing of an occasional rosy blush, certainly ought to have got the better of that fitting phantom of a single night.

Ten days brought Christmas. Santa Claus visited the grown-up children at Mrs. Van Pearse's. It is needless to enumerate the various pretty and expensive gifts which Annie found beside her plate on Christmas morning. Some of these came from home, some from her aunt, and one—a magnificent, perfume-exhaling bouquet, in a costly jewelled holder—she guessed at once came from Philip. As for him, he had his usual allowance of smoking-caps, slippers, etc., and a little paper parcel, which he proceeded to untie very leisurely, as he sipped his coffee. Annie chanced to be looking at him, and saw the crimson flush mount to his face as he caught sight of the gift inside; but whatever it was, he hastily rolled it up again, and thrust it into his pocket.

"You ought to let us see all your presents, Cousin Philip."

"Perhaps the giver would object." It was well for him to give her to understand that she had not his full confidence; it might tend to check hopes which might be destined to disappointment.

After this he grew stupid for the rest of the meal, losing his appetite, owing to putting powdered sugar on his hashed potatoes, and salt on his waffles. As soon as he could decently be excused from the table, he stole up to his room to compare notes. The mate of the blue-spangled slipper was in the brown paper parcel! He put them together. He had a pair now. She must have sent it to him! Oh, tormenting and delicious perplexity! She knew him—not as Feramorz only, but his real name and address, as was proved by her sending him this reminder.

In vain he questioned his mother and Hannibal as to how the package had arrived. So many brown paper parcels had come home the previous day by so many different errand boys, Hannibal could recollect nothing especial.

One ray of hope streamed over his mystification. Invitations were out for another fancy ball to come off New Year's Eve. The success of Mrs. Jonquil's had been such as to tempt Mrs. Daffodil to follow with another. His expectation was that the fair unknown would be present again, when he trusted to wit and determination to discover who she was, and to get a sight of that beautiful countenance whose lovely possibilities haunted him. He gave a great deal of thought to his costume. Of course, it must not be the same as before. Finally he concluded to go as the Prince, carrying around with him the slipper, vowing to marry the lady whose foot it would fit. His mother and Annie were going; but they would not confide to him the characters they intended to assume. He received the impression, however, that Annie was going as a Shepherdess.

"I thought she had more originality," was his mental comment. "She will look very fair and pretty; but I can't endure these milk-and-water characters."

So Annie's star sank, while that of the unknown was in the ascendant. The ladies were engrossed with company and the preparation of their costumes; Philip paid them only so much attention as they needed; Mrs. Van Pearse could see no evidences in the young couple of the state of feeling she had wished and anticipated.

Mrs. Daffodil's ball was as superb as Mrs. Jonquil's. The Prince, with the blue-spangled slipper in his hand, went around in search of his Cinderella. He had not been long in the rooms before he recognized, or thought he did, the lady of whom he was in search. This time she was dressed, if possible, more exquisitely than before. Her dress was that of a water sprite—a transparent silvery tissue waving over a pale sea-green robe, lilies in her hair and trailing in the crystal waves of her tunic. Philip was enraptured. Again he solicited her hand for the dance; when it was over, he led her to a retired seat in the embrasure of a window, and with a meaning air begged her to try the slipper.

"It is the sandal of a seraphic star," he said, in a warm whisper; "but I know that it will fit the foot of Undine as well. Alas! I cannot swear that I will marry you, if you can wear it, for ladies will not be taken, even by princes, now-a-days, without their own consent, and you might make me break my oath. But if I dared to hope—if I dared to say—”

She put up her hand deprecatingly; she would not listen to the impassioned words which trembled upon his lips; but he rushed on impetuously:—

“I cannot refrain; my heart is too full. I have thought of nothing else, especially since you proved that you took some interest in me, by sending me the mate to this slipper. Only promise to let me know you hereafter without this disguise, to give me a chance to prove the impression you have made. Make me happy by going with me to supper, and allowing me to behold that face of which I have dreamed for a whole maddening fortnight.”

The fair bosom, nestled in water-lilies not so white, heaved, but whether with emotion, or suppressed laughter, it was impossible for him to tell. Presently she answered, in a low voice:—

“Feramorz has indeed turned out to be the Prince in disguise. If I had been Lalla Rookh, I should consent to put on the slipper. Seek me after supper, noble Prince, and if you find me, I will accede to your request.”

So saying, she glided from him. He was resolved not to lose sight of her an instant, for something in her answer suggested that she intended escaping before midnight. However, as yet, he had not detected Annie, and seeing a shepherdess in the distance, he made his way towards her. This shepherdess had black hair, and was tall; it was not Annie, and when he turned to keep near the water-sprite, she had already disappeared. While he was striving to trace her in the crowd, his mother, in turban and jewels, arrested him, detaining him some time in attendance upon her.

Alas! he saw no more of his Undine. Half frantic with disappointment, he could hardly be civil when the two ladies descended from the dressing-room, wrapped up in their cloaks, ready to be escorted home. He was in the carriage with them before he realized how neglectful he had been of Annie; the masquerade was over, and he could not tell what dress she wore, who had been polite to her, or whether she had enjoyed herself.

Half ashamed, he ventured to ask her if the ball had equalled her expectations. She avowed herself quite contented with her share of the pleasure; said she had danced all she wished, and had not been neglected.

“Did you notice that delicate and unique costume—the Undine?”

He endeavored to keep his voice quite careless; but it betrayed a tremble of consciousness.

“Yes, I noticed it. It was quite pretty.”

“Quite pretty, indeed! It was delicious—original! I wish you had chosen some such poetical conceit, Cousin Annie, instead of that humdrum shepherdess, with her everlasting crook.”

“Your compliment is rather a crook-ed one, Mister Philip. I'm sorry that I did not please your taste more, seeing your devotion would have rewarded any trouble I might have taken. However, I could never hope to be so alluring as your Undine, do what I might.” She laughed, gayly; evidently she was not jealous, or she would not be so good-humored.

Philip's vanity was just enough piqued to save him from the despair into which he was settling. He would see if he could not arouse a little spark of feeling out of this gay indifference.

Yes; though more than ever convinced that he should never love Annie, he was ungenerous enough to seek to interest her in him. These efforts of his went on from day to day. The more miserable he became brooding over his passion for the mocking vision which had evaded him, the more he sought to divert his unhappiness by trifling with his gentle cousin.

He read love-breathing poetry to her in the mornings when they were alone together; twice or thrice he had pressed her hand; once he had kissed a ringlet of the bright hair which rippled down about her throat. The feeling which had urged him to this last action was the resemblance her hair had to that of the fair unknown; but how could Annie guess this, as she blushed at the deed, her soft blue eyes drooping beneath his glance?

Thus the weeks rolled round until the time of her visit had expired. Gladly as she would have prolonged it at the earnest solicitation of Mrs. Van Pearse, she had other reasons for declining to do so. Maiden delicacy prompted her to fly from Philip, who might think that she lingered under the spell of his influence. One day his manner would be cold and constrained; another, he would be all devotion, saying and looking a thousand things, which, to her, all unversed in hollow flatteries or worse coquetries, seemed to mean much, setting her heart in a glow, bringing the richest light and color to her face. Could Philip, man of the world as he was, see all this and not be to blame, if he were only amusing himself?

The evening preceding her departure came.

Her trunks stood in the hall, ready strapped for the journey. The three sat in the library, denied to guests, wishing to spend the last evening together, as Annie intended to retire early, having to arise early in the morning.

"The house will be intolerable after you are gone!" said Philip, suddenly, with one of those bursts of excitement peculiar to him. "Mother, why don't you persuade Annie to stay here always?"

"Why don't I persuade her? I should like such a daughter very much; but Providence denied me one; and I presume her parents would have something to say against my robbing me of theirs."

Mrs. Van Pearse was going out of the room as she said this. Both the young people colored at the first part of her answer. Annie took up a book, and pretended to be absorbed in an engraving. Philip sat and looked at her. She was lovely—most dearly lovable! Would it not "pay better" to make sure of this living treasure before him—this bona fide incarnation of love and sweetness—than to pursue the mysterious stranger any longer? He had not dreamed that he should miss her so much; but now he could not bear the idea of the house as it would be to-morrow, with no Annie in it. That arch laughter, those light footsteps, that fair face—how they had lighted up everything with a new charm! It came upon him suddenly, that life would be a blank, if he should see them no more. What a daughter she would be for his mother! What a wife she would be for him! Wife! the word sounded sweet as he applied it to the fair girl before him, whose face bent lower and lower over her book, until her ringlets, down-sweeping, hid it from sight. Mrs. Van Pearse had some errand which detained her—her son forgot to wonder why she did not come back.

"Annie!"

She did not look up; he bent over and took the book away, when he saw tears in the eyes which she forced herself to raise to his.

"Are you sorry to go away?"

"I want to see my dear parents, of course, Cousin Philip; but I like your mother so much—I—feel grieved to part with her."

"Is it my mother, alone, whom you like, Annie? I hope not. If I only ventured to think you could like her boy a little, too, I would ask permission to go home with you, and see what your parents had to say about it."

"I never thought you cared much for me, Philip"—the hand he had taken possession of was half-withdrawn, and her eyes searched his earnestly. "Do you know, I fancied you had an attachment for some other lady?"

"Well, I hardly knew my own feelings," stammered he, "until to-night. When I realized your going away, it seemed as if the sunshine had gone out of everything."

"How about the starlight?" she asked, roguishly, her smothered dimples breaking out of their hiding-places.

"I have come to the conclusion that every-day sunlight is the best thing to live with," he answered, after a moment's embarrassment. "Do not torment me, Annie; let me know my fate at once!"

When Mrs. Van Pearse came back into the library, her children sat hand in hand; the blushes of one, and the triumphant joy of the other face told her how matters had progressed. It was arranged that Annie should defer her departure one day, to enable Philip to make ready to go home with her, and gain the consent of her parents to their betrothal.

The next morning a note came to him by the city courier. On a dainty sheet of paper was written daintily:—

FERAMORZ: Bring my blue-spangled slippers to — Sullivan Street this evening, at eight o'clock. I want them. STAR.

This note agitated Philip more than he dared to confess. Why had it been sent just when it was too late to make him happy? But was he not happy? the most blessed and happiest of men? Had he mistaken the feelings which only an hour before seemed so intense and real? Would there be any danger in meeting her who had interested his imagination only? He glanced over at Annie, whose tender blue eyes sank beneath his own. No! he could meet Venus herself, fortified with the memory of that blush and smile.

"It's high time the slippers were returned," he thought, as he buttoned his coat about them for the last time, preparatory to his long ride down town. His mother and cousin, upon hearing that he had an engagement which would keep him out all the evening, had concluded to make a call or two, with Hannibal and the carriage; and they had been gone an hour when he left.

A little whirlwind of conflicting emotions raised a great dust amid the dried and withered sentiments which had once been so green, as he thumped on the brass knocker again at the three-story brick house. The fat German handmaid admitted him to the prim parlor. As he entered, there arose from the sofa the only occupant of the room—the same lovely vision which he had once pursued hither, in the identical dress, and masked as before. Dazzled and overcome, he stood still, saying nothing. His faith with Annie bound his feet, but he felt a rush of the same maddening feelings which the vision had before inspired.

“Peramorz,” said a voice, very low and tender, “I have concluded to let you try the slippers.”

“Too late!” cried Philip, tragically. “I am pledged to another! Ah, why did you not sooner summon me to your presence?” And he made a motion as if he would tear his hair.

“Do you regret it, then? Ah, Prince, you are very fickle.”

Something in the tones of the voice appeared curiously familiar to him. Bewildered and agitated, unable longer to restrain his overmastering curiosity, he stepped hastily forward, and tore the mask from its wearer.

“Annie Sumner!”

“Yes, Philip. Would you like to see if the slippers fit?”

The golden ripple of laughter which broke on his ears restored him to his senses. He seized her in his arms, giving her more kisses than she thought proper.

“I can’t help it, you little deceitful witch! I’m so glad that I’m only in love with one woman after all! I’ve been troubled more than a little by thinking myself in love with two.”

Then, to complete his astonishment, entered his own mother along with the Quaker dame and her husband John.

“My Aunt and Uncle Hooker,” said the Morning Star.

In a short time all the mystery of the affair had been explained away. Mrs. Van Pearse, who had a touch of the romance more fully developed in her son, had conceived the idea of having the young people meet under some striking circumstance which would be apt to fix their interest. The invitations to the fancy ball gave her an idea of how this could be effected. The only difficulty was in getting Annie to the city in time to have her dress prepared, but without her meeting Philip. When she wrote to her about it, she asked her if she had no friends with whom she could stop for a couple of days. Annie replied that she had an uncle and aunt, old-fashioned people, living in the same house in the city in which they went to housekeeping thirty years before; that she had visited them once or twice before, and loved them dearly, despite their quaintness.

Her only fear was that Aunt Rachel would not consent to any such worldly proceeding as the preparation for a ball; however, she would try to win her over to it. Mrs. Van Pearse had sent her carriage to the depot to see her guest safely to Uncle Hooker’s; had made the acquaintance of the Quaker couple, and represented that Annie would go to this private party under her protection and auspices, and would return home very early.

Aunt Rachel, who made a pet of Annie, was not very difficult to persuade. Mrs. Van Pearse went to her friend, Mrs. Jonquil, and procured another card of admission; her own carriage took Annie to the party, and Hannibal had especial orders to come at twelve and return her safely to Sullivan Street. The diamond star was formed of some of Mrs. Van Pearse’s own jewels.

Keeping up the deception was an afterthought. When Annie found herself pursued by Philip, whose identity his mother had revealed to her, she was delighted with the success of their little romance; the slipper was purposely left on the step. The next morning Mrs. Van Pearse sent early for her; they expected that Philip would recognize her when they met, and a gay laugh would be the end of the affair. She cautioned Aunt Hooker before she left, if any young gentleman called, with a blue slipper, which she had lost, not to give him any information; and the good lady emphatically consented, not thinking such an errand strictly proper.

When it was seen that he did not recognize the Star of Dawn in his country cousin, it was concluded to watch him, and see how much of a simpleton he was going to make of himself. The two ladies had a great deal of amusement, which their victim did not suspect. The present of the slipper on Christmas continued the mystery. It was quite easy, at the second masquerade, to keep him from recognizing his cousin. As for her, she began to feel troubled at the serious air he put on, and was tempted then to betray herself to him, thinking that would put an end to his fancied passion; but, in the meanwhile, she, too, had become involved beyond extrication. Oh, if he should think that she had done it on purpose to try and entrap him, she should be so mortified as never to wish to see him again.

Her aunt, quite satisfied with her little romance, told her to let him find it out when the best opportunity occurred—there was no haste about it.

“How could you make up your mind to declare yourself to a humdrum shepherdess?" asked Annie, maliciously, as they sat partaking of the apples, nuts, and cider, which kind Aunt Rachel brought forth for their entertainment.

"If I'd only had the taste and originality of an Undine—"

"You hav'n't tried on the slipper yet," he said, to change the subject. "Come, let us all see if you are the true Cinderella.

THOUGHTS ON THE PAST.

"What happy days were our childhood's days! never were we so happy as then! how joyous and light-hearted! no care or sorrow seemed to cross our path." These, and such similar words we often hear from our friends and companions. Is it not true? Is not the pleasing remembrances of our childhood's associations, companions, and even pastimes, fixed on our minds, never to be forgotten? How well we remember the time when our hearts would beat with joy to see the merry faces of our school-fellows, and join in their ringing laugh! How we longed to enjoy a skip, or a toss of the ball, with them! And then, when our irksome studies were over (as we thought them), how happy we were to throw our books on one side and hasten home to the loved ones there!

Those were happy days; for could we not tell our mother of all our childish griefs and sorrows? and, when we fancied danger was near us, how safe we felt near her; and how carefully she watched over us! Happy, happy childhood! I fancy I hear some say, "Though we were under the parental roof, we had our griefs even then." True, we had. How many of us, when children, have had to grieve over a sick parent; how noiselessly we moved about, fearing to make their pains more acute, and how relieved we were when told they were better; we felt, then, as if we could jump for joy. But how often has our loved circle been broken by death! How sad we felt when our pet, the cherished playmate, the sunshine of our home, was laid in the cold, dark grave! These, indeed, were times of sorrow; but we look upon them as light, compared to what they have been since.

Time sped on. School-days were over; our schoolmates were separated far and wide. We, too, must leave the parental roof to join in the busy turmoil of the world. What preparation, what advice from our friends, what tears were shed over us when the time came for us to bid farewell to all most dear at home!

"Sad was the parting hour!" We did not know till then the depth of the affection we had to those that surrounded us. We like to linger on the past, and wish it over again; but it has gone—gone forever! At first we thought we could not stay from home; we could not get along without the help and guidance of those we had been accustomed to look to; but when we had fresh duties to perform, and new companions to associate with, we felt reconciled to the separation. Though resigned, how we longed for the time when we should once more join the home circle! Perhaps many such seasons have gone by to most of my readers; and how do we feel now, when returning to the home of our childhood for a short time to have sweet converse with all the dear ones there? We cannot too highly prize our home; for we do not know how long it may be home to us. Let us, then, cherish those we love, lest they be snatched from us by the icy finger of death, no more to be seen in this world. Some of us may have parted from them forever—no, not forever, for they are waiting to welcome us where parting will be no more.

I SEE THEE WHEN THE TWILIGHT FOLDS.

BY UNA.

I see thee when the twilight folds
Its robes of silver gray,
Soft as an angel's downy wing,
Above the sleeping day;
When silence broods o'er land and sea,
My heart flies fondly back to thee.

Love oft rebels 'gainst fate's decree,
Though duty bade us part,
Bade each to walk life's weary way
With a divided heart;
And twilight oft brings back the past—
The happy hours too bright to last.

When, borne on memory's airy wings,
My thoughts go back to thee,
I know that twilight to thee brings
Thoughts of the past and me;
It brings the words so fraught with pain
To both: We may not meet again.

And yet, though bitter is the thought,
Perhaps 'twas best to part,
Ere cold distrust had banished love,
Or time had chilled the heart;
For now we only know we meet
To love, to part, but not forget.

When twilight's sombre shadows creep
O'er life's declining day,
When burst our souls their prison-doors,
And break their bands of clay,
At last united may we soar
Through worlds of light for evermore.

THE FATAL BRIDEGROOM.

BY M. E. D.

THE other day, when wife and I were riding to town to do up a few odd chores for the family, who should we see walking along the road but Dr. Smith, the very parson that married our Jeremiah to Farmer Dobbs' gal.

"Hello, parson!" says I, stopping the mare, "how d'ye do? I ain't seen you since you did up that ere little job for my youngster."

The parson's generally reckoned a jolly kind of man enough, but he walked up to us kind of solemn as we halted.

"Good-day to you, friend G——, and to you also, madam; it has indeed been many days since we have met."

I knew from his pompous manner that he alluded to wife and I not havin' been to meetin' of late; so I thought I'd smooth up matters a little.

"Yes, indeed," says I, drawin' my face as long as I could, "we've had such drawbacks with the bad roads, and the mare's being lame, and my old woman, here, down half the time with the rheumatiz, that we've been fair run aground up our way lately for want of a good sermon."

This did the business, and our parson looked smiling in an instant, that is, about as jolly as a persimmon tetch'd with frost, which is doin' pretty well for a parson.

"And how is your son, madam, and his bride?" he asked, turning to Mrs. G——, who sat on the back seat.

"Oh, fust-rate," said my wife; "they're jest as happy as two clippy birds; and I often can't help thinking what a goose I was to sit and cry that day all through the ceremony."

"Well, well," answered the parson, "weddings are solemn things, madam, after all; but your son's wedding was nothing to one I officiated at the other day."

"Why, doctor, what on airth do you mean?" put in my wife, who, like women in general, is very easily aroused in the curiosity way.

"Why, madam," he replied, "I married a beautiful young girl."

"You married her!" screeched my wife.

"Ah! ahem! I mean I performed the ceremony," explained the parson, blushing clean through his yellow skin; "and, sad to relate, I buried her on the same day."

"Dear me! how terrible!" cried my wife, actually turning pale, and no wonder. "Was it consumption? Oh no; I guess it must have been cholera, since they couldn't keep the body. Poor young man! how desolate he must be!"

"Don't pity him, madam," said the parson, looking mysteriously around him; "she was a victim of neither cholera nor consumption. And what is stranger yet," he continued, lowering his voice, "it is not the first case of the kind that has occurred in the bridegroom's family. Ten years ago I married his eldest brother to a lovely girl, and, strange to say, I was forced to bury his wife, too, on the very same day, and in the same manner."

"Sakes!" I exclaimed, "it's really a dangerous thing to be concerned in, parson; you ought to let the police into such a piece of business as that."

"What!" cried the parson, "go to the police with a private family matter like that? Never!"

Sometimes, when the parson had worked himself up rather high in his sermons, I had fancied there was something kind of flighty about him; but now I made quite sure that he was raving mad, or else about as black a villain as ever walked the earth. Just as he was going to speak again I drove off.

"Good-day, parson," says I, a little stiff, "we've lots on hand this morning, and must be moving. Good-day!"

So saying, without noticing my wife, who wanted to talk more, and kept kicking my boots under the seat as a hint, I whipped up the mare, leaving the parson standing in the road.

"I declare, Jed," scolded my wife, "if you ain't the provokingest man that ever was. I wanted to hear more about that awful queer family, and there you went and drove off right in the middle of it. Dear! dear! there's murder somewhere in that business, you may depend on it."

"Of course there is," I answered; "and I tell you, wife, the less you and me knows about it the better. Sooner or later things of this kind come to light, and then look out for being called to court as a witness."

"That's so, Jed," replied my wife, "but, my goodness! ain't it awful to think of? It's worse than Bluebeard! What family can it be, I wonder? He seemed kind of disinclined to tell us, did you notice?"

"Of course I did. You don't think the man would go and let out anything of that kind before a woman, do you? He might as well publish it."

"Umph! What did you marry a woman for, if they're so dreadful?" retorted my wife.

"Because," says I, chuckling, "I didn't care to keep my marriage particularly secret."

Well, to tell the truth, we had a few more words not over-tender and affectionate; but we soon made up, and so drove into town, still talking over the unnatural business, and wondering at our parson's having a hand in such work.

All the rest of that day we couldn't talk or think about anything else; but we both resolved to keep the matter to ourselves for fear of getting into some scrape or other.

Finally, after tea, my wife said: "Jed, I declare I shall have nightmare all night if I don't find out something more about that business. What do you say to callin' in at the parson's on your way to brother Tim's. You could get up some excuse or other to stop."

Well, the long and short of it is, like Adam of old, I was tempted by the curiosity of "the woman," and so dropped in to offer the parson the use of my new seed-sower in case he needed it.

The parson's room was full of folks, and I talked about different things until at last I couldn't hold out no longer; so I just drew the parson out in the entry, and whispered:—

"Doctor Smith, if you wouldn't mind intrusting me with the name of that bridegroom, I might some time be of use to you in the matter, as I can testify to your general character and—"

"Of use! character!" interrupted the parson, opening his big eyes wider yet. "Why, my dear friend, what do you mean?"

"Hush!" I whispered, "we will be overheard! I merely ask to know the name, in case you are willing to give it to me. Rest assured, my dear sir, your secret, dark though it may be, is safe with me. I shall never betray you."

The parson colored—got purple—turned from me an instant, and I could see that his frame was convulsed by some great inward struggle. At last he turned towards me, and gave vent to his feelings in one long hideous shout—of laughter.

"Why, my dear Mr. G——," he yelled out, holding his sides in the mean time, and actually drawing half a dozen people out in the hall by his outrageous racket. "Why, my dear sir, is it possible? Didn't I tell you that man's name? He! he! he! he! Dark secret, indeed! Why, you see, you drove off in such a hurry I had no chance to tell you—he! he! he! he! he! Why the man's name was Berry; and so of course I had to Berry his wife when I married her to him! Don't you take?" And he laughed harder than ever.

Yes, I took, and I put too.

Mrs. G—— was even more indignant than I was. But she always clinches off any allusion to the story with—

"Well, it served you right! Another time you'll be more careful not to drive off in the very middle of a story."

TEMPER.

If that disposition of the mind, which we call temper, be good, what a blessing it may prove! but when bad, of how many evils is it the cause?

How many do we hear excusing the most unpardonable offences by saying, "It was only temper." They little think to what "only temper," if unchecked, may lead.

How many have, in an evil hour, through temper, committed deeds, and spoken words, of which a whole lifetime has not been sufficient to repent. Deeds, that have arisen to accuse and torment them in their dying hour.

How bitterly Henry regretted the hasty words which caused the death of Thomas a Becket! But the words were spoken, and no after-remorse could recall them. Yet we can say, "only temper."

I am afraid it is because temper is so common a fault with otherwise good persons, that we are so ready to excuse it. How often do we hear it said, "I should not think there was much in any one who had not a spice of temper." And this conclusion, in many cases, has much truth in it; but then it must be a governed temper; one under the control of reason. A temper, the conquest of which has purified the spirit of its possessor. Yes, there is the use of temper: it is a trial to purify us. Let us use it as such. Let this thought encourage us to strive for victory over it.

And we who are tried by the temper of those around us, whether it be hasty, or irritable, or sullen—no matter what, let us ever remember that it is far more irksome to themselves than it can be to us; therefore, let us, in a truly Christian spirit, help them to bear the burden of it.

THE foundation of domestic happiness is faith in the virtue of woman; the foundation of all political happiness is confidence in the integrity of man; and the foundation of all happiness, temporal and eternal—reliance on the goodness of God.

THE VERTICAL RAILWAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EXPERIENCES AT THE SEASHORE."

MISS HATTIE WALLACE was shown to her elegant room at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. She put down her neat little satchel, and glanced around with great satisfaction. "Velvet carpet, rosewood furniture, fronting Twenty-third Street—good!" She removed the dusty travelling-hat, bathed her face and hands, gave a hasty brush to her curls, and then opened the door and looked down the long hall. "Why don't papa come? I'm as hungry as a bear!" Happily for the poor famished young creature, papa's portly figure was at this moment seen approaching.

"Well, Hal, ready for supper, hey?" he called when he spied her.

"I should think I was," rather crossly said Miss Hal; "hav'n't had a mouthful since breakfast."

"Come on, then; lock your door." And Mr. Wallace led the way down to the tea-room.

And while Miss Hattie satisfied her ravenous hunger, I will tell you what she is, viz.: a very pretty girl. I am a judge of a pretty girl, and I consider Miss Hattie a fair specimen; red lips, good teeth, full gray eyes, with long curving lashes, and great bunches of auburn curls waving rich and soft over her forehead and down either side of her oval face. Miss Hattie is petite; but, as every quick graceful movement indicates—alas! must I acknowledge it?—flirty.

Miss Hattie, having finished her supper, leaned contentedly back in her chair, and catechized her parent.

"Now, papa, we are here; how long are we going to stay?"

"Can't possibly tell," answered papa, carving with great vigor.

"But how long do you think?"

"Two weeks, probably three—perhaps four."

"Aggravating! And what am I to do while you are off on business?"

"Oh, what you always do: drum a little on the piano, and sew your clothes."

"Sew my clothes!" here said Miss Hattie in great indignation; "I'll do nothing of the kind."

"Then, anything you please."

A short pause, and then a coaxing little whisper. "You will take me to the theatre every night, of course?"

"Ugh! of course not!"

"You cross old thing!" was the undutiful speech that followed. "You are sleepy now, I know you are; you are always as cross as two sticks when you are sleepy."

Mr. Wallace answered by a yawn, and pushed his chair away from the table. "I will go to bed, then," said he; "perhaps I will be in a better humor in the morning."

Miss Hattie followed, shaking her curls a little disconsolately. "I see I shall have to look out for myself," she thought.

It was during that season when even Broadway is deserted; shops looking dusty and uninviting, the clerks standing unemployed behind the counters, and answering grumpily any meek requests made by shabby-looking ladies, arrayed principally in green veils, for hair-pins, Lisle thread gloves, and the like; at that season when the sound of the omnibusses, rolling slowly over the stones, had an emptiness plainly indicating the condition of the inside of the 'buss. As for the hotels, they were positively ghostly. The heavy tread of a porter, or the light trip of a maid on the muffled floors, being the only sounds heard.

My pretty heroine wandered through the parlors hour after hour, occasionally stopping at the windows, and drumming impatiently on the panes, and watching the little news-boys and apple-venders on the pavement below. True there was some consolation in the large mirrors that met her at every turn; I own there is an inexhaustible pleasure in seeing how one's dress hangs; but still a variety is pleasant. So the third day Miss Hattie determined to have a walk, in spite of the heat. Bonnet and mantle were donned, and gloves (No. 6, double buttons) were drawn on, and she sallied forth. Up and down the Fifth Avenue, through and through Madison Square, and then back to the hotel, "tired to death," of course. "I'll ride up to my room on the railway!" was her brave determination. Now you must know that this same railway was Miss Hattie's horror: she had a dreadful presentiment that if she once got on there would surely be an accident; she pictured to herself the car whizzing violently down the screw, and stopping at last with a great thump, mashing her poor little head, or, at the least, her bonnet; therefore, her "brave" determination.

"Are you going up?" she asked of the conductor.

"Yes, miss," was the answer. So Miss Hattie stepped in and seated herself, quaking.

Slowly they started; the network door closed as if by magic; Miss Hattie's eyes grew big with apprehension; but up they went safely to the next floor; and on the next floor stood a young man—a young man with a buff moustache, and a stylish suit of light gray. Now, the young man was the picture of listlessness, till he caught sight of the pretty face and auburn curls shining mistily through the network door; and as it came nearer, and the door opened again as if by magic, his before half-formed resolution ripened, and he cried out:

"Stop! I'm going up."

The rope was pulled, the car stopped, and in he got. Miss Hattie moved gently along the seat, and drew her skirts within bounds, thereby leaving oceans of room. But the young man preferred to stand; he could see so much better, and I am afraid he made good use of his eyes, for his little fellow-passenger blushed and swept her cheeks with her dark lashes, and almost forgot to have the car stopped in time to get out at the next landing; however, she managed it, and glided past the young man with a charming little bend, and a half-murmured apology for "incommoding him." Incommoding! he had almost a mind to go down on his knees, then and there, regardless of the conductor, and swear that he would rather she would walk over him than not. He restrained this insane impulse, and merely bowed, and stammered, and stroked his moustache; so she, seeing plainly that she had the advantage, got saucy again, and gave him a quick look from under her curls as she went off that she well knew would "finish him."

And after this young lady got to her room, what do you think she did? Seated herself in a comfortable chair by the window, and giggled—wickedly. Yes, she was well pleased with the morning's adventures, and found herself at once in her element. The chair was rocked easily back and forth for some time, and then suddenly stopped. Miss Hattie's brows knit in a pretty contemplating frown; she seemed in deep and earnest thought for a moment, and then a radiant smile dimpled about her mouth. "I'll wear my blue!" she said, aloud, and went to the bed with a novel, cuddled up, and read herself to sleep.

When Mr. Wallace came home at six o'clock and tapped at his daughter's door, it was opened by that young lady rather timidly. The truth is, she had been accustomed to wear only a plain little dress and linen collar, and she was afraid the gorgeous combination of silk and lace might meet with her father's disapprobation.

But Mr. Wallace was thinking too much of his dinner to notice; he merely said: "All ready, I see," and started down the hall. This naughty girl, bent on chaining the already conquered, sailed into the dining-room, taking in at a glance the whole room. There he was, a few tables off, pushing aside the white cravatted waiter, who unconsciously impeded his view. Miss Hattie ate her dinner gracefully and tranquilly, never once meeting the eager looks fixed upon her, and apparently entirely unaware that the giver of the looks ate nothing, and cruelly snubbed the aforesaid waiter. But as she was leaving the room, and passed close by him, a little look dropped from her gray eyes—a little look that said, "I have not forgotten you!" and it was returned by one that said as plainly, "I adore you."

After Miss Hattie's eleven o'clock breakfast, the next morning, she wandered as usual in the parlors, and then threw herself languidly into the corner of a sofa, pettishly wondering "what she was to do with herself?"

"It is raining, and of course I can't go out," she thought, with a despairing look at the heavy clouds.

Here I would remark that this is a very common complaint with girls. Can't go out because it rains? Nonsense! Lace on thick walking boots, loop your dress up over a bal-moral, put an aqua scutum around you, the hood over your bonnet, and be off. Why, there is real pleasure in a tramp on a rainy day, if you are arrayed in the very sensible manner I have described. There is one objection, however, I have not met. Miss Hattie sees it, for she stuck out the toe of her slipper, and looked at it dolefully. "If I did go out," was her inward remark, "I would have to put on boots, and I'd rather take a whipping than lace them up." Alas! for the laziness of the age! As I sit here, writing, a cousin of mine is hobbling about the room on one foot and one heel, one of her slippers lying out on the balcony where she kicked it a while ago, and she being absolutely too lazy to go and get it. There! a needle has pricked the unprotected foot, and she is nursing it, and whining, "Mary, do please go get my slipper; I know I'll have the lockjaw." But I refuse, and smile scornfully at the idea of lockjaw; she calls me "unfeeling," and has now fished the slipper from off the balcony with an umbrella handle, and is putting it on, bemoaning herself the while.

Miss Hattie was still regarding the toe of her little French kid, tapping it pathetically upon the carpet, when this pleasing occupation was arrested by a pair of arms being thrown around her waist, and a very hearty kiss pressing her lips. She gave a ridiculous little shriek, and then said, gladly—

"Why, you dear Bob! when did you come—and what brought you?"

"I have just got in by the boat," said dear Bob, "and I came because father wrote me that you were so lonely."

"How very nice in papa, and what grand fun we'll have together!"—and Miss Hattie gave her brother an ecstatic pinch, and her languor vanished. "And oh, Bob, I am in for a flirtation!"

"At your old tricks again, hey?" said Bob, approvingly.

Hattie nodded and murmured, "So handsome—light moustache," etc. etc.

Bob was used to this, and listened with praiseworthy attention for some time; and then interest flagged. "Come, now, Hal," he said, rising, shaking down his pants, and settling his collar; "come with me while I get in some rations, and we'll talk of this chap and everybody else another time."

Miss Hattie and Bob industriously "did" New York for the next few days, lingering away the mornings at the Dusseldorf Gallery, or Joupils; driving every afternoon in the Park, and patronizing the theatres in the evening, ending up with a petite souper at the Maison Dorée. Miss Hattie was, too, somewhat stage-struck, and "came" Miss Bateman more than was absolutely necessary: she invested the young man with the buff moustache (whom, by the way, she had not seen since her brother's arrival) with all the virtues of a Sir Thomas Clifford, and adopted her good papa for Master Walter. Unconscious Mr. Wallace! How horrified he would have been if he had known that he was sustaining all the time a theatrical character in the fertile imagination of his daughter!

One morning, Miss Hattie awoke with a headache. She lay still for a few minutes, hoping it would go off; but no, the dull throb continued, and she reluctantly concluded that she must keep her room and a lounge for the whole day. She told Bob mournfully, when he came to her door, that "she could not go out with him, but that he must go without her; for his presence would do her no good, only harm—all she needed being perfect quiet." So the reluctant Bob went off, and his poor little sister shut her two eyes and did her best endeavors to get well.

Bob stamped down stairs, buttoning up his great-coat, and inwardly bestowing many anathemas upon headaches in general. He betook himself to Broadway, and wandered morosely about until, suddenly, a bright thought struck him: he stepped into Maillard's and purchased enough goodies to last a regiment for a week (well knowing that his sister had a partiality for goodies), and then hurried home with them, entertaining strong hopes that they would act as a charm, and dispel the old headache.

As he was dashing up stairs, three steps at a time (entirely ignoring the vertical railway), he came full upon a gentleman leisurely descending—a gentleman with a buff moustache. Both started back with the usual apologies, and then as suddenly forward and into each other's arms, where they hugged and thumped each other for the space of ten minutes or so, sundry exclamations escaping both of "Bob, you good old fellow!" "Hunt, my dear old chum!" etc. "And now come up to my room, and we will have a regular pow-wow," says he of the moustache.

Bob acquiesced, only seizing a moment to rush excitedly into his sister's room, throw the bundle of goodies at her head, mutter something about "old chum, Hunt Fairfax," and be off again.

The "regular pow-wow" took place in style; both young men in dressing-gowns and smoking-caps, their meerschams emitting clouds of fragrant smoke, and their boots placed, very improperly I acknowledge, upon the window-sill. Old college-days were talked over, college scrapes recounted with great gusto, college flirtations freely discussed.

"And what became of your inamorata, Miss Sallie Hillard, Bob?" Hunt asks. "You were pretty far gone in that quarter when I last saw you; you threatened suicide, I remember."

"Ha, ha! so I did," answers Bob. "I was at her wedding a couple of months ago; pretty yet, but rather oldish. I don't believe you ever looked at a girl, a second time in your life, Hunt."

Hunt blushed guiltily.

"Not often, I own; but"—here he burst out in a fit of confidence—"I'll tell you what, Bob, I am fairly in love now."

"Not you?" Bob asked, incredulously.

"Fairly in love," Hunt continued, meditatively knocking the ashes out of his pipe, and proceeding to fill it again: "I'll tell you how it happened: I was standing by that vertical railway as the car was coming up, and as it neared me I discovered, seated demurely within it, the very prettiest girl I ever saw; such an odd style of beauty, gray eyes"—

"Eh!" said Bob, removing his feet from the window-sill.

"Fine eyebrows and lashes"—

"Yes, certainly," assented Bob, with a nod of his head.

"And auburn curls."

"By Jove, I thought so!" exclaimed Bob, almost leaping from the window. "Why, old fellow, it was my sister!"

"Not your sister?"

"Yes, my sister!"

"My dear fellow! shake hands."

"With all the pleasure in life."

"And when will you introduce me?"

"She has got an infernal headache to-day, but to-morrow I will."

"I may depend upon your influence, Bob?"

"No need to ask that, chum; nothing would delight me more."

To-morrow came, and the impatient Bob tapped, tapped at his sister's door, hurrying her to an alarming extent.

"Bob, why will you do so?" she cried at last; "I'll never get my hair curled."

"Girls take so long!" snapped Bob.

"I am coming right off," she said; and ten minutes after she kept her word.

"Oh, you are ready at last?" says Bob, who was leaning resignedly against the door-post.

"Don't sneer, you shocking boy! I dressed in no time at all."

Bob merely shrugged his shoulders. He well knew that when a girl declared she had dressed in "no time at all," after having been fully an hour engaged in the operation, that there was no persuading or reasoning her to the contrary.

Miss Hattie marched on in dignified silence, and when Bob, entirely quenched, asked if he might not bring an old chum of his to introduce to her, she said, "I know I don't look fit; I dressed in such a hurry; but I suppose you may bring him."

She took her accustomed lounge upon a sofa in one of the parlors, and waited with complete indifference the arrival of her brother and Fairfax; she even was guilty of a slight yawn, and a half wish that Bob's chum was in Jericho. But Bob's chum was not in Jericho, but there before her, bowing low.

Miss Hattie glanced up hurriedly—a buff moustache—a countenance well remembered.

Poor Miss Hattie! how wofully she blushed, and what awkward work she made of the little bend necessary in response to the "Hunt Fairfax, sister."

"I did not know that—er—Mr."—she stammered.

"Mr. Fairfax was here," assisted Bob. "I did not know it myself until yesterday, and would have told you, but kept it for an agreeable surprise."

"Oh, delightful!" murmured Miss Hattie, in anything but a delighted tone, and with a movement of the eyes about the room that showed a decided desire to escape.

"Bob and I have not met for two years," Mr. Fairfax said, in a very commonplace way, and sinking negligently down by Miss Hattie's side.

"Over two years, Hunt," observes Bob, with a sly wink to show his approbation of the course his friend was pursuing.

"Is it?" said that gentleman, languidly. And then, looking full into Hattie's face, with a slight smile, "Your sister reminds me somewhat of a lady I met once before."

"If he can play that game so can I," thought a quick little brain. "Ah!" she said, sweetly, "I don't remember ever to have had the pleasure of seeing you before."

Bob chuckled. "Had him there," he muttered beneath his breath.

Mr. Fairfax received this cutting thrust with nonchalance, and only said: "Perhaps not."

"You'll go with us to Wallack's to-night, Hunt?" Bob says.

Hattie blushingly thinks of her ideal, Sir Thomas Clifford, and does not urge the invitation. Mr. Fairfax, not noticing the omission, accepts as a matter of course.

"And what shall we do this morning?" he asks.

"Pray leave me out of your plans, gentlemen. I shall be busy all the morning,"—and Hattie nods graciously and makes for the door.

"That's all bosh," Bob said, pettishly, as she disappeared; "she has got nothing under the sun to do; girls are so whimsical. Let's be off."

A month had passed, and Mr. Wallace talked of returning home. "You will be glad to go, Hal," he said, totally blind to the consternation depicted in his daughter's face. "You have had a stupid time of it, poor child! To be sure it has been a little better since Bob came, and that young Fairfax, by the way, has been very kind."

Hattie only asked, in a faint little voice, "When they were going?"

"Most likely to-morrow," was the answer; "better pack your trunk."

Now Miss Hattie had been having anything but a stupid time; her brother and Fairfax had devoted themselves to her amusement, and consequently she had enjoyed herself entirely.

As for Fairfax, he was in a state of bliss indescribable. The few and slight favors that this little flirt allowed him were valued beyond anything; if she graciously accepted his assistance, instead of her brother's, in descending from the carriage, Fairfax was happy; or if, in a crowd at the theatre, she clung closely to his arm for protection, he was triumphant. But he was a wise man, and disguised his feelings, well knowing that if Miss Hattie knew the power she had over him she would exert it to a tormenting extent.

Hattie's face, as it was reflected in the mirror the morning they were to leave, almost startled her, so white it was. "Pshaw!" she half laughed, giving both cheeks a vigorous pinch, "one would think I was sorry to go, instead of being delighted," and she picked up her shawl and satchel, and gave a hurried glance around the room to see that she had forgotten nothing. "I'll take one more ride on the railway," she thought, as she closed her door reluctantly after her. "I hope the car will be going down."

The car was going down, and as Miss Hattie stepped in some one close behind followed. Hattie blushed rosily, as this "some one" seated himself beside her.

"And you are going?" Fairfax said, mournfully.

"And you care?" she asked, gently.

Fairfax looked up, full into her eyes. "Do you wish to know how much I care?"

"I can guess how much," she said, a little nervously.

"No, you cannot. I will tell you," and he leaned towards her gravely.

"Pray do not—not here," she whispered, with a frightened look at the conductor, who stood there whistling, entirely oblivious of the little scene.

"Then I may another time?" Fairfax asked, his eyes flashing.

Hattie saw that she had committed herself. "I only meant," she said, trying to laugh, "that—that—here we are."

Fairfax did not see the point, but the car had stopped, and Mr. Wallace and Bob stood waiting.

"Come, no time to be lost," Mr. Wallace said; "the stage is at the door; baggage gone half an hour ago. Mr. Fairfax, shall we bid you good-by, or will you see the last of us?"

"I will go down to the boat with you, sir."

And when they got down to the boat they found they had not, indeed, much time to lose: crowds pouring on and off, jostling each other, and everything in a grand state of hullabaloo and excitement.

"We can't hear ourselves speak here," said Bob; "come up on deck, Hunt."

"I am afraid there will not be time," Hunt said, hesitatingly.

"Oh yes, there will be," whispered a pleading voice; "do come."

What could Hunt do but go; and what wonder, late as it was, that Bob suddenly exclaimed: "We are off, by Jove!"

Fairfax sprang to the side of the boat. Sure enough, off they were, and too far off for a jump to be possible.

"Make the best of it, Hunt," Bob said, as well as he could for laughing. "I'll go shares with you till you can send for your baggage."

Hunt said he must take the next train back, and sat down resignedly. Mr. Wallace came up and expressed his pleasure at his misfortune, and declared they would keep him for a long visit. "When we once get you down there you will want to stay," he said.

Fairfax did not doubt that, and he glanced furtively at Hattie to try and discover what her feelings were upon the subject. There she sat, half sideways, her hand supporting her head, her smiling eyes fixed musingly upon the water; her curls, flashing bronze in the sunlight, shading her cheek; whether this pose was intentional or not, n'importe, the picture was very pretty and very consoling. Fairfax felt sure that she was not displeased at the thought of his going, so he brightened up wonderfully, and made himself very agreeable—and the little journey came soon to an end.

Two weeks passed quickly away; two very busy weeks they were; everything that could be crammed into two weeks was crammed in. Rides and drives, dances and pic-nics, and tea-parties; the whole neighborhood joined in and did their share, and Fairfax was the very life of it all. Never was a listless, lazy fellow, thinking only of the fit of his boot, or the color of his meerschaum, so transformed. In some things, however, he was unchangeable; he still fondly caressed his buff moustache, still walked with the saunter, and talked with the drawl habitual to him.

There must have been a secret understanding between him and Hattie, for there was a constant allusion to a meeting in a vertical railway, that sadly puzzled Miss Hattie's uninitiated friends. But certain I am that no further conversation upon the subject had taken place between them, or else how could it be that one day at the close of the two weeks, as Hunt lounged into the drawing-room and found Miss Hattie there, cuddled into a corner of a sofa in a dark corner of the room reading, as usual, a novel, and took his place close beside her, drawing the book from her little hands and clasping said little hands closely in his own, he whispered—

“And now, may I tell you how much I cared when you were about to leave me, or rather how much I care now that I am about to leave you?”

And Hattie answered with a little laugh and blush—

“Yes, now you may, there being no conductor within hearing.”

Which is proof positive that this was the continuation of the conversation commenced on the “Vertical Railway.”

fine a certain portion of a landscape or other subject. The importance of attending to this rule will be obvious to every person; and when we treat hereafter of sketching from Nature, you will then find how essential it is to adopt this method. When the boundary-line is formed, your next care should be to determine the relative positions of the principal objects, points, or features, etc.; and if you have attended to the instructions given in the former lessons, you will not have much difficulty in doing so by faint lines and dots. In a landscape you will have to fix the height of the horizon, which should be done by first placing a dot at each side of the boundary-line, and then, if you have judged the distance correctly, uniting the two by a faint line drawn through the picture; this is called the horizontal line. When that has been done, determine the nearest conspicuous object to the boundary-line, its height, width, and relative position to the horizontal line and other objects; then fix the position of the trees, distance, and foreground, by means of faint outlines or dots, or both, taking care to observe their relative situations, inclinations, and measurements are regulated by their proximity to the boundary, horizontal, and base lines of the picture; the last-mentioned line being the bottom or lower boundary-line of the drawing.

In Fig. 8 you were directed to draw a line perpendicular to the horizontal ones; this was done for the purpose of enabling you to judge the relative distances of the several angles of the pyramid from each other; and you will find it very useful to draw a line through the centre of any object that you have to copy, because it serves as a guide to the proper disposition of the several other parts. Of course, as you be-

FIFTH LESSON.

BEFORE submitting the examples we have prepared for this lesson, it will be necessary to make a few observations upon copying.

We will suppose that you have to copy a drawing, perhaps an architectural one. How would you commence? Most probably differently from your neighbor, who would also commence differently from his neighbor, and so on, unless guided by correct principles. Do not imagine that what we state is without foundation—it is perfectly true; for, not long since, we placed two drawings of the same subject before four pupils, and requested them to copy them, and each one commenced differently. One of them began at the right-hand side, the other at the left, another at the top, and the fourth in the centre of the drawing. What could illustrate more forcibly than these blunders that attention to the rules of the art is absolutely necessary?

You ask, “How am I to commence?” and to this question we will at once reply. First, inclose a certain space by means of four lines, if for a landscape; or by an oval or circular line, if for a portrait, etc.: this is called the boundary line of the drawing, and is used to con-come more and more proficient in the art, this will not be always necessary.

We will now commence some practical illustrations of the preceding remarks. You are required to draw Fig. 20, which is a centre-piece for a border, or an ornamental panel. Fig. 21 is a diagram illustrating the method of doing so, which is thus: First draw three horizontal lines, a b, c d, e f, and bisect them with the perpendicular line g h. You have only to determine the relative distances of each point by means of dots, and to draw the curved and straight lines faintly, as shown in Fig. 21, and afterwards to rub out the superfluous lines, and strengthen the outline by broad touches with an HB pencil.

We have found it an excellent plan to cut the India-rubber, used for rubbing out architectural and fine drawing, in a triangular shape, because the angles enable us to remove very small lines or dots. The India-rubber should not be more than one-fourth or three-sevenths of an inch thick.

Our next example is of a different character, being the outline of an antique vase (Fig. 22).

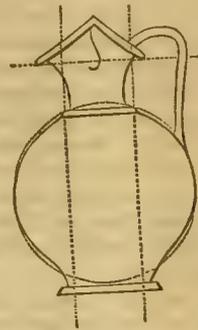

Fig. 22.

In drawing this figure, a circle is first of all drawn, and then it is divided by two perpen-

lines are sufficient to enable the pupil to construct the figure with ease.

Our next exercises are taken from antique vases, and given without any diagrammatic illustrations to enable the pupil to construct them; because, having already given ample directions, we wish our pupils to think for themselves, so as to be able to act at times without the aid of an instructor.

LINES.

(Affectionately inscribed to Mrs. J. H. LAWS, of Cincinnati, Ohio.)

BY MRS. JENNIE D. LANGDON.

FATHER, thy will be done!

Even though our hearts with deepest sorrow mourn,
And tears will flow for him, our darling one
To his long slumber borne.

How peacefully he lies—

After those weary days and nights of pain,
With the white lids closed o'er his violet eyes,
Never to weep again!

Upon his baby brow,

So high and fair, no cloud may ever rest,
Nor sin nor sorrow reach him nestling now
On our dear Saviour's breast.

"Not lost, but gone before!"

Dear sister, to thy loving care once given—
Now safely landed on the other shore,
He waits for thee in heaven.

If the talent of ridicule were employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, it might be of some use to the world; but, instead of this, we find that it is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good sense, by attacking everything that is solemn and serious, decent and praiseworthy, in human life.

AUNT SOPHIE'S VISITS.—NO. XV.

BY THE LATE LUCY N. GODFREY

UNCLE CHARLES, Aunt Sophie, and Willie were in their places at the tea-table, and the other members of the family were rapidly taking theirs, when Carrie exclaimed:—

"Where's Henry? He was in a hurry for his supper a half hour ago!"

"The mails were not in when I came; so I sent him to the office," replied her father, adding, a little later: "Here he comes! You have been spry, my boy."

"Yes, I was hungry," replied Henry, eyeing the table, as he unbuckled and placed in his cap the strap he had, boylike, fastened about him, as an indication of his eagerness for supper.

"You will do well to rest a minute, my son," said Aunt Sophie. "I am sorry you ran so, just before tea."

"But I got a letter from Mr. Chapelle, and I should think there would be a note in it for me," said the boy, apologetically.

"There are two for you, and one for Emma," replied Mr. Laselle, as he handed the notes, and laid the unopened business letters aside.

"They are all well, mother," he continued, "and wishing to see you and me at their house as soon as convenient."

"And me, too; they all want me to come!" exclaimed Henry, glancing up from his notes.

"Hettie and Lizzie urge me to come also, and Carrie, if there is a chance for both of us," said Emma, hesitating, and passing her note to Carrie, at the last clause.

"Oh, dear! Why can't I have an invitation?" said Edward.

"You have one, my son; Mr. Chapelle speaks particularly of you, as he urges me to bring as many of the family as possible. He is at length about settling himself in business, and he wishes my advice and assistance in making the necessary arrangements."

"Can you leave to go?" asked Aunt Sophie.

"Oh yes; I must go. Mr. Chapelle was so kind a neighbor that he has a brother's claim. Willie can attend to the office, for I shall be where he can write daily, or telegraph, if need be. But who will go with me? Mother, of course."

There was silence among the eager-looking young faces, till Uncle Charles, laughing, said:—

"Now don't all speak at once; commence at the oldest. What say you, Willie? I will take two of the children; which shall go?"

"Henry, for one, that I may not have the risk of his getting hurt on my hands," was the ready reply.

"That's it! Hurrah! When shall we start?" cried Henry, jumping up from the table.

"Have you forgotten your supper?" said his mother, while Edward hinted the impropriety of pocketing his strap, since he would be likely to need it again soon.

"Oh, I don't want anything to eat," he answered to both, continuing, impatiently: "Please, when shall we start? I want to go and tell Johnnie Holt, because he thinks it is such a big thing that he is going half a dozen miles to his grandpa's next week."

"His grandfather lives twenty miles from here," said Aunt Sophie, with a bit of rebuke in her tone, while the careful Emma handed him a piece of paper, bidding him take a bun or two from the table, lest he should again find it necessary to beg a cracker at bedtime. Henry folded his buns, and stood demurely, cap in hand, till Uncle Charles said:—

"Well, sonny, I think, if there's nothing unusual in the way, and it pleases your mother, we will start in the first train day after to-morrow."

"I have no objections," said Mrs. Laselle.

"Goody! goody! only day after to-morrow! I shall go quicker than Johnnie! But who will go, too?—Edward?"

"No," replied the youth; "I can help Willie some, can't I?"

"Yes, a great deal," replied Willie, affectionately.

"What say you, Emma?" asked her father.

"As you and mother think best. I suppose Carrie wants to go quite as much as I do, perhaps more, and I went away last."

"Yes; but you did not go far, and the girls evidently prefer your coming," promptly replied Carrie.

"How is it with the boys, do you suppose?" archly questioned Edward; but he had no further answer than the reproving glance of his mother, and the blushes upon Carrie's face, as she continued:—

"Besides, I'd rather stay at home, for Jennie Miles will be fourteen next Tuesday, and I would not miss her birthday party for anything."

"Then Emma will go?" said the eager Henry; and, as his sister's glad, bright eyes answered him, he sped away to tell his companions of the projected visit; while the others, as usual, lingered long over the social meal.

Two days later, glad greetings were exchanged between our friends and the Chapelles. No tie of kindred bound the two families; but the elders had to friendship in early life added constant, kindly, neighborly intercourse for near a score of years, while the children had grown together, sharing the same sports and tasks, till the wider separation of their homes a year before, by the removal of Mr. Chapelle, had partially checked the intimacy which they tried to keep up by frequent letters between the elder, and the inclosed notes of the younger members of each family.

"This seems like the good old times. I only wish all the children could have come," said Mr. Chapelle, looking around upon his guests, with evident satisfaction, as they were seated at table.

"Yes," echoed his wife; "I believe we all yet love the old home the better."

"But you seem very pleasantly situated here," said Uncle Charles.

"O yes," replied the host; "we have built us a far more splendid home, and decked its rooms with the paintings we love, rare statuettes, and elegant furniture; but, unfortunately, we cannot buy the dear old associations. Near twenty years of life made the old place rich in them; I did not realize how rich till I came away from it. However, no one else could so readily bring those treasures into our new home as yourselves, since you can but remind us of many white days in memory's calendars."

"And Sophie always says I ought to learn to love this home, you know, father," said Mrs. Chapelle; "so I expect she will do her best to make me do so."

"She need make no unusual effort, if she will only stay long enough," gallantly responded the gentleman.

"At your ages," remarked Uncle Charles, "you will readily adapt yourselves to the new surroundings, and very soon this home will be almost as rich in untransferable wealth as was the other. But I always pity old people, who are led by circumstances, or mistaken inclinations, to change their dwelling. The new house never satisfies grandma; the cheerful, sunny room, with its fresh paper and paint, is all very nice; but it isn't home to her or to grandpa, who turns from the marble bowl, with the hot and cold water ready to flow at his touch, to long for the old rough-hewn trough by the pump in the yard. Young people delight in new things and new surroundings; but the old, whose circle of living friends is necessarily narrowing, need the resources of memory, and hence crave such surroundings as shall constantly remind them of departed friends and joys."

"But," responded Annt Sophie, "I do not think that their love for time-honored things and customs is always wholly the result of their prizing the old associations, though that it is partially so is beyond question. Aged people do not, I suppose, like to feel that they are losing capabilities they have rejoiced in any better than the rest of us. We know how, when we are flattering ourselves that we have regained our strength after illness, we love to think, or, better still, hear other people say: 'You cannot open that window, because it is swollen by the dampness;' or, 'That is heavier than usual; so you could not expect to lift it alone.' We want to believe we are strong; it is much pleasanter to think that changes, for the worse, are in things about us than in ourselves. If, at such times, we were moved into new houses, I am afraid we should be ready to complain of the conveniences we should have no capacity for appreciating. So with our good old grandma. There was no contrast between the old, half dingy rooms and herself; but she must wake to the fact that she is failing, if she acknowledges that the new ones are better. So with grandpa. As he quivers with the cold at the old pump, he loves to remember how his hands and face used to glow beneath the pure water, and he will not recognize this morning's cold as anything more than a temporary bit of rheumatism; and when the old pump is torn away, he wholly forgets all the late chills at the trough, and, remembering only the exhilarating baths there, he finds the stream from the bright faucet too small; the warm water only makes him feel the cold the more; in fact, anything is wrong in his view, rather than he losing the power to enjoy."

"I am surprised," replied Mr. Chapelle, "to hear you imply that old people lose capacity for enjoyment. You used to say that we should grow happier with advancing years."

"I think I never said that one's capacity for physical enjoyment increased with age. It is wholly against fact," said Aunt Sophie.

"May we hear of the superior enjoyments of the aged, which are not against facts?" queried Mr. Chapelle, almost sarcastically, for it had been his lot in early life to reside with a querulous, unhappy old couple, whose days were filled with weariness and complaint, and nights with unrest.

Aunt Sophie's face glowed with bright memories, as she asked: "Do you remember old Mrs. Sistaire, who lived with her granddaughter, in the little brown cottage next the meeting-house, when we were children?"

"O yes. I went to school a little while to the bright little schoolma'am, and of course saw her pious old grandmother often. I used to think she was a rare old Methodist; but, for all that, we boys liked her."

"Of course you loved her; every child did. She was the happiest person I ever knew—the only one I ever came near envying, I believe."

"You envy old Dame Sistaire in her short gown and petticoat? It seems ridiculous," laughed Mr. Chapelle.

"Not ridiculous in the least, if you look at it in one light," replied Aunt Sophie, seriously. "I was an earnest, conscientious little girl, already loving our holy Saviour and his omnipotent Father with reverent, childish love, but not at all sure of their tender love for me. She knew God was her Father, and she trusted in the glorious promises, with which her memory was stored, and her lips familiar. She was triumphantly finishing the course I longed to run. It was not wonderful that, when I saw her always happy, always full of cheerfulness and love, repeating psalms and joyful hymns, when any other would have been fretting over her trials, I longed to be as sure that God was 'my shield, my strength, and my redeemer' as was she. Her happiness was evident to all about her, for it was real, above all the accidents of life, independent of the shafts of death. It was such happiness as no child might share—the happiness of looking back and seeing a holy Father's tender guidance through all the years of a long life, the happiness of looking forward, knowing that the same infinitely loving hand shall lead ever onward and upward unto Himself. I am glad that I knew her poverty, her frequent times of illness, and her want of even a common education, for thus the exceeding preciousness of the true riches was made more manifest."

"If," replied Mr. Chapelle, "I admit that Dame Sistaire was happier in age than in her youth, and I can tell you of forty wretched old people, who look regretfully upon the past, you certainly will not put your one observation against my many."

"I beg your pardon, but I shall," said Aunt Sophie; "or, rather, if I had no example, I should still believe that happiness must increase, perhaps I should say improve in quality, with the years of every child of our Father, who is wholly and intelligently true to himself and his duty. Remember, I do not say old people are happier than young, but that they should be, they may be, and will be, if they have lived true Christian lives, and constantly enlarged their higher capacities, as each of us may do. Those, who have abused or dwarfed their natures, may have no larger mental or spiritual capacities than in youth, and such must have a poor, pitiful old age. Childhood is the time when we can sport with the lambs and kittens, with a joy but little above that they manifest, and yet very satisfying to us then. Later, we may find added pleasure in recognizing and cultivating those noble intellectual powers, which help us to exult upon the mountain tops of thought. In maturity we may command a still better kind of happiness, in our activity and its accompanying sense of power; but through these seasons there will be a poverty in our joy, if we neglect our highest and best powers; how much more will there be such in age, when the physical nature has lost its freshness and elasticity, and mere intellectual activity ceases to satisfy; then the spirit should assert its superiority and supremacy, and thus a man's last days become his best days."

"It is certainly a very pleasant ideal of age," remarked Mr. Chapelle's eldest son, Theodore, who had listened with interest to the conversation, and was not disposed to let the thread of it drop, as they were leaving the table.

"Make it yours, my young friend," replied Aunt Sophie, "and then bend your energies towards realizing it a half century hence. With our Father's ever-ready help, you need not fail, for our highest, noblest ideals fall infinitely below His thoughts, and if in youth we trustfully claim His fatherly guidance, He will lead us far above our early selves to joyful though partial sympathy with Him. If all our young people could adequately realize the nobility of our nature, if they could have that faith in God and good which would lead them to make their lower capacities work healthily instead of ruling, the millennium would scarcely be many generations in the future."

"I am not sure that I understand you," said Theodore.

"Do you understand the words of St. Paul, when he says, 'He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting?'" asked Aunt Sophie, in reply.

The young man hesitated a moment, and then replied: "I cannot say I ever devoted any thought to them, or supposed them anything more than an indefinite, figurative expression I might perhaps study out by and by, when I shall have more leisure for such things."

"But did you ever realize that you never will have more leisure? You are forming tastes now, which must monopolize your attention, sowing seed which you must reap. If you devote all your youth to sowing to the body and mind, can you expect to reap the fruits of the Spirit in old age, or at death?"

"Yet you always urged upon us care of our health; isn't that sowing to the flesh?" asked Lizzie.

"No, indeed," replied Aunt Sophie. "Because I have talked with you of the infinite value of the immortal souls of your household servants, and urged upon you intelligent care for them, you never supposed their improvement of the same importance to you as your own, did you? Just so, I might talk, or we might study a great while profitably of your physical capacities, and their best development, for it is evident none of us have yet reached our full perfection as physical beings, and from this cause reap many a penalty of pain. I might also encourage you in the widest mental culture by truthful assurances of ample fruit of happiness, and yet I would not have you forget that, if I could say all the truth at once, the most earnest portion of each appeal to you would be in behalf of your spiritual natures. We cannot abuse, by neglect or otherwise, any capacity of our noble, threefold nature without loss to ourselves; and the higher the capacity neglected, the greater and probably the more permanent that loss. This seems unreal to you young people, yet, if you will look about you, you will see all kinds of sowing and reaping going on, and if your eyes are keen enough, you can but acknowledge that each seed bears fruit after its kind."

"But, Mrs. Laselle," said Theodore, earnestly, "my eyes are not keen; I cannot even see what kind of seed I have been sowing. I want to do about right, I am sure; but I like to have a good time with my companions, and I have always thought it would be time enough to 'get religion' by and by. It is certainly very respectable and desirable for elderly people; but it seems to tie up the young too closely for enjoyment."

"I have none of the sympathy, which experience gives, in 'getting religion,'" replied Aunt Sophie. "I am glad that there is this way open for those who have commenced wrong; but to me that trust in God seems best, which, beginning its growth in the heart in childhood, leads its happy possessor into such paths of enjoyment that he will never have a taste for any save pure pleasures. I cannot acknowledge that religion, real love to God, can be any restraint. 'Perfect love casteth out fear;' the laws of morality may be as chains about him who loves the evil; but he who intensely loves the good works with God, and prizes his laws as helps, safeguards, and warnings. When you first began to go to school, in the old red school-house, the necessary rules were as needless and cruel restraints to you. If you had not perfect confidence in the teacher, you thought a whisper or bit of play could do no harm; but as you grew older, and learned to love study, you loved the discipline, too, which gave you quiet for it, and the farther you advanced mentally, the more you prized the rules, which you could now see had been necessary to your progress. As we know that all God's laws are righteous ones, trustful obedience is our first duty, and thus His law is our schoolmaster, teaching us of Christ, until we rise to larger liberty as children of the Most High."

"Thank you," responded Theodore, "for making those words of St. Paul significant to me. Will you please to illustrate his figure of sowing to the flesh and the Spirit, before the gas is lighted?"

"I shall be glad to try; but the brief time will give me no chance to do justice to the subject. First, sowing to the flesh—placing sensual gratification in the first place. The mother often unconsciously commences her darling's training for the degradation which afterwards wrings her heart. She forgets how susceptible he is to all pure and beautiful things; she neglects to teach him to love the birds, the flowers, and the bright sunset clouds as the works of the good God; she cannot find time to answer his wondering questions, or tell him the Bible stories every child loves intuitively. She may also be injudicious sometimes in her praise, her rewards, and her punishments: praising him more for care of his clothes than his conscience, bestowing sweetmeats and goodies as rewards, and withholding them as punishments, and thus making them of undue consequence to him. She loves to see his sprightly manifestations of pleasure at sight of the toothsome morsel, and then to gratify the tastes for which he so quickly learns to demand farther indulgence. She enjoys seeing him eat the delicacy better than eating it herself, for her enjoyment is higher; and thus it soon becomes a matter of course that he shall monopolize her share of the rarities at the table. As he grows older, he finds the cakes, pies, and sweetmeats in their places, and sadly annoys the mother, who has fostered his appetites, by appropriating them to himself. Perhaps she resists, or places the coveted eatables under lock and key; but the pampered appetites are not thus removed, the old motives are still strong. The boy cannot reasonably be expected to fully recognize the higher powers, which have been neglected. He is ready now to sow bountifully for himself. His selfish greed for something good to eat makes him disagreeable at home, and constantly conflicts with his pride abroad. He meets others like himself; they have found tobacco a comfort. He tries it, and exults. It is a 'solace' for many longings. He knows it is abominably filthy, but he never intends to descend to halfpenny pipes, and loathsome, uncut twists. Neither does he wish to disgust the ladies. He has, at first, fine perfumes for his breath, if he is old enough to call upon them; but soon the dear, delightful weed becomes so pleasant to him, that he cannot conceive it disagreeable to them, and he coolly enters their drawing-rooms with the vile stuff in his mouth, and—I say it in pity and shame for my misguided sex—the girls, thinking that all the young men smoke and chew, express no dislike to it."

"I beg your pardon, mother, for interrupting," exclaimed Emma; "but I don't want you to say the girls don't dislike tobacco; we hate it up and down—a thousand times more than you do, because we have not yet your large comprehension that sees everything as a work of God, and we despise the man who is a slave to it incalculably more than you, because we have not your pity for him, or your large charity. Anybody would hate tobacco to have heard that poor woman talk, who fell sick at our door and was buried from our home last fall. Please tell them the story." And she stopped, her voice quivering with emotion.

"It was only too common a story, my dear, in many of its particulars, for it is often a scarcely discernible step from tobacco to brandy; and yet it is one which can never be wholly retraced. The husband of our unfortunate friend must have been a marked example of sowing to the flesh, since he sowed other fruit so sparingly, yet his wife could never look behind his tobacco for the cause of his degradation. If he could have stopped chewing, he would never have drank, she said, for she was sure that tobacco caused the unnatural appetite which brandy fed, till his fate was sealed. Accustomed to every luxury, till they were almost as necessities to her, for she was the idolized only daughter of one of our merchant princes, she married at eighteen, and was for a brief time the happy mistress of the elegant home her father had loved to provide. Her handsome husband's passion for her measured the capacity of his nature, and, in her inexperience, she fancied it was deep and pure as her love for him. Life was as a sweet dream of paradise to her. Her husband had scarce a fault in her eyes, save that he had learned in his bachelor days to chew tobacco. How she pitied him that he had done so! and he, knowing her dislike for the habit, rarely indulged in it in her presence; he was sorry it was pleasant to him, and tried to break off its indulgence to please her, but yielded to the appetite, and thence she noted his downward course. Brandy soon mingled with his tainted breath, and not long was either banished from her parlors or even boudoir. Partially blinded as she was, her bright dreams soon faded. Strong drink led him into all manner of vices. With specious pretexts he beguiled her father into such indorsements as wrought his pecuniary ruin; but the old man happily died before realizing the extent of their misfortune. This was sorry comfort for the frail woman, whose only remaining support was weaker than a broken reed. Sorrows followed thick; children were born and died in her wretched home. Then she learned that her husband had taken that guilty step from drinking to excess which alone may annul a marriage vow; but at this stage of affairs, the miserable man, who had sowed lavishly to the flesh, manifestly reaped corruption. He was seized by a vile and loathsome disease, and the patient wife, already thinking to fly, lingered through the long torture, ministering all she could to him whose outward self she could but loathe. Care for him broke her constitution, for it had been sadly weakened by previous suffering; and when, after his death, kind neighbors proffered aid, that she might go to some wealthy relatives, she was wholly unfit for the journey. Her anxiety to undertake it supported her in starting; but she soon found herself unable to go on, and a brief illness at a public house so exhausted her funds that she determined on walking a few miles across the country to a cheaper route. It so happened that she fell exhausted at our door, and it was our privilege to care for her in that sickness which opened the pearly 'gates' for her. She won our love, and we were amply repaid for the care we enjoyed bestowing, in that our experiences of life seemed to be enlarged by our hearty sympathy with her. It is not wonderful that Emma and Carrie are ready to exclaim they hate tobacco; but Mr. Snell's case was not one I would have chosen to exemplify sowing to the flesh, for it was an extreme one. Not all, who seek gratification for a morbid palate, descend to drunkenness or licentiousness; but, just in proportion as one listens to appetite, in preference to reason and conscience, making the gratification of the senses an aim in life to the exclusion of higher ones, is his nature degraded. However, I do not think St. Paul refers to disease or bodily corruption only in the text; there is a deeper meaning: He who yields to the sway of the senses, and ignores higher capacities, gives these no means or conditions of growth. The seed which is put in the ground, and then deprived of its needed nourishment by the less valuable plant which grows at its side, decays and dies without appearing above the soil, or lives a feeble, starved life at the side of its ever-encroaching companion, according to the comparative strength of both. There are in the world only too many puny, withering souls in suffering contact with morbidly developed sensual natures; and I fully believe that tobacco is a most potent agent in causing this state of things. At any rate, we women do well to despise it, and teach our children to do so, for it annoys us everywhere. We may learn to like the fragrance of a prime cigar, from its associations with the friends we love to greet; we may not notice the breath of the dainty chewer of the fine cut; but let us not forget that the fragrant cigar in the hands of youth may bring the foul pipe to the lips of age, and that daintiness in chewing the weed cannot in the nature of things be permanent. As a sex we should set ourselves to make the most of our influence in preventing any from using it who have not already commenced. Few intelligent old smokers, with higher tastes, but regret having learned to crave the indulgence, for it is expensive and unprofitable. Still fewer are the chewers who, after a lapse of ten years, are not sorry they formed the habit, unless they have been led by it to lower vices."

"But," said Hettie, "you say nothing of the old women snuff-takers." And Aunt Sophie replied:—

"They, too, will add their warnings against the bewitching habit, as they make excuses for their self-indulgence. Almost all took it first for catarrh, or under some peculiar circumstances; but they would be glad if they did not like it; nevertheless, the habit unconsciously grows upon them, if they do not make constant resistance. Who wants to be the slave of such an encroaching appetite? Let us have all charity for those who have been ensnared, for their temptations might have conquered us; but let us use our influence against this enemy of the best interests of our fellows. However, we cannot linger now upon this fruitful theme. Just as some live for sensual gratification, others starve all except mental capacities. Their life is in their books; a kind of dried, petrified semblance of life rather than life itself. However, men respect them, but they never love them. Intellectual heights are cold, bleak, and bare, unless they glow and bloom in the light of love. Mere knowledge never made a man happy for any length of time. The Christian botanist, who analyzes the wayside flower his Father has made, finds a purer pleasure in the act than an infidel philosopher could do in solving all the mysteries of the Alps. Age finds the mere scholar eminently respectable, but in no wise satisfied. He has walked far in the field of knowledge; but at each advancing step the horizon has receded till he realizes the infinity of its treasures; and now, weary and discouraged, his labor seems well nigh lost. But if he has also sowed to the Spirit—if he trusts in that everlasting Father, in whose image he was made, the dimness and the mystery, which prove the inexhaustibleness of the stores of knowledge, will give him new delight, since with the eye of faith he can see himself, walking ever onward, and gathering abundantly. More than this, if his heart be alive with love to God and love to man, there can be no barrenness, no dissatisfaction in his life. It matters little what the outward surroundings of the aged saint may be; he has sowed to the Spirit, and he reaps life. How significant the word! Every noble germ of a faculty, which the Creator intrusted to him, is ready to expand in the light of immortality; none are crushed, none corrupted, and the glorious light of heaven is so reflected on this side the shadowy valley that even now he rejoices in it. If poverty comes, he is rich; if bereavement comes, he clings the closer to the bright promises he loves, exclaiming, from his full heart: 'Though He slay me and all I love, yet will I trust in Him!' and this trust is happiness—an ever-increasing happiness. Make it yours now, my young friends; earnestly love the right, and strive to do it, and, though you may often fail, your onward course will be sure. Strength will come as reward for effort. Be as merry as you choose; but be in earnest. Resolve that your lives shall be blessings to yourselves and others; and humbly and constantly ask your heavenly Father's guidance, that they may become such."

As Hettie was lighting the room, Theodore said, huskily:—

"I thank you a thousand times. I will remember your words." And, bowing rapidly to Mrs. Laselle, left the room. As soon as he was beyond hearing, Lizzie exclaimed:—

"Your talk against tobacco was a capital hit on Theodore. He has tried once to learn to use it, but it made him deathly sick, and he gave it up for that time, though he said then he should try it again before going back to college, for his chin delights in it."

"Yes," said Hettie, "and from the few words I overheard between him and Tom Derby, I think they intend going to a saloon to try it to-night. I do hope he will not go. I think he has changed a great deal during the last year. He doesn't seem so happy as he used."

"I am sure he laughs often enough," replied Lizzie.

"Yes," said her sister; "but it is not his old merry laugh; he seems to be thinking of something all the time—"

"What! are you speaking of Theodore?" said Mrs. Chapelle, as she seated herself for the evening. "Of course he is thinking of his books; they always were victuals and drink to him."

"But they were never play, as I remember; and he is a social boy. But let us hear more of our good friends in the old place," said Mr. Chapelle, and thus the conversation was turned. But when, a little time after, Aunt Sophie and Hettie heard the bell ring, the latter glided from the room. She soon returned, and whispered to Mrs. Laselle that Theodore had sent word to young Derby, by the servant, that there was company in the house; he did not wish to leave.

It was nearly two hours, however, before the young man came to the parlor. Then Aunt Sophie's quick eye saw the traces of keen suffering upon his face; but she saw as clearly that there was peace now.

Theodore found opportunity, during this visit, for one more earnest conversation with Aunt Sophie, in which, as there were no listeners, he spoke freely of his needs, his powerful temptations, and the instances in which he had yielded to them. She met him with such sympathy and encouragement as strengthened all his good resolves, and also promised to willingly receive, and sincerely answer all the letters he should wish to write to her. Theodore many times availed himself of this privilege, even before he commenced writing directly to Carrie, and afterwards the letters of his lady-love often contained a note to her mother. Aunt Sophie enjoyed the correspondence which gave him a son's place in her affection and respect before he could claim it in reality.

More than once in the years which have followed, as Aunt Sophie has visited at the pleasant home of Theodore and Carrie Chapelle, or they have been eagerly welcomed at her own, earnest, eloquent words from the gentleman's lips, or animated accounts of his noble deeds from those of his wife, have made her heart thrill with gratitude to the great Disposer that, when he stood upon the brink of a precipice, her voice had power through her earnestness and the potent influence of all sweet, childish associations, to waken him, and afterward to encourage him in the upward way, where he now walks so nobly.

CALL ME THINE OWN.

BY KATE HARRINGTON.

CALL me thine own, dearest—

Call me thine own;

Whisper it softly,

In love's gentlest tone;

Murmur it over

In silence of night;

Tenderly breathe it

In morn's rosy light.

Nought in this wide world can soothe like thy tone;

Then call me thine own, dearest—call me thine own.

Call me thine own, darling—

Dearer to me

Are such words than bright pearls

From the depth of the sea;

Like nectar the sweetest,

Of-tasted before,

My soul drinks them in,

And keeps thirsting for more.

O the purest of bliss my fond heart e'er has known

Has been born of this thought: thou hast called me thine own.

Then call me thine own, love:

Emboldened with thy breath,

These accents will linger

To cheer me till death.

Whether severed by fate

From the dearest and best,

Or in rapture untold

I recline on thy breast,

Still, still round my path let this blessing be strewn,

That thou hast, dost, and ever wilt call me thine own.

NOVELTIES FOR OCTOBER.

RIDING JACKET, CAP, CHEMISSETTE, HEADRESS, ETC.

Fig. 1.

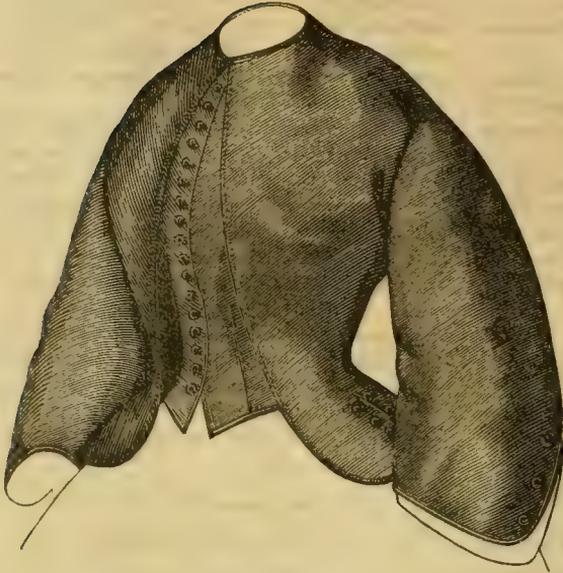

Fig. 2.

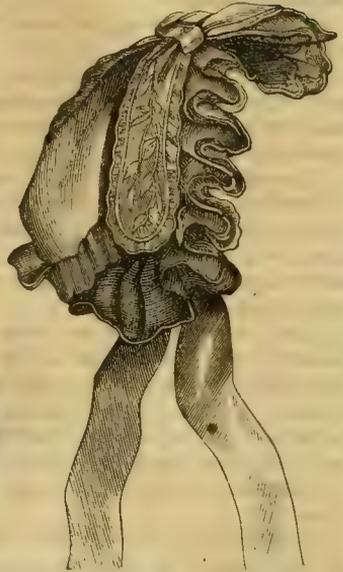

Fig. 1.—Riding jacket, made of cloth or alpaca. The vest can be of the same material as the jacket, or of piqué.

Fig. 2.—French cap, made of embroidered muslin, and trimmed with mauve ribbons. One of the latest styles.

Fig. 3.

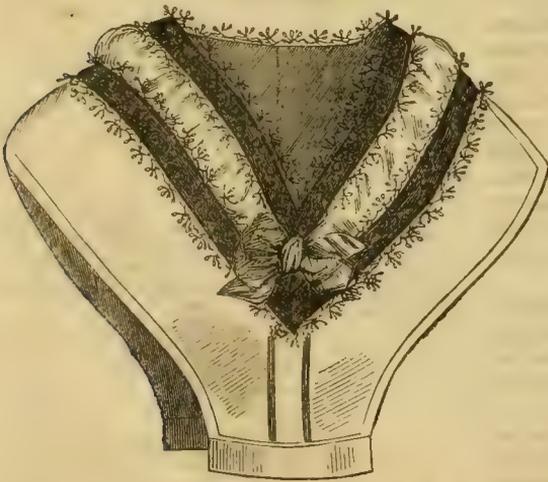

Fig. 4.

Fig. 3 is a fancy chemisette, trimmed with braided silk and lace.

Fig. 4.—Headdress, composed of lace and rose sublime ribbon.

Fig. 5.

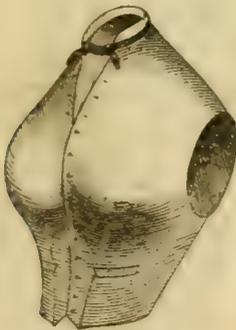

Fig. 5 is a dress for a child from three to five years old. It is made of blue cashmere, with applications of white merino, braided with black mohair braid.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT,

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

Ladies' Vest.—A new and very becoming addition to the wardrobe this season is the vest. It is intended to be worn under an open jacket, and is made to fit the form closely round the waist; it is fastened with flat gold buttons to within four inches of the top, where it is left open sufficiently to show a handsome chemisette. The material used is fine cloth or cassimere; the colors chiefly in demand are buff, fawn color, and white.

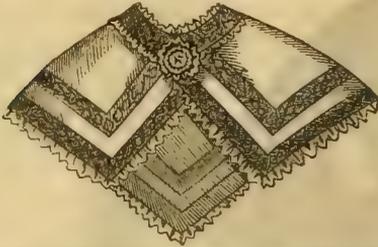

It is worn with a small standing collar, and a narrow silk neck-tie. It is so entirely new, elegant, and attractive, that it will form one of the chief features of the season.

Lavinia Sleeve.—Half flowing sleeve, plaited with a large double box plait on the shoulder, and trimmed with a cuff cut in points, and edged with plaited ribbon, the cuff carried up the front of the arm to the setting in of the sleeve. This sleeve is cut plain and flowing; it is then plaited at the seam so as to set it to the form of the arm, and the bottom of the sleeve drawn into a narrow band the size of the cuff, which is set on plain.

Lace Cape.—A simple and becoming little cape to be worn with a low-necked dress. It is made of double illusion or figured net, and trimmed with two rows of velvet, or ribbon; the cape finished on the edge with a pretty lace.

The Giraldine.—This cloak is a very pretty garment for a young lady of ten or twelve years. It resembles a circular with pelerine, but is not quite so full, being cut with seams just behind the shoulders, to set it closer to the figure; the pelerine is braided with an elaborate and effective pattern, and forms a graceful and becoming finish to the cloak; the armholes are also trimmed with a pretty braid pattern.

BRAIDED TOP OF PINCUSHION.

LADY'S PURSE.

(See engraving, page 304.)

Materials—Two skeins of bright blue; two skeins of white fine purse silk; two bunches of gold, and two of steel beads, No. 4; one pair of knitting-pins, No. 18.

With blue silk and steel beads cast on forty-eight stitches, work four plain rows, then commence the pattern thus:—

1st row.—Make 1, purl 2 together, *, pass down 14 beads, keep them under the thumb, make 1, purl 2 together, make 1, purl 2 together; repeat from *.

2d.—The return row to be worked in the same stitch, but without beads.

3d.—As the first, only pass down 13 beads instead of 14. Every row the same with 1 bead less, until only 2 beads remain; then work the return row, and join on the white silk and gold beads. *, pass down 14 beads, make 1, purl 2 together, make 1, purl 2 together; repeat from *. The other row same as the blue and steel; then repeat the blue and steel once more. This forms one end of the purse. The middle may be worked thus:—

With white and gold beads make 1, purl 2 together, pass down 2 beads; repeat; return row plain.

Repeat these two rows four times in white, four times in blue, four times in white. Then commence the other end in blue; work the same as before, only commence with 2, and increase to 14 beads.

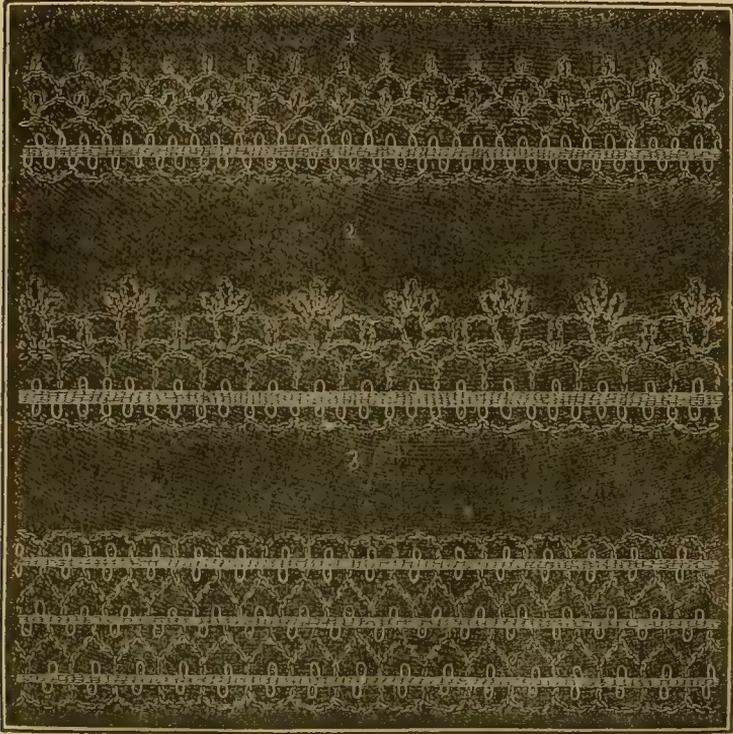

Sew up one-third at each end, and trim with mixed gold and steel tassels.

CRAVATE MARIE THERESE.

This cravat is of sea-green silk, shaped to the neck, and trimmed with rows of fluted black lace. The ends are embroidered in black silk and jet, and finished with three rows of fluted lace.

MIGNARDISE WORK.

EDGING No. 1.

Materials.—One piece of Mignardise, of the smallest size; cotton, No. 24; crochet hook, No. 19. Bell gauge.

Commence in the 2d loop of the Mignardise, work 5 chain, double into next loop but one, 5 chain, repeat.

2d row.—Join on the cotton on the first stitch of the 5 chain, 5 chain, double into centre stitch of 5 chain, 5 chain, * double into same stitch, 5 chain, double into next 5, 5 chain, repeat from *.

3d.—Join on the cotton in the centre stitch of the first 5 chain, * 6 chain, 1 single, into 3d stitch from the hook (this forms a point), 3 chain, double into centre of next 5, between the two points in last row, repeat from *.

4th.—On the other side of the Mignardise work 5 chain, 1 double into every other loop.

EDGING No. 2.

Materials.—Same as No. 1.

1st row.—1 treble in the 2d loop of the Mignardise, 5 chain, 1 treble, in next loop but one, 5 chain, repeat to the end of the length required.

2d.—1 single in the centre of the 5 chain, 7 chain, double in same stitch, 5 chain, * double in next 5 chain, 7 chain, double in same stitch, 5 chain, repeat from *.

3d.—1 double under the 1st, 7 chain, 7 chain, *, double under same, 7 chain, double under same, 7 chain, double under same, 5 chain, double under next 7, 5 chain, double under next 7, 7 chain, repeat from *.

INSERTION IN MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET, No. 3.

Materials.—One piece of Mignardise of the smallest size; cotton, No. 24; crochet hook, No. 19. Bell gauge.

Take a piece of Mignardise the length required, commence in the 2d loop and work 3 chain. Take another piece of Mignardise and unite to the 2d loop, 3 chain, miss one loop, double into next loop of the first piece of Mignardise, 3 chain, unite to 2d loop of second piece of Mignardise, repeat to the end.

2d row.—Commence in the 2d loop 3 chain, take another piece of Mignardise and work in the same manner as before. At both outer edges work thus: commence in the 2d loop, 5 chain, miss 1 loop, double into next, repeat to the end.

CROCHET PURSE,

IN BLUE SILK AND STEEL BEADS.

Materials.—One and a half skeins of bright blue purse silk; one bunch of steel beads, No. 7; a few needlefuls of maize-colored purse silk; a steel clasp the top, to shape the purse, and finished off in the same manner, 12 stitches from the end of the row. The two following rows are then worked, commencing each one a little lower down, and then the purse is crocheted in straight rows again until it is finished. On referring to the illustration, it will be clearly seen where the length of the rows is diminished. The purse is sewn together on each side about half way, and is ornamented round with a fringe of beads; but before doing this the crochet is embroidered in little diamonds in maize purse silk. The clasp is then neatly stitched on, and the purse is complete.

EDGING IN WAVY BRAID AND CROCHET.

This little edging will be found useful for trimming many articles of the wardrobe; and it is especially suitable for children's dresses, being firm and durable.

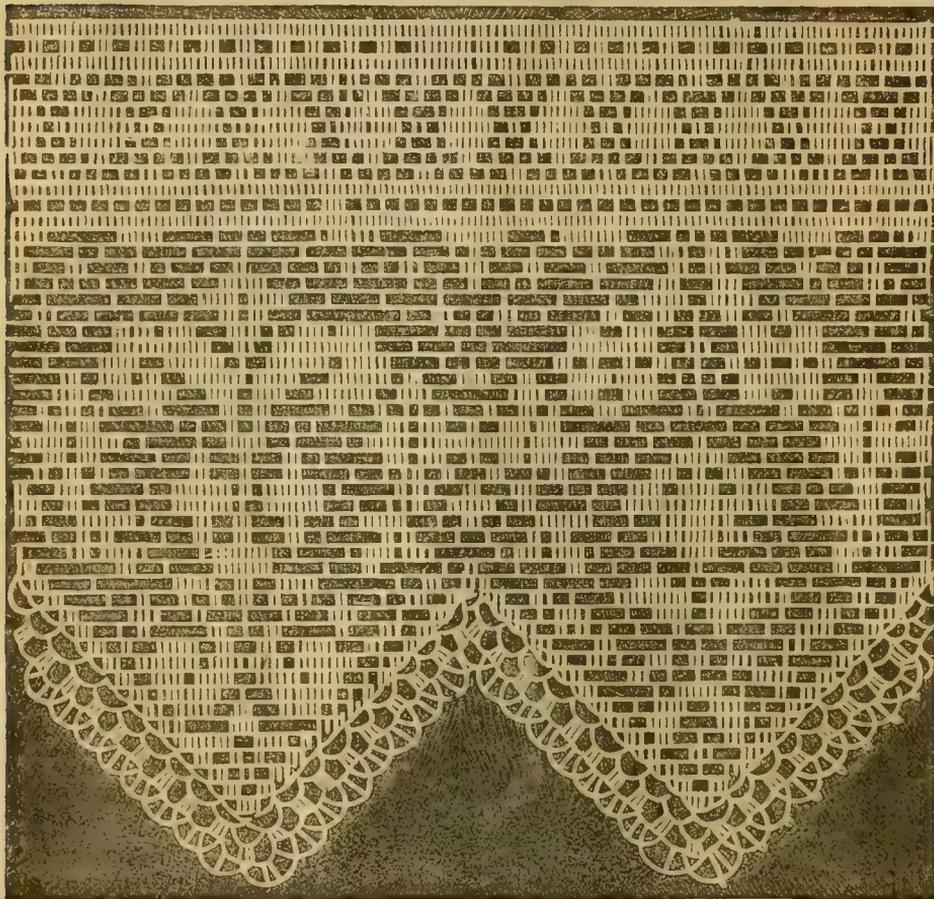

THREAD sufficient steel beads on the silk before commencing to work, and make a chain the length of the two sides of the purse. Work in double crochet in straight rows, breaking off the silk at each end and commencing a fresh row. A steel bead is put at regular intervals. When the centre of the work is reached, the row must be commenced about 12 stitches from

It is composed of a mixture of fancy braid and crochet. To commence, take a piece of wavy braid; double the length that will be required, on which work a row of point de Bruxelles, double the braid, making the points meet, and with No. 40 crochet cotton sew the points together, passing the thread down the middle line. Commence the crochet with No. 16 of the same cotton, and make a chain of nine; loop into the point of the braid, and continue to the end. For the second row of crochet chain six; loop into the centre of the last row; chain four, loop in again on to the same, and continue thus working to the end. This completes the crochet. The other edge of the braid is finished with another row of point de Bruxelles. Leaving out this last row and repeating the crochet to match the other side, makes a pretty light insertion corresponding with the edging, the two being thus arranged for accompanying each other.

BIRD-CAGE BORDER IN CROCHET.

Among domestic pets there are none which seem to claim so much care and attention as the delicate and fragile little canary, which is so great a favorite among ladies, from its capability of tuition and strong attachment. There is now much taste displayed in the cages which are intended for the reception of those little birds, which charm us with their song, but they have not all the border of perforated metal which is sometimes added for the purpose of protection from the habit which they have of scattering their seed and water, and thus giving an air of untidiness to the apartment in which they are located. As a substitute an ornamental crochet border is frequently adopted, which has a prettier effect, and is quite as efficacious. We now give a pattern for this purpose for working in crochet, and which, when arranged round the lower part of the cage, has quite an ornamental appearance. It is worked in the solid and chain crochet, which is so easy to execute from any given pattern, that it requires no instruction beyond looking at the engraving. It is a great improvement to add to the point of each vandyke a tassel of white cotton.

FANCY BAG.

This bag is made of scarlet velvet, braided with gold braid. It is bound with gold braid, and trimmed with two gold balls. The same design is suitable for chain stitch.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR KNITTED MITTENS AND CUFFS.

MITTENS FOR LITTLE GIRLS OF EIGHT OR TEN YEARS OLD.

Hair brown, Magenta, or pink, and bright green. Three pins, No. 18. Forty-six to fifty stitches. Cast on fifty stitches in Magenta.

1st row—Magenta. Plainly knit across, and back in open work; that is, by putting the wool forward and taking two together.

2d, 3d, and 4th—Brown. Plain knitting.

5th—Green. Across in plain, and back in open work, as before.

6th, 7th, and 8th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one stitch on the left hand side, in the front of the work (in the loop of the last stitch but one in the former row), in the 7th and 8th rows.

9th—Magenta. Knit across in plain, and back in open work.

10th, 11th, and 12th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one on the left, as before, in each of the three rows.

13th—Green. Across in plain, and back in open work, as above, increasing one.

14th, 15th, and 16th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one on the left, as before, in 15th and 16th rows.

17th—Magenta. Across in plain, and back in open work.

18th, 19th, and 20th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one, precisely as before, in 19th and 20th rows.

21st—Green. Across plainly, and back in open work.

22d, 23d, and 24th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one, as above, in the 23d and 24th.

25th—Magenta. Across in plain, and back in open work.

26th, 27th, and 28th—Brown. Plain knitting, increasing one, as before, in the 27th and 28th rows only.

29th—Green. Across in plain, and back in open work.

30th—Brown. Plain knitting.

31st—Brown. Knit plainly sixteen stitches only, for the thumb, turning back at the sixteenth, and leaving the other stitches (which should now be forty-four) on the pin.

32d—Brown. Plain knitting.

33d—Magenta. Across in plain, and back in open work.

34th, 35th, and 36th—Brown. Plain knitting. 37th—Green. Across in plain, and back in open work.

38th, 39th, and 40th—Brown. Plain knitting.

41st—Magenta. Across in plain knitting, and back in open work, as before.

42d—Magenta. Across and back in open work.

Cast off the sixteen stitches loosely. Recommence at the 31st row for the hand, beginning at the right side.

31st and 32d—Brown. Plain knitting, adding one stitch, on the left, in both rows.

33d—Magenta. Across in plain, and back in open work.

34th, 35th, and 36th—Brown. Plain knitting.

37th—Green. Across plainly, and back in open work.

38th, 39th, and 40th—Brown. Plain knitting.

41st—Magenta. Across in plain, and back in open work.

42d—Magenta. Across and back in open work.

Cast off loosely, and for the other mitten, etc., see previous directions.

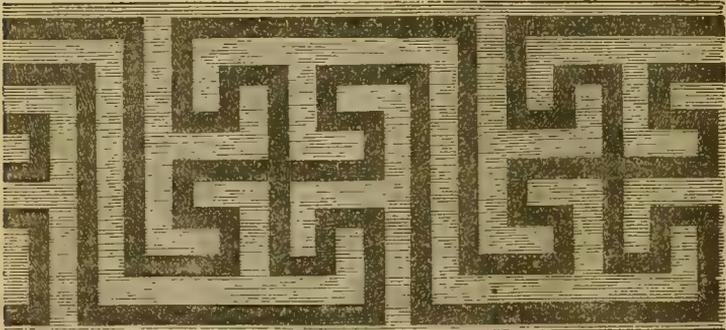

the meeting of the two rows of stitches. Crochet silk or beads might here be very well introduced.

DESIGN FOR BERLIN WORK.

This pattern, which may be continued to any size, and may be worked either in double or single wool, is executed in seven shades of the same color, commencing with black and ending with white. It consists of long stitches made on four or six threads of the canvas, whichever is preferred, worked in a slanting direction, and the top portions of the points are filled in with smaller stitches, to make the design complete. Down the centre of each pattern a long stitch of gold cord or fine chenille is put to hide

RUSTIC ORNAMENTS.

A WREATH OF AUTUMN LEAVES.

DURING the autumn months nature freely flings them at our feet, and if we pause to examine these autumn leaves, we shall discover much beauty in their varied tints of brown, red, and yellow. Collect and press a good variety of them, and preserve them in the following ornamental way, and you will have a picture deserving as much notice as any modern Grecian or Oriental.

Have a wood, or stiff pasteboard frame of an oval shape, and about ten by twelve inches inside, and three in width. Cover the frame with autumn leaves, laying them in form of a wreath, and fastening them with glue. Varnish with white varnish, and when dry, fasten into the frame a sheet of fine drawing paper.

Cut of thin pasteboard the shapes 1, 2, and 3. Sew them together, and they form one side of a basket. Glue over the edge, of the basket, and a long one on the outside, drawing the thread down among the leaves.

Bail.

Half of Bottom.

Half of Side.

This gives a finish to the edge of the basket. Finish the bottom the same way, only make the twist nearly twice as large.

For the bail, sew inside the basket, and each side of the bail ten pairs of leaves, twist, and bring them forward of the bail; then twist them all together, and fasten them at the end and top part of the bail. Cut away the lower part of the pasteboard bail. Now take two beech leaves, the color of the pine leaves; cut off the stem end of each, and glue them on the basket as seen in the engraving, hiding the edges under the leaves.

and on the bail some light brown cambric.

This piece of a basket must be glued on to the paper in the frame, two or three inches from the lower part of the frame, and filled with autumn leaves, reaching within two or three inches of the top, and hanging over the sides of the basket. Varnish the leaves and basket with white varnish.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

A CHAPTER OF FRENCH COOKERY.

BORILL.—The rump of beef is the best piece to be employed for this dish. Tie it round, put it in a stewpan, with water or stock, and let it stew gently for three hours. The dish may be varied by serving it variously garnished. It may be covered with sprigs of parsley, or it may be surrounded with small onions and other vegetables, or with fried onions, or laid in a bed of water-cress, which looks exceedingly pretty.

A FRENCH MAIGRE SOUP.—Take a large lump of butter and a tablespoonful of flour; brown them in the saucepan in which the soup is to be made; then chop up finely some carrots, onions, celery, sorrel, and potatoes, and mix them together; put them into the saucepan, with pepper and salt, pour boiling water over them, and let them stew over the fire for three or four hours—they can hardly simmer too long. A little thyme, parsley, cress, and mint are a great improvement to the other ingredients.

ENTREES TO BE MADE OF BEEF WHICH HAS BEEN COOKED TO MAKE SOUP.—

Beef au Gratin.—Most readers know—but there may be one here and there who may like to be reminded—that au gratin is a mode of cookery in which the fire is applied above as well as below, the lid of the vessel being formed to hold hot charcoal. Melt some butter at the bottom of the stewpan, add to it fine bread-crumbs or raspings, and place in a circle thin slices of the beef. Place over them some little pieces of butter, parsley chopped fine, a sprinkle of salt, and a little broth. Let it cook gently, with the fire above and below.

Beef en Mirton.—Cut some onions in slices, and partly fry them in butter, add a sprinkle of flour, and turn them about until they are brown. Moisten them with equal parts of broth and white wine, season with salt, pepper, and a little nutmeg, add the beef, cut in thin slices, and let it all stew together for a quarter of an hour. At the moment of serving, add a little mustard to the gravy.

Beef en Vinaigrette.—Cut some slices of the beef when cold, and place them in a salad-bowl. Cover them with fillets of anchovy, or of very good red herrings; garnish them with chives, cervil, and other fine herbs, chopped very fine, and pickles sliced. Season with pepper, add oil and vinegar, and serve without stirring the mixture.

Beef à la Ménagère.—Take about twenty rather small onions, brown them in a frying-pan with a little butter, and when they have taken a bright color, sprinkle over them a little flour or some bread crumbs. Remove the onions to a stewpan, taking care not to break them. Add a teacup of broth, the piece of beef whole, a sufficient seasoning of salt, pepper, and nutmeg, and a bouquet of sweet herbs. Let the whole simmer over a slow fire for about two hours. Serve the beef on a dish, and arrange the onions round it.

BARLEY CREAM.—Take two pounds of perfectly lean veal; chop it well. Wash thoroughly half a pound of pearl barley; put it into a saucepan with two quarts of water and some salt. Let all simmer gently together until reduced to one quart. Take out the bones, and rub the remainder through a fine hair sieve with a wooden spoon. It should be the of same consistency as good cream; add a little more salt, if requisite, and a little mace if approved of. This makes light and nourishing food for invalids.

FRIED POTATOES.—Peel the potatoes, cut them into very thin slices, and fry them with a little butter, lard, or dripping. They will eat crisp, and form a nice accompaniment to cold meat. Another way is, when they are peeled, to cut them round and round, as in peeling an apple, until they are quite cut up, then fry them brown and crisp in a pan nearly full of melted lard or oil. Spread them on a dish before the fire to dry, and season them with pepper and salt.

TO COOK A FRESH BEEF TONGUE.—Choose a moderate sized beef tongue, boil it gently in water until it is sufficiently tender for the skin to be stripped from it. Trim it neatly round the root. Put into a saucepan a quarter pound of butter, one tablespoonful of flour, half an onion cut up into small slices, salt and pepper to taste. Let these dissolve gently at the side of the fire until the butter boils. Place the tongue into these ingredients, and let it remain until it is browned. When this is the case take it out, place it on a hot dish by the side of the fire, and add to the gravy two wineglassfuls of red wine (either port or claret), a large teaspoonful of made mustard, and one of walnut ketchup. When these are well mixed, return the tongue into the gravy, and simmer gently for ten minutes, taking care that the saucepan is closely covered to keep in the aroma. When served, the tongue should be cut into thick slices, and banded.

MELTED BUTTER.—Mix a tablespoonful of flour quite smoothly with a little cold water. Add to this half a pint of water in a clean saucepan, stir in two ounces of butter, and stir the mixture over the fire until it is sufficiently cooked, and looks thick and rich. The thickening properties of flour vary very much; if, therefore, the melted butter does not thicken with the tablespoonful of flour named, a little more may be dusted in from the dredger as it cooks. Cooks consider it imperative to stir it only one way all the time.

TO STEW OYSTERS.—Take three dozen oysters, open them, and put their liquor into a saucepan, with a little beaten mace and cayenne pepper; thicken with flour and butter, and boil for five minutes. Toast a slice of bread and cut it into sippets, which lay round the dish. Add half a teacupful of cream to the liquor in the saucepan; put in the oysters, and stir them round continuously. They should not boil; if they are allowed to do so, they shrink and become hard. Serve them up hot.

FRIED HAM AND EGGS.—The slices of ham should first be boiled a trifle. Put a bit of lard in the frying-pan. After the slices have been dipped in flour, place them in the hot fat. Sprinkle pepper. When both sides are finely browned, dish with sufficient gravy. Slip the eggs into the fat, avoiding to break the yolk. Cook slowly, and separate each egg with a knife. When done, place them in a chain around the meat.

HAMBURG PICKLE FOR SALTING BEEF.—To four gallons of water add sufficient common salt, which, when dissolved in the water, will be strong enough to bear an egg, put in four ounces of saltpetre, and half a pound of very brown sugar. Boil all well together, and skim it clean; strain it off, and when cold put in the beef. Let the pickle cover the meat, and in ten days it will be fit for use, or you may keep the meat in for two months, turning it daily, and at the end of six weeks boiling up the pickle and skimming it afresh.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

CORN CAKE FOR BREAKFAST.—Mix at night one quart of corn meal with hot water enough to make a thin batter, adding a tablespoonful of yeast, and salt to suit the taste. In the morning stir in two eggs and a small teaspoonful of soda, and with a spoon beat it long and hard. Butter a tin pan, pour the mixture into it, and bake immediately about half an hour in a moderately heated oven.

TRANSPARENT PUDDING.—Six eggs, half a pound of sugar, half a pound of butter; melt the butter and sugar together; beat the eggs well, and stir them in it while warm; grate in some nutmeg; bake on pastry.

RICE MERINGUE.—Swell gently four ounces of rice in a pint of milk, let it cool a little, and stir an ounce and a half of fresh butter, three ounces of pounded white sugar, the rind of a lemon, and the yolks of five eggs. Pour the mixture into a well-buttered dish, and lay lightly and evenly over the top the whites of four eggs beaten to snow. Bake the pudding for ten minutes in a gentle oven.

TO MAKE BATTER PANCAKES.—Beat up three eggs with four large tablespoonfuls of flour; add to these half a pint of milk, or as much as will make the batter the consistency of cream, and a little salt. Fry them in lard or butter. Grate sugar over the top of each of them, and serve directly they are cooked. The juice of a lemon is generally added when eaten. A small frying-pan is the best for the purpose.

TO MAKE WAFFER PANCAKES.—Beat up well four eggs; add two spoonfuls of fine flour, and two of cream; one ounce of finely-sifted sugar, and, if approved of, part of a grated nutmeg. Rub the frying pan well with a little cold butter. Pour the batter in as thin as a wafer; fry it only on one side. Put them on a dish, and throw sifted sugar over each pancake, and serve them hot to table.

HARRISON CAKE.—Two cups of molasses, one cup of butter, one cup sugar, one cup sour cream, one teaspoonful cloves, one of saleratus, two teacups currants. Butter melted with molasses and poured into three or four cups of flour; then add sugar and half the cream; put in the rest of the cream when you have dissolved the saleratus in it. Then take enough more flour to make it about as thick as cup cakes; stir it ten or fifteen minutes, add the currants, and bake it in pans like cup cake.

LECHE CREAM.—Beat up the yolks of three eggs, and the white of one; add to them a quarter of a pound of powdered sugar; mix gradually three ounces of arrow-root and two ounces of flour, and then a pint and a half of milk; boil it up gently, stirring continually until thick; take it off the fire and continue to stir until it is a little cooled. Place sponge-cake at the bottom of a buttered dish, and pour the leche cream over them. A flavoring of either lemon-peel, vanilla, or cinnamon is an improvement.

CREAM CAKES.—Half pound butter, three-quarters of a pound of flour, one pint water; boil your butter and water together, and while boiling stir in the flour; then let it cool, and add ten eggs—the whites beaten separately; half teaspoonful of soda; grease your pans well, drop a large spoonful, leaving space enough for them to rise. Bake about forty-five minutes in a moderate oven.

CHEAP CAKE.—Two cups white sugar, three of flour, a piece of butter size of an egg, two eggs, one cup of milk, one teaspoonful cream tartar, one of saleratus, both thrown on the batter, sugar, and eggs; then add the milk, then the flour, stir quickly, spice to taste. Sift a little sugar on the cake, and bake immediately.

RICE PUDDING.—One quart milk, one cup rice, four eggs—yolks beaten as custards—baked. The whites as frosting.

SPONGE PUDDING.—One pound sugar, one pound flour, one dozen eggs well beaten. Steam two hours.

VERY LIGHT BUNNS.—One pound and a quarter of fine flour, six ounces fresh butter, eight ounces lump sugar bruised, two ounces candied lemon, twelve ounces currants, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, five eggs or a little cream, or six eggs. Beat the eggs well, and mix all together; bake in small tart, or queen-cake tins, in a quick oven.

BAKED APPLE PUDDING.—Twelve ounces of fine flour, four ounces suet chopped fine, one teaspoonful of baking powder, and a little salt. Mix with cold water to a paste; have ready a well-buttered basin or mould that will hold a quart; roll out the paste and line the basin, leaving a little for the top; fill it with apples pared and cored; add golden syrup and sugar; roll out the paste for the cover, moistening the edges to make it stick; fresh suet from a loin of mutton is the best. Thirty-five to forty minutes will bake it, turn out upon a dish, and serve.

THE TOILET.

TO MAKE SOFT POMATUM.—Beat half a pound of unsalted fresh lard in common water; then soak and beat it in two rose-waters, drain it, and beat it with two spoonfuls of brandy; let it drain from this; add to it some essence of lemon, and keep it in small pots.

Or: Soak half a pound of clear beef-marrow and one pound of unsalted fresh lard in water two or three days, changing and beating it every day. Put it into a sieve, and, when dry, into a jar, and the jar into a saucepan of water. When melted, pour it into a basin, and beat it with two spoonfuls of brandy; drain off the brandy, and then add essence of lemon, bergamot, or any other scent that is liked.

HARD POMATUM.—Prepare equal quantities of beef-marrow and mutton suet as before, using the brandy to preserve it, and adding the scent; then pour it into moulds, or if you have none, into phials of the size you choose the rolls to be. When cold, break the bottles, clear away the glass carefully, and put paper around the rolls.

Or: Take equal quantities of marrow, melted and strained, lard, and castor oil; warm all together; add any scent you please; stir until cold, and put into pots.

PASTE FOR CHAPPED HANDS.—Mix a quarter pound of unsalted hog's lard, which has been washed in soft water, and then rose-water, with the yolks of two new-laid eggs, and a large spoonful of honey. Add as much fine oatmeal or almond-paste as will work into a paste.

Or: Blanch one pound of bitter almonds, pound them smooth in a marble mortar; add half an ounce of camphor, one ounce of honey, a quarter pound of spermaceti, all pounded, and mixed with the almonds, till it becomes a smooth paste. Put it into jars or china boxes, and tie it down till wanted.

A VERY FINE SCENT.—Take six drachms of oil of lavender, three of the essence of bergamot, sixty drops of ambergris, and two grains of musk. Mix these into a pint of the best rectified spirits of wine.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO CLEAN CALICO FURNITURE.—Shake off the loose dust, then lightly brush with a small long-haired furniture-brush; after which wipe it closely with clean flannels, and rub it with dry bread. If properly done, the curtains will look nearly as well as at first; and, if the color be not light, they will not require washing for years. Fold in large parcels, and put carefully by. While the furniture remains up, it should be preserved from the sun and air as much as possible, which injure delicate colors; and the dust may be blown off with bellows.

By the above mode curtains may be kept clean, even to use with the hangings newly dipped.

TO GIVE TO BOARDS A BEAUTIFUL APPEARANCE.—After washing them very nicely with soda, and warm water, and a brush, wash them with a very large sponge and clean water. Both times observe to leave no spot untouched; and clean straight up and down, not crossing from board to board; then dry with clean cloths, rubbed hard up and down in the same way.

The floors should not be often wetted, but very thoroughly when done; and once a week dry rubbed with hot sand and a heavy brush, the right way of the boards.

The sides of stairs, or passages on which are carpets or floor-cloth, should be washed with sponge instead of linen or flannel, and the edges will not be soiled. Different sponges should be kept for the above two uses; and those and the brushes should be well washed when done with, and kept in dry places.

TO EXTRACT OIL FROM BOARDS OR STONE.—Make a strong lye of pearlashes and soft water, and add as much unslacked lime as it will take up; stir it together, and then let it settle a few minutes; bottle it, and stop close; have ready some water to lower it as used, and scour the part with it. If the liquor should lie long on the boards, it will draw out the color of them; therefore, do it with care and expedition.

TO CLEAN STONE STAIRS AND HALLS.—Boil one pound of pipe-clay with a quart of water, a quart of small beer, and put in a bit of stone-blue. Wash with this mixture, and, when dry, rub the stones with flannel and a brush.

TO REMOVE IRON-MOULD.—Salts of lemon, mixed with warm water and rubbed over the mark, will, most probably, remove the stains.

Another Way.—Throw on the stain a small quantity of the dry powder of magnesia, rubbing it slightly in with the finger, leaving it there for an hour or two, and then brushing it off, when it will be found that the stain has quite disappeared. Apply it on the wrong side of the dress, if not lined; but it matters not which. As some colors are spoiled even by water, it will be found safer to use dry magnesia.

BRASS AND COPPER VESSELS require to be well and often cleaned, both inside and out. Indeed, the thorough cleansing of all vessels in which victuals are cooked, is not only desirable in point of neatness and show—for most servants make a display of them—but it is actually necessary, as it regards the flavor and the wholesomeness of the food cooked in them, whether solid joints, or soups, ragouts, &c. And these remarks apply more fully to vessels made of copper or brass, than to tin and iron ware; the canker which they contract being absolutely poisonous. Brass and copper, whether cooking utensils, candlesticks, or other articles, are best cleaned with sweet oil and tripoli, or powdered Bath brick, or rottenstone. A piece of flannel should be oiled, and then sprinkled with either of the above-named powders, and well rubbed over every part of the article, till every spot and soil is removed. They should then be polished with soft wash leather. The inner part of tinued vessels should be well cleaned with soap and water, and then thoroughly washed with clean warm water, and put away perfectly dry. A solution of oxalic acid in water gives brass a fine color; and vitriol and spirits of salts make brass and copper very bright; but they soon tarnish, and, therefore, require more frequent cleaning. A strong lye of rock alum and water will also improve the appearance of brass.

SIMPLE DISINFECTANT.—Cut two or three good-sized onions in halves, and place them on a plate on the floor; they absorb noxious effluvia, etc., in the sick-room in an incredibly short space of time, and are greatly to be preferred to perfumery for the same purposes. They should be changed every six hours.

HOW TO GET OFF A TIGHT RING.—Thread a needle fat in the eye with a strong thread, pass the head of the needle with care under the ring, and pull the thread through a few inches towards the hand; wrap the long end of the thread tightly round the finger regularly all down the nail to reduce its size, then lay hold of the short end and unwind it. The thread repassing against the ring, will gradually remove it from the finger. This never-failing method will remove the tightest ring without difficulty, however much swollen the finger may be.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

The following receipts have been kindly forwarded to us by a correspondent; we insert them for the benefit of our readers:—

TO CLEAN SILK (black or colored).—Mix spirits of wine with water, sponge on the right side, and iron on the wrong; it will look new again.

TO MAKE WATER SOFT.—Boil bran in it.

FOR MAKING HANDS SOFT.—Mix honey, olive oil, and almond meal. Use when washing; then wear gloves.

MACCARRONI CHEESE (simply done).—Boil the maccaroni in milk; put in the stevpan butter, cheese, and seasoning; when melted, pour into the maccaroni, putting bread-crumbs over, which brown before the fire all together.

WELSH RABBIT.—A slice of bread laid in a tin dish, buttered, and mustard laid over it; pieces of cut cheese laid also on the bread and butter; pour two or three tablespoonfuls of ale; put into the oven until slightly brown.

CHEESE OMELET.—Mix to a smooth batter three tablespoonfuls of fine flour, with half a pint of milk. Beat up well the yolks and whites of four eggs, a little salt, and a quarter pound of grated Parmesan or old English cheese. Add these to the flour and milk, and whisk all the ingredients together for half an hour. Put three ounces of butter into a frying-pan, and when it is boiling pour in the above mixture, fry it for a few minutes, and then turn it carefully; when it is sufficiently cooked on the other side, turn it on to a hot dish and serve.

MR. GODEY. I send you the following receipt for cleaning craps, hoping you will give it a place in your Book.

Brush the veil till all the dust is removed, then fold it lengthwise, and roll it smoothly and tightly on a roller. Steam it till it is thoroughly dampened, and dry on the roller.

WOMAN:

HER PLACE IN THE CHURCH.

A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars.

Rev. xii. 1.

PURE religion on earth: is it not the intercourse or sympathy of the human soul with the Divine Spirit? Was not the perfect religion of the Eden pair shown in their intercourse with their Creator, when "the Lord God walked in the garden?" and their miserable Fall, was it not fitly expressed in their hiding from Him, when they felt their robes of innocence were lost?

The man and the woman constituted the first Church of God on earth; their perfect worship was love; their pure offering was obedience. They sinned together when withholding this obedience, and both stood condemned before their righteous Judge. Their lives were forfeited; the Church was ruined; all was lost! How could there be intercourse or sympathy between holiness and sin, between God and Satan?

Oh the infinite love and mercy and goodness of the Creator in devising the way of salvation, when His pitying Fatherhood softened the stern justice of the Ruler of the Universe! We read this in the reprieve of His guilty children from immediate death; we read it in the precious promise made the woman that God would "put enmity" between her and Satan, because we thereby know that our heavenly Father did, then and there, implant anew the seeds of moral goodness in the heart of humanity. And then, in the glorious announcement or prophecy, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head," did not the Lord God re-establish His covenant or Church on earth?

In this manifestation of Divine Love to the first sinners we find the way provided for the expression of human worship towards the only true God; worship that would be required of His church as the exponent of true religion on earth.

Woman was to keep the true faith in her heart, exemplifying and teaching it in her life of purity and love; of self-sacrifice and faithfulness in duty; of obedience to her husband and careful training of her children, and in humble submission to her lot.

Man was to show forth his true faith in his life-long struggle for dominion over the earth; doing his hard work in humility and thankfulness; tenderly supporting and protecting his own household; governing himself in obedience to the laws of God written in the human heart,* and by conformity to the natural laws controlling the works of God—these he was to seek, discover, and obey, while following implicitly the Divine inspirations, commandments, and precepts that were to guide him in his religious ceremonials, sacrifices, and sacraments, representing the soul's fealty to God and penitence for sin—all these were to be exclusively under man's control. In other words, the forms of the Church, its outward embodying and laws were to be the work of men; the faith of the Church or its inward life was in the keeping of women.

* See Romans, chap. ii.

Let us pause here one moment, at this stand point of God's Church, inaugurated after the Fall, and contemplate her glorious triumph, as the beloved Apostle pictures it in the chapter from which we have quoted. It is WOMAN who, in the Apocalypse, represents the glory of the redeemed Church. Mark how she is persecuted by Satan! how she is succored by Divine interposition! how surely she is to be glorified by Divine Grace!

Is not this the blessed rainbow painted on the black clouds of woman's history? It was the woman from Eden who held for earth the promise of salvation. It was the woman to whom the Devil bore "enmity." It was and has been, from that day to this, against the honor and happiness, the goodness and intelligence of woman that "the Devil and his angels" have fought their most subtle and devouring battles. How these enemies of God and woman have succeeded in engulfing and destroying "the glory of the man," while crushing out the mind, and heart, and soul of his "help-meet," let the history of polygamy tell! Polygamy seems Satan's most potent device for destroying all good in humanity.

The history of the Church is, in the Bible, inwoven in its spiritual development, with the story of the moral power of women who, through and by Divine help, have influenced in the right way the characters and lives of men, when these had charge of the worship of the true God. We alluded, in our last paper, to the special Providence that saved Sarah from the pollution (Gen. xii.) to which Abram would have consigned her, and thus ruined himself as well as the Church. Sarah's faith also preserved the inheritance for Isaac the true heir. Rebekah's faith won the blessing which God had promised her should be given to Jacob. Could the true Church have been perpetuated through Ishmael or Esau?

The Hebrew Church, which included the Commonwealth, established, by the special laws of Moses, through Divine inspiration, bears the impress of Almighty power and mercy in sustaining the weaknesses and mitigating the sorrows of woman; it does this in such a marked manner as makes her seem the favorite of her heavenly Father. How strikingly this is exemplified in the Hebrew laws and commands concerning that most helpless, desolate, and wronged class of human beings—the widows* of the land! For the childless widow in her youth an honorable marriage was provided. For the desolate widow and her fatherless children God himself stood a protector, provider, and judge. Woe to the * Contrast these Hebrew statutes and customs with those of all heathen nations concerning widows, and you will see how Satan's "enmity to the woman" has succeeded in degrading and destroying her sex and, with it, the race of mankind. This miserable record is written the world over—that all men who reject the true God reject, also, or labor to destroy the spiritual and mental influence of woman. Her mind has been kept in ignorance that she might be made subservient to man's pride or the dupe of his superstitions; licentiousness and polygamy have degraded her into the toy of his pleasures or the slave of his lusts and selfishness; till even now, in this nineteenth century of Christian light, three-fourths of the living world of women have no power for good, and no means of spiritual improvement; consequently, the men have neither goodness nor "glory."

Hebrew man who dared do evil to the true widow and her fatherless children!

The mother of the family was, by the Decalogue as well as in the special laws of the Hebrews, entitled to the same honor and obedience from her children as were due to the father. No human code has thus sustained the mother's honor and authority.

In the Hebrew Church women enjoyed more freedom than men, because the women had the privilege of attending all the feasts and convocations if they chose, or they might stay at home if this appeared to them their duty. The men were compelled to go up three times each year to worship before the Lord.

Does not this prove that God, who knows the heart, saw He could trust the faith of the woman? that she would worship him in spirit at home? but that man required the aid of outward observances, in which he was compelled to join to strengthen his faith in the spiritual, or he would, inevitably, relapse (as Aaron did at Sinai) into the earthly, the idolatrous, the sinful?

Many other instances of God's favor towards woman, shown in the laws for His chosen people, might be cited if we had room; all strengthening our positions that the moral destiny of the world is in the keeping of the weaker sex; and that woman is the conservator of religious faith the world over, whether that faith be true or false.

There is no record of an apostate or "wicked" Hebrew woman; the men who led the Church and people into idolatry had first broken God's law of marriage by an alliance with heathen women. And that these heathen wives had such influence over their Hebrew husbands proves, conclusively, the stronger moral or spiritual power of the feminine nature, whether exerted in the cause of error or of truth.

The religious influence of Hebrew women is always represented as conservative of their faith, until the man, or government in Church and State, were wholly given over to idolatry. Even then instances of faithful women are recorded who had sympathy with the chosen prophets of the Lord—as the widow of Sarepta, who forgot that she and her son were starving while she fed Elijah; and the woman of Shunem, who recognized and provided for Elisha.

When the last stage of spiritual degeneracy had been reached, and Jerusalem was ripe for destruction, and the Old Covenant of Works, so often broken and dishonored, was to be superseded by the New Covenant of Justification by Faith in Jesus Christ, then the woman's soul was found ready to meet and welcome the Spiritual Church. Three Hebrew women rejoiced over the infant Saviour, each with a song of thanksgiving or a blessing of joy, while but one Hebrew man came to do Him homage. At the Cross of Christ the proportion of His devoted followers was similar, three women to one man. Such has, probably been the difference of numbers between the sexes who have, since that time, united with the Church of Christ, voluntarily, and been true to the end. Thus we differ from the proportions of members in our American churches—three women to one man.

As, in the Old Dispensation, the Church of the Gospel was, in its public ministrations and outward observances, placed entirely under the government of men. For this purpose the twelve had been chosen—or compelled—to follow Christ. He had taught and prepared them for the service of founding His church.

Women came to Christ of their own accord. Lovingly He received their ministrations, tenderly He soothed their sorrows, warmly praised their love, and faith, and works, namely ones worthy of a world-wide memorial; confiding to their sex only His spiritual mission, and making women messengers of His will even to His chosen Apostles.

Do we not find in these examples proof that Christ intended woman should have place, and name, and work in His Church?

The Apostles seem to have thus understood Him. They employed women and publicly honored their piety and faithful services in the inspired record, left for the guidance of the Church in all ages. St. Paul was not ashamed to acknowledge his obligations to the help of women; he tells us of a Phebe, the deaconess, and Priscilla, the instructress of Apollos in the doctrines of salvation; of Philip's four daughters—all prophetesses (or teachers of Christ's precepts), and many others we have not room now to name; while St. John gives an Epistle to that noble teacheress, the "elect lady," whose children "walked in the truth."

Thus, for several centuries, woman held place, duties, and memorial in the Christian Church—but always under the direction of men. The zeal with which these women sustained the faith and labors of the Apostles and first missionaries was one of the greatest human elements of their success against heathenism.

Wherever the Gospel was made known women were found ready to receive it. Queens became nursing mothers of the Church, and lovely maidens martyrs for its truth. The moral influence of women changed the worship of the greater part of Europe from Heathenism to Christianity.

Could this humble religious influence have gone on, unhindered, the world would, long ago, have become Christian. But the "enmity of Satan" prevailed over the spiritual in humanity. Woman was deprived of her offices and acknowledged influence in the church; she has been, for more than a thousand years, literally, a non-entity in its history—with one only exception, "the Sisters of Charity!"

The great benefits to humanity and to Christian character, conferred by this noble order of devoted women, have been acknowledged in all countries; but not till lately have any systematic efforts been made by Christian men to give the women of Protestant lands similar opportunities of doing good. The dawn of a brighter day has come. The churches in Europe, particularly in Germany, are leading the way in re-establishing the order of Deaconesses. England is following the example; and now our American churches* are taking counsel on this important question.

If these papers "On Woman," which we have prepared with great care and earnest hope of helping the good cause, have any influence in directing the minds of our readers to these subjects, we shall feel sure of their sympathy and approval. Our sick country needs the ministering services of its Christian daughters. How can this great benefit be permanently secured except by organizations which have Bible authority for their basis and government?

The time is propitious. What inspiration declared, nearly three thousand years ago, concerning woman, will be verified on earth: "Strength and honor are her clothing, and she shall rejoice in time to come."

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER TO THE EDITRESS.

MY DEAR MRS. HALE: For us who believe in a Providence that out of present evil educes future good, it is delightful to look on the bright side of this war, as it has shown some of the best traits of womanhood.

Three years ago, our daughters seemed to be inevitably growing up idle and ignorant. Not for want of schools, nor for want of employment. For schools there were, many and excellent; and for employment, it was pressed out of its natural sphere and range, and dubbed vulgar and beneath a refined age. Some girls knew Euclid, and all played the piano; but exactly not one could make a pudding, or write a receipt. A bride entered the house-keeping state so ignorant as not to know whether a piece of meat on the table was beef or mutton; and I know one who said "calf's head" was only good to throw away! Think of that, shades of departed grandmothers!

In vain I have from time to time gently insinuated the habits of the young French nobility, and recommended the adoption of some of their culinary accomplishments; in vain suggested that whatever maid might think of, fine reading and writing, no lover or admirer was the less ardent for some attention to his palate—always, mostly in vain, lectured on shirts and collars. Nonne avons changé tout cela. This is one good of the evil times.

It would delight you to look in or meet at the sanitary rooms once a week the bright faces of the young girls. To be sure, they began with stitching the sleeves into the neck of the blue woollen shirts; but what of that? They make shirts now, and cut them too. Then the jellies they make; the comforts they have learned to contrive and produce for the absent loved ones! All the inventions to solace and soothe the feeble ones; oh! it is beautiful to see the growth of helpful tenderness and self-sacrifice in the young girls of all ages.

* See "Report made to the Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania on organizing the Services of Christian women," etc. Philadelphia: 1863.

I don't despair now of seeing a race of women worthy of the name; thoughtful, energetic, useful women. Women who think of something in life besides singing and dancing, and who don't end every song with a "Tara lal la!" for you will allow that was very much what we were all coming to. Not a corner stone for our palaces among our daughters; not a wise son to make a glad father among our youths.

ALUMNÆ ASSOCIATION OF THE WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE. Cincinnati, 1863.—There was a time when the advantages of education, founded on the solid branches of scientific knowledge, and graced by elegant accomplishments, could only be obtained in the Atlantic cities. Young ladies were then sent to Philadelphia, New York, or Boston at great cost of money, and often greater cost of anxiety, from the most distant points of the Union.

We are happy to know that, of late years, literary and educational institutions have been established at the West on a scale of liberality and excellence which now offers to the people of each section great advantages in the best culture and training for young girls; that which makes them intelligent, accomplished, and useful Christian ladies.

Among these institutions the Wesleyan Female College holds a high position, and deserves to be greatly honored. The pupils are thoroughly trained as well as taught; nothing seems to be omitted in the list of useful or liberal pursuits. Above all, the spirit of this seminary is, as such institutions should be, Christian, and the best of all knowledge is sedulously taught in such a tenderly faithful manner as to be seemingly impressed into every young heart that imbibes its purifying nura.

This college, as a distinguishing feature of its happy influences, has an "Alumnæ Association," promoting an affectionate union and sympathy among the young ladies, at the same time inciting them to excellence in their various studies, and binding them to a continuance of intercourse, if possible, and improvement during their whole career of life. We have before us a catalogue numbering three hundred and sixteen members of this association, founded in 1852, of whom forty-one are married, and thirty-four have died. The members meet every year at Cincinnati, and celebrate their anniversary with music, poetry, and original literary contributions. The tone of all their writings, whether solid essays or sprightly letters, bears the unmistakable impress of true piety and earnest endeavor to be and to do good. Love, sisterly and heavenly love, is the prevailing beauty and perfection of their order. Long may it live and bear its fruit of goodness and happiness.

EUGENIE DE GUERIN.—The Journal, poems, and letters of this gifted and pious French lady have lately been published, with a sketch of her interesting life. Joined to rare talent and intelligence, she had great force of character, with an extraordinary depth of affection; "and all these under the control of a deep religious feeling," says her biographer. One affection only seems not to have been thus subject to reason; her love for her brother Maurice is a romance of deep, self-sacrificing feelings that nothing in life or fiction has ever surpassed. Thus she writes in her journal, which she kept sacred for her brother's eye only.

"I find writing has become almost a necessity to me. Whence does it arise, this impulse to give utterance to the voice of one's spirit; to pour out my thoughts before God and our human being? I say one human being, because I always imagine you, Maurice, are present—that you see me write. In the stillness of a life like this my spirit is happy, and, as it were, dead to all that goes on up stairs, or down stairs, or out of the house. But this does not last."

She has to go back to her domestic duties, which she performs with the cheerfulness and readiness of a girl who had never had a thought beyond household occupations. We hope the book will be published this side the Atlantic.

SCHOOL FOR YOUNG GIRLS.—Mrs. Schaffer, an accomplished lady, has opened a school at 1037 Walnut Street, which promises to become an excellent training institution in the elementary branches of an English education. Those who wish their young daughters carefully instructed, would do well to try this school.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—These articles are accepted: "Look on the Sea" (the other poem declined)—"Faith and Sight"—"The Troubadour"—and "Varieties."

The following articles are not needed: "The World's Deceit"—"The Bridal Kiss"—"I'll be Merry while I Can"—"Old Memories"—"Upwards"—"Oh, Let Me Hope"—"The Great Conflict"—"Ellen Murdock's History"—"Blessings"—"A Summer Vacation" (too long)—"Vice" (the author can do better)—"Estrangement"—"The Fallen of our Battle-fields"—"A Great Prize"—"Roman Valor and American Bravery Compared" (best for a newspaper)—"Anodynes are Poisons"—"Art in its Best Development" (not finished)—and "The World of Fashion."

Health Department.

The following sensible remarks are from an essay on the hardships of "Farmers' Wives" in our country. We can give only a few paragraphs; but these may be better than medicine to some weary and almost despairing invalid wife, who must work on. Sympathy is curative. So read what is said by Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health.

FARMERS' WIVES OVERTAXED.

"Time, and money, and health, and even life itself, are not unfrequently lost by a want of promptitude on the part of the farmer in making repairs about the house in procuring needed things in time, and failing to have those little conveniences which, although their cost is even contemptible, are in a measure practically invaluable. I was in a farmer's house one night; the wife and two daughters were plying their needles industriously by the light of a candle, the wick of which was frequently clipped off by a pair of scissors. I asked the husband why he did not buy a candle-snuffer. 'Oh, the scissors are good enough!' And yet he owned six hundred acres of fine grazing lands, and every inch paid for.

"I once called on an old friend, a man of education, and of a family, loved and honored all over his native State. The buildings were of brick, in the centre of an inherited farm of several hundred acres. The house was supplied with the purest, coldest, and best water from a well in the yard; the facilities for obtaining which were a rope, one end of which was tied to a post, the other to an old tin pan, literally. The discomfort and unnecessary labor involved in these two cases may be estimated by the reader at his leisure.

"I know it to be the case, and have seen it on many Western farms, when firewood was wanted, a tree was cut down and hauled bodily to the door of the kitchen; and when it was all gone, another was drawn up to supply its place; giving the cook and wife green wood with which to kindle and keep up their fires.

"There are thousands of farms in this country where the spring which supplies all the water for drink and cooking is from a quarter to more than half a mile distant from the house, and a "pailful" is brought at a time, involving five or ten miles' walking in a day for months and years together; when a man in half a day could make a slide, and with a fifty cent barrel could in half an hour deliver, at the door, enough to last the whole day. How many weeks of painful and expensive sickness; how many lives have been lost of wives and daughters, and cooks, by being caught in a shower between the house and the spring while in a state of perspiration or weakness, from working over the fire, cannot be known; but that they may be numbered by thousands will not be intelligently denied.

Many a time a pane of glass has been broken out, or a shingle has been blown from the roof, and the repair has not been made for weeks or many months together; and for want of it have come agonizing neuralgias; or a child has waked up in the night with the croup, to get well only with a doctor's bill, which would have paid twenty times for the repair; even if a first-born had not died, to agonize a mother's heart to the latest hour of life; or the leak in the roof has remained, requiring the placing of a bucket, or the washing of the floor at every rain; or the 'spare bed' has been wetted and forgotten; some visitor, or kind neighbor, or dear friend has been placed in it to wake up to a fatal fever, as was the case with the great Lord Bacon."

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

SIGHTS A-FOOT. By Wilkie Collins, author of "The Woman in White," "The Dead Secret," etc. etc. A book like this will bear frequent reprinting. It takes the reader to a part of England seldom visited by the tourist, and seldom mentioned by the novelist. Following the footsteps of the author and an artist friend, he gets glimpses of scenery whose very roughness and wildness give it a grandeur of its own, and meets people whose primitive habits and simplicity of character make them remarkable. The book is not a novel, but a truthful account of a genuine pedestrian tour.

VALENTINE VOX: the Ventriquist. His Life and Adventures. By Henry Cockton, author of "Percy Effingham," "Sylvester Sound," etc. If one wishes to enjoy numerous hearty laughs, let him turn the pages of this book. The ludicrous scenes, the merry adventures, and the rich satires are, together, enough to add a hundred pounds to one's weight, if the old adage, "Laugh and grow fat," be true.

THE TIGER SLAYER. A Tale of the Indian Desert. By Gustave Aimard, author of "The Prairie Flower," "The Trail Hunter," etc. This book, we believe, begins a new series of the interesting stories of western life for which Aimard is so widely noted. The scene of the story is laid in Mexico, in the province of Sonora.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. No. 5 has been received. Price 25 cents. Everybody ought to purchase this. The pictures alone, independent of the history, are worth the money.

From FREDERICK LEYPOLDT, Philadelphia:—

SKIRMISHING. By the author of "Who Breaks Pays," etc. This is the third volume of Leyoldt's Foreign Library, and fully sustains the reputation of this new enterprise. It is a quiet and pleasant story of English country life.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE BOOK OF DAYS. A Miscellany of Popular Antiquities in connection with the Calendar, including Anecdote, Biography and History, Curiosities of Literature and Oddities of Human Life and Character. Parts 15 and 16 have been received. Price 20 cents each. We would not be without this work for three times its price.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

HEAT CONSIDERED AS A MODE OF MOTION. By John Tyndall, F. R. S., etc., Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Royal Institution. This book contains a course of twelve lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain in 1862, the first seven of which deal with thermometric heat, and the concluding five of radiant heat. A more thorough examination of the subject, in all its divisions and bearings, than this could scarcely be conceived. There are numerous fine wood-cut illustrations of philosophical experiments.

WAR PICTURES FROM THE SOUTH. By B. Estvân, Colonel of Cavalry in the Confederate Army. A history like this, written by one who, in the commencement of our present national struggle, took up arms with the Confederates, and yet who claims to view the subject from an independent point, "disposed to do justice to both sides," will excite the curiosity of all. He awards great praise to many of the Federal Generals, His history begins with the secession of South Carolina, and continues to July 1, 1862, including the Siege of Richmond. Appended are brief biographies of the more prominent generals on either side.

THE HISTORICAL SHAKSPEARIAN READER. By John W. S. Hows, author of the "Shakspearian Reader," etc. This volume comprises the "Histories" or "Chronicle plays" of Shakespeare, carefully expurgated and revised, with introductory and explanatory notes. It is expressly adapted for the use of schools, colleges, and the family reading circle. These plays have been especially selected, as being invaluable adjuncts to the study of English history, presenting, as they do, a truthful narration of events, drawn from accredited chronicles of the times, and vivid pictures of the manners, habits, and customs of the people.

LIGHT. By Helen Mod't. This is evidently the maiden effort of its author, who discovers fair constructive ability, and who is to be commended for the excellent moral tone of her work. But though her characters are tolerably modelled, she has evidently studied most of their prototypes in works of fiction, and those not of the highest order of merit. The conversation is too stilted, and its would-be wit often sinks to foolishness.

A MANUAL OF DEVOTIONS FOR DOMESTIC AND PRIVATE USE. By George Upfold, D. D., Bishop of Indiana. This manual has been chiefly compiled from the "Family Prayers" of the late Henry Thornton, Esq., of Clapham, England, such modifications being introduced as seemed desirable in an American edition.

ELLSWORTH'S PRIMARY BLACK-BOARD CHART OF LETTERS. We have upon our table a black-board chart of letters belonging to Ellsworth's New System of Penmanship. It seems well adapted for the use of the student.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

GERVASE CANTONEL; or, The Six Gray Powder-s. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lyone," "Ver-ner's Pride," etc. This more properly styled nouvelette bears the usual characteristics of Mrs. Wood's works, and possesses the elements of a first class sensational novel. But it must have been written under disadvantageous circumstances of some sort. Both characters and incidents are hurried briefly over; mysteries in the plot are left unraveled; and the whole reads too much like a hastily sketched plan for a larger and more meritorious romance.

PARLOR TRICKS WITH CARDS. With seventy engravings. By the author of "Book of Riddles and Five Hundred Home Amusements," etc.

BOOK OF FIVE HUNDRED CURIOUS PUZZLES. By the author of "The Sociable," "Parlor Tricks with Cards," etc. Illustrated with a great variety of engravings. These two books, the former of which contains all the tricks and deceptions with playing cards ever invented, and the latter numerous entertaining paradoxes, numerical and geometrical puzzles, etc., are both sources of infinite amusement in the home and social circles.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

AUSTIN ELLIOT. By Henry Kingsley, author of "Ravenshoe," etc. This, without being an absorbing book, possesses a certain pleasing interest. Mr. Kingsley has a style of his own, dashing, easy, sometimes almost too careless; yet full of vigor and freshness. Next to the hero Lord Charles Barty, Eleanor Hilton, old James, and dog Robin are the most interesting characters.

HOSPITAL TRANSPORTS. Compiled and published at the request of the Sanitary Commission. This book gives, in the words of the actors, a brief account of the embarkation of the sick and wounded from the Peninsula of Virginia in the summer of 1862. Most of the letters comprising the volume were written by Frederick L. Olmsted, Esq., Secretary of the Commission, the Rev. Mr. Knapp, Chief Relief Agent, and several ladies who were co-workers in the enterprise. When the history of this war shall be written at length, this little book will give invaluable aid to its pages, and the earnest men, and the worthy imitators of Florence Nightingale will receive their due meed of praise.

From T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

MY GOOD-FOR-NOTHING BROTHER. A Novel. By Wickliffe Lane. We know of no publishing house which displays equal discretion with this in its selections among foreign literature for American publication. Its issues are always of the highest order of literary merit, and are never deficient in moral tone. "My Good-for-nothing Brother" proves no exception to the rule. The hero and heroine are of course included among our favorites in this book, and next rank Dr. Lansdale and Miss Patty Dove. The villain and his coadjutor are both very human in their sins, displaying none of that mysterious and erratic wickedness which romances so often describe. The arguments which the book offers in favor of religious faith are worthy of the closest consideration.

From EDSON C. EASTMAN, Concord, N. H.:—

THE WHITE MOUNTAIN GUIDE-BOOK. Third edition. We regret that we receive this book at so late a date as to make its recommendation to tourists for the present year almost out of season. Yet those who have delayed their annual journeying to the cooler and not less beautiful months of early autumn will find it, if their destination be the mountains of New Hampshire, of great use to them. While others, to whom is denied this pleasure, will receive almost a recompense, and can indulge in a journey of the imagination without any of the troubles and expense of travelling, by a careful perusal of its descriptions of places and scenes.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—

FLOWERS FOR THE PARLOR AND GARDEN. By Edward Sprague Rand, Jr. Illustrations by John Andrew and A. C. Warren. Pp. 408. The lovers of flowers, and these should comprise all who love the beautiful in the works of God, will warmly thank the author of this charming volume. We have never seen a book so perfectly answering the design for which this is prepared—that of giving a practical knowledge of the best manner of cultivating flowers. It is more than a Treatise on the Floral Art: it is an Epic and History, a Directory and illustrated Manual, all combined to improve the taste of the world in the care, culture, and love of flowers.

"We would have flowers in every house, for their sunny light, for their cheerful teaching, for their insensibly ennobling influence," says Mr. Rand. He is right. We hope his beautiful book will induce thousands of families to ornament their homes with these precious floral gifts of our heavenly Father, bestowed as tokens of His love and care for our innocent happiness. "The rose of Sharon and the lilies of the field"—these are the flowers of the Old and the New Testaments of God's Book of Nature. Who would not be better for studying the flowers? The book is fitted to become a standard work of the beautiful in Art as well as in Nature.

THE DRUMMER BOY: a Story of the Burnside Expedition. By the author of "Father Brightshopes." This book, while evidently written for children, will, we think, be found interesting in an uncommon degree to older persons. Its style is simple, easy, and attractive; the author's power is especially marked in the graphic and vivid descriptions of camp-life and battle which seem to point to a personal experience. As may be seen from the title-page, it is a story of the present war. It seems the writer's object to narrate in a manner attractive to children the achievements of the Burnside Expedition. This is skillfully effected through the medium of a personal narrative. The book is crowded with incident and adventure, but the plot is simple and easily condensed. The hero, Frank Manly, whose name well expresses his character, enlists, with the approval of his parents, in a Massachusetts regiment as drummer-boy for the company. The regiment, after drilling for some time in camp near Boston, is sent to Maryland and brigaded at Annapolis. It sails with Burnside to North Carolina, and plays a conspicuous part in the subsequent operations. The account of the capture of Roanoke Island is too graphic and minute for any but an eyewitness. Throughout the book shows intimate knowledge of the peculiar life, habits, and temptations of a soldier, and the exhibition of their influence upon the character of Frank and his comrades is true to nature and experience. The book will certainly gain among the children the great popularity it deserves. It is got up after the usual perfect style of Mr. Tilton's publications. The illustrations are by Darley, which is saying their excellence is indisputable.

FROM BLANCHARD & LEA, Philadelphia.—
THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. July, 1863.
Price $5 a year.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR OCTOBER, 1863.—Our principal plate in this number is "The Sisters' School." We need say nothing of the engraving; that speaks for itself; but we call attention to the beautiful illustration story, commencing at page 320. What a chance for a publisher! to collect Godey's stories with the illustrations. Perhaps we may do it some day ourselves.

Our Fashion-plate! Well, our Fashion-plate, what can we say about it? Is it necessary to gild refined gold, or add a perfume to the violet? We think not. But when a person has anything nice, does not he or she like to have it noticed? And what hints will be thrown out to draw attention to it. But we give the article itself for notice and criticism, not fearing the latter, because we know that we are correct, and that our fashions cannot be doubted. Like the king's name, they are a tower of strength.

Our next plate, "The Lesson on the Flageolet," is a humorous and a very good one.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We ask attention to our notice on second page of cover. We have just received a MS., but unfortunately the lady inclosed her letter in it, and we had to pay full letter postage, twenty-six cents. Your letter must not be inclosed in the package, nor any private communication. What you want to say must be in a letter accompanying it, paying three cents postage on the same, and referring to the MS. you send, mentioning the latter thus: "I send you by same mail as this MS. entitled ——. I inclose a stamp for an answer to the letter, and also stamps for the MS. if it has to be returned." Any postage unpaid on letters or MSS., say it is three cents, has to be paid double here, six cents.

MARION HARLAND.—In this number we commence a new story by Marion Harland, which will be concluded in the November number; and in our December number will be found

A CHRISTMAS STORY, BY MARION HARLAND.

MANY of our subscribers may have noticed an additional plate mentioned by the press, which they may think they have not received. It arises from this fact: We usually print a notice intended only for the press, and having some old plates remaining on hand from former editions, we have printed on the back of them.

NEXT YEAR.—It may seem a long time to look for next year, 1864, but it is near at hand. We refer to it only to say, or rather indicate, what we have in preparation for 1864—something that our contemporaries do not dream of. In fact, they are always only dreaming, not acting. But we are on the alert, and we promise a rich year for those who subscribe for 1864.

POETRY AND A. ROSTER. addressed to particular persons are only to be sent to those to whom they are addressed, and had better be sent to those persons.

OUR CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.—Orders for our beautiful card photographs for albums come flowing in from all parts of the country. We are sending them off by thousands. They are of the best quality made, and give the highest satisfaction. See our advertisement on cover. The list there given comprises only a small selection from the catalogue, which now embraces between six and seven hundred subjects. This catalogue we send free on application.

The taste for these exquisite miniature copies of portraits, statuary, paintings, and fine engravings is steadily increasing. By means of the photographic art, you may now procure brilliant copies, perfect in all the effects and details, of pictures and engravings which only the few could once purchase, and the price will be only nominal. Who may not now indulge his love of art and beauty?

"CLUBS," "CLUBS."—Now is the time to commence the organization of clubs. Remember that the Lady's Book is the cheapest, because you get so much more for your money, and that so much better. Compare the Lady's Book with any other magazine. See the quantity and quality; and remember, also, what our exchanges so often mention, that it is "an evidence of the good taste of a family when the Lady's Book is seen upon the centre-table." We hardly need say more upon this subject. Every one of any taste wanting a "lady's book" will subscribe for "Godey."

YOUNG LADIES' SEMINARY FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS.—Mrs. Gertrude J. Cary, Principal, No. 1617 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa. The nineteenth session of this school will commence September 14th, 1863.

The course of study pursued embraces the fundamental and higher branches of a thorough English education. Particular attention is given to the acquisition of the French language, and a resident French Teacher furnishes every facility for making it the medium of daily intercourse. Mrs. Cary gives personal attention to the instruction of her pupils, aided by experienced lady teachers, and the best professional talent in the city. It is her constant endeavor to secure an equal development of body, mind, and heart, and the formation of habits of neatness and industry.

Mrs. S. J. Hale, Rev. H. A. Boardman, D. D., Rev. J. Jenkins, D. D., Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, D. D., Louis A. Godey, Esq., Philadelphia; Rev. J. N. Candee, D. D., Galesburg, Ill.; Louis H. Jenkins, Jacksonville, Ill.; Rev. George Duffield, Jr., Adrian, Mich.

Circulars sent on application.

PENN'A.

Two weeks ago I sent you $20 for the Lady's Book. I now send you $10 more. When your Book has come to us once a month for a whole year, we become accustomed to it, and fond of it, and who could help it? When our husbands and fathers tell us, with long faces, that we ought to deny ourselves something, as it is hard times, we never think of giving up the Lady's Book. We would rather fix up our old hoops, and make them do another year, than deny ourselves the pleasure of the Lady's Book. L.

A WORK has just been issued by a Paris firm which cost £40,000 ($200,000) for thirty copies! It is the description, with illustrations, of the coronation of the Emperor of Russia, and was ordered by him.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

We have neglected our usual chronicle of musical movements in opera, etc., during the summer. In fact there has been nothing, absolutely, to chronicle. With the return of fall and winter, however, we hope for a better state of things. Already the note of preparation is sounding, with the prospect of no less than four different opera troupes in the field—two Italian and two German. Carncross & Dixey have reopened for the season at their Burlesque Opera house.

The Musical Monthly.—At the request of many of our subscribers, we are now publishing two numbers of the Monthly per month to complete the volume during the year, and to enable us to begin the new volume on the first of January. The eighth and ninth numbers are now ready, bringing the work down to September inclusive, counting in numbers regularly from January last. These two numbers contain a delightful variety of music, including songs and pieces by Glover, Theo. Oesten, Mac Farren, and other favorite composers. Each separate piece of music, it will be remembered, is ornamented with a showy and distinct title-page, engraved expressly for the work. No other periodical has ever contained this costly feature, the value of which will be seen when the volume is completed and bound. Printed in the regular sheet music form, the Monthly is offered to piano-players as the cheapest and most desirable work ever published. The terms are but $3 00 per annum. Single numbers 50 cents. To those who have not yet seen the work, we will send any three numbers for $1 00. We would suggest numbers six, eight, and nine as best exhibiting the character and plan of the work. All subscriptions, etc. must be addressed to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher Musical Monthly, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

New Sheet Music.—S. T. Gordon, New York, publishes three beautiful new ballads by the always favorite Stephen C. Foster, There Was a Time, 25 cents, Larry's Good-by, and Bring my Brother back to Me, each 30. The Flowers are Asleep in the Dew, a charming serenade by Fred Buckley, 25. Also a Union version of the famous Southern melody, Bonnie Blue Flag, 25.

O. Ditson & Co., Boston, publish a beautiful Cradle Song, to words by Timothy Ticomcomb. Also, Roses Lie along the Way, sweet song by Porter; Morn is the time for Me, by Edw. L. Hime; The Village Bells Ring Merrily, charming bridal song; I'm Coming Home to Die, by Ossian E. Dodge; Kiss Me Once More, Mother, ballad by the favorite author of Annie Lisle; The Cumberland, fine song and chorus to words by Longfellow; The Volunteer's Good-by, a touching melody; and a spirited song and chorus, Corn is King; each 25 cents.

Also, a spirited and playable Cavalry Quickstep, by Glover, 35 cents; this is a fine composition. The Dew Drop, Polka Redowa, by Warren, 25. Domino Galop, arranged from Verdi's Un Ballo by Cootie, 35. Eldora, fine polka, 25. Masquerade Galop, and Light Heart Mazourka, each 25. Carol of the Mocking-Bird Schottische, a beautiful and showy piece for somewhat advanced performers, 40. The new Nocturne by Brinley Richards, Alexandra, composed in honor of the wife of England's future king, 35 cents.

Price of the following, 10 cents each: Ingleside Mazourka, Lily-leaf Polka Schottische, Gilt Edge Polka, Rochester Schottische, Camp Polka.

Any music in the Column we will purchase and forward to any address on receipt of price. Address

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

ARTIFICIAL HAIR, which is now in such general use, must come from "somewhere." Have you ever known how it is obtained? Light hair all comes from Germany, where it is collected by a company of Dutch farmers, who come over for orders once a year. It would appear that either the fashion or the necessity of England has, within a recent period, completely altered the relative demands from the two countries. Forty years ago, according to one of the first in the trade, the light German hair alone was called for, and he almost raved about a peculiar golden tint which was supremely prized, and which his father used to keep very close, only producing it to favorite customers, in the same manner that our august sherry-lord or hock-herr spares to particular friends, or now and then, it is said, to influential literary characters, a few magnums of some rare and renowned vintage. This treasured article he sold at eight shillings an ounce, nearly double the price of silver. Now all this has passed away, and the dark shades of brown, from France, are chiefly called for. Our informant, venturing boldly into a subject where-with ethnologists fear to tackle, delivers as his opinion that the color of the hair of English people has changed within the last half century, and that the great intercourse since the war with southern nations has deepened by many tints the predominating Saxon blonde of our forefathers.

YORK CITY, CALIFORNIA, June, 1863.

DEAR SIR: I am a constant reader of the Lady's Book; indeed to me it occupies the place of refined female society in the California mountains, and I would recommend it to all bachelors who wish to keep their minds in good order until they again return home. W. D.

CHESTNUT STREET FEMALE SEMINARY, English and French Boarding and Day School.—The twenty-seventh annual session will open Wednesday, September 9th. Particulars from circulars. Address Miss Bounney, or Miss Dillaye, 1615 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

THE LATE MRS. COLFAX.—In the death of Mrs. Evelyn E. Colfax, widow of the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, a very large circle of admiring friends share, to some extent, the bereavement of her husband and family. Mrs. Colfax, though for years an invalid, and verging toward that "undiscovered country" whence the most devoted love, the utmost medical skill could no longer withhold her, had spent several winters at Washington, and had formed acquaintances, which ripened rapidly into friendships, of which none was ever withdrawn from her. Finally her health failed so decidedly that she was removed last spring to Newport, R. I., in the hope that air and bathing would at least prolong her life, if they could not vanquish her disease. All was in vain; she sank steadily and irresistibly to the hour of her death, which occurred on Friday last, in the forty-first year of her age. Mrs. Colfax was a native, and till her marriage a resident, of Argyle, New York, which is still the home of her father's family.

CLUB of $40 from Washington Territory:—

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find $40, subscription for your most excellent and almost indispensable magazine. The greater part of us, having taken it for the last three years, feel as though a dear and valued friend was to remain with us another year at least. We wish you continued success in your most worthy enterprise.

TO THE EDITORS OF GODEY: At page 102, a subscriber wishes for information about paste. It matters not about the paste, what it is made of, providing that it adheres properly. But all persons who place scraps in a book should paste the edges only; stiffness would be avoided, and the evenness of the leaves of the scrap book would be preserved. In doing this care is required not to omit any part of the edge, and about the eighth of an inch is wide enough to hold any scraps if the paste is good.

TAKE YOUR OWN PAPER.—We ask every one to take the paper published in his town or county. It is a duty you owe the publisher. This ought always to be done before subscribing for any paper or periodical out of your own State.

It is proposed to modify the old English comedies for the American stage so that the favorite phrase of the passionate pater familias to the ungracious son—"Zounds, sir, I'll cut you off with a shilling!" shall read: "I'll cut you off with a small piece of paper bearing portraits of the Father of his Country, and called postage currency, or with two car tickets."

HOW TO COLOR THE PHOTOGRAPH.—MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have just published a little manual on the art of painting the photograph, which is for sale at the bookstores, or will be sent by them, post-paid, for 10 cents.

The same publishers are about publishing a capital story for the boys, by the author of "Father Bright-hopes." It is to be called "The Drummer Boy," and is a true historical account of "The Burnside Expedition." It will be illustrated by F. O. C. Darley, and issued in the Messrs. Tilton's well-known attractive style.

WE call attention to the advertisement of Mrs. Cary's School in this number. We can recommend it to our subscribers as an admirable institution.

FRUIT CULTURE.

In no branch of fruit culture do we find a more marked and decided improvement than in the quality and quantity of small fruits with which the markets of our principal cities are now supplied, and no other branch is so profitable; and it would surprise some of our distant readers were we able to give the quantities that are annually sold in the markets of Philadelphia. Among the small fruits, we include the strawberry, currant, gooseberry, raspberry, blackberry, and grape.

One great advantage which they possess over any other fruit crop is the quick return of the investment. In planting a pear or apple orchard, years must elapse before there is any return, or at least sufficient to compensate for the mere labor of planting and cultivating the trees. Now with the small fruits, the return is almost immediate; all the varieties enumerated, except the grape, will yield a partial crop the first year after planting, and in the second or third year they will come into full bearing, providing due attention is paid to the preparation of soil and cultivating.

My object, in the present article, is simply to call attention to the advantages of small fruit culture, so much neglected throughout the country. How many patches of ground that are now allowed to run waste, overgrown with weeds and briars, might be made with a little outlay to yield an abundant crop of delicious and health-preserving fruit, adding so much to the comfort of all who partake of them, either in their fresh state, or when prepared as jellies, jams, cooling drinks, or made into wine. Their cultivation is simple, the main requisite being a deep soil, well enriched with decomposed manure. Our space will not admit of any detail as to management; for this we must refer to such standard authors as Downing and Barry on "Fruit and Fruit Trees," and Phin on "Grape Culture and Wine Making." Our purpose is to give select lists of the latest and best varieties, such as we can recommend from our own experience as being the most productive and desirable for general cultivation. For the information of those interested, we have attached the prices as sold here. Orders for five dollars and upwards will be packed without any extra charge. Small packages can be forwarded by mail at the risk of the purchaser; but no orders will be received for any amount under one dollar. We can furnish all the varieties enumerated, and recommend as the best time for forwarding and planting the months of October and November.

STRAWBERRY. French's Seedling, new; the largest variety ever introduced; fruit of a bright scarlet color, fine flavor; plant of vigorous growth, and abundant bearer. Price of plants $2 per dozen; $10 per hundred. We can also recommend Wilson's Albany and Triomphe de Gand; both are of large size, and great favorites in this market. Price of plants 50 cents per dozen; $1 per hundred.

CURRANT. Large Red Dutch; White Grape; Cherry, and Versailles. $1 50 per dozen.

GOOSEBERRY. Houghton's Seedling. $1 50 per dozen.

BLACKBERRY. Dorchester, early; Larion, very large. $1 per dozen.

RASPBERRY. Philadelphia. This we consider the greatest acquisition in the raspberry line ever introduced; being remarkably productive, good size and flavor, and as hardy as an oak tree. The product of this variety has been estimated at two hundred bushels to the acre (see Gardener's Monthly for August). Price of plants $2 50 per dozen; $15 per hundred.

Hornet. A French variety of immense size, and quite productive. $1 50 per dozen; $10 per hundred.

Brinkle's Orange is also productive, and a beautiful variety. $1 per dozen; $5 per hundred.

Neither of the last two mentioned is hardy, and requires protection during the winter.

Catawissa is an everbearing raspberry, producing fruit from midsummer until late in the autumn. It is also quite hardy. Price $1 50 per dozen.

GRAPE. We cultivate all the leading varieties, and can furnish genuine plants of the Delaware, Concord, Rebecca, Union Village, Diana, Clara, Mountaineer, Isabella, Catawba, Elstnboro', Powell. Young vines from 25 to 50 cents each. Strong vines for early fruiting from one to three dollars each.

BULBOUS ROOTS. Orders are frequently sent out of season. Now is the proper time to plant all hardy bulbs, such as Hyacinth, the Tulip, Crocus, Smilacina, Lily, Narcissus, Jonquil, Iris, Pæonia, Crown Imperial, etc. We have a large collection of all the choicest varieties.

Catalogues will be forwarded to all inclosing a three cent stamp. Address

LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS.—We now commence in time to warn our subscribers against sending their money to any association purporting to furnish the Lady's Book as part of the inducement to subscribe, and promising them great prizes in some future drawing of a lottery. We will not be responsible in any way. We will also add that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible. We only send the Lady's Book when the money is sent direct to us.

WE would like our correspondents, ladies particularly, if they have any good jokes, to send them to us—about servants, or any thing else. There are many, and each one of our subscribers can contribute one. So let us have them. We would like a joke department; no old Joe Miller's. We have an original copy of that venerable joker, but don't use him.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—Very often we receive a notice, "Change my address to such a place." This would be very well if we had only one subscriber, but as we have nearly 100,000, it would be as well if that self-complacent person would say where the Book had been previously sent; or, in other words, this would be the form:—

Please send the Lady's Book, formerly addressed to me at — city, — county, State of —, to — city, — county, State of —.

A PUFFING wine-merchant having sent a sample of wine to the Earl of Derby, which he averred was a specific for the gout, subsequently wrote asking for an order. The Earl replied; presented his "compliments to Mr. —, etc., and begged to say he had tasted the wine sent, but—preferred the gout."

AN economical hint for the Secretary of the Navy. Let our sailors be taught to make their own stockings out of the "yarns" they manufacture.

MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will furnish, post paid, the book for $2 00. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

FAIRY TALE TABLEAUX.

THESE scenes are arranged expressly for juvenile performers, and are most of them descriptions of tableaux witnessed by the writer; the pretty scenes and costumes* of the little folks making very effective pictures. The audience, after seeing all the scenes bearing upon one fairy tale, should be required to guess the story represented.

TABLEAUX FROM "ALADDIN, OR THE WONDERFUL LAMP."

Scene I. represents the magician and Aladdin when the latter is about descending into the magic cave. The magician must wear a long white beard and hair; a high-pointed black cap, with a band upon which are cabalistic figures in gilt paper; a full robe of black, with similar figures just above the hem and on the belt. Aladdin wears an Oriental dress of dark blue stuff, and a cap of red cloth. The moment chosen is that of the incantation. Upon the ground is a pile of dry sticks, heaped as if for a fire; Aladdin kneels with a lighted taper, as if about to light the pile, while the magician, erect, extends his arms over the sticks. The fire should be centre of stage; the magician behind it, facing audience; Aladdin left, profile to audience.

Scene II. represents the mother of Aladdin cleaning the lamp. In the centre of stage is a table, upon which are the antique bronze lamp and a cup of water. The mother of Aladdin, in an Oriental dress, is standing right of table, profile to audience, rubbing the lamp. Aladdin, left of table, facing his mother, has his hand raised in an attitude of terrified astonishment. Behind the table, facing audience, is the genius invoked by rubbing the lamp. Here is a chance for the boys. The head of the genius may be made of the lid of a handbox, painted to represent a ferociously ugly human face, with a shock of black worsted hair. The body made of a broomstick with a cross-piece for shoulders. Drape from this a scarlet mantle. The legs are two boys, whose body and two legs represent one leg of the genius. A blue sack, open at the bottom and gathered at the neck, makes each leg of the trowsers, and the scarlet mantle must cover the boys' heads. This form stands centre of background, facing audience. Aladdin seems fainting with fear; but the mother does not see the spirit she has invoked.

Scene III. represents the sale of the wonderful lamp. In the centre of background is seated the princess, in a rich Oriental costume, before an embroidery frame. She has suspended her work, and is looking at the group in foreground. The magician, with a coarse blue cloak over his magic robe, and a red cap on his head, is kneeling right of foreground. Upon the ground before him is a basket covered with a white cloth. One of the magician's hands is on the handle of the basket; the other holds up to the slave a very shiny new brass lamp.† The princess' slave, in an Oriental dress, stands before the magician, holding toward him the old lamp, her other hand extended to take the new one.

Scene IV. represents the death of the magician. In the centre of stage is a table with fruit, cakes, and glasses upon it. On left side, profile to audience, is seated the princess, leaning forward, and looking eagerly at the magician, who is seated opposite to her. He has just fallen back, as if dead; his hand, toward audience, grasping the cup which has contained the poison. Entering the room, centre of background, is Aladdin.

MISCELLANEOUS AMUSEMENTS.

The Watchword.

ONE of the company must leave the room whilst another touches some article in her absence, which she is to guess on her return. She has been prepared a few minutes before, unobserved by the rest, with "the watchword," by the player, who undertakes to ask her the questions on her entrance. This she does by pointing to an object, and saying, "Is it that?" and as long as she continues that form of interrogation the other replies in the negative; but as soon as she changes it to "Is it this?" she replies immediately, "Yes," as "this" is the watchword fixed on. If the secret is not discovered in the first round, and a second one is requested, with a change of article touched, the puzzlers may contrive to again, and still more, perplex their companions by making "that" the watchword in the second instance.

The Apprentice.

She who begins must say she apprenticed her son to some trade, and only mention the initial letters of the first article he made or sold, and the other girls must guess the word. Whoever guesses rightly takes her turn. Thus: "I apprenticed my son to a confectioner, and the first things he sold were B. A.;" whoever guesses "burnt almonds" may continue the game.

EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY INTEREST:—

Ben Adam had a golden coin one day,
Which he put out at interest with a Jew;
Year after year, awaiting him, it lay,
Until the doubled coin two pieces grew,
And these two four—so on, till people said,
"How rich Ben Adam is!" and bowed the servile head.

Ben Selim had a golden coin that day,
Which to a stranger asking alms he gave,
Who went rejoicing on his unknown way—
Ben Selim died, too poor to own a grave;
But when his soul reached heaven, angels with pride
Showed him the wealth to which his coin had multiplied.

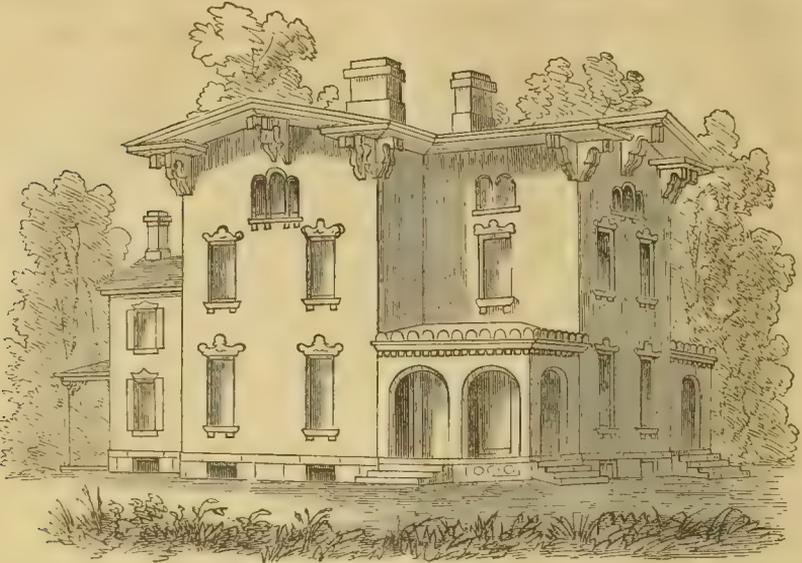

MY DEAR MR. GODEY: Knowing that you enjoy the joke of the present system of servantism, I want to tell you the "very last," which I have just heard.

A friend of mine advertised in the Ledger for a girl. She was called down to see a "lady who wanted to see the person who advertised," and went into the parlor. The lady wore a plaid silk, handsome cloak, richly trimmed bonnet, kid gloves, and a thickly worked black lace veil down; carried an embroidered handkerchief, and mother-of-pearl card-case. She made a great many inquiries about the place, which were politely answered, as my friend thought she wanted to recommend somebody. At last she said: "Well, I'll inquire and see if any better place offers; if not, I'll come and try it. I'll leave my card, in case you wish to send me any word." And throwing back her veil, disclosing a light mulatto, she took out a card, courtiesied, and left. The card was embossed, and written on it was—"Miss Lavina, Lady Attendant, Laundry Department, C. H." All of which is a true fact.

In many of the seminaries for ladies in our country, Godey's is the only magazine allowed to be taken by the scholars.

A letter from Munich informs us that Mr. Randolph Rogers gave for the city of Washington, which was cast at the great brass foundry, is now being exhibited to the public in the Bavarian capital. As this gate is to have a place in the great International Exhibition of this year, we offer the following brief description of it: The gate consists of nine panels, four down each side and one crowning the top. The first panel represents Columbus before the Council of Salamanca, endeavoring (but in vain) to prove the existence of another hemisphere; in the second he is seen taking leave of his friends, mounted on the mule purchased with the money given by Queen Isabella; in the third he is pleading his cause before the Queen and King Ferdinand; in the fourth he is seen sailing from Palos; in the fifth he lands at St. Salvador, and takes possession of the newly-discovered country in the name of the king; in the sixth he releases an Indian maiden, and thereby gains the friendship of the Indians; in the seventh he enters triumphantly into Barcelona; the eighth and ninth panels depict his degradation and melancholy end. Rogers has marked the period of the discovery of the American continent by placing round the gate statues of the chief contemporaries of Columbus—viz. King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, with Cortes, Pizarro, Balboa, &c. Between the panels are heads of writers on Columbus, among whom Robertson, Washington Irving, and Prescott are conspicuous.

A SCIENTIFIC lady, when a question turned on dynamics, asked the late George Stephenson, the celebrated engineer, "What do you consider the most powerful force in Nature?" Said he: "It is the eye of a woman for the man that loves her; for if a woman looks with affection on a young man, should he go to the uttermost ends of the earth, the recollection of that look will bring him back. There is no other force in Nature could do that."

C. Canada.—See page 195, August number. Cannot answer more definitely, unless you explain more fully.

E. L.—A dark spot appears on the skin where each hair has been removed. The receipt you mention does not prevent the hair from returning.

We have been frequently asked for Depilatories to remove hair. The following answers we copy from an English work, simply adding that we have always refused to furnish any receipts for removing superfluous hair:—

"A sister of my own, annoyed at the roughness of her arms, was tempted to use a preparation much advertised, apparently efficaciously; but, after a lapse of several months, the down reappeared thicker and more unsightly than ever."

"We know of no simple remedy for destroying superfluous hair. It may be burned off the arm by the flame of a candle."

"It not unfrequently happens that depilatories are pernicious or dangerous, but if the opinion of one who has had no practical acquaintance with any preparation of the kind is worthy of attention, from many remarks that have reached me, I am inclined to believe the least harm likely to accrue to the user is the increase of the defect it essays to remedy."

Now, after the above, we hope no one will ask us for a depilatory, for most certainly we will not furnish it.

Bertha.—We invite communications from our readers on all and every of the topics likely to interest. No charge is made for inserting receipts, as our object is to be useful, and to spread such knowledge as may be of interest and value to ladies.

"Lilla" is not satisfied with the color of her hair, "it is getting so dark;" and "Rosa D." wants to make her hair "wavy." "Helena" wishes to enamel her face, and "Freckles" to remove what she has adopted as her signature. Nobody is satisfied. One is so stout that she "feels quite awkward;" another, who would, perhaps, have no objection to exchange with Rosa, is "so sorrowful" that she is "unlike any one else." Now, as Mrs. Brown says at the play, "we don't hold" with hair-dyes or cosmetics—the hair and skin are irreparably injured by their use—and we have no sympathy with those who attach over-much importance to their personal appearance. It is quite right that every woman should look as well as she can; but dyeing the hair, dubbing the face, or resorting to any other artifice, defeats its own end—it spoils the real beauty of a handsome woman, and makes an ugly woman ridiculous.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXIII.—(Concluded.)

585. The blowpipe, as used in glass-working.—For this purpose, the best flame is that furnished by an oil or tallow lamp; but the spirit-lamp is more convenient, and answers the greater number of useful purposes.

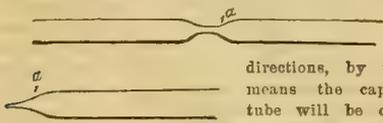

586. The operator will now require free play of both his hands; hence the blowpipe must no longer be held in a horizontal but a vertical plane, its bend resting on the ridge of a spirit-lamp collar, thus. And now will be evident the use of winding cord around the blowpipe at one end. Were the cord not there the blowpipe would slip. Some persons use a kind of fork in order to support the blowpipe and prevent its slipping. Such a contrivance is a positive disadvantage, preventing those little adjustments of the instrument made intuitively, and which are so desirable. It is not desired that the blowpipe should be fixed, but lightly, delicately balanced.

587. Golden rules in glass-blowing.—Never work on a dirty tube; never abruptly thrust a tube into, nor remove a tube from the blowpipe flame; never hold a tube motionless in the flame, but rotate it constantly; never attempt to blow a bulb whilst the tube is in the flame; and never, on any consideration, throw down a tube because you chance to have touched it in a hot part; rather burn your fingers than break your apparatus; a slight scorching of the finger-ends is rather an advantage than otherwise, producing a certain thickening of skin, which enables an operator to touch hot things with comparative impunity.

588. Take a piece of English flint-glass, about the following diameter and thickness; apply the outside part of a spirit-lamp blowpipe flame in the middle, balancing the tube between the two bends, and continually rotating. Then pull, still under rotation, and generate a small tube between the two large pieces; to whatever length extended it would always be a tube. Apply a small jet at the point a, and revolve the two pieces in opposite directions, by which means the capillary tube will be closed. Continue applying a very fine jet at the point a, until the glass point recedes to a in diagram the second. To get rid of the fresh bead a is not easy for a beginner. Not a bad plan consists in dextrously snapping it off by means of a pair of scissors. The operation just concluded of closing a tube is one of the most common in glass-working. If you can succeed in expanding the open end and forming a rim b, you are a clever glass-worker.

It is by no means easy, but may be effected at two or three operations by the sweeping motion of a wet slip of wood, thus—

Wet wood and cold metals can be brought into contact with fused pasty glass with impunity, but not in contact with hot solidified glasses.

589. The tube not finished is a test-tube; perhaps you would like to make its end flat. This is most easy. Bring it to the pasty state, and press it quickly on a metal plane—say the blade of a knife. Perhaps you would like to form an inverted end, such as we see in the so-called pint and quart bottles. This is most easy. Bring the end to a pasty condition, and apply suction by the lips. Lastly, a bulb may be required; for which purpose fuse not only the end, but also a portion of the side; then remove the tube, and blow rapidly yet gradually, otherwise the bulb will expand to an undesirable size, or it will be scarcely thicker than a soap-bubble.

590. The next point in glass-working consists in learning how to bend a tube. Tyros at the operation generally effect a bend of this kind, a result which depends on two or three circumstances, such as the too limited extent of tube softened, and the too rapid application of bending force, and, more than all, on the omission of pressure, applied before the bending operation. This pressure consists in forcing gently each extremity of the tube inwards on the fused middle, by which means the fused portion becomes thickened. This pressure should not only be applied before the bending is commenced, but even during that process; and remember that a good bend can seldom be effected at one heating. The operation must be frequently repeated.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq. No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co's; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR OCTOBER.

Fig. 1.—Dress of a light golden cuir-colored silk. The skirt is edged with a box-plaited ruffle, and above it is a row of black guipure lace. Rows of guipure insertion are arranged en talier up the front of the skirt, and in bands and pointed devices round the skirt. The corsage is made with points in front, and a square jockey at the back. The sleeves are cut with an elbow; and both sleeves and corsage richly trimmed with guipure insertion. A narrow fluted ruff is round the neck of the dress, fastened in front by a clerical bow. The hair is arranged over a roller in front, and ornamented with a scarlet velvet bow.

Fig. 2.—Dinner-dress of Irish poplin. The skirt is trimmed with narrow ruffles of pinked silk, the exact shade of the dress. These ruffles are about three-quarters of a yard long, and arranged slanting on the skirt; each ruff is headed by a fancy trimming formed of narrow black velvet, and finished off at the top by a bow of narrow velvet. The corsage is low, and made with a bertha, trimmed to match the skirt. The guimpe and sleeves are of embroidered French muslin, finished with muslin ruffs. The hair is rolled in front, and arranged in a waterfall at the back, tied with a blue ribbon. A broad plait encircles the hood and fastens beneath the waterfall.

Fig. 3.—Child's dress of white piqué, embroidered in white and red, and trimmed with a box-plaited trimming of scarlet worsted braid. The dress is low, and with short sleeves. The guimpe is of fine French muslin.

Fig. 4.—Dress of black alpaca, trimmed with crimson velvet cut in leaves, and arranged as a bordering above the hem of the skirt and round the jacket. The sleeves are cut with an elbow, and trimmed with velvet and drop buttons to match the waist. The hair is parted on one side, and arranged in a braid at the back.

Fig. 5.—Dinner dress of lavender silk, with a narrow fitting on the edge of the skirt. The overskirt is of a rich black silk, cut in deep points, trimmed with thread lace, and headed by a narrow bugle trimming. The corsage is made in one piece, although it has the appearance of a black jacket over a lavender silk waist. It is trimmed with black lace, which forms a jockey at the back. The hair is dressed in rolls and puffs, and ornamented with flowers.

Fig. 6.—Visiting dress of a rich green silk. The skirt is cut a half yard short, deeply pointed, and trimmed with narrow velvet. Under this skirt is fastened a deep founce, set on with a little fulness, and very elegantly braided with black velvet. The corsage, sleeves, and cash are braided to match.

Fig. 7.—Dress of Marguerite colored poplin, trimmed with a thick silk cord of the same shade as the dress. The corsage is novel, and made to represent a jacket. It is trimmed with narrow cord and buttons. The hair is arranged over a roller in front, and falls in a chignon or waterfall at the back.

FRENCH CORSAGE.

(See engravings, page 303.)

This corsage is made with a moderate point in front and deep jockey at the back. The material is black silk trimmed with guipure lace. It is worn over a fine tucked French muslin waist, with short puffed sleeves.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

With this month the display of fall novelties commences, and the fashionable world is again plunged in the ever-important subject of dress. Our stores are opening a multitude of charming tissues, and our milliners and dressmakers are again racking their brains to devise pretty novelties for the fall.

Bonnets have not yet undergone any change in shape. The Marie Stuart still prevails; and most of the trimmings are arranged to droop over the face. Few dress bonnets have appeared; most of the bonnets yet seen are straws, tastefully trimmed with feathers and velvet. Black and maize, black and coral, and black and a rich blue, are the favorite combinations. The new color, called Blé de Turquie, a rich shade of yellow, contrasts charmingly with black. Branches of pine, with small cones, are now substituted for the grasses and grains worn during the summer. A novelty is the Bohemian straw, which is dyed of a bright yellow, and when trimmed with ribbon to match, mingled with black lace and buttercups, is exceedingly stylish.

The dressmakers are in despair for a new style of bodice; but, alas! it has not yet appeared. All they can do is to change the style, by the different arrangement of trimming. The Postilion bodice with its swallow tail basque, with two points or square ends in front, the vest style, the corsage with three points at the back, and four in front, are all being made, though far from novel.

Double skirts and tunics will be worn. This last is somewhat novel. The upper skirt and body are in one, the same as an Empress dress. The skirt is quite long at the back, and slopes very suddenly to the front. This style of dress is generally trimmed with chenille fringe, which is one of the richest trimmings of the season. Silk fringes of all kinds and widths will be very much worn. Feather fringe is very beautiful, also the Thibet fringe—a most elegant soft kind of fur, very light and graceful. It is about three inches long, and mounted on a hooding of white silk braid.

Dresses are made very high in the throat, and in order to make the collar set well a small straight band is sewed round the neck of the dress.

Skirts are mostly cut en traine; that is, the back breadths are cut very long, and sloped at the bottom to suit the side and front breadths. This gives the skirt a graceful sweep, and is decidedly prettier than lengthening from the upper part of the skirt.

We cannot help remarking, en passant, on the shape of crinoline. It is worn now perfectly flat on the hips, and all the fulness thrown at the back. For outdoor wear, the skirt should have a small train, and for evening a large train; but always without any fulness on the hips.

Silks have come out this season of particularly rich quality. Gros grains are the favorites, and black continues more in vogue than ever. Black silks are being made up with contrasting colors, such as the different shades of Russia leather, hazel, gray, maize, blue, and white. This style of dress is, in our opinion, the richest and most distinguished a lady can wear. Plaids of all sizes, and of the richest colors, with moirés and chenées, are among the new goods.

The rage for fluted trimming still continues; and to those who object to it on account of its losing its folds from dampness, we would suggest that Mme. Demorest has obviated this difficulty by an ingenious little contrivance. We believe it is by the insertion of a very delicate wire, which keeps the trimming perfectly in shape. An extremely thick cord, matching the dress in color, is frequently placed above the braid; and sometimes perfectly straight round the skirt, and sometimes twisted or arranged in a fanciful design on each breadth.

From the tasteful hands of Mme. Demorest, we have already seen some very good and effective styles which possess both the charm of novelty and elegance. The first was a promenading costume. The material Alexandra cloth of the darkest shade of mode color, made in a suit, consisting of a dress and casaque. The casaque, or basquine, was shaped to the figure, but not closely, and rounded off from the front, deepening behind until it reached two-thirds the length of the skirt. The trimming was leather-colored velvet, put on in pointed straps, finished on each edge with a quilting of mode-colored silk. The suit was trimmed to match, and even the bonnet, boots, and gloves intended to wear with it were of the same colors, which contrasted charmingly, and formed a very quiet but recherché promenading dress.

These uniform costumes, of which we spoke in our last Chat, will be much adopted during the fall and winter. It is a pretty style, but of which one tires soon, unless a person has a variety of suits, and then it is exceedingly expensive. In some cases square shawls of the same material as the dress, and trimmed to match, are substituted for the Talma, or casaque; but they do not seem to be greatly in demand, and never for young ladies.

Another dress was a very rich black gros grains silk, ornamented in quite a novel manner. The decorations consisted of diamond-shaped blocks of black velvet embroidered in the centre in a light leafy design, with silk and jet, surrounded with guipure lace. These were united to form a border round the bottom of the skirt, and also ornamented the waist and sleeves.

A robe of very light gray taffetas, superb in quality, was ornamented with a narrow festooned volant, which deepened in the centre of each festoon, and was fastened at each point by a flat bow of ribbon without ends. The volant was edged with narrow guipure. The bodies were in all cases plain and very high; the sleeves nearly tight, and shaped to the arm.

A pretty design among the fall sleeve patterns was a puff, or a frill, set into the back of the sleeve, reaching several inches above, and terminating several inches below the elbow.

There is nothing new in the form of headdresses. The two most popular styles are the coronet and the spray of flowers at the side of the head. All flowers are now mounted on gutta percha, which gives the appearance of natural stems, and makes them more pliable than the old-fashioned wire mountings. Bows of ribbon, velvet, and lace are frequently substituted for the spray of flowers. This style, we may say, is universal, and adopted both by young and married ladies.

Many of our belles are weaving natural flowers among their tresses. It is a Spanish fashion, and very beautiful. Still natural blossoms are so frail that, unless constantly renewed, but few will retain their freshness during an evening. We think, therefore, we prefer the imitations of nature, as they can scarcely be detected from the originals, and are decidedly more economical.

We learn from our Paris correspondent that a noted French artificial florist has introduced small oranges into bridal wreaths, to overcome the heavy effect of the orange blossoms and buds only; green, it is said, not being admissible in bridal wreaths. We have as yet seen nothing of the kind; therefore, cannot recommend them. Indeed we do not like the idea at all. We think nothing can be prettier than orange blossoms with their rich glossy green leaves mingled with sprays of the pure and graceful lily of the valley. Green must necessarily be introduced into a bridal wreath to relieve the white; otherwise it is exceedingly tame. Daisies are being substituted in Paris for the lilies; but we consider pendant flowers the more graceful. The back hair is generally arranged in a waterfall, frequently tied with a bright ribbon or velvet. Bunches of braids are also caught up in the same style.

For married ladies the Marie Stuart cap is being revived, and is generally a becoming coiffure.

A novelty in the way of a sash has just been introduced for a muslin dress. A belt is worn round the waist, and then a long scarf of muslin is knotted and fastened at the back. The sash is scalloped all round, and the ends are slashed with three rows of slits, each about one inch and a half long, and one finger apart. Through these slits velvet or ribbon is run; and the ends of the ribbon, instead of being fastened under the scarf at the edge, are cut in fish-tails, and stand out. The first row of slits, or slashes, slant from right to left; the second row from left to right, and the third and last row the same as the first. This is really very pretty and effective.

The other style of sash is either fastened on the left shoulder and tied midway down the skirt under the right arm, or else encircles the waist, and is tied midway down the skirt at the back.

Wraps are now a matter of no small perplexity. There exists such a variety of styles, that it is difficult to know what to select. The ever-fashionable India shawl, one of the most graceful and convenient wraps, now appears on all the promenades. In no one article is there such a variety of quality and style. They are to be had at Stewart's of all prices, from the convenient little wrap of $50 to the marvel at $2000.

Blue cloth mantles are very much worn by misses and children. They are generally trimmed with black or white.

We will note a few of the numerous styles for black silk mantles. There is the loose paletôt, trimmed all round with a double ruching; the outer one black, and the inner one scarlet or blue silk. These are principally worn by young girls. Then there are casagues, which reach to the knee in front, and much longer in proportion at the back. They should be cut to follow and define the outlines of the figure, without fitting it too closely. They are trimmed in a variety of ways; but one of the prettiest is to have small loops of black and white velvet, about one inch wide arranged round the neck, down the outside of the sleeve, and all round the skirt.

Talmas and circles are also much worn, trimmed with laces, gimps, feather trimming, chenille fringe, ruches of cuir-colored silk, and stamped leather trimming.

Cloth wraps are also made up in a variety of new styles. Among the most effective are the Spanish, which are caught up in graceful folds, and fastened on the shoulder.

THE DARRO.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

The brilliant colors in which pardessus are now so popular afford the opportunity to have the ornaments with which they are decorated strikingly conspicuous. The circular illustrates one which can be made in any color desired—crimson, blue, white, black, etc. at the choice of the wearer. For carriage, or festive occasions, especially the latter, when in white cloths, with the fleur de lis in light blue velvet appliqué, with silver braid, or in royal purple and gold embroidery, the effect is peculiarly elegant. For street wear, the same pattern is made in black or quiet colored cloths, with black velvet appliqué, and braided, for those who do not desire such gay colors in garments.

POLISH DRESS AND LOUIS XIV. COSTUME.

The Polish dress consists of an underskirt of green bordered with scarlet. The corsage and short sleeves are of green, and the long sleeves scarlet. The upper skirt and point are of purple, edged with swans'-down. The sash is of scarlet, with black ends. Boots red, and bordered with swan's-down. Cap scarlet, bordered with swan's-down, and a black leather at the side.

The Louis XIVth costume consists of a petticoat of white satin, with a lace flounce on the edge of the skirt. The overdress is a very rich pink satin, trimmed with roses and quillings of silk. The hair is powdered, and dressed with a small wreath on the left side of the head.

DRESS TRIMMING.

CONSISTING OF LACE INSERTION AND NARROW RIBBON.

This consists of lace insertion and narrow ribbon or ribbon velvet, folded at equal distances, so as to form the pattern very clearly represented in our illustration. A white muslin skirt, trimmed round the bottom with black lace insertion, and mixed with a bright colored ribbon, would be extremely stylish. To make the trimming easy to do, the design might be traced on a broad piece of ribbon, and the materials run on. This band could then be easily put on the skirt, and the skirt would not be so much tumbled as if the trimming were made on the dress in the first instance.

LEAH MOORE'S TRIAL.

BY MARION HARLAND.

(Concluded from page 319.)

[Entered, according to act of Congress, in the year 1863, by LOUIS A. GODEY, in the clerk's office of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

CHAPTER III.

I HAVE been thus minute in my description of the scenes immediately succeeding Charles Moore's return to his home, both because they were my initial lesson in the knowledge of the true state of affairs in the household, and because they will best convey to the reader a conception of the many links—no single one of which was worthy of serious notice, that yet, taken altogether, formed a chain whose grievous weight was bowing my poor friend's heart and soul to the dust. It would be derogatory to my self-respect were I to trouble myself to assert that I never, by look or word, intimated to Leah aught concerning the picturesque tablean I had broken up on that night. I fancied that Mr. Moore appreciated my discretion and was grateful for the same, for his treatment of myself was, in every respect, unexceptionable. He took great pains to render my stay in the town and house agreeable, devising excursions and entertainments, which he supposed would suit my taste, and accompanying me in these with alacrity and apparent pleasure. I would have declined going out upon many such occasions, but Leah opposed this inclination so positively, and so often exerted herself to an imprudent extent to make one of the party, when she suspected that I designed to remain at home with her, that I generally yielded to her importunities and played Mademoiselle De Trop with what grace I could.

For de trop I was, whenever there were but three in the company, and Miss Dalrymple did not scruple to make me feel this, when she could accomplish the lady-like feat without attracting our cavalier's attention. One instance of her disposition to claim him entirely for herself recurs to me with particular force. A heavy fall of snow was followed by moonlight nights of rare beauty, and a temperature so mild that one marvelled at the solidity of the white carpet spread thickly over the earth.

"Ladies, what say you to a sleigh-ride this evening?" questioned Mr. Moore at dinner, the day after the storm. "Don't all speak at once!"

Leah smiled at the silence that ensued.

"Nobody seems to be in haste to accept your tempting invitation," she remarked. "Why not 'all at once?'"

"Because my cutter holds but three, with moderately close stowing, and I wish to avoid the predicament of being called upon to decide between claimants for the privileges of being one of the passengers."

"I could not go if there were room for a dozen without packing," she returned. "So the matter is settled without perplexity to yourself or to us. Maria and Janetta will compose your load."

Janetta ate on in sober taciturnity, although I had heard her wishing for a sleigh-ride that very morning.

"I must be excused, if you please," said I. "I had the toothache last night, and dare not venture out in the evening."

"But the air is so pure and dry, almost as bland as summer, and you can wrap up your head and face! I cannot consent to your missing such a treat!" insisted Leah.

Her husband civilly seconded her arguments; but honestly believing that the exposure would be injudicious, I remained firm in my declination.

"So, Nettie," said Mr. Moore, with affected chagrin, "you are the only one who does not excuse herself from the pleasure or displeasure of accompanying me! I warn you that I shall expect you to make up for both losses and mortification."

Janetta Dalrymple danced about the house that afternoon like a mad creature—in an irrepressible flutter of exultation, oddly at variance with her manner of listening to the proposition, as first made, and its discussion.

"Will night never come?" she cried, meeting Mr. Moore in the upper hall about five o'clock.

"It is almost dark now!" he returned, laughing. "Do you then anticipate so much delight in this frolic—this moonlight flitting?"

"Delight! could I fail to have it?"

Leah's appearance interrupted her.

"Charles," she said, coming to the sitting-room door, "I was just about to dispatch a note to you. Can I speak with you for a moment?"

"I came up home for some papers," he began, just as the door shut them in.

The result of the conference was soon made known to me by Leah, who sought me in my chamber for that purpose.

"I am here to entreat you to reverse your purpose of staying at home to-night. I have changed my mind; so there's a worthy precedent for you. Henry Ellis—my cousin—called awhile ago to offer us his double sleigh in exchange for our lighter cutter. His wife is not at home, and he wishes to drive a fast trotter instead of a pair of sober family studs. He wants Charles to put in one of his horses with ours, and take us all. I am going, and so are you! We have fur robes enough to smother you, a footstove, and foot-blankets, and I have provided a phial of toothache medicine, in case of casualties. There is no use in saying a word!"

I submitted, not reluctantly, for the prospect of the drive was tempting, and already the merry din of the passing sleigh-bells made the blood bound more quickly in my veins. We took a hurried cup of tea to prepare us for the excursion, and by a queer chance the alteration in the programme was not mentioned at the table, the meal being discussed in unusual silence. Janetta begged to be excused before the rest of us were half through, and sped off to her room, carolling fragments of the sleigh-bell waltz as she ran.

"How that girl enjoys life!" said Mr. Moore. "It is a genuine pleasure to afford her a diversion like that of this evening; she partakes of it with such zest, such child-like abandon!"

The observation was directed to me; and I rejoined, very safely and truly: "She does indeed seem to be in fine spirits to-night."

Leah and I stood in the hall, wrapped in furs and hoods, before Janetta made her appearance. She was unpunctual to a proverb.

"Come, little one! come, birdie!" called Mr. Moore, at the stair-head. He had an exhaustless store of pet names for her. "We are waiting!"

"I am coming—yes, I'm coming!
With my furs about my feet!"

she sang from the floor above.

This trick of parodying her favorite songs was a great habit with her. She came down upon the run, and was close upon us before she saw either of the unlooked-for additions to the party. The fall of her countenance was actually ludicrous.

"Why, how is this? I had not understood!" she stammered, thrown completely off her guard by the suddenness of the disagreeable discovery.

Mr. Moore explained the causes of the change in his plans, after a style that savored too much of the apologetic to suit me. She made no reply, except by her looks, which betokened unqualified dissatisfaction. She even hung back, as half inclined to decline going at all, when he would have handed her in after us. Her cousin spoke to her in a low tone of displeased expostulation, of which I caught but two words—"unreasonable" and "jealous." Sulkily submitting to the impetus of his hand, she was placed upon the front seat. This was always her chosen position; it mattered not that I often occupied the back alone. It had occurred to me that Leah might, once in a while, prefer to ride by the side of her husband, but she never expressed such a preference in my hearing. I could see, in the clear moonlight, that our gallant charioteer made repeated efforts to engage his companion in conversation, bending to her ear with whispered soothing or entreaties, and watching her countenance with anxious attention. She was obstinate in her dejection, keeping her face averted, and replying to him by monosyllables, or gestures. At last he showed signs of the spirit he should have exhibited at the outset; ignored her presence, and devoted himself to amusing Leah and myself.

We rode for more than two hours, and the talk was hilarious, as befitted the scene. The broad roads were filled with swiftly gliding equipages, and the air resonant with merry voices and chiming bells. Janetta paid little visible heed to what was going on about her; took no part in the interchange of salutations that were continually passed, as we met acquaintances and friends. She had drawn her veil closely over her face, and sat bolt upright, looking neither to the right nor the left, without uttering one syllable. As we neared home, she lifted her handkerchief to her eyes, and her cousin bestowed a searching, sidelong glance upon her, from which circumstances I inferred that her obdurate mood had assumed a softer form. She went quickly into the house, upon alighting at our door, and straight on to her chamber, her veil still wrapped over her features. Leah's thoughtfulness and bountiful hospitality had provided a hot supper for us—coffee, oysters, and biscuit—which was served in the upper sitting-room, by the time we had divested ourselves of our muffings. Mr. Moore, in dressing-gown and slippers, looking very gay, comfortable, and handsome, occupied his arm-chair at the head of the little round table. Leah sat opposite, and I at his right. The chair to the left remained vacant.

"My dear, have you sent for Nettie?" inquired the host, as he dipped the ladle in the smoking tureen.

"I have. She does not wish any supper."

"What!" suspending his hand midway between the dish and plate.

"She does not care for supper, she says," repeated Leah, quietly.

"There must be some mistake! I never knew her refuse oysters before, let them be offered when they might. She is surely not well."

"I sent up a second message to inquire if she were indisposed, and if I might supply her with a cup of coffee in her room. She declined taking any refreshment, and said that she was very well."

Mr. Moore ladled out a plateful of the savory "stew" for me, and another for his wife; then pushed his chair back.

"I will go up and speak to Nettie myself."

"Charles!" ejaculated his wife.

"I will be gone in a moment, my love," and he was gone.

I have seen Charles Moore grieve and wound his wife more times than I like to remember. I never saw her angry with him except this once; yet her temper was naturally quick. She did not comment upon his conduct during his absence; finished pouring out the coffee; ordered the servant to replace the cover of the tureen, and dismissed her, saying that she would summon her when she was needed. After this there was no more said for the next ten minutes. Mr. Moore was gone at least that long. Leah's flushed cheek, flashing eye, and compressed mouth were enough to deter a bolder person than myself from opening a conversation upon indifferent topics, and every principle of honor and delicacy withheld both of us from alluding to the subject that engrossed our minds.

Charles's temper was less inflammable than his wife's, and while he looked annoyed upon his return from his fruitless errand, he yet accosted us with his customary cheerful courtesy.

"Nettie begs to be excused from appearing again to-night, ladies. I have been scolding her a little, and the poor, sensitive child is nearly heart-broken."

"Did she send no apology for her unjustifiable rudeness to Miss Allison and myself during our ride?" asked Leah, sternly.

"She is very sorry that she marred the pleasure of our excursion by her silly moodiness. There is no accounting for woman's whims and humors, Miss Allison."

"Pray, do not judge all women by Janetta Dalrymple!" Leah's vexation mastered her prudence. "Her behavior this evening was more than whimsical. It was ill-bred and unkind—a display of temper such as no lady would be guilty of."

"You are hard upon her, Leah. She has her faults; but she is incapable of offering an intentional insult to any one, particularly to a friend whom she respects, and a connection whom she loves as sincerely as she does you."

"A depth of respect I should never have suspected had not you informed me of it! I am sorry to say it, Charles, very sorry to disagree with you upon this or any other point; but I do not think that you are going the right way to work to correct Janetta's faults, if that is your wish. She is both unreasonable and selfish."

"Just what I have been telling her, my dear wife; so we agree there! If you please, we will dismiss this matter for the present. It is an exquisitely painful thought to me that my favorite relative—one whose attachment to myself is that of a sister for an elder brother, should have failed so signally to conquer your prejudices and win your affection. Don't suppose that I blame you for this, however! I know that she tries hard to please you, to make you love her, and I think that you are not intentionally unkind to her; but I believe, Miss Allison, that it is a well-established although an unexplained fact, that no two women, however excellent and lovely, can dwell for two months under the same roof in perfect concord."

I answered that I had certainly known exceptions to his rule, and passed, gladly, to other themes of discourse.

In this single instance I could not acquit Leah of blame. She had spoken injudiciously, and at the wrong time; yet my heart ached for her none the less on this account. I may not, in my spinsterly experience, be the best judge of such questions, but it appears to me that few women, who really love their husbands, could have borne more patiently the spectacle of the petulant disappointment, the undisguised chagrin, excited in a young and fond maiden by the discovery that, instead of her being permitted to enjoy the anticipated affectionate tête à tête with the said husband, his lawful spouse was to form one of the company. I doubt if even Griselda, milk-and-water angel though she was, would, out of the plenitude of her insipid amiability, have witnessed such an exhibition unmoved by some spice of conjugal jealousy, or that she would not have set her wits to work to conjecture what could be the nature of the intercourse which was thus impatient of the presence and surveillance of her who should have been the gentleman's best friend and prime counsellor. Between ourselves, moreover, dear reader, I do not believe that Griselda loved her kingly lord with one tithe of the fervor that glowed in the bosom of this untitled American wife for hers.

Miss Janetta never apologized to the object of her profound respect or to her visitor for her misbehavior, nor did her demeanor to us bear the salutary fruits of repentance and reformation, malgré her cousin's scolding and her consequent broken-heartedness. In his absence she favored us with very little of her society, a deprivation we could not deplore while her uniform bearing, when she did vouchsafe the honor, was flippant and supercilious, and herself a decided specimen of the nil admirari school, so far as our pursuits and plans were concerned. To Mr. Moore, she was a totally different being; her perpetual outbreaks of artless enthusiasm; her girlish warmth of speech and action reminding me of nothing so much as the encomium passed upon Miss Merry Pecksniff by her poetic admirer: "Oh, she was a gushing young thing!" She affected no secrecy as to her dotting love for her cousin—"her best, her only friend!" She worshipped him abroad, as at home and in private, and Charles Moore was not superior to the weakness of liking to be worshipped by an attractive woman. What man—unless he be an anchorite or a dullard—is not liable to fall into the like temptation?

The intimacy between the idol and the devotee became more marked each day, and the slighted wife still saw all—perchance saw and feared more than did really exist, and suffered silently. It is not suffering like this that makes the soul strong. I verily think that Leah could have borne more easily entire estrangement and divorce from her husband than the anomalous existence she led just now. Then there would have been no ground for hope, no food for love, such as the presence, the loving looks and words, the acts of kindness and liberality that now brought with them a mildly sweet agony. O to have so much and yet not possess, all! It was very selfish; but then, as Miss Dalrymple has remarked, "all married people are selfish." I take the liberty of adding on my own authority, "Or ought to be!"

Leah and I were paying a call, one afternoon, at a house that stood exactly opposite to Mr. Moore's law-office. "Why do you not bring that nice little cousin of yours to see me, Mrs. Moore?" asked the hostess, by and by. "I have taken quite a fancy to her from seeing her in the street. She seems to be very fond of out-door exercise."

Leah made answer that this was the case.

The lady continued: "Not a day passes, unless the weather is very stormy, that she does not call in at Mr. Moore's office, across the way, and she often tempts him to join her in her rambles. I like to watch them walking together. They appear to be very much attached to one another."

"Mamma!" The speaker's daughter checked her innocent volubility. "You have dropped your spectacles!" And in restoring them, she gave her senior a meaning look that silenced her.

"They are very sincerely attached to one another!" replied Leah, composedly. "It would be strange if they were not, since they were reared almost like children of the same mother."

The world should not asperse his fair fame, however grievously her confidence in him might be shaken. She would play her part bravely in public, if the lacerated heart quivered and bled to death in the effort.

How long would this false and hollow show of tranquillity last? how long the surface of the groaning deep smile, as with summer calm? were thoughts that haunted me day and night. I inwardly condemned Leah's reserve with her husband as much as I admired her concealment of the true state of her domestic affairs from others. While she bore his name, and lived with him in seeming amity as his wife, she had no right to smother thoughts within her breast that were eating away her life; to brood darkly and secretly over imaginations that multiplied, and were magnified in the darkness. Her skirts were not quite clear while this policy was pursued. Yet she was actuated by no mean cowardice or sullenness in adopting this course. A prouder woman never lived. She would have died sooner than play the spy upon another's actions. While she would, and did try to prevent the growth of the attachment between her husband and his cousin by all fair and honorable means, strove, conscientiously and constantly, to win back the love she feared and believed was straying from her, she scorned to attack her persecutor with her own weapons, or to constrain, by reproaches and threats, the return of the recusant. She would not owe to duty and law that which should be the spontaneous tribute of a true and loving heart.

Thus matters stood when I was seized with a violent cold that confined me to my bed for several days. Leah spent most of the day, and a portion of each evening, in my apartment. Mr. Moore was busily engaged with preparations for an important suit in which he was counsel, and could spare but half an hour or so for his after supper smoke and talk in the sitting-room—the pleasant home-chat which, Leah had once told me, was to her the most delightful event of the day, however choice might have been its other pleasures. She was uncommonly cheerful, the third evening of my confinement, although she came to me earlier than upon either of the two previous ones.

"Isn't Charles the most thoughtful fellow in the world?" was her introductory remark. "Overrun by business, as he is, he could yet remember the name of the book we were wishing for yesterday, and went half a dozen squares out of his way, as he came up town, to get it. Shall I commence it forthwith?"

I assented, gratifiedly; and, seating herself under the shaded light, she began. The reading had lasted an hour and a half; when, detecting signs of hoarseness in her voice, I stopped her, fearful lest she should be exhausted by the prolonged effort.

"It will be a sorry return to make Mr. Moore for his considerate attention to our wishes, if we present to him a voiceless wife in the morning!"

She laughed, and agreed to postpone the perusal of the volume to the morrow. Still holding it, and now and then turning a leaf, unwilling, as it were, to lay aside this tangible token of his remembrance of and kindness to her, she narrated, with affected carelessness, other examples of a similar nature; favors shown and benefits conferred, as apropos, and in a manner as delicate. In her happier moods—now, alas! far less frequent than of old—she enjoyed nothing more than to talk of him; and would enumerate his manifold virtues in my hearing with the simple-heartedness and circumstantiality of a child. I imagined sometimes that she strengthened her own faith in his affection by rehearsing these proofs of it to me. To-night, she was very hopeful with regard to other subjects, all bearing a close connection to this master emotion. She spoke of a certain and momentous event, now not many weeks distant, with calmness—even pleasure.

"We shall both be happier then, Maria, and I hope and feel that I shall be a better woman. I have grown irritable and unjust of late; have developed traits that not even the fact of my being a prey to this unfortunate and, it would seem, unconquerable nervousness can excuse. I told Charles this evening how heartily ashamed I was of my variable and pettish moods, and promised that, if he would bear with me a little longer, I would promise better things for the future."

I returned a cheering reply, and there was a pause. Mr. Moore's "den"—his wife's favorite aversion, according to her declaration, was directly above my room, and there penetrated the ceiling, now, the low murmur of a deep voice.

"Hear the man!" laughed Leah. "He is studying his tiresome briefs as a school-boy would con his spelling-book! Does he often amuse you in this way?"

"I have heard the same sound many times before," I rejoined.

She listened, smilingly. She loved the very echo of that voice better than she did the finest music in the world.

"He must enjoy hearing himself talk!" she resumed. "One might suppose him a magician holding converse with his familiar demon, conjured from the vasty deep by the incense of his inseparable cigar. Did you ever venture a look into the recesses of his grotto?"

"Never!"

"I will show you the mysterious chamber some day when he is not at home. I never approach the charmed precincts myself, if he is within. If he has a private study, it must be inviolable by all human foot during study hours, he says. This was the stipulation he made when he had the room fitted up. I could not bear to have him write and read in his office at night. It is an inexpressible comfort to know that the same roof covers us both, although I do not see him."

She retired early, quitting my room by ten o'clock; and, feeling myself unable to obey her injunction to immediate slumber, I lay listening idly to the slight sounds that, in this quiet quarter of the town, varied the silence of the night. The chief of these was the murmur overhead, and I found myself harkening to it, after a while, with kindling interest. It was intermittent, I noticed, and in the deepening stillness without and within, I fancied, as it came more distinctly to my senses, that the tone was colloquial, not meditative or hortatory; next, that the pauses of irregular length were made to admit the replies of some one else; then, that a voice of different pitch and quality filled these up. I was dismissing the idea, with a smile at my fantasies, when there fell into the room—I can use no other expression that would fitly describe the suddenness and weight with which it burst upon me—there fell into the room the unmistakable sound of a laugh—a peal, in which two voices blended, and I recognized both!

Janetta Dalrymple's chamber was likewise in the third story, at the back of the house, a situation she preferred on account of the view and seclusion; and here she professed to spend her evenings in reading or writing, when we were without company, and she was not at the piano. This, then, was the inviolable sanctuary which the wife's footsteps must not approach! this, the studious retirement, for which the industrious lawyer had forsaken her society! here was the solution of the strange noises I had so frequently heard upon other occasions, when I had bidden Leah "Good-night," and sought my pillow; oftentimes receiving with her kiss a sigh that "Charles would injure his health by studying so late and so much at night!" There was no self-deception in the present case. I only wondered, as once and again Janetta's peculiar laugh set my teeth on edge, albeit it was not an unmusical one in itself, and her accents, less cautious than in the earlier part of the evening, or more audible by reason of the surrounding hush, offended my sensitive auriculars; I only marvelled that I was so late in arriving at the truth.

There was but one drop of comfort in the troubled thoughts that kept me awake far into the night—until after eleven o'clock, at which hour I heard a movement in the study overhead; then a door closes softly, and light footsteps retreat in the direction of Miss Dalrymple's room. Mr. Moore did not descend to his rest until past midnight; but he did not study aloud. The single consolation which I derived from the events of the evening was that Leah had not suspected these clandestine interviews—I could give them no other name. Things were assuming a more serious aspect. The reckless girl was not only betraying the confidence and abusing the hospitality of her hostess, but imperilling her own reputation in the eyes of servants and chance visitors. I wondered if it ever crossed Mr. Moore's mind what construction the prying curiosity of his domestics might put upon these prolonged and unseasonable visits of this young and fond cousin to a remote and lonely part of the house, well understood to be his private study—privacy, which even their mistress respected. I knew that Miss Janetta would have met such an impertinent insinuation with a bold face, and the maxim I had heard many times from her lips—"Evil to him that evil thinks." Perhaps I was full of evil thoughts and all uncharitableness; but I could not resist the conviction that the majority of those whom this artless and daring damsel daily met in society would judge her conduct as I did—many more harshly.

Discoveries, like most other earthly events, are epidemic; and, being aware of this fact, I ought not to have been so startled and confused at a proposition made by Leah a few nights after I became convalescent. We were in the "snuggery" alone—Mr. Moore having pleaded urgent business to be transacted—deeds drawn, or copied, or something of that kind, and Miss Janetta bidden us a cool "Good-night," without making any apology whatever. A ring at the front door heralded the appearance of the housemaid, burdened with a large bundle.

"From the dressmaker's, ma'am," she said, delivering it to her mistress.

Leah sprang up gleefully. "Do you know, Miss Allison, that I have been doing something very naughty—something for which your lady-ship will berate me very soundly? No! Then listen and behold! Do you remember the cashmere robes de chambre we were admiring the other day? I went out that afternoon and selected two—one for my unworthy self, the other for somebody whose worth I know, and you do not!"

While speaking, her rapid fingers were tearing off the papers, and she now called upon me to take my choice of the wrappers. This was no easy matter, when both were so beautiful. I represented, vainly, that I would be delighted with either, and tried to thank her for her elegant gift. She interrupted me with declarations that I should make a selection, or she would force both upon me. We were precisely the same height; our complexions were similar; we had the same breadth of shoulder and length of arm, and these were all the requisites demanded in loose robes. I still hung back, and she suggested that we should try them on, and ascertain their comparative becomingness.

"This redoubles difficulties!" was her decision, as we surveyed ourselves in the mirror; then looked at one another from head to foot, and laughed like two school-girls in a masquerading frolic. "I tell you what we will do! We will besiege the 'den,' drag Charles out, and make him settle the question! The emergency of the case justifies extreme measures. His taste in ladies' attire is infallible—perfectly miraculous!"

She ran off before I could collect thoughts and words to oppose her. I overtook her at the foot of the stairs.

"But, Leah!"

"But, Maria!"

"I am afraid that Mr. Moore may not like our interrupting him."

"Of course, he will be as cross as a bear: and we, being babies, are afraid of bears!" she retorted, ironically, conscious, as I was, that no extent of provocation from a lady could force her gentlemanly husband to an unseemly show of irritation. "One would think, from your rueful visage, that you were going to peep into the cave of Trophonius. I will take the responsibility! Come, I say!"

I could not refuse to go without wounding or offending her; and, after all, Miss Dalrymple might be at that instant buried in one of her favorite French novels in her own chamber—for once, harming nobody but herself. However this might be, I would linger some paces behind Leah, that she might first explore the forbidden region. At the entrance, she stopped and beckoned to me imperatively—her face arch, and glowing with mischief. I never saw her look so again.

"We will enter together—storm the garrison with united forces!" she whispered, seizing my hand.

Throwing the door wide open, she proclaimed, theatrically, "Enter an invading—" The words froze upon her lips.

Mr. Moore sat nearly facing the door upon a lounge, whereon half lay—reclined, she would have said—Miss Janetta. His arm was about her waist; her head was laid upon his shoulder; their hands were clasped, and his cheek rested upon her sunny hair. If the picture, seen but for one second, was burned, as if by lightning, upon my memory, how felt the deceived wife—the lofty-souled, pure-minded woman, who stood like a statue in the doorway, the amazed, outraged spectator of the group!

With a half scream of nervous horror, Janetta sprang to a sitting posture, and gazed, pale with affright, upon the unwelcome intruder. Mr. Moore met Leah's eye, not without a slight change of feature and color, but far more calmly than I had believed it practicable for any man to appear in such circumstances. Either his self-control outmatched his cousin's, or his conviction of guilt was less strong. He arose, with no show of trepidation; but Leah's speech forestalled his.

"My business can wait. I will not interrupt you further!"

"Stay—" he began, eagerly: but the door was already shut, and I was following Leah down stairs.

She paused upon the threshold of her chamber. "You will excuse me if I leave you somewhat abruptly, Maria?"

"Certainly!"

We parted, without so much as a pressure of the hand. She was not yet brought so low in spirit to accept any sympathy—not even mine—upon this subject. Her husband came down a few minutes later, and for an hour and more, I could discern the faint murmur of their conversation. Perhaps it was as well that this denouement had taken place, I reflected. Despite this one great fault of conduct, I liked Charles Moore. I hoped that he had erred more through thoughtlessness, than lack of principle or from waning love for his wife; was certain that he had a very imperfect conception of the pain this, to his apprehension, lawful and innocent intimacy had occasioned her. If he once understood what were her feelings and wishes with regard to it, every sentiment of manliness and affection would prompt him to pursue a different course, and this he must learn during the explanation now in progress. If Leah would only be true to herself, and just to him, he could not fail to derive a severe, but assuredly a useful lesson.

Thus hoping, I fell asleep, and dreamed that Janetta Dalrymple was comfortably supplied with a husband of her own, whose home was in California—an event that threw me into an ecstasy of joy, terminating prematurely the entrancing vision.

CHAPTER IV.

MISS DALRYMPLE came down to breakfast the next morning, sola, notwithstanding my dream—smilingly oblivious, so far as mien and words indicated, of having transgressed the slightest rule of good breeding, to say nothing of decorum or morality. She got a very grave, cool salutation all around the table in exchange for her bland “Good-morning.” Her first observation—a jaunty comment upon the weather—was directed to Leah, whose response was civil and brief; her next, playfully affectionate, was to her cousin. He replied in the dryest imaginable tone, scarcely looking at her as he did so; and, turning away so soon as the sentence was finished, he began a conversation upon commonplace topics with me, occasionally appealing to Leah. Janetta’s demeanor was consummate in its well-acted surprise, deepening into injured feeling, and the naive bewilderment of an innocent grieved child, at undeserved reproach. She could not eat; try though she seemed to do, to swallow her distress and breakfast together, and sat, throughout the remainder of the meal, mutely dejected. The uncomfortable repast to all of us was finally concluded. Mr. Moore arose, walked around to his wife’s seat, and gave her his customary “Good-by” kiss before going to his office; then, merely saying, “Good-morning, ladies!” to his cousin and myself, left the room. Miss Dalrymple followed him into the hall, as she often did, even when he had parted with her in our presence; had bestowed, with his brotherly kiss, a tap upon the cheek, or a caressing stroke of the head, always some merry, affectionate word. When I went up stairs, they had withdrawn to the parlor, from which issued the sound of convulsive sobbing and Mr. Moore’s mournfully resolute tones.

No Janetta appeared at dinner that day. “She was indisposed, and would take nothing to eat,” Catharine reported. The tea-table was likewise denied the light of her countenance, and Mr. Moore looked wretchedly uneasy. His solicitude was so marked as to be distressing, when the morrow failed to bring her down to breakfast. His own appetite had deserted him, and his temper was on the point of following its example, if one might judge from the unwonted asperity of his injunction to his wife.

“I desire, Leah, that you go up and see that poor child some time during the forenoon. She is here under my care, and, whatever may be her faults in your eyes, common humanity demands that she shall not suffer for want of attention while she is sick.”

He had forgotten my presence; but Leah was mindful of it; and while she grew white to her very lips, rejoined, in calm dignity: “Your wishes shall be obeyed. I will see that she wants for nothing which I can procure or do for her.”

The visit of inquiry was duly made; repeated in the afternoon and semi-daily, with conscientious regularity, during the term of the interesting sufferer’s confinement. Those must have been queer interviews, I thought; but Leah brought no report of them below, at least none to me. For five days, the grieving maiden maintained the rôle of invalid, persisting in her refusal to accept medical aid, and subsisting upon alarmingly light rations of tea and toast. I had no fears of her becoming dangerously enfeebled by this penitential regimen. She carried with her, into her retirement, an abundant supply of adipose matter to sustain her during a whole hibernation, and I applauded her discrimination in having selected the means of punishment best adapted to her offence and present position to the really injured party. But Mr. Moore’s moodiness was fast changing into misery. True, he rarely mentioned her name, and his attentions to Leah were assiduous—so studied and punctilious that she shrank from them in absolute pain. Still, his spirits had declined utterly; he ate little; talked fitfully and without animation, and was subject to spells of gloomy musing; in short, acted like a man who had met with a heavy, stunning blow—one which he felt to be irremediable.

Never had I regarded Leah with such love and reverence as during that trying week. There was not a spark of haughty resentment, not the most distant approach to retaliation in her manner to her husband. Another woman was pining for the demonstrations of affection he had pledged himself to withhold, and she could not but read in his altered bearing his settled sadness and prolonged seasons of abstracted pensiveness, the terrible truth that she was no longer adequate to fill his heart, or make his home what he had avowed it to be in the past: yet she strove humbly and prayerfully, if not hopefully, to contribute all that she could to his comfort and happiness, was, to all intents and purposes, his slave. She kept up nobly the forced show of cheerfulness, not to him alone, but with me. Not an allusion to the unhappy estrangement, brought every hour to my notice, escaped her lips in our most confidential moments. Native strength of character and early discipline had taught her how to endure anguish and make no sign.

The overtried nerves and neglected body failed first. Charles Moore was aroused from his dream of selfish woe by her sudden and dangerous illness. For forty-eight hours I question whether he ever remembered Janetta Dalrymple's existence, unless, indeed, the thought were one lash in the whip of scorpions held by Remorse. All through the second night of his wife's sickness, he walked the floor of the room adjoining his wife's chamber, in a state of mind bordering upon distraction. With the dawn came tidings that, at another time, would have awakened a thrill of holy and happy emotion. When the nurse brought his first-born son to him, and would have given him, in proud ceremony, into his father's arms, the glassy eyes surveyed the tiny stranger as if they saw him not. There was no movement of fond welcome; the parched lips articulated but one sentence: "How is she?"

She was very low; not rational, and too weak, if she had been, to see even him.

"It is just!" he gasped, when the physician reluctantly recommended that he should not run the risk of agitating her by a visit. "It is just—only just!"

"I must confess that I was surprised at his ready acquiescence in my judgment," said the doctor to me, in describing the scene. "I was prepared to encounter strenuous opposition. These very devoted husbands are generally unruely under such a sentence."

I did not explain the hidden meaning of the exclamation that sounded to the man of medicine like the utterance of prudent submission to wise counsel; but my heart bled for the misguided being undergoing the agonies of an accusing conscience, that saw, in this exclusion from her presence in this fearful hour, a righteous retribution for his wilful neglect of her in the seasons of loneliness and debility, of trial and depression, that had contributed to bring about this critical condition of reason and health.

Janetta Dalrymple, now that her illness no longer produced a sensation, and brought discomfort to herself only, had found it convenient to declare it at an end, and made sundry shy overtures of consolation and sympathy to her kinsman, all of which he swept aside as if he saw them not. The deeper fountains of his being were stirred, and in these she had no share. Slowly the beloved one struggled back to sanity and strength. She gazed, at first vacantly, then with loving anxiety, into the pale, sorrow-stricken face that now hardly left her bedside, day and night, more haggard by reason of the effort he made to smile, as he saw that he was recognized. Once more her tongue pronounced his name in fond, natural accents; her cheek was pillowed upon his breast, while great, scalding tears, he could not keep back, bedewed her hair. It was not a sight for other eyes, and I stole away to weep for very gladness.

I was still in my chamber, and hardly calm again, when a knock was heard at the door and Miss Janetta answered my bidding to enter.

"I looked in, upon my way to bed, to inquire how Leah—how Mrs. Moore is now."

"Better," I replied. "Much better, we think, and, at last, quite sensible."

"You are then more hopeful as to her recovery?"

"We are—decidedly!"

She had declined my proffer of a seat, and now stood before the grate twisting her bracelet—her cousin's gift—until the soft flesh grew red beneath the friction and pressure.

"It is your design to leave us in a few days, is it not, Miss Allison? I believe I heard you say something of such an intention, this morning, to my cousin Charles."

"Yes. I must go very soon. I have lingered already longer than I expected to do when I came, on account of Leah's illness."

"You are an orphan like myself, unless I am mistaken?"

"I am."

She turned slowly towards me and fixed her keen eye upon mine.

"And this was, in your estimation, a sufficient reason for the hatred you conceived against me before you had known me a day, which has manifested itself in innumerable persecutions ever since?"

I answered, in astonishment, that I had never persecuted or interfered with her in the slightest degree.

She interrupted me. "You have not scrupled to play the spy upon my actions, and to put the worst possible construction upon the most innocent of these; to slander me to Mrs. Moore, and arouse against me her enmity also; to sow the seeds of strife between husband and wife, and all that you might render this my only home, in the absence of my natural protector, as intolerable as it was once happy! Oh, you have done a good work in these six weeks—one that you have cause to be proud of! But I am not here to criminate, or to quarrel with you. I merely wished, as was but natural, to notify you of my purpose to thwart your righteous designs. So soon as Mrs. Moore is sufficiently strong to bear the excitement of the disclosure, I shall, in the presence of her husband, unravel the whole mystery of your iniquity; right myself in her eyes or leave the house. Not even your machinations have shaken his faith in me. You had best make your foundations sure before you leave your dupe. I give you leave and notice to do this. I never fight in the dark—never stab in the back. God defend the right!"

"Amen!" I returned, fervently. "You ought to know, if you do not, Miss Dalrymple, that there is not one syllable of truth in all you have said. I have never acted the spy or informer with respect to yourself or any one else. If I have seen much in your conduct that appeared reprehensible, according to my ideas of right and honor, Mrs. Moore is none the wiser for these impressions and opinions. If she has witnessed yet more to grieve and displease her, she has been equally discreet towards me. I do not expect you to credit this!"

She interrupted me again with her mocking, sneering smile—cool and deadly—the look poor Leah dreaded and disliked beyond expression.

"You are correct in the supposition. I see no necessity for a further interchange of compliments. We understand one another. I have the pleasure of bidding you good-night."

Did I understand her? Had I then, or could I have any just conception of the motives, base and pitiful, that urged her to renewed efforts for the destruction of her unoffending victim's peace? And were this accomplished, finally and irretrievably, what possible benefit could accrue to herself from the consummate villainy, beyond the gratification of a senseless vanity and petty revenge? If she indeed loved Charles Moore in an unlawful degree, if he were separated, divorced from his wife and free to seek his would-be charmer's hand, public scorn and reprobation would be their portion; respectful compassion surround Leah like a shield and halo. Was the girl mad, or dreaming? Silly or impetuous I knew she was not. She was safe in gratifying her spleen by the delivery of her denunciations against me to my face. I comprehended this, as she intended I should; knew that she appreciated my impotency as thoroughly as I did myself. Not to rescue my good name from universal ignominy would I have risked Leah's returning life and senses by ominous sign or speech. I must go and leave her in happy ignorance of the prepared mine; could only commit her to the Helper of the innocent, the Trust of the upright.

The evening before my departure I went to her room, at nightfall, to sit with her until tea-time. I had heard Mr. Moore leave her and run down stairs, then out of the house, but a moment before, and surmised correctly that he had gone to procure some newly-thought-of dainty, wherewith to tempt her slender and varying appetite. He was continually recollecting "just the thing" to please her palate and "bring up her strength," and the result was a supply of delicacies, rare, rich, and delightful, that would have surfeited a well person. I moved quietly, not to disturb her, should she feel disposed to sleep, and when her weak, sweet voice broke the silence of the dim chamber, I supposed, for a minute, that she was speaking to me. The latter part of the sentence undeceived me. She was fondling the babe who lay upon her arm.

"We have had a dear, blessed visit from him this evening, haven't we, baby dear? Mamma thought once—yes, many times—that she would never be so full of peace and happiness again as she is now. We have won him back, my own heaven-sent blessing!"

By this time I had slipped out as noiselessly as I had entered.

I see that picture yet in my dreams, at times: the shaded bed, the faint, but expressive outline of the young mother's face bending lovingly down towards the infant; I hear the gentle tones, tremulous with joy as weakness, but I say no more to her hopeful assertion—"God grant it!" for mother and child seem always to be lying upon the crumbling verge of a precipice.

CHAPTER V.

ONE sultry August evening, seven months after my visit to the Moores, as my brother and myself were seated at our quiet tea-table, a servant brought the message that a lady wished to see me in the parlor.

"She came in a carriage, ma'am, and has brought a trunk," added the girl, following me into the hall. "And she seems very tired; had I better get her room ready?"

"By all means!" And anticipating a meeting with some cousin or aunt from a distance, I unclosed the parlor door.

A woman had sunk down into a large arm-chair, near the middle of the apartment, and upon her knees lay a child, apparently asleep. I had only time to make out this much in the dusk, when the drooping-head of the weary-looking figure was lifted, and a voice, familiar in spite of its strained cadences, said, with an outburst of hysterical laughter: "I have presented myself at your doors uninvited, you see!"

"Leah, my dear child! can this be you?" cried I, hurrying forward.

She laughed again. "I believe it is! I am not sure! He is asleep!" as I took the child from her lap. "I came off in such haste that I could not supply the place of his nurse, who is sick. Then, too, I wanted him all to myself for a little while, you know. I suppose they could take him from me as it is, couldn't they?"

"What an idea!" said I, cheerily, but with secret and growing uneasiness at her strange behavior. "Why, who would want him?"

"That is what I try to remember! Nobody would care to be troubled with the care of him, except the mother that bore him. And it does seem to me that mine is the best right. She never cared for children, and I hope he will let me keep my boy!"

"He is a noble fellow!" I responded, soothingly, while my heart throbbed so violently it seemed that it must awaken the little sleeper in my arms. "We will take him up to bed, and mamma must have a cup of tea immediately."

Chattering on about the heat of the day, the dust, my delight at seeing her—about everything that came into my head except the heavy, nameless fear that oppressed my spirit, I led the way to her chamber. There was a light there, and when I had deposited my burden upon the bed I went up to Leah, who stood by a window, and offered to remove her hat and mantle. Turning her wild eyes upon me, she whispered, motioning towards the servant who was unstrapping the trunk, "Send her out!" As the door shut behind the girl, Leah threw herself upon my neck—"Oh, Maria, will you let me stay here a little while, until I die?"

An alarming fit of hysterics succeeded. It was two hours later when, lying pale and exhausted upon her pillow, her hand clasped in mine, she told me the story of her sufferings since we parted.

Janetta had not carried out her threat of complaint against and exposure of my "machinations," in the hearing of both husband and wife. She had never attempted to traduce me to Leah, nor was her conduct, throughout the convalescence of the latter, in the slightest degree offensive. She was gentle, respectful, almost affectionate to the woman she had tried so hard to injure; accepted gracefully her secondary place in the household. Her attentions transferred, for the most part, from the husband to the wife, were well-timed and skilful; her demeanor to Mr. Moore frank and free, kind and cousinly, yet evincing no desire for a prominent place in his regard, much less a monopoly of his affections. In the generosity of her lately-regained happiness, Leah was ready to consider much, if not all the misery of the past winter as the morbid dream of her imagination. Her husband had declared, in the most solemn terms, that she had misinterpreted many of his actions, and been misled by a diseased fancy in viewing others, and offered to renounce not only all intimacy but all intercourse beyond that of the coldest civility, with his cousin. To this Leah could not consent. It had never been her desire to interfere between him and his relatives. She felt real pity for the friendless girl, committed for a time to his guardianship, and expressed the wish that the mistakes and misunderstandings of the past should be forgotten, and the three form in future one united family. Nay, she went so far as to urge the propriety and kindness of this course upon Charles, when he hesitated to make the experiment, and doubted whether separation would not be best for all parties.

By imperceptible degrees affairs slid back into their old train. Janetta's manner lost its deference; covert taunts and open sneers, when Mr. Moore was not by, taking the place of the loving appeal and soft answer. Charles—never harsh or impatient in speech or look; generous to supply every expressed wish of his wife; watchful of her health and bodily comfort—nevertheless yielded, as formerly, to the exigent affection or vanity of his so-called sisterly kinswoman, and was, ere long, as thoroughly her slave as in the dark old days to which Leah had looked back with trembling; whose shadow, she began to feel, was stealing fast after the doubtful brightness of the present. It was harder to endure in silence, now, than it had been then. Her illness had unhinged and enfeebled her nervous system. She was often irritable and peevish with her husband—conduct invariably regretted and apologized for by herself, and attributed by him to her health, when a more searching inquiry would have revealed to him a deeper cause in a tortured mind. Too proud to speak; ashamed to complain of the work whose beginning was apparently in her own imprudent confidence; aware, moreover, that such remonstrance would be met by the recapitulation of the license she had given, she resolved to bear on dumbly until the time for Mr. Dalrymple's return from abroad.

As if no drop were to be wanting in her cup of trial, there arrived by the steamer in which they had expected him to take passage a letter, announcing his intention of prolonging his stay until the autumn. His sister could either remain where she was, he wrote, or take up her abode for the summer in the family of another cousin, who resided in the western part of the State. It was like Janetta Dalrymple to put the letter and the question to be decided in Mr. Moore's hands, instead of settling the matter promptly for herself. She had less genuine self-respect than any other woman I ever knew. Of course Charles' inclination coincided with gallantry and hospitality in recommending her further sojourn under his roof. He was so incautious as to say as much to her before consulting Leah upon the subject, and was reminded sadly by his cousin that there might be an essential difference of opinion upon this point between the heads of the household. Thus artfully prepared to expect and resist an unreasonable show of opposition to his scheme, he sought his wife, and opened up the question in a tone that showed a foregone conclusion so arbitrary as to render the form of consultation a mockery. Her timid attempt at expostulation was met sternly, and her long and carefully repressed spirit arose in arms. She painted, with the burning emphasis of truth and feeling, the neglect and insult which had been, and were daily her portion, meted out by the hands of husband and guest; sketched the probable end of the entanglement that was constantly binding him more tightly, and was already the theme of slanderers' tongues, and closed by declaring that, if he chose to retain Miss Dalrymple as a member of his family, she would herself seek some other abode.

"The time has come when you must choose between us!" were the words with which she quitted him.

How he broke the decision to Janetta she never inquired; but he informed her coldly the next day that she had written to engage board during the summer months with her distant cousin. The letter and its discussion were not named between Janetta and herself. In the process of time, the serpent in the house took her departure; and, in spite of her husband's lowering brow and marked depression of spirits, Leah breathed more freely. Strong in the night of her love, she believed that she could yet win him back; that, if the freshness and fervor of that early devotion, which is made up of faith and hope, were gone, there might still be in store for them a tranquil enjoyment of life, and the society of one another and their boy, that might take from memory its sting. After a time, the salutary effects of her endeavors after his comfort and pleasure began to be apparent. He recovered his cheerfulness; seemed satisfied and happy in her company, and there was, in the attentions he was never backward in rendering, an alacrity and soul whose lack she had felt most painfully while seeing them continually exhibited in his demeanor to another. If she suspected that he wrote regularly to his cousin, and received letters in return, she put the idea out of her mind as soon as possible, and concealed the hurt his silence upon this head caused her.

Four days ago, she went on to say, he had told her of important business which would call him away the middle of the month, and might detain him from home for a fortnight or more. He proposed, thoughtfully and kindly as it seemed to her, that she should spend the time of his absence with me. Thanking him for this considerate attention to her wishes, she promised to think over the matter, and they separated for the day. Court was in session, and he had to hurry off to be at his post in season. As she was passing through the upper hall in the course of the forenoon, she chanced to espy a waste-paper basket, which the housemaid had brought down from her master's study and left unemptied until her work in the chambers should be done. Upon the top of the disorderly pile of torn manuscripts, old newspapers, etc., lay an unfolded sheet of letter-paper, white and smooth, and evidently recently written upon. By a mechanical impulse of carefulness, prompting her to see whether this might not have been added to the refuse by the servant's blunder, Leah picked it up and glanced over it.

Voice and strength failed her. She drew a crumpled paper from her travelling satchel—crumpled and worn as by numberless readings—and passed it to me; then turned her face to the wall. It was an unfinished letter from Charles Moore to Janetta Dalrymple. "My own darling—my sweet Nettie," was the beginning. The purport of the communication was that he had made his arrangements to join the travelling party which was to set out the next week for a fortnight's tour, and accepted, with eager pleasure, her invitation to become her especial escort.

"And I warn you, my pet, that I will brook no interference from the 'handsome young collegian' of whom you try to make me jealous—you witch! The thought of having you all to myself for two whole weeks has almost set me crazy with joy. L. will probably pay Miss Allison a visit while we are gone. "I say 'we' to you, not her. You and I, my poor darling, have suffered too intensely from her absurd jealousy and prejudices in times past for me to run the risk of provoking the sleeping demon by revealing the direction of my journey, or in what company it will be made. I have sacrificed my inclinations and happiness to her so often during the last year, that I am surely justifiable in seeking something like heart-pleasure now. I shall count the moments until we meet—"

Here the delectable effusion had stopped. The date was the very morning upon which Leah discovered the waif. He had undoubtedly forgotten it in his haste when he found that he was behind time. She told me briefly by and by how she had heard him that evening inquiring of the servant whether she had taken a letter from his table, and biaming her, with unwonted harshness, for having, as she confessed, picked up one from the floor and put it among the waste matter, adding that it was well she had burned everything she had taken down, since there were papers in the basket he would not have meet other eyes for a thousand dollars. For two days she had to keep this terrible secret locked up in heart and brain; to act and speak as usual; to forego mourning over the love and hopes now indeed lost—buried forever; then she calmly kissed him "Farewell!" held up this boy for a parting caress, and, with tearless eyes, beheld him depart to happiness and her successful rival. Her own trunk was already packed, and she took the next train for the town in which was my home.

She poured out the story with a rapid incoherence that would have made me question the verity of certain portions, but for the unmistakable evidence of the letter. Smothering my indignation, I tried to persuade her to sleep, for her child's sake, if not her own.

"My boy! yes—I know! Put his cradle just here, where I can lay my hand upon it, and be sure the door is locked, please! They may try to rob me of him! He is all they have left me—everything!"

The fearful misgiving awakened in my mind by her first burst of emotion was too true! Her sorrow and its unnatural suppression had affected her mind. In this persuasion, I made an excuse of her apprehensions on her babe's account to insist upon remaining with her all night. She accepted the offer thankfully, and with an effort at self-command, that reminded me of the Leah of other times—when I had darkened the room and lain down upon a lounge, as if for repose—she closed her eyes and tried to compose herself to slumber. She had rested thus but a few minutes, when a low laugh, so hollow and desolate in its meaning that it chilled my blood, came to my ears.

"Maria, they named me rightly, did they not? We could hardly have blamed Jacob, had he deserted Leah entirely for the better-beloved Rachel!"

I would that I could obliterate from my mind as I can keep from my readers' eyes the scenes of the week that followed. After that fearful laugh and the accompanying words, there gleamed not one ray of reason upon her fevered brain for seven weary days and nights. She did not recognize her idolized boy, and talked to me as to a stranger. Oh! the matchless tenderness—the depth of woe revealed by the ravings of those dreadful hours! Wronged! deceived! deserted! thus arose the climax of woes upon which she had pondered until she had gone mad—and what wonder?

My brother wrote and telegraphed in various directions for Mr. Moore. His partner in business had been furnished, as had Leah, also, before Charles left home, with the names of two or three places where communications would be likely to intercept him, and there had arrived two letters for Mrs. Moore forwarded by the above-named gentleman to our address, but the postmarks upon these gave no additional clue to the wanderer's whereabouts, and, as we learned subsequently, none of our messages or notes reached him on the route.

Upon the eighth day, the sick woman awoke from sleep, sensible, calm—dying!

"I have dreamed of my mother, Maria!"

she whispered, a smile of holy peace illuminating her wan features. "Do you remember those words: 'As one whom his mother comforteth?' I do not die alone while you and she are here—and there is one nearer and dearer yet!"

The eyes, large and lustrous, looked steadfastly upwards; the lips moved without sound. There was no need of audible language in that communion! Then she asked for her babe, and, while he laughed in her face and cooed his gladness at seeing her again, she laid her hand upon his head and breathed a blessing.

"But for him, death would be all sweetness. As it is, I find it very easy!"

Even in that awful hour, my thoughts ran swiftly back to another night—three short years' before—when her full, happy tones had sunk with the weight of what I now read as fulfilled prophecy.

"God knows how constant and earnest is my prayer that I may make him as happy as he deserves to be! If the power is denied me, I shall find death very sweet!"

Oh, my poor, poor friend! She had not to wait long for the welcome guest, and his coming was painless as peaceful. Her last words were, "Give my love to Charles!" Of his infidelity and Janetta's vile treachery, she did not once speak. Already, before the weary sank to rest, the wicked had ceased to trouble her. At that very time, according to the testimony of a member of the travelling party, Charles Moore was waltzing with Janetta Dalrymple in the ballroom of a fashionable watering-place.

When he came to us, frenzied by the tidings that had met him upon his return to his home, his wife had slept in the grave for three days. I concealed nothing from him. I could not feel that he deserved mercy at my hands, although it was plain that his heart's blood welled at every stab. It was impossible for him to suffer as he had made her do, I reasoned savagely, yet half terrified at the sight of his horror of remorse.

"For pity's sake, no more!" he groaned, at last. "You will kill me! My poor girl! Heaven is my witness that I did love her to the end! I never dreamed of wronging her! If she had lived I could have explained everything!"

How, he did not say, nor did I care to inquire; but I imagine that he would have attempted a repetition of the arguments and assertions that had brought balm to her wounded spirit upon a former occasion. I suppose he assuaged his torn conscience with these; purchased from it rest and forgiveness, as he would have hoped to buy hers, had she survived the blow he had dealt her, for he wedded Janetta Dalrymple in less than eighteen months afterwards.

I am thankful that, before this event took place, the sinless babe was gathered to his mother's arms, perhaps in answer to that mother's prayers. I am glad in the thought that in that high home of perfect peace, no knowledge or memory is permitted to enter that could mar the serenity of the tried and faithful, of whom the world was not worthy.

They say that Mr. Moore lives happily with his new wife, and it may be so. Justice and judgment are not of this life. I knew that when Leah died!

"IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN."

BY ELIZA FRANCES MORIARTY.

WHEN the pearly gates of morning
Ope and flood the earth with light,
I arise, all foud and hopeful,
From blest visions of the night,
When I walked entranced beside her,
And her hand was clasped in mine,
And her voice of angel music
Softly answered, "I am thine."
But my bliss was bright and fleeting,
As that dream of joy serene—
While the dawning brightens upward
Lone I weep, "It might have been."

Day by day I bow in worship,
As she moves in beauty by,
Grace enchanting in her motion,
Love's warm splendors in her eye—
'Neath her feet my heart is lying
In its wild idolatry;
But she turns from me unconscious
Of my great love's misery;
Every pulse that thrills my being Throbs for her my idol queen—
But my youth is lost in sighing,
Vainly now, "It might have been."

Once, with love's mysterious power,
I allured her eyes to me,
Quick they drooped with modest sweetness,
My adoring look to see;
Oh, I seemed at heaven's gate standing,
When her tender, gracious smile
Flashed a ray of glory o'er me,
Kindling all my life the while;
But a shadow darkened o'er me,
Fate uprose our souls between,
And I pierce the night with crying—
"God of love, it might have been!"

THANKSGIVING.

BY S. G. E.

MR. VAN LENNOR tells us that in the East they have no surnames. A worthy, turbaned old gentleman is content to be known as "Abdallah, the father of Hakim," and is so distinguished from the other Abdallahs of the neighborhood. Bachelors must be nobody under such a regime! What, too, becomes of family pride, driven from its stronghold in surnames? No doubt it has other fastnesses, where it will fight to the death for its existence. How well it would suit Young America to disown all connection with old-fogyish progenitors, and have the very "governors" reduced to being individualized only as the fathers of hopeful Bob, or Jim, or Orlando!

Mrs. Murray would have gone to the stake sooner than submit to such a subversion of the natural order of things. It is doubtful whether she would have been willing to go down to posterity as the mother of Washington himself. Not that Mrs. Murray was wanting in that affection which dignifies even the she-bear, and is the crowning beauty of the loveliest feminine character. Its true, deep current partook of the strength of her strong nature; but its flow was secret and silent as that of the ice-bound river. She kept her children in due or undue subjection. She had no idea of having her family tree turned upside down, so that the roots might develop into branches, and the branches take the place of the parent roots. No! no! Scotch on one side, and Puritan on the other, these were not the traditions in which she had been bred. She was the head of her own household now, no matter what may have been the case in good Mr. Murray's time, a period lost in the mystical past, and never referred to by the present self-sustained mistress of Oak Cottage.

Tall, stiffly-straight, pale, clear-eyed, well-featured, well-dressed, and "well to do in the world," Mrs. Murray was an admirable picture of a certain type of New England women. She affected no airs of youth. Her white lace handkerchief was folded over her bosom, and her muslin cap was free from taint of bow or furberlow. She wore human hair, smoothly brushed over her forehead, and no attempt was made to disguise or root out the silver lines which striped her bands of brown.

Just now Mrs. Murray was in mourning. The village dressmaker had passed more than a week at Oak Cottage, and, on her departure, three new bombazines, three alpacas, and three black calicoes were left behind her as trophies of her skill. Not that Mrs. Murray had so profusely stored her own wardrobe. She had bought and had made suitable dresses for "the girls," Miss Minty and Miss Molly, the daughters of her house.

Tall, thin Miss Minty, and short, fat Miss Molly would never see their thirtieth birthday again; but their mother labored under a continual sense of their youth and inexperience, and cared as truly now for their wardrobe as when they had been "wee toddling things."

It was well that "the girls" had no share in choosing their mourning. Their eyes were so swollen with weeping that, give the scientific test-rub to the material as they might, they could not have properly scrutinized its fibre, and might have been alarmingly taken in.

The young brother, who had been their joy, had fallen on a distant battle-field, and found a lonely grave far from the home of his childhood. Mrs. Murray had shed no tears. She had rejoiced to see her favorite child offering himself for the service of his country, and when she received tidings of his death, she but grew more pale and rigid, and uttered not a murmur.

A few weeks after this bereavement, Miss Minty ventured to say: "I suppose we won't have any Thanksgiving this year, mother?"

"No Thanksgiving, child! Have we not enough to be thankful for? What do you mean?" was the astonished reply.

"No pies, I mean—no Thanksgiving dinner. I thought perhaps we would not keep the day just as usual this year," said Miss Minty.

"Pumpkin, cranberry tarts, apple, grape, mince, lemon, custard, and chicken pie, I ordered Melitable to get ready for, and we will go into the kitchen and make them to-morrow, girls. Is it any reason why we should cease to be thankful because the hand of the Lord has been laid upon us?" Thankfulness and pies seemed indissolubly connected in Mrs. Murray's mind.

Miss Minty gave a little sob, and Miss Molly disappeared through an open door. Neither of the girls was looking at Mrs. Murray; so no one saw the quivering of her thin lips, and the moisture in her clear blue eyes.

Mrs. Murray stood with a pie well balanced on her left hand, while, with her right, she dexterously trimmed off the edges. Did her thoughts wander to the merry boy, whose delight it had once been to witness this part of the Thanksgiving preparations? Mehitable's apple-parings, skilfully left in one unbroken coil, did they remind the mother of the strong young arm, which had so often thrown over the shoulder these mystical auguries of marriage? To Miss Minty and Miss Molly, at least, such remembrances were ever present, and Mehitable was a perfect magazine of sighs, which were let off in volleys, more striking than sentimental.

A trio of fat chickens found a common grave in a well-covered chicken-pie, and Mrs. Murray put on that epitaph in sundry hieroglyphics of twisted slips of paste. Mince-meat was chopped, and seasoned, and tasted, and chopped, and seasoned, and tasted, till all the various blissful flavors were merged in the one, perfect, resultant, crowning flavor which pronounced the work complete. No little hard bits of apple, cold and crisp, no sudden surprises in the way of morsels undoubtedly from the animal kingdom, but a perfect chaos, without organization and subject to no laws of classification. What are mince-pies made for? What enemy of mankind first prompted their composition? What inventor of patent dyspepsia medicine brought into use these promoters of the disease he would pretend to cure? Mrs. Murray gave herself no trouble on this score. She held to mince-pies, as to baked beans on Saturday, as a fixed institution, not to be subverted by Carlyle, or Emerson, or any other destroyers of the old landmarks.

Of the pumpkin pies, we hardly dare to trust ourselves to speak, yet on them the good housewife expended her special care. They had been the favorites of her boy, and she seemed to have a kind of savage joy in making them the very quintessence of melting deliciousness, while she would not allow a single tear to tremble on her lashes at the thought of his pleasant "Another piece, mother; nobody can make pumpkin pies like you."

Poor dwellers in cities, who know only of ranges and stove-ovens, can never be properly thankful, according to Mrs. Murray's notions. Their eyes have never been gladdened with the sight of one of those antiquated, artificial caverns, as full of wonders to the eyes of childhood as the Mammoth Cave, with all its array of stalactites and stalognites. We could never remember which of these white fingers of the past pointed up, and which down; but we well know that all the pies in Mrs. Murray's oven reverently looked towards the arching roof, the tarts with their wide open eyes, and the other gentry peering through the ocular slits, made in their covers for purposes known to Mrs. Murray.

The energetic mother always made a point of having Miss Minty and Miss Molly with her on these days of preparation, ostensibly to help her; but in reality they were as useless retainers as were Saladin's Arabs with their headless lances. Mehitable, one of those doubtful treasures, an old family servant, preferred to pare and chop, stone and grate, herself; and Mehitable generally carried out her own views, even in the face of Mrs. Murray. There was a legend of some former battle between these great powers, from which each retired with a respect for the other's prowess, and a determination to keep to the terms of the perpetual peace thereafter concluded.

No wonder Miss Minty and Miss Molly had never had a chance to be "grown up," with two such overwhelmingly depressing influences acting continually upon them. No voice, no will, no opinion, no mission, no sphere had yet been thought necessary for "the girls." They were unrebelling subjects under the most despot yet kindly will. Nature has her obstinate laws of growth, and shut out from her legitimate development, she will yet have free course in some direction. The fallen tree that dams the stream, but turns the swollen current to right or left, or makes a waterfall of the quiet brook. Wedge round the turnip seed with stones, and the poor struggling thing will make its way through the cracks, and its misshapen form will be as teeming with vegetable life as if it had had fair play.

Cut off from many an avenue of joy and usefulness, Miss Minty and Miss Molly had one path left them—a sweet, sunny path, which leads more surely to the Kingdom of Heaven than the beaten highway, where the self-satisfied roll in their gilded coaches.

Miss Minty and Miss Molly, unlike as they were in external appearance, had yet found a common outlet for their throbbing life. Their woman's heart poured itself forth in tender love to all the dead ones of the blood of the Murrays, and especially to the young brother, whose loss had plunged them in grief. How they inwardly shrank from this making of pies, this "going on as usual," when the morning star had sunk in gloom!

Mrs. Murray was sitting "bolt upright" in her lawful end of the pew, listening to a Thanksgiving sermon. Think you the minister touched the tender chords of the human heart, and made them vibrate to a song of praise? Think you he cast an eye backward along life's journey, dwelling on the sunshine and the flowers, the little children and the singing birds, the loving companionships and the household joys, the blessings and the consolations, which every candid man must own have lightened his lot and cheered his pathway? Ah, no! A fierce, bold promulgation of his individual views of our country's "sea of troubles" was the sum and substance of the pastor's Thanksgiving sermon. Where he found his text we cannot say; doubtless he forced some bit of Scripture to preface a speech, which was anything but a Gospel message to sinful man.

There was nothing touching, truly, in this discourse, yet Miss Minty and Miss Molly had their handkerchiefs at their eyes more than once during its delivery. Not to the orator's eloquence were their tears a tribute. Unseen to others, to them, a dear worshipper seemed present beside them. The athletic form, the sunny eye, the soft brown locks, the manly air, every line of the loved brother's face, every movement of his figure, every tone of his voice was present to them with a vividness like reality. But one short year had passed since he stood with his hand on that pew-door, while the other held the very hymn-book on which Miss Minty's tears were now drooping.

Yet in the midst of their sorrow, the mourning sisters did not forget their cause for true thanksgiving. Their precious brother had early set his foot upon the narrow way. To them his young lips had talked of the glories of the Kingdom of Heaven. No word had come to tell how he met the King of Terrors, yet were they sure that through the "grave and gate of death" he had passed to a good resurrection.

Mehitable had not been at church—not she! She had been thankful in the midst of the blending odors of turkey boiled and roasted, crisping pig (of the Elia pattern), and chickens broiling of a tender brown—an atmosphere more suited to her taste than "sitting for two mortal hours, penned up in a meeting-house." We use her own words.

It was not strange, since so powerful a magician had been at work, that Miss Minty and Miss Molly had barely time to substitute the alpaca for the bombazine (the latter being sacredly allied to the crape veil, and devoted to outdoor use) when dinner was announced.

Mrs. Murray's two married sons had been invited, as usual, to dine with their mother, and, as usual, their wives were understood to be included in the invitation.

There was stout Tom Murray, with his pretty silly little wife. There was grave Robert Murray, with his merry, talkative partner. All were subdued to uncommon taciturnity by this sad family meeting. These same people were by no means always gloomy at home and around their own table, in spite of that affliction; but being together, a stiff sort of solemnity was pitched upon by common consent, as the proper demeanor for the occasion.

Mrs. Murray took her place at the head of the table; Robert, the oldest son, assumed the foot, while the two wives were ranged opposite their sisters-in-law. Vis-à-vis to Thomas Murray was a vacant chair, placed there by Mehitable's orders, perhaps to make all balance, or, possibly, as a silent remembrance of him who had once been the life of these family gatherings.

Mrs. Murray folded her hands to ask the blessing. She had borne up valiantly thus far. She had been true to her theories. She had crucified her own feelings. She had checked all outward expression. She had made pies and been thankful, in spite of a sore and wounded heart. Now her lips quivered, and her voice trembled. She could trust not herself in the long grace generally deemed fit for such festal days. She could only substitute, "God help us, and make us thankful!"

Were those her own hands covering her two eyes? No! Those hands were withdrawn, and two strong arms were round her neck, and a brown cheek was pressed close to hers.

"Mother! dear mother! Did you really believe I was dead? And you tried to bear up bravely; but I heard your voice tremble! I did not know you loved me so!"

"Love you! I love you like my own soul! God be praised! You are safe!" exclaimed the mother.

The barriers were broken down; the flood-gates were opened. The mother had thrown off the mask. The true woman would speak now and evermore.

Ah, that was a Thanksgiving Day indeed! In that merry party none were more merry than the youthful soldier. As for Minty and Molly, they were almost wild with joy. They left all other feasting to feast their eyes on that recovered treasure, and took more friendly liberties with their mother, and were more at ease than ever before in their mortal lives. Nobody blamed the papers for reporting one soldier as dead, who had only been taken prisoner. The happy seldom find fault. It is the sour and discontented who always have a "bone to pick with somebody," and, dog-like, growl over it.

Mehitable, long after this Thanksgiving Day, was wont to say: "Miss Murray was right. We ought to be thankful, and have our pies when the day comes round, no matter what happens. Suppose the Lieutenant should have come home and found no right sort of a dinner ready for him! That would have been a pretty 'How d'ye do!'"

THE ORPHAN.

THERE is much to call forth our most tender pity in this word! A weary life must hers be. We, who know, and daily experience, the blessed comfort of a kind father and mother, cannot enter into her feelings; what a pang of desolation must shoot through her heart when she thinks she is bereft of a mother's anxious care, and a father's tender watchfulness: no bosom upon whom she can rest, no kind parent to whom she can confide her daily troubles; perhaps no sister into whose affectionate ear she can pour forth her thoughts. Providence has bereft her of all these earthly props; and sad it is, but alas! too true, that there are many who are thus let adrift on the ocean of life with not even one friend to whom they can flee in an hour of need; and not even a fire-side they can call their own. Alone, the orphan has to fight her way through this weary world, doubly wearisome to her: her path is oftentimes a very thorny one. She meets with no friend, no kindness, no sympathy! The remembrance of the past only increases her grief; and her eyes fill with tears when she thinks of her dear parents' admonition, and that the voice which spoke so many gentle, warning words to her is now hushed forever in the silence of the grave.

But, though the orphan is bereft of all her earthly friends, she has a never-failing Friend above, who has promised to be a Father to the fatherless, and that those who seek Him earnestly shall most certainly find Him. Many, perhaps, in the bitterness of their grief, are apt to think God has forgotten them; but however inexplicable His dealings may appear, we should remember He chastens us for our profit, that we may be partakers of holiness; and in the midst of our sorest afflictions, remember that it is an all-wise Father who is laying His rod upon us; but let us, who are blessed with kind parents, be doubly thankful to Him who has spared them to us, and endeavor to do all in our power to mitigate and soothe the griefs of our fellow-creatures; but, whether our path here below be smooth or rugged, let us recollect that if we serve Him faithfully in this world we shall at the last day receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away; and "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glories which shall be revealed to us."

PURPOSE IN LIFE.

In order to the accomplishment of any noble purpose, it is necessary to have a carefully-laid plan; for a rambling and desultory application, even with a virtuous intent will prove altogether inadequate.

It is a poetical assertion that "life without a plan serves merely as a soil for discontent to thrive in," and of the justness of this assertion the proofs abound. But if we would shrink from the idea of abandoning what was intended for a garden of fruitfulness and beauty, to the growth of rank and ungrateful weeds, we must lose no time, but begin at once to occupy the ground and lay down our plans.

Some point in view, some fixed object of pursuit, is a spur to the energies, and where that point in view is something really great and good, the influence it exerts is sufficient to inspire courage, and sustain the concentration of the powers requisite for its attainment. And, more than this, the influence of that great and good object upon which the mental eye is fixed, imparts to life a zest and earnestness which those who pass an aimless existence can neither understand nor appreciate. Yet this is no forced or fancied representation, but a plain statement of the contrasts of character arising from the presence or absence of an object, a plan, a noble motive, and a high resolve. May we never want these, and then we may give melancholy complainings to the winds, for we shall find that life is too short and too precious to spare any part of it for anything but its important work.

THE STORY OF "FAIR MABEL."

BY BEATA.

Come hither, little daughter mine, and near me take thy seat,
 And knit upon thy father's hose while I my tale repeat;
 Of Mabel fair thou oft hast heard, and marvelled in thy heart
 Why mystery and dark dismay made of her fate a part.
 Now I will tell thee her short life, for thou art heedless too,
 And ever prone to wander forth in search for something new—
 'Twas thus thy cousin loved to roam, and household duties scorned,
 But girls had better stay at home, by wiser counsel warned.

Now pretty near to Mabel's house uprose a castle grand,
 The like was nowhere to be seen in all this prosperous land;
 The mistress of this mansion fine had foreign countries seen,
 And gathered in its spacious halls were wondrous things I ween;
 The tales of all these wondrous sights had reached the maiden's ear,
 And that she might admittance gain she sought both far and near.

It chanced one day—an audience day!—the gate she open found,
 And, pleased her wishes to obtain, she entered to look round;
 But scarce the portal had she cleared, when to her startled mind
 A legend came she oft had heard—the park was so designed
 That only whom the owner chose could tread the hidden way,
 All others might for weeks or years disconsolately stray.
 But daunted not, the maiden bold remembered one she knew,
 Who for admittance to the house possessed the wished-for clue.

Fortune does often help the brave; she scarce ten steps had turned,
 When Mabel saw the very friend for whom her bosom yearned.
 Courageously she told her need, and threaded the vast maze,
 Delighted with the objects new that met her earnest gaze.

At length they gained the stately hall: what wonders all around!
 Flowers from distant climes were here, fountains with tinkling sound;
 Statues and vases, works of art, are clustered without end,
 And Mabel thanked over again her kind, obliging friend.
 They reached at length the audience room, and what looked grand before, Seemed but a dim reflected light from what the maiden saw.

Hangings and mirrors blazed with gold, and scarce she dared to move,
 Lest all should vanish from her sight, some vast delusion prove;

Ladies were there in rich attire, whose beauty matched their dress,
 And men of rank and high renown within the circle press.

But in one corner, quite alone, she saw what seemed a man,
 And near, and nearer bent her steps, the strange, great thing to scan
 An Ogre, 'twas ugly and grim—the sight near made her scream,
 Though all did say the grand ladye held him in great esteem.
 The guests she loved to entertain he never harmed at all!
 On those who entered without leave with tooth and nail he'd fall!
 When Mabel came beneath his eye she wished she were at home
 (But these who follow every whim will oft to mischief come).

And now the ladye entered; was e'er such splendor seen?
 All rose to do her homage, just though she were a queen:
 At the first glance she saw a stranger in the crowd,
 And calling her most kindly she praised her beauty loud;
 And graciously she smiled. "My pretty friend," she said,
 "I wish you to see every gem that here is gathered."
 Then to her strange attendant spoke, "This fair one, I presume,
 Would like to see our wonders all—take her through every room.
 The pictures and the flowers, show them to her, I pray,
 The sweetest flower must yield to her, so sweet, so fresh,
 and gay!
 But, when you reach some quiet spot," she whispered in his ear,
 "Then eat her up—for I will have no interloper here."
 (I wish thee to remember, child, the great are often stern; Improve my story as it runs, and thus the moral learn.)

But how he swallowed Mabel up, and how she did implore,
 I cannot tell with certainty, we never saw her more!
 Some say she was not harmed. The ladye kept her there,
 A pretty thing to look upon, for she was wondrous fair.
 Girls of sixteen are silly things, but I may safely say
 Mabel would gladly have been plain, could she get safe away.
 But though her father stormed the house and begged for his dear child,
 The ladye answered not a word, she heard and only smiled.
 The great hall door was closely shut, the judge could not pass through,
 And when the Ogre walked abroad his teeth were hidden too.

So, daughter, ever be content, and e'er it be too late,
 True wisdom gather from the tale of Mabel's mournful fate.
 Ogres are plenty in the world, and beauty is a snare;
 And should one praise thy rosy cheeks, thy long and curling hair,
 Then think upon thy cousin lost, and flattery beware

FRIENDSHIP ENDANGERED.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

(See Steel Plate.)

It was the scene and hour for confidence. The hazy twilight of a damp, warm summer day was creeping in with its cooling breath at the window of the "girls' room," one of the cosiest prettiest apartments that ever graced a country-seat; and near the window, seated one in the deep arm-chair, the other on a pile of cushions on the floor, were the girls—two as bright, sunny-faced, lovable specimens of the class as ever vowed eternal friendship, or exchanged heart confidences. The one on the floor, half sitting, half lying in her luxurious nest of cushions, was a graceful brunette, with large soft black eyes, and a profusion of the darkest brown hair, just verging on black. The other was a tall blonde, with soft golden tresses, and large blue eyes; and to finish the introduction in due form, the one in the chair was Miss Mena Lee; the other, Miss Martha Harris. And now, having drawn up curtain, set the scene, and introduced the characters, let the latter speak for themselves.

"I am so glad you like our room," said Martha. "When auntie first told me you were coming, she was going to put you in the spare room; but I petitioned for you to come in here with me, unless you objected very seriously."

"I could not be better pleased," was the cordial reply. "I am a sad coward about sleeping alone, though I have done so for years. I never had a sister, and my parents died when I was a wee baby."

"As mine did. We must be sisters to each other, dear Mena."

The fair-haired girl bent down, with an earnest look on her face, and a loving light in her eyes to seal the contract with a warm kiss and embrace.

"And now," said Martha, "let us commence our relationship by knowing something about each other. I am the hostess; so I will tell you my story first. As you came so unexpectedly to-day to find me sole occupant of the premises, I will tell you first of the people here. Uncle George is an old gentleman who can be described in one word—lovable. He has the kindest heart, the sweetest smile, the most cheery voice, and the heartiest laugh I ever heard. I don't think he ever spoke a harsh word, or thought a hard judgment in his life.

Aunt Mary is the dearest little bit of a blue-eyed angel that ever made a good man happy. Rupert, their only child, is now about twenty-three; tall, rather handsome, with a noble stock of talents, a frank, generous nature, and his father's kind love for all mankind. I come next. I am inaccurate in calling Mr. Loyd my uncle, he is really not related to me. His father married twice: Uncle George is the son of the first wife. My grandmother was his second wife, and was a widow with one child—my mother—at the time she married Uncle George's father. I have heard from members of the family of the devoted love between my mother and Uncle George; and when I was left an orphan at six months old, Aunt Mary took me to her heart and home, and I have never felt the loss of either parent."

"Then Mr. Loyd is in a measure your guardian, as he is mine. He takes care of your property, does he not?"

"A heavy charge!" said Martha, laughing heartily. "Why, Mena, two pennies would outweigh all the property I have in the world, yet I have never had a wish ungratified, or a whim crossed. And now tell me about yourself."

"There is but little to tell. When my father died, he left Mr. Willis and Mr. Loyd my guardians, and they put me at a boarding-school. Last month Mr. Willis died, and Mr. Loyd wrote to my teacher to send me here when my term was over. That is all."

But as the evening came on the flow of talk became more earnest. Mr. and Mrs. Loyd had gone into the city to transact some business, and were not expected home until morning, and Rupert was away on a shooting excursion; so there was nothing to break in on the long conversation. As the twilight deepened, and the night shadows trooped more thickly into the room, Mena slid from her chair to share Martha's impromptu couch; and so, locked in each other's arms, these two warm-hearted girls, full of loving impulses, with no thoughts to conceal, no secrets to restrain, opened their hearts to each other. It was but a trifling record to repeat stories of school life, of glimpses into the great world of society, of favorite studies and pet authors, of dear delicious hours in country rambles, or blushing confessions at attempted poetry, or "some time to be seen" stories, suggested by this or that incident met on the highway of their quiet lives. But little for other ears to hear, but who is there that cannot recall some hour of such entire confidences when dear hands clasped each other fast, and the magnetism of entire friendship opened wide the portals of the heart.

Of course, in such confidential chat, it was but natural for Martha to allude frequently to her cousin, Rupert Loyd, the companion of her whole young life. From the hour when he had been allowed to make her a cradle of his boyish arms, he had been her protector, brother, companion, and nurse. His was the task to guide her baby footsteps, his the hand to teach her later to control her horse, his arm her support in all arduous walks, his voice ever ready to sympathize in all her joys and sorrows, and with the earnest zeal of a sister for a dearly loved brother, she described his every grace and virtue, till Mena's full share of interest was roused to see and admire this hero of Martha's affections.

The night had gone past its noon before the young girls went to bed, and early morning found them up, and sharing the pleasant labor of making ready for Mr. and Mrs. Loyd's return. The flower vases were to be refilled with fresh flowers, an extra dinner to be ordered, and dessert prepared by Martha's nimble fingers, and a thousand little dainty devices contrived to make the house look cheerful and homelike. Then fresh bright dresses and smooth hair, and the girls were ready for the arrival of the host and hostess.

When Uncle George's kind cordial voice bade her welcome, and Aunt Mary gave her a gentle motherly caress, and both poured out their earnest, loving desire to have her made comfortable, Mena felt that she had indeed found a home. Her soft eyes were full of grateful tears as she shared with Martha the "good-night" kiss of her kind hosts; and the talk that night was full of the kindness of both uncle and aunt. Martha's many stories of the loving care that had made her home so pleasant since her infancy were readily credited, and Mena's first impressions were as enthusiastic and warm as even the exacting love of Martha could desire.

It was not until she had been domesticated in her new home for nearly a fortnight that Mena first saw Rupert. During that time she had been winning with her gentle loving manner, her sweet low voice, and ready yet modest intelligence, the love of all. Uncle George insisted upon having from her lips the same title Martha gave him, and Aunt Mary claimed the same privilege.

The days passed pleasantly in rambles, rides, music, reading, and the thousand little devices women always have ready in needlework to pass long summer days. The love that began so auspiciously on the night of Mena's arrival, still drew her affection to Martha to meet a warm return. They were inseparable; sharing the same room, interested in the same pursuits; from the hour when they bade each other "Good-morning" till they slept, locked in each other's arms, their days were passed in sweet intercourse. There was sufficient contrast in their dispositions to keep this love ever warm, and prevent any jar.

Martha, active, energetic, and impulsive, seemed the stronger nature of the two, and took the lead in even their most trifling pursuits; while the clinging fondness, the gentle submissiveness of Mena's character turned ever to her stronger companion for guidance and support.

They were in the parlor together, about two weeks after Mena's arrival, with no light but the silver flood the moon poured in at the open window. Mena was at the piano, while Martha sat half hidden among the folds of the window curtain. Mena was playing one of Grebbman's Nocturnes, with a movement that suited the hour. The notes trickled from her fingers' touch as water ripples over the stones in a brook, and rose and fell in waves of melody. They had been seated there for nearly an hour, when Mena felt a pair of strong arms clasp her waist, and before she had time to cry out, a moustache brushed her cheek, and a warm kiss was printed on her lips. With quick indignation she sprang to her feet, pushing the intruder from her, with a force her slight form seemed scarcely capable of.

"Why, Mattie, what's the matter?" The hearty manly voice, half laughing, was full of surprise.

"Mattie is here, Rupert."

He turned to the window, with a quick gesture; but instantly returning, said: "How can I apologize?"

"It is not necessary; I see the error," said Mena; but her quick breathing and trembling figure showed how she had been startled.

"And this is Mena Lee, Rupert, my newly-found sister," said Martha.

"Mine then as well, if she can forgive my rudeness," he said, extending his hand to clasp hers with a cordial pressure.

"Look out in future for the difference between fair hair and dark," said Martha, "and Mena will no longer obtain my caresses."

"Where's mother?"

"The true boy question!" said Mrs. Loyd from the inner room that opened on the parlor. "Mother's here, and father, too. Come in, all of you, and hear our runaway give an account of his visit."

It was an account full of racy, sparkling interest. Stories of adventure by field and flood in search of game, all told with a lively grace that made the meanest words interesting. The tall, lithe figure in the rough dress suiting his late pursuits, graceful and animated, the dark eyes flashing, the white teeth gleaming as the handsome mouth poured out its fund of words, and the half-sancy, half-modest consciousness of being the hero of his own tales, all made Rupert very fascinating to the lonely orphan who had never before been in familiar intercourse with a gentleman; her only idea of the sex being confined to the white gloved youngsters she had met at the boarding-school parties, or the teachers of the institute. It was no wonder she was pleased with this long-expected hero, whose gentlemanly language and refined manners toned down his rough dress, and gave a grace to his wildest story of adventure.

This was the first evening.

All day, his holiday being over, Rupert was in town in a lawyer's office, where he was junior partner; but in the evening he invariably sought his sisters to, as he said, clear all the cobwebs from his brain. Music, conversation, company made these evenings the pleasant hours of the day to both Mena and Martha; but while to the latter they were but the resuming of a regular routine, to the former they were a delightful and dangerous novelty.

Thinking nothing of such danger, without the most distant idea of flirting, Rupert was to her a courteous, tender brother. As he treated Martha, so he began to treat this new sister; and as one shared his thoughts, so the other, too, soon became his confidante, sought for as every new device for enjoyment came to his mind, protected with the gentlest courtesy, and made a centre for every kindness. Both Rupert and Martha strove by every loving device to make the stranger feel her new residence indeed a home.

Unknown to herself, unsuspected by her companions, Mena was giving to Rupert the first love of her untried heart, learning to feel his presence the sunshine of her life, his approval her surest guide, his affection her keenest pleasure. With such brotherly intercourse as his, there came no thought of jealousy to either Mena or Martha; both thought they regarded him as a brother, and he as blindly thought they were to him dear sisters—nothing more.

Two years passed, with their ever-varying panorama of pleasure and pain, and then a cloud gathered over this family, before so happy. Uncle George, the tender husband, the kind father and uncle, the placid gentleman, became slowly yet fatally altered. He absented himself from home for a whole day at a time—a thing, as he had years before retired from active business, that grew alarming as it became more frequently repeated. In the evening, returning from such absence, he was morose and sometimes even violent, angrily resenting any inquiry as to his business, and checking instantly any allusion to his absence. From looking with impatience for pleasant evenings, the family grew to dreading them as the time of restraint and fear. One night he did not return. After waiting until midnight, Rupert sought him in the city. His first inquiry was at the office of his father's lawyer, and there he found his father's corpse—a suicide! There was no time then for explanation; the fatal news was to be carried home, the wife's wild grief soothed, the whole burden of comforter to the three mourning women resting on Rupert's hands. His must be the head to keep clear for all arrangements, his the voice to direct, the mind to thrust out its own stunning weight of pain, and support the new burden of responsibility.

It was not until the funeral was over, and the house restored to that dreary quiet that follows a great shock, that Rupert again went to the lawyer's office.

"My task," said the old man, kindly, "is the most painful one of my life. I have known and loved you from a boy, Rupert, and your father was dear to me as a brother, yet I must—" He made a long, long pause while the young man waited, not daring to break the silence that was numbing him in its chilling terror. "Your father, Rupert, about two years ago, became interested in the new, absorbing speculations in western lands, and against my most earnest advice, plunged blindly into buying on a scale his income would not justify. I did not know until the day he died that he had invested Miss Lee's money as well as his own in this hazardous investment; but he came here, mad with the intelligence that his stock upon which he was building most sanguine hopes was worthless. He confessed to me his falsity as guardian, and declaring himself unable to bear the shame and burden of his sin, stabbed himself here at my side. Your mother's property makes her independent, and you have your profession; your Cousin Martha will have something from your mother's will, and no doubt a home for life; Miss Lee is beggared."

Rupert tried to speak, but his voice was choked, and his parched lips refused to make a sound.

"Rupert, I am going to take a liberty that only your father's oldest friend may dare to take, when I advise you to marry Mena Lee."

A cry of pain burst from Rupert's lips.

"I know," the old man said, and his voice was tender as a woman's, "this sounds cruel and abrupt so soon after your great loss and my painful disclosures; but I know, too, it will be the dearest object of your life to keep your father's error a secret between you and myself. When your Uncle John dies, you are the heir to his property, and can replace Miss Lee's. Until then, unless you support her, she is penniless."

"But she can live at home with my mother, and I will lay every penny at her feet."

"She would not accept it; and your utmost efforts could not earn the income to which she is entitled. After she is your wife, you can tell her why she is poorer, and I leave you to judge whether she is likely to love you less when she knows you have married a beggar instead of an heiress."

"But—"

Rupert paused; that confidence just on his lips was too sacred to pass their portals. Suddenly, by the light of this new call upon him, he read truly his own heart—he loved Martha! And she—ah! he dared not now think of the thousand little acts he would once have recalled as proofs that he did not love in vain. All her sweet confidence, her thousand winning ways, might be but the outpouring of her sisterly affection, they might mean—. He tore himself shuddering from the thought.

He was young, enthusiastic, devotedly attached to his father, with an affectionate brotherly love for Mena; he was urged on by what seemed duty, the advice of the man second only to his father in his heart, and by his own keen sense of honor. What wonder then that he persuaded himself that he could learn to love (the very phrase mocked him) and learn, too, to forget. Then and there, with his friend's encouraging voice in his ear, he wrote to Mena.

She was sitting in the library, thinking over the sad events of the past few days, and trying to form some plan for her own future. Martha was in her aunt's room, giving some directions about the mourning to be made, and trying to rouse the widow from her apathy of sorrow. When the servant opened the door to hand Mena the letter, she was thinking so intently of Rupert's grief and Rupert's loss that the envelope directed in his hand seemed only following out her train of thought. She opened and read it.

One short week ago every chord of her heart would have thrilled with rapture at the prospect of being Rupert's wife; but now the note chilled, half frightened her; it was a cold, formal offer of his hand, with but few words of affection, and those seemed forced. It was not even in the warm, brotherly style of his usual intercourse with her, and she sat, pained, wondering, and full of vague sorrow, looking forward with eyes full of sad, questioning wonder.

"Mena!"

Martha was beside her, holding in her hand the envelope she had just thrown aside. For the first time in all their long intercourse the friends met with the chill of restraint between them.

"Mena, why does Rupert write to you, when he sees you constantly? Mena—" oh, the agony of the tone! "there is no new trouble?"

"No, no, Martha! Rupert wrote to"—and the forming of the words turned her vague pain to pleasure—"ask me to be his wife."

"To-day! so soon! His father scarcely cold in his grave! Rupert!"

Then, as the full sense of the words came into her heart, then she, too, learned that her adopted cousin was dearer than a brother, that she, too, loved him.

It was a bitter, bitter day. Rupert bowed down under the weight of his knowledge of his father's sin; Martha vainly trying to make her woman's pride cover her woman's love; Mena, with the keen intuition of love, reading the constraint of Rupert's redoubled attentions.

Three long weary months passed, and still the cloud of restraint hung over all these young hearts. The warm, loving words that had become habitual between the girls were changed for the commonplace sentences necessary between inmates of the same room and house, while Mena grew daily more troubled and puzzled over Rupert's behavior.

She could find no fault. He was attentive beyond the requirements of even a lover. Every hour at home was passed by her side, while he avoided Martha as studiously as she avoided him. Yet he was no joyous lover. Even his father's death could not account for the gloom that grew every day deeper; the pale cheeks that were becoming so thin and wan; the tone of sadness that marked even his tenderest words to her. If he pressed his lips to hers it was with the tender, self-reproachful pressure of one craving pardon for some offence, and his caress was as protecting as it was loving.

She was lying on the parlor sofa, half dozing, when the enigma was solved. Mrs. Loyd was in the inner room, reading, and Martha had gone to her own room when Rupert came in.

"You are late, my son," his mother said, as he sat down on a low stool at her feet to caress her hand; "the girls have gone to bed."

"Never mind! Let me be your boy to-night, as before the girls came."

Mena lay still, half dozing. She could not escape except by passing through the room where the mother and son were seated, and she was slowly learning not to seek Rupert's presence. From some anxious questions Mrs. Loyd put to her son, some comment on his pallid face, some motherly pleading for confidence, the whole story came from Rupert's lips. He had learned that day that his mother must know of his father's sin before long, and he had voluntarily undertaken to tell her all. From that to his own part in the sad affair, his own love, his more than suspicion of Martha's, all came from his overburdened heart to his mother's sympathizing ears, and to the involuntary listener, who heard her heart's death-warrant from those pale impassioned lips.

The blow proved too much for the widow. Before Mena could let Rupert know of her resolve to release him, she was called to assist in caring for Mrs. Loyd, sinking rapidly into a dangerous state of prostration, from which she never rallied.

Again we see the friends in the room where we were first introduced to them. The winter winds are sweeping round the house, and in the place of the soft white raiment of summer both wear deep mourning garments, and sat far apart—one near the window, the other by the fire. Mena was the first to speak. Leaving the seat near the window, she came to Martha's side, and bent over her in the old caressing way.

"Mattie, we are drifting away from each other day by day, till the old love is dying out of our hearts, and now, when I have my hardest burden to bear, I have no friend to whom I can go for a word of sympathy, no voice to comfort me."

"What sorrow can you have?" Martha's voice was cold and hard.

"Rupert and I have broken our engagement. He does not love me—he—Mattie! look up, he loves you, and I am breaking my own heart to give him to you."

The ice barrier was broken. The fast pouring tears from Mena's eyes fell 'on Martha's bosom as she was pressed closely to it, and locked, as of old, fast in each other's arms—again the young girls exchanged confidences. All the story that Mena had heard she told Martha, that she might know how loving and loyal, how self-sacrificing and noble Rupert had been. She made no secret of her own love, only imploring Martha to help her in her resolve to conquer it.

Two years later, when Uncle John died, and Rupert replaced his father's violated trust, Mena returned from her position as teacher to again make her home with the sister she loved; the brother, for whom she had now the affection he craved, came back to the happiest home, the most loving couple, and the warmest welcome that the world could produce.

I CAN'T AFFORD IT!

BY M. M. BARRETT.

"I CAN'T afford it!"

"But, father, I'll do without the new bonnet you promised me; I can have my old one pressed, and it will do quite well, and—"

"You will have the new bonnet. As for the Lady's Book, it would just fill your head with all sorts of folly, and my daughter would become another Florence Dieaway. No indeed! I can't afford it."

"But she don't take the Book—never has taken it. It might put some ideas of taste into her head, if she would," was the thought that passed through her mind.

It was of no use to say anything more; for James Percy was, as one of the neighbors expressed it, "remarkably set in his way." He had formed the opinion that all reading of stories was a sin, and a fashion-plate an abomination.

Mary Percy was an only child; years before, her mother had been laid to rest beneath the wide-spreading branches of the willow. People called James Percy cold and proud; they did not see that his heart was ever filled with sorrow for the early dead; nor did they see the tears that dimmed his eyes, as his gaze rested on his daughter, while she busied herself with household duties.

"Mary has got her mother's eyes!" Mr. Percy had let fall his hoe, and was wiping the large drops from his forehead. "She's got her mother's eyes!" and his gaze was fixed on the willow, whose long, sweeping branches touched the white marble. He resumed his labor; but there was a look of care upon his face, and he was evidently debating some question in his mind. At last, he said aloud, "No, I can't afford it. There's those horses of Nye's! I must get them; and the payment on the south lot must be made next week, and the barn wants a new roof, and—"

"Mr. Percy!"

He started, for so intently was his mind occupied with the thoughts that had just found expression in words, that he had not heard the light footsteps of the lady who now stood by his side.

"Mr. Percy, if you are not too busy, I would like to say a few words to you about Mary." And Mrs. Lee, the minister's wife, seated herself on the grass at the foot of the large maple tree, near which they were standing.

Mrs. Lee was a woman for whose opinion James Percy had a high regard. She was a practical Christian—one who would not forget the everyday duties of life in endeavoring to accomplish some doubtful or distant good.

"I am getting up a club for the Lady's Book," said Mrs. Lee, "and called at your house, thinking that Mary would like to subscribe; but she tells me you think you 'cannot afford it.'"

James Percy looked up with surprise. He had always supposed that the Lady's Book was an "institution" expressly for young ladies who wished to while away their time in light reading, or lighter work; but his false notions were suddenly swept away like the mist of morning. Before him was a woman who stood as the personification of all that was pure and excellent, and this woman was getting up a club for the book he so much despised. No wonder he looked surprised. After a moment's hesitation, however, he said:—

"Well, times have been rather hard for me. You know Jameson ran away, and he was owing me five hundred dollars, and there are considerable many things to be bought for the farm, and, the fact is, I would not mind the money so much, but I was afraid of the effect on Mary's mind—afraid that she might get extravagant notions of life, and that she would not be the same contented little housekeeper that she now is. Do you think there is no danger of this?" And there was the slightest trace of hesitation in his voice as he asked the question.

"Its effects would be quite the opposite. I feel assured," said Mrs. Lee. "My mother was one of the first to subscribe for the Book, and every volume since that time is now in my possession; and you will not accuse me of egotism, if I say that I am confident I should never have been able to accomplish the amount of good which I have thus far, but for the influence that it exerted upon me in my early days; indeed I cannot tell you all that it has done for me. I have never offered to lend my Book to Mary, as I do not think it right; it seems like defrauding the publisher, for many will not take a magazine while they can borrow, and, at the same time, the borrower has to read with such haste, that half the beauties are unappreciated, while the numerous receipts and various other valuable items are not read at all, or, at least, not remembered in once reading. I have no doubt that, to Mary, with her good taste and noble fingers, the Book would be invaluable.

James Percy smiled; evidently the compliment pleased him, for he felt that it was a just one.

"Mary is a spry little thing; that's a fact. Just like her mother when I married her, twenty years ago next Thanksgiving." His mind seemed to wander back to the old days with strange pertinacity. "Well," he said, at last, "I think you may put Mary's name on your list." And thus was the prejudice of James Percy conquered.

A year had passed away. Mary was busy spreading the cloth for the evening repast. There was a look of refinement about her, and her dress, although of the simplest materials, was made with care, and harmonized with her complexion. A neat collar encircled her throat, and her black silk apron, with its delicate pockets, told of neatness and good taste. The farm-house, too, had improved in many of its arrangements. The table-spread in the front room was appliqué, and "father's chair" had received a new cover; a tidy was also added, and a lamp-mat had made its appearance. All these improvements had been made without neglect of other duties. Her father's favorite dishes still appeared upon the table, better prepared, as he had more than once said; for now she had an unfailling guide in all cases of doubt, and could, therefore, economize both time and materials.

"Mary," said Mr. Percy, "is it not about time Mrs. Lee was getting up her club for Godey's? I think you had better send; in fact I don't see how we ever got along without it. I've been reckoning up some of the items that it has saved me during the last year. There's that table-spread and lounge-cover—those I should have had to buy; those other 'fixin's,' although not exactly necessaries, still are quite an improvement to the looks of a room; then I should certainly have lost my best colt, but for that receipt for bruises. Well, I am sure it has been worth more than a hundred dollars to me the past year, and hereafter I think I can afford to take the LADY'S BOOK."

Pearl the Elvewitch.—November.

WHERE the brown squirrel stops and peeps—
Where the field mouse in safety sleeps—
And over stunted stubble heaps
And down the wold NOVEMBER sweeps—

The sound of dropping nuts is hushed;
The late, last flowers lie drooped and crushed,
And every face we meet is flushed
By the crisp breeze that o'er it rushed.

And o'er the face of nature spreads
The hues that tell us how she treads
The worn pathway of time, and sheds
Both shade and sunshine on our heads.

There was a time, there was a time
(Oh, sing it soft in sweetest rhyme!)
When the bells rang a sweet Spring chime,
And the world was in its youthful prime.

There was an hour, there was an hour
(Oh, own the magic of its power!)
When roses decked each wood and bower,
And beauty graced the Summer's dower.

There was a day, there was a day
(Oh, twine it kindly in your lay!)
When Nature's bosom, flush with grain,
Greeted the farmer's Autumn rain.

But now the recompense is past;
The fleeting year draws near at last
The goal so many reach so fast;
Already is its shadow cast

Upon NOVEMBER's weary brow,
And as we look, we ponder how
We've seen the changing seasons bow,
But not with feelings such as now.

The sadness of the fading year
Reflects the sadness of the sphere
Where mortals reign in constant fear,
And sorrow steals on every cheer.

There are NOVEMBERS of the heart,
Where memories alone form part
Of actual being; shapes that start,
And sounds that through the soul's realms dart

With premonitions of decay,
And whose unerring echoes say
Time, like the year, must end some day!
Ere long death's curtain hides life's play.

A DISCREET WIFE.

THERE is a large class of excellent female characters (observes Mrs. Hannah More) who, on account of that very excellence, are little known, because to be known is not their object. Their ambition has a better taste; they pass through life honored and respected in their own small, but not unimportant spheres, and approved by Him, "whose they are, and whom they serve," though their faces are hardly known in promiscuous society. If they occasion little sensation abroad, they produce much happiness at home. These are the women who bless, dignify, and truly adorn society. The painter, indeed, does not make his fortune by their sitting to him; the jeweller is neither brought into vogue by furnishing their diamonds, nor undone by not being paid for them; the prosperity of the milliner does not depend on affixing their name to a cap or a color; the poet does not celebrate them; the novelist does not dedicate to them; but they possess the affection of their husbands, the attachment of their children, the esteem of the wise and good, and, above all, they possess His favor, "whom to know is life eternal."

"A creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food;
For simple duties, playful wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles."

ERRORS.

THE little that we have seen of the world and know of the history of mankind, teaches us to look upon their errors in sorrow, not in anger. When we take the history of one poor heart that sinned and suffered, and represent to ourself the struggles and temptations it passed through; the brief pulsation of joy; the feverish inquietude of hope and fear; the tears of regret; the feebleness of purpose; the desertion of friends; the scorn of the world, that has little charity; the desolation of the soul's sanctuary, and threatening voices within; health gone; happiness gone; we would fain leave the erring soul of our fellow man with Him from whose hands it came.

MRS. VINING'S "HELP."

A STORY FOR HOUSEKEEPERS.

BY MARY W. JANVRIK.

"WHAT we are to do, I'm sure I can't imagine! Cousin Fanny coming next week, and Lena taken down sick just at the time I need her most!" said Helen Vining, in a despairing tone, at the breakfast-table.

"We must get another girl, that's all, if Lena isn't able to keep her place," replied the husband, pushing back his chair.

"But I dislike to take new help so at any time, and especially just now, when Lena had learned our ways, and had begun to be such a good girl; besides, I wanted most of my time during Fanny's visit, to go about with her and show her some of the beauties of our western home, instead of spending it in the kitchen, irritating a stolid Norwegian, as I must if I have a new girl. You know I spent weeks over Lena, who was perfectly ignorant of our American method of housework when she came to us."

"I know it; but these things can't be cured, and therefore must be endured in housekeeping, Helen. Let Lena go—and I'll hunt up a new girl by to-morrow. As I go along to the store I'll order something for dinner that won't keep you long in the kitchen to-day," said Mr. Vining, rising.

"But I'm afraid, James, that you'll not find it so easy to obtain a new girl as you think," exclaimed his wife. "There seems to be a perfect dearth of help just now. I know half a dozen of our friends who are without; and only yesterday, Mrs. Doctor Webster and Mrs. Vail were in, and spoke of their having been deserted without any warning. I didn't dream then that I should be in the same situation to-day myself. If Lena were really ill, I wouldn't feel so; but it's only an ordinary cold, and I cannot prevail on her to take the simplest remedy for it. It's my opinion, James, that she finds we are expecting company, and so uses this excuse to get away from us."

"Ma, Lena can't be real sick, for her bean was here in the kitchen last night, when I came down after a drink of water!" upspoke Master Freddy, a bright boy of five years. "I guess she's making believe, and wants to play hokey, like the children do from school."

"Hush, Fred!" said Mr. Vining, repressing a smile. Then, turning to his wife, "Let Lena go to-day, and I'll hunt up another girl," and he set off for his place of business.

Mrs. Vining—one of the pattern housekeepers and most lenient of mistresses—was correct in her supposition regarding her suddenly-ailing help. The Norwegian girl, who had come to her perfectly untrained and uncouth, and under her hands had been moulded into an efficient maid-of-all-work, was destitute of that sense of obligation which should have retained her; and, finding that the advent of company might probably bring to her additional duties, she had cunningly feigned illness. And, super-added thereto, possibly the persuasions of the "bean," to whom Master Freddy referred, a low-built, thick-set, flaxen-haired emigrant from their native North-land beyond the Ocean, had decided her to resign her situation as subordinate in another's home, and set up house-keeping on her own account in the little one story log shanty which Christian Newburger had built in the oak-opening on the borders of a fertile prairie country in southern Wisconsin. So, upon receiving her wages and the accompanying full discharge from the Vining campaign, the invalid rose with wonderful alacrity from her bed, packed up the wooden chest which had been transported in the emigrant ship across the deep, and departed, leaving her quondam mistress sole queen of the menage, from parlor to pantry closet.

Let not the reader infer, from the disappointment with which Helen Vining lost her "help," that that little lady was of the idle, inefficient, or, as Aunt Ophelia hath it, "shiftless" class of wives. Far from either was she; for, in her distant, pleasant New England home, Helen Scott had been trained by an excellent and judicious mother in all the housewifely virtues, and when she accompanied her young husband to their new home in the far West, she had expected to encounter privations, and had met them bravely, in the pioneer town which was then springing up on the borders of the wilderness; but, as increasing size in the town brought increasing business and, consequently, prosperity to Mr. Vining, while a troop of fair young children clustered round Helen's knee, many changes crept into their household, and additional "help" found their way to the nursery and kitchen. Of late, however, three-year old Katy having retained her position as "baby" in the domestic circle, and harum-scarum, curly-headed, quick-tongued Fred having been promoted to the dignity of his first suit from the tailor's, and his advent at the school-room, the nursery-girl had been dispensed with, and a strong-armed maid-of-all work had been considered sufficient by the thrifty Mrs. Vining to officiate, under her superintendence, in the domestic department. But Norwegian Lena, fully imbued with the true spirit of the land of her adoption, scorned the idea of remaining a private in the great army of "domestic help" when she could attain the honors of a female Brigadier Generalship in another department; hence her resignation in the former, with the prospect of an immediate promotion in the latter, leaving poor Mrs. Vining alone, beleaguered by the contending hosts of multifarious duties pressing hard upon her.

Let us see how Helen Vining conducted her campaign, and if "reinforcements" arrived. "Let me see," soliloquized Helen, after the elder children, Alice and Henry, respectively of ten and seven years, and the curly-headed Freddy, had all been duly equipped and departed for school, the mother returning to the breakfast-table, still standing as they had left it—"let me see; here I have, indeed, a forenoon's work before me—the dishes to wash up, the house to put in order, and bread to set for baking! Dear me, now! why did I forget to send Harry over to the brewery after the yeast? and I can't go myself to leave Katy! The bread will have to go to-day; I'll send to the bakery for loaves; but let me see, I'll manage to find time to make a couple of loaves of nice fruit-cake, if I can. I may not have any more leisure to-morrow, even if we should get a new girl. Come, Katy, be a nice little girl, while mamma is busy!"

Disposing a variety of toys upon the floor to amuse baby, Mrs. Vining turned back the sleeves of her neat morning-wrapper, brought her little keeler of warm water, and dexterously dispatched the breakfast-dishes; afterwards regulating the pantry and china-closets, which wore a singularly untidy look that morning.

"Lena meant to leave!" ejaculated Helen, as she gazed at this evidence of the girl's carelessness, "and she didn't care how she left me. I won't have another Norwegian in my house, stupid and ungrateful things as they are! I'll do my cooking myself—but there! that's out of the question," she added, in a moment. "I forget that we have a family of six, and one pair of hands aren't strong enough to do everything. I do hope James will be fortunate enough to find a good girl, to whom I sha'n't be obliged to learn 'the rudiments.' Come, Katy, let's go up stairs! Bring dolly, too!"

Grasping the headless trunk of her mutilated china doll, which had been the bosom companion of Miss Katy by day and by night for the past two weeks precisely, the child followed her mother up stairs, tottering from parlor to bedrooms, and all the while chattering most volubly in unintelligible baby-talk to her treasure. But at last the baby voice rose to a shriller tone, and the child began violently shaking the headless trunk, as mothers of violent scolding propensities are prone to do refractory children.

"Why, Katy, what's the matter?" asked Mrs. Vining, in astonishment, pausing in her task of dusting the parlor table. "Why do you treat poor dolly in such a way?"

"Her won't mind! her real naughty! and I whip her hard, and scold Norwegian at her!" was Katy's quick reply, again administering sound corporeal punishment; all the while jabbering away in a ludicrous mixture of jargon, such as she fancied she had heard from the departed Lena's lips.

With an amused smile, Helen pacified the excited child whose precocious maternal cares so overwhelmed her. "There, there, Katy! that will do! Perhaps if dolly hadn't lost her head she could understand better, and wouldn't be so naughty. Poor thing! don't scold her any more. When Cousin Fanny comes, she will dress a nice new dolly for Katy!"

An hour afterward Mrs. Vining stood at her kitchen table beating eggs vigorously, while Katy strenuously insisted upon helping, by every now and then surreptitiously inserting her little hand into sugar bucket or fruit can. Filled with visions of the new "dolly," nothing could induce her to return to the old love, which now lay, quite discarded, and henceforth deemed utterly unworthy of Norwegian baby-scolding, upon the floor beside the table.

"When is Tuzzin Fanny tuming, mamma?" she suddenly asked, pausing in the abstraction of a huge lump of sugar and a sly pinch of currants.

"When my little girl leaves off eating things that will make her sick—to-morrow, perhaps!" replied her mother. "Run away, now; there's Freddy, come from school!" as the little fellow, with a whoop and bound that would have done credit to an original young Winnebago of the Western State he inhabited, rushed into the room.

"O mamma, mamma! I readed best of all, and setted the stillst of any of the boys—and the teacher said so!" was his triumphant shout, swinging his cap aloft in triumph—"and now I want two pieces of bread and butter!" suddenly descending, in this closing request, from the exultations of genius to the cravings of mundane nature.

"O Freddy, Tuzzin Fanny is tuning to-morrow, and is going to fetch me a real nice dolly!" cried Katy, bounding to her brother's side, all aglow with the importance of her communication. "A'n't that nice?"

"Dolls a'n't nothing!" scornfully remarked Master Fred between his mouthful of bread and butter. "Maybe she 'll bring me a top, or bat and ball, or a big drum!" and then, with a toss of his curly head and a bound for the door, he vanished.

With the dinner hour came Mr. Vining, who met his wife's look of inquiry with the remark, "I have had no leisure to look about for a girl yet; but, as I go down town again, I will call at that Norwegian family's on High Street, which is a sort of general depot for them, and see what the prospects are for securing one."

"How I wish there was an Intelligence Office here, where one could step in and find a dozen good girls in waiting! But one can't find those outside of cities; and we, in country towns, are forced to take such help as we can get. I only hope, though, that I may not have to tator another raw girl!" was Mrs. Vining's comment.

At supper, Mr. Vining received his cup of fragrant tea from his wife's hand, and sipped it with evident relish.

"This is tea!" he exclaimed, "quite unlike that which Lena used to brew. It tastes like that my good old mother used to serve up to us as we gathered round the family table in the good old Granite State."

"Lena was a good cook after being with me awhile; but I never could learn her that tea should not be boiled like herb drink," was Helen's rejoinder.

"By the way, I had poor luck to-day about getting another girl," said her husband. "There isn't a Norwegian out of a place; and they told me that it would be hard finding one just at this time—as the harvest season is coming on, and they are so used to out-of-door work in their own country that they prefer going out on our farms till after harvest is over."

"There are two or three Irish families at the farther end of the town, and perhaps we could hear of a girl there," suggested Mrs. Vining. "Mrs. Doctor Webster said she should try among them."

"I'll put an advertisement in the Chronicle to-morrow," said Mr. Vining. "That will probably be the best course."

"So it will; and we shall have plenty of applicants at our doors," was Helen's reply. "I can get along a day or two very well, or even this week out, if Fanny don't come; but next Monday will bring washing day, and I hope we shall be supplied before then!"

The advertisement duly appeared in the morrow's weekly paper, and Mrs. Vining purposely remained in doors for the two days following, expecting applicants; but, much to her surprise, none appeared. Friday came, and found her still without a single visitor of the class desired.

"What are we to do, James?" asked Mrs. Vining. "This is so unusual here in the West, where emigrants are constantly arriving. I did talk the first of the week decidedly anti-Norwegian; but now, I honestly affirm that I should regard the advent of even the most untutored specimen of the Slavonic race as a signal blessing. Here it is, about the end of the week, and no prospect of a girl!"

"I had a sort of an applicant to-day, at the store—one of my porter's asking the situation for a woman who was staying at his house, but who, unfortunately, had a frowsy-headed boy of five or six years, from whom she would not be parted; so her coming was out of the question."

"Of course," replied Helen; "but I do trust we may be fortunate enough to get help before to-morrow night!"

But Saturday came and passed, and Sunday also; and the advent of Monday—that "rainy spell" to housekeepers—found the Vining household still without any adjunct in the kitchen; while in the wash-room figured the tall, muscular, uncrinolined figure of the Widow Frisbie, who made weekly peregrinations from house to house among sundry families in Prairieville. All the long twelve hours, from 8 A. M. till the hands of the kitchen clock had revolved through their cycle to the corresponding figures at eve, did the quiet, faithful, but dreadfully "slow" mistress of the wash-board plod her weary round; till, late at night, she crowned her straight figure with a long, deep-caped Shaker, and betook herself to her own domicile.

And at the same evening hour Helen Vining emerged from her kitchen, whither she had descended for a "reconnaissance" after bestowing the children safely in their little beds, and seated herself at her piano with a half sigh, mechanically taking up a sheet of music which lay upon the rack and repeating the apropos line from Longfellow's "Rainy Day":—

"Some days must be dark and dreary."

Too weary to strike a note, Helen then threw herself into her low rocker, and soliloquized: "And the Widow Frisbie must be here all day to-morrow again! Well, I realize the meaning of the command, 'Let Patience have its perfect work,' whenever I hire her! I shall be thankful when the ironing is over! I wonder why Fanny stays so long in Chicago?"

Next day brought a solution of Helen's question. Just at the mid-afternoon hour, when the elder children were at school, Katy taking a sound nap in her crib, Mrs. Vining in her low rocker sewing busily, and the dame of the smoothing-iron engaged in giving a fine polish to sundry garments damp from the clothes-basket, the depot coach stopped in front of the house, and a pretty, stylish figure, in a neat travelling costume, emerged therefrom. In another minute the cousins were in each other's arms.

"Why, Helen, is this great boy yours?" asked Fanny Waterman, divesting herself of her travelling-gear, and turning to meet Master Freddy, who had just come home at recess. "And this girl, too?" as Katy awoke, and appeared on the scene.

"Wait till you see Harry and Alice," answered Helen, smiling, and adding: "You forget that, while you have been keeping yourself a girl, I have been married these eleven years, and consider myself one of the pioneer mothers of the West."

"Merci!" cried Fanny, with a little French grimace accompanying the phrase, "you make me feel old, Helen! You are—how old, ma chere cousine, if I may be pardoned the query?"

"Twenty-nine, Fan; and just three years your senior, you know," answered Mrs. Vining, with a laugh.

"Which makes me just twenty-six, and past the first corner by a full twelve-month. I wonder if any crow's-feet have got into my temples, Helen?" And she advanced to the mirror, into which she gazed with an affectation of earnestness. "And will they take me for one decidedly passée out here in this great, young, growing country of the West? Say—Helen, that's a western word, you see, and I've got 'say' at my tongue's end already—say, hav'n't you some 'right smart chance' of a western lawyer, judge, or professor picked out for me?—my tastes run to the professional, you see. They say at home it's quite time Fan was married!"

"Which 'they,' being interpreted, means but one, in the third person, singular, who shall be 'spoken of' by my own self, unless you forestall me," retorted Helen, archly. "How is the health of my prospective cousin—Squire Etheridge? Professional tastes, eh?"

"How did you know—that is, what do you mean?" stammered Fanny, stooping to caress Katy, and thereby veiling her handsome face with her rich brown curls to hide her blushes.

"Oh, nothing in the world, my dear; only I'm very grateful that you should have come out West to see us, prior to settling down in life. I can't imagine but one thing that would have reconciled me to your not coming at present—and that would be, having you come in the future with a compagnon du voyage. But I suppose you enjoyed your visit in Chicago?"

"Oh yes! I quite dissipated there. Saw all the sights, from the performing elephants, Romeo and Juliet, to ebony contrabands fresh from Dixie in gayest apparel; met everybody, from the Michigan Avenuers, on their native heaths, to German babies, fed, I am sure, on lager beer and sour kroust, in the omnibuses; inhaled all its native air, from delectable attar of roses at Grau's Italian opera to a cluster of wild violets plucked from the oak grove where sleeps the great departed statesman in his lone grave by Michigan's blue waters—and now I am come to you, in this beautiful June time, to catch a glimpse of freer western life, and to breathe the purer prairie winds that blow, uncontaminated, across the mighty Father of Waters. You see I've not permitted my powers of oratory to grow rusty," said Fanny, closing her speech with a gay, laughing "say."

"The same as ever—wild, witty, winsome!" exclaimed Helen Vining; "but, to descend from the sublime to the ridiculous, you behold me, on your first visit to the West, in a positively unpleasant dilemma. We are in great trouble, Fanny: our girl has gone, and I know not where to find another."

"Oh, is that all!" gayly answered Fanny. "Great trouble! Why, I thought all the children had got the measles, or James had failed up—stolen a store full of goods—been arrested by the sheriff, or something! No girl! that's very slight foundation for domestic misery. How long have you been laboring under this calamitous infliction, Helen?"

"For the space of just a week to-morrow."

"Ah! that accounts for your careworn look I noticed on my first arrival; hair slightly gray round your temples, and wrinkled brow! But now, requiescat in pace! You shall see presently what famous puddings, pies, and genuine New England doughnuts I can improvise—and, by the way, I hav'n't eaten one of the last named edibles since leaving home. To be sure, at a way station in New York State, on my journey out, my escort left his seat and presently returned with two immense specimens of this article of food, carefully folded in a large sheet of wrapping-paper, which bore about the same relation to the Simon pure as Barnum's fat woman does to Tom Thumb. 'What are these?' I asked, as we settled ourselves to our lunch. 'I bought them for doughnuts; but I thought I had secured a barrel of flour,' was his reply. And we positively nibbled away at those two doughnuts all the remnant of the journey through York State! I can see now the philosophy of the flour manufacture being centred in York State."

"How opportune that you came to us now, Fan!" exclaimed Helen, recovering her breath from laughter at Fanny's amusing rendition of her luncheon on the rail.

"Yes, indeed! I had a sort of warning that I should find my sphere here in the far West; and am delighted to know that it is that of commissary general. On the streets of Chicago last April, I heard a good old farmer remark, 'Wa'al, let the rain come now—I've got my wheat in!' But little did I suppose then that said wheat was to furnish me the staple of my occupation here in Prairieville. Oh, I expect to revel in goodies out here, Helen! fresh strawberries, picked by my own taper fingers, and all that sort of thing; and then I have a fancy for sleeping under the shadow of prairie-rose vines to dream of prairie wolves, gophirs, quails, snipes, turtle-doves, and similar domestic creatures, who, they tell me, do get up musical entertainments in your country."

"All such expectations, I trust, will be fulfilled," said Helen.

An hour or two later the family gathered around the table in the cool dining-room; and Mr. Vining and Fanny Waterman, between the pauses of their tea-drinking, exhausted the topics of queries and answers concerning dear friends in the far-off Eastern States.

"It really sets me longing for the old familiar faces and places to meet one from home," said James Vining, earnestly. "I would give a good deal for a glimpse of the old Granite Hills, or a sound of the ocean breakers thundering along the sands of Hampton Beach this hot June afternoon. It is not often that I get a homesick spell, for I like this great, growing western country as well to-day as I did when I sought it ten years ago; and yet I believe that I shall some time go East again to settle down. And as for Helen, I suppose that the very thought of going home one day to live would set her crazy with delight!"—turning to his wife.

"Try me, and see. I think my sanity would stand the test!" was her reply. "I like the West quite as well as you, James."

"Oh, I had an answer to the advertisement to-day!" he said, suddenly. "Fanny's coming almost drove it from my mind."

"Did you? I hope you succeeded! Is she Norwegian?" asked Helen, eagerly.

"No; an ebony lady from Dixie: in other words, a contraband just from Memphis, who sports the gayest turban, and professes a knowledge of cooking, washing, and ironing, she having been a house-servant. She said she wanted a situation—somebody told her I had advertised—and I bade her call round to see you this evening. So if you like her, you'd better engage her."

"Black are usually the best cooks," said Helen; "and a great many of these contrabands are hiring out in the North. I shall probably take her." And regarding the thing as settled, she led the way up to the parlor, feeling as if a great load had been lifted from her shoulders.

But l'homme proposes, and le Dieu disposes. The evening passed, and the turbaned contraband did not make her appearance; and next morning it appeared that she had departed on the early train for the great Queen City, to congregate with the hundreds of her race whom the turmoil of the war had cast up there. The crowded city invited; and sable, gay-turbaned Cressy could not limit her ambitious ideas to a residence in the comparative quiet of Prairieville. And, doubtless, to this day neat-handed Cressy flourishes the duster or presides in the kitchen of a palatial mansion on "the Avenue" in common with her ebony sisters and brothers.

"Misfortunes never come singly;" nor did disappointments at this juncture to Helen Vining. The next claimant for the position of housemaid appeared in the person of Bridget O'Shannessey—a middle-aged, sour-visaged daughter of Erin, who faithfully stipulated to take her place in the kitchen on the ensuing Monday morning, and there perform her duties for the sum of fourteen shillings per week. But, alas! for the veracity of the Milesian lady! Monday morning came round; breakfast was over; a large boiler of water steamed over the wash-room fire, and the week's wash awaited the coming of Bridget. But nine—ten o'clock arrived, and no Bridget; but in her stead one of those convenient cousins, with whom the daughters of Erin are always blessed, who brought the tidings that, "An' sure Bridget was taken on a suddint with the sore eyes, an' it wasn't she that would be able to do the worruk at all—an' sure it's sorry she was; but the matther of it couldn't be helped, and Mrs. Vining could be afther getting another girrul."

"Provoking!" exclaimed Mrs. Vining, as she turned away from the messenger. "Her eyes, indeed! In my opinion, she don't want to live where there are children: she was so particular in her inquiries as to how many I had. If I had only known of this earlier! Well, I must send round again to-night for Mrs. Frisbie, and try and get her for to-morrow and Wednesday."

But this time the role of the washerwoman's engagements was completed up to Friday and Saturday; no other could be obtained; hence Mrs. Vining was forced to wait the turning of the wheel of events, and Saturday night came round ere she again looked upon a settled household. Meantime, it is almost needless to chronicle, that, when her Cousin Helen was engaged in the culinary department, Fanny Waterman kept good her threat of entering the commissary line; and very pleasant were the morning chats that mingled with the beating of eggs, the mixing of ingredients, and the various duties with which they busied themselves; while their evenings were given over to social visiting, music, or drives along the broad streets bordered with green cottonwoods, locusts, and oaks, or out on the wide-stretching, grassy prairies that skirted the town on every side.

Again the Star of Hope arose over Mrs. Vining's kitchen. This time it was in the shape of another flaxen-haired daughter of the laud of Vikings and Sagas, recommended by Mrs. Vail as the sister of the girl she had recently obtained.

"She has been over these five or six years; and, of course, must be excellent help now—very different from a fresh girl. I saw her last evening, when she came to visit Anna, and spoke of you as needing a girl; and, I think, if you will call round on me this evening, you may find her at our house. To-day she has gone out into the country."

That evening Mrs. Vining made it convenient to drop in at Mrs. Vail's, and soon had an interview with the desired "help."

At first sight, Helen was not favorably impressed. The girl's attire was quite too à la mode for her condition; and her whole bearing and mien savored too strongly of that manner whose mildest description is "independent," but which a lover of the plain English would have denominated "impudent."

"She will never suit me," said Mrs. Vining, mentally; but a thought of the deserted kitchen at home decided her to proceed in questioning her. "You are out of a place, I hear?" was her preliminary remark.

"Yes'm; though I might have stayed where I was, only the work didn't suit me!" replied the descendant of Thor and Woden, with a toss of her tow head. It was evident that a residence of six years in America had produced their indoctrinating effect of "equal rights" and genuine democracy."

"Perhaps mine might have the same result," said Mrs. Vining, with a quiet dash of sarcasm.

"Ma'am?" was the query, in a tone that showed that this remark was hardly understood in its full meaning.

"I am in need of a good girl," pursued Helen, unheeding her. "What wages have you had?"

"Fourteen shillings, always, ma'am; but nobody now hires out under two dollars. Things is riz these war times, ma'am. I can't work for less than two dollars in America."

Another glance at the gay, flounced valencia skirt, and the braided 'Garibaldi' valenced Helen that the sixteen shillings per week were quite necessary for the supplying of the Norwegian girl's wardrobe; but it was the girl's manner more than anything else to which she felt aversion. She did not make any remark for a moment or two; from which fact the girl, evidently deeming her position secure, and the lady's necessity her opportunity, took up in her turn the inquisitorial cue.

"Is your house convenient, ma'am?"

"Quite so. It has never troubled me much," answered Mrs. Vining, amused at the girl's thorough assurance.

"Have you good cistern water handy for the washing, ma'am?"

"Close by the back door," was the answer.

"Do you have plenty of milk? I like new milk, and always drank a good deal in Norway."

"We keep a cow. My children are fond of milk, too," said the lady, quietly.

"How mooch childrens have you, ma'am?" And, with this question, came the realizing sense that the Norwegian had an outlook for sundry small garments for weekly laundrying.

"Four," was the imperturbable answer.

"Babies, ma'am?"

"Our youngest is three," said Helen, beginning to bite her lips and curb her impatience; for she was growing to thoroughly dislike the girl's cool, nonchalant repertoire of inquiries.

"Then you are six in family, Mrs. Wining?" And the Norwegian rendition of Helen's surname came with a full, aspirated breath.

"Seven, just now," said Helen, with quiet malice. "At present I have a visitor stopping with me."

"Do you have mooch company, ma'am?" continued the girl, with stolid, imperturbable insolence.

Helen's moment had come. "As a general rule, no; and, if you should live with me, you wouldn't have much, either. But I don't think you would suit me at all," she said, with dignified, sarcastic manner, then quietly turned away, leaving the disappointed Viking's daughter to carry her wares of kitchen accomplishments to some other market.

"She would never do for my family at all, Mrs. Vail!" said Helen. "I know we couldn't keep her a week, so I wouldn't engage her. I like the appearance of her sister, your girl, far better. So I must be resigned and wait, like Micawber, for something 'to turn up.'"

The next day's sun revolved somewhat more auspiciously for Mrs. Vining. "Old Sauty"—so-called by the children of Prairieville, which corruption of name was very naturally derived from the cognomen bestowed by their fathers upon the one-limbed individual who came and went among their back yards in the occupation of wood-sawyer, more peaceful avocation than that his illustrious warlike antitype once flourished in ere he betook himself to his retreat in smiling Cuba—"Old Sauty," coming in from his labor upon a load of hickory at Mr. Vining's, communicated a bit of intelligence.

"I was over to Doc. Webster's yesterday a-sawin', and heern Mis Webster say she seen a notice in the paper as how your people wanted a gal ter work, and she must git time ter cum over to your place ter tell ye of one she'd heern on. Sez I, 'Mis Webster, ye kin send yer arrant by me to-worrow;' and so she said 'twas a Wisconsin gal, that lived with her own people out on Coon Creek—a right smart sight better nor a Norwegian, he reckoned."

"Thank you, Sauty. I'm much obliged to Mrs. Webster and you, too," said Helen, going up to her parlor to communicate the intelligence to Cousin Fanny, whom she found deeply absorbed in some specimens of fossils sent in for her acceptance by the Geological Professor at the Prairieville College.

"I think I'm on the trail of a good girl now, Fanny!" she exclaimed, exultingly. "Out on Coon Creek. James must have the horses harnessed, and take us out there to-night."

"'Coon Creek'—soil, alluvial deposit—carboniferous formation—bed, washed by clear waters—underlying strata, the product of centuries—clay stones—tracks in stone—other fossils. Really, Helen, I'm quite geology-mad; and while you are treeing this kitchen goddess on the banks of the creek, I'll be fully occupied in taking an inventory of the features of the country." And again Fanny turned to her fossils.

At the tea-table the expedition to Coon Creek was broached to Helen's husband. "The ride would be too long for to-night," he said; "we should not reach there before dark; but to-morrow morning we will take the children in the great carryall, and go in genuine western style for Fanny's edification. I want her to see all these classic localities by daylight."

With the following day came the projected expedition. A large carriage, drawn by two spirited horses in stout harnesses, bore the party through the streets of Prairieville and out over the broad undulating ridges of land that stretched away due west. To Fanny, it was a delicious, exhilarating drive. "The incense of the dewy-breathing morn" was on the air; a thousand songsters—the scarlet-winged blackbird, the golden robin, the field-swallows, fluttered and screamed around and overhead; quail, snipe, and wonderfully-tame prairie-chickens hopped close to the carriage-wheels and under the horses' feet; then, when apparently within hand's touch, darted away. And all the while the carriage rolled on over the soft grassy prairie, studded with gayest flowers, golden buttercups, crimson Indian warriors on their long, pensile stems, and a few large, late violets, looking up with blue wonder-eyes from their clustering companionship on some low, damp spot of black prairie soil.

And when they struck a swift-flowing stream, gliding rapidly on, with a rushing sound, as all western waters do, down in the "river bottoms," belted by rows of green willows and the dancing-leaved poplar, the grass took on a deeper emerald richness; the meadow-lark, startled from her nest by the horses' hoofs, soared up with a quick cry; the partridge's drumming was heard from out the wood; and the plaintive cry of the moaning turtle dove resounded on the air.

It was an experience never to be forgotten by Fanny Waterman—that ride across the western prairies; and the soft green richness of the soil, the delicious blue of the cloudless sky, the triumphant jubilate of bird-music, the blending of light and shade, and the loneliness of this region, far away from the city's turmoil or the bustling town, all combined to form a fair picture to be hung away in memory's gallery.

But the Ideal may not always hold us, and the Actual soon rose to our party's view. A little, log-built, one-story hut upon Coon Creek appeared in sight; and thither Mr. Vining turned his horses' heads. Long ere the carriage paused, a half score of frowsy heads protruded from the doorway; and then, after a brief reconnaissance, were as suddenly withdrawn, to be replaced by the comfortable figure of a matronly woman, who came out to receive the strangers.

The errand of the visitors made known, Mrs. Beals—for such was her name—returned answer.

"Oh, you want to hire a gal? Wa'al, Marier ain't home ter-day: she's gone over to the neighbor's t'other side of the bottoms; but I reckon she'd take the chance of going inter town ter hire out a spell. She ain't lived out much—Marier's only seventeen yet; and my old man, he kinder don't like the idear of any of our people workin' out. 'Siah's got a heap of pride and independence—too much, I tells him, for folks as ain't cleared the mortgages off of their farms; but, you see, Marier's gettin' to like new gowns and finery, and I tells her she must cut fodder for herself."

"You have several children besides Maria," ventured Mrs. Vining; an assertion corroborated strongly by the flax-headed troop that were peeping from the doorway and the one front window of the cabin.

"Lor' yes, a pile on 'em! Ten in all, and Marier's the oldest. I tells 'Siah I hopes the wheat crop will turn out good this year. They are all purty young. Now, there 're our neighbors beyond the creek—they hain't but three sons, and they 're all out fighting the enemy. I thanks the Lord mine is mostly gals in these times!"

"Not very patriotic, eh, Fanny?" said Mr. Vining, sotto voce.

"What 's the war news, Mister Vining? Is Vicksburg took yet?" now asked Mrs. Beals.

"My old man don't git hold of a paper oftener 'an once a week, and news is mighty scarce out on the bottoms here. We 're both strong Union, 'Siah and I; tho' I make him purty riled when he says he wishes we had some boys to send off to do some of the fighting, by saying it saves us a heap of worryment to think we ain't."

"No, my good woman. I'm sorry to say that piece of good news isn't confirmed yet. But we must be driving. You think your daughter will come to us without fail?" asked Mr. Vining.

"Yes, Marier shall come!" was the decisive answer, followed by the stipulation for said "Marier's" wages. "Mr. Hopkins, one of our neighbors, he's going into town to-morrow after some lumber; and he'll take Marier along. I reckon you'll like her a heap; she's a right handy gal about house, and 'll take powerful care of the children, being as she's been brought up with sich a pile on 'em. Good-day."

Pausing a little to quaff a drink from the pure sparkling water—which Fanny declared she must taste, since it flowed through a bed of limestone—our party again reiterated their parting salutes, and left Mrs. Beals and her "nine small children" to the silence of Nature and Coon Creek bottoms, arriving at home with sharpened appetites for dinner.

"Say, ma, I'm glad Maria Beals is coming to work for us to-morrow!" said Master Fred that night, as his curly head sunk on his pillow; and then he broke out, in his juvenile glee:—

"It must be now de kingdom coming,
And de year of jubilow."

The morrow ushered in the Beals dynasty. A long, lumbering, farmer's wagon set down "Marier" and two handboxes at Mrs. Vining's. Said handboxes containing her wardrobe, aside from the bright pink calico and the Shaker bonnet she wore. "Marier" was a stout, good-natured looking girl, remarkably avoirdupois in dimensions, and with a certain slow, heavy kind of tread that would have done credit to an emigrant wagon rolling across the Plains, Californiaward. At first glance it was evident that, though she might be ever so willing, it was doubtful whether she possessed the qualities of a good, trained domestic.

"I shall want you to do the plain cooking, and the washing, ironing, and sweeping, Maria. My pastry and cake I always make myself. Do you understand cooking meats?" asked Mrs. Vining.

"O yes 'm!" answered "Marier," with ready tongue.

"I doubt her capacities very much," said Helen to Fanny. "But she is young, and I can train her. And then I think a good deal of having a girl kind to the children when I want to go out and leave them."

But how vain are the best laid plans! Under "Marier's" sway everything went astray in Helen's household. The coffee was thick and muddy; the tea was steeped to inky blackness; the vegetables were overdone or water-soaked; the bread was heavy; and the meats, which she had proclaimed her knowledge of cooking, were unfit for mastication; while china-closet and pantry partook of the elements of discord.

"How is this, Maria?" asked Mrs. Vining, one morning as they came to breakfast, and the dish of steak was set upon the table. "Hav'n't I repeatedly told you not to cook steak too much; and yet you always serve it in this manner! Really, Maria, you must not bring us anything like this again!"

But the obtuse girl seemed utterly regardless of directions. An ever-ready "Yes 'm" was on her tongue; but still she pursued the even tenor of her way, serving up overdone meats and underdone bread, till Helen was fain to spend a greater part of each morning in the kitchen in the performance of the culinary duties.

"If I could only teach Maria anything!" was her comment, in a tone of combined annoyance and mirth. "But she is so obtuse! No way tractable! Why, we shall all have dyspepsia if she remains a month longer. I must find another girl! Even if she proved useful with the children, I should feel encouraged; but I find she takes quite too powerful care of them, for, so sure as I leave Katy alone ten minutes with her, she comes up, crying that 'Maria hurts her.' And yet I don't think she intends to harm Katy; but the fact is, she is so ponderous and unwieldy in her movements that, when she, good-naturedly, attempts to amuse her, she is sure to either stumble over her or push her down."

"Which facts, viewed in the light of geological discoveries, confirm the supposition that 'Marier' of Coon Creek is an undoubted descendant of the race of mastodons, who, at an antediluvian age, inhabited these western regions bordering on the Mississippi; and who, stalking abroad in ponderous majesty, crushed out all creatures of a lesser growth. Another important item for my journal," said Fanny Waterman, with great gravity.

"Well, of one thing I am very certain," laughed Helen Vining, "and that is, that all the bread she has served up to us since she came has been either heavy as our alluvial soil, or veined with regular stratas of soda; while our eggs and steaks are perfect fossils in hardness. I think I'll send some specimens up to the College for the cabinet. But may the Fates bless me with a good girl before many weeks more have passed!"

And Helen's prayer was answered. The overruling deities who sit above the presiding Lares and Penates of the household, directed a new order of things to supervene. By the merest accident, Mr. Vining heard of a capable, faithful, and experienced American girl, who was seeking a place; and, without delay, he engaged her, and sent her to his house. At the first interview, Helen felt assured that she had at last secured a treasure in the newcomer; and now turned her attention to the disposal of the incumbering occupant of the kitchen. But this affair was taken out of her hands by the very opportune arrival of Maria's father; who came into Prairieville in hot haste to recall his daughter.

"The children are took sick—some on 'em—and the old lady, she ain't very smart herself, and we can't git along without Marier! Sorry to disappint you, Mrs. Vining; but you see Marier's powerfully handy round the house, and harvest is comin' on, and we shall have a heap of work to do this hot weather."

And so the two bandboxes were duly packed: the pink calico, and the new hat trimmed with bright pink roses, and a white blonde veil were quickly donned, and "Marier" received the balance of her wages, mounted the long lumber wagon, and accompanied her father homeward over the prairie toward the river bottoms.

"I feel as if all the Coon Creek country was off my shoulders, now I have got rid of that unwieldy Maria!" said Mrs. Vining; while Master Freddy just then made his appearance from the morning session of school, singing, with all the strength of his lungs, "The battle-cry of Freedom."

It perhaps seems needless to chronicle that, after this, the tide of domestic affairs ran smoothly with Helen Vining. The new girl proved all that she claimed to be; good, healthy viands were served at table; order and system reigned in the household; and Helen found abundant leisure, aside from her customary home duties, to contribute to the enjoyment of the remnant of her cousin's visit.

Several weeks passed delightfully to Fanny

Waterman, during which she met cultivated people, and visited interesting and pleasant localities; and when the autumn brought her again to her eastern home, she bore thither fragrant memories of the young, vigorous, and large hearted West.

A few months later, perusing a letter which bore the distant Prairieville post-mark, she smiled at a sentence which followed Helen Vining's congratulations on her approaching marriage with Dana Etheridge: "I hope, Fan, when you come to housekeeping, you will be spared such experiences with 'help' as I had at the time of your visit West."

WIDOWS: PART VII.

MINISTERS' WIDOWS.

Servant of God, well done!

Thy glorious warfare's past,
The battle's fought, the race is won,
And thou art crowned at last.—WESLEY.

The Church shall guard thy little ones,
Thy wife shall be her care;
Once thou for us didst labor here,
We now thy burden bear.

HAPPEN into any church you choose on a Sunday morning, and you will find the mass of the assembly people who have come together for any purpose under heaven but to worship reverently, hear humbly, and then go their way to do good deeds. It is a strange institution (as the boys say) that men who do not seem to care a straw for religion, as far as their own practice is concerned, yet feel it a necessity to have a man to pray for them and preach to them, and a suitable place in which these offices may be publicly performed. They make a sort of compromise with conscience by sitting week by week in a building where somebody offers the prayers that ought to come from their own hearts, and then makes an effort to wake their sleepy old souls to the solemn realities of eternal life. This is not a Christian invention. Heathen nations have always had their priests, their temples, and their public assemblies. It is not strange that men who are content to do their religion by proxy, never care to pay largely for this indulgence.

With the coming in of a purer religion, the honorable, truthful, self-denying Christian minister goes to his work, with his hands tied, as far as the means of gain are concerned, which formed the wealth of his less scrupulous predecessors. He is to depend simply on the voluntary offerings, whether occasional or stated, of the people, for whose sake, and in whose stead, he is to devote himself purely to a religious life. If there were no tares with the wheat, no bad fish in the net, if the church were made up of true and faithful Christians, then might the minister pray, and preach, and visit the poor and afflicted, without one care for his worldly substance. Willing hands would provide for him food and raiment; the rich would cast in of their abundance, and the poor of their poverty—glad offerings to him who stands in the place of his Divine Master, the Maker and Giver of all.

This is not the real state of things, as we every one of us know—we to our shame, and our pastor, probably, to his sorrow.

Say what you will about the large salaries of the few city clergymen, the parish priest is nevertheless the poor man among us. The talent and worth which give the city minister his position, would enable him in any other calling to be adding thousands to thousands in an ever-increasing capital, to belong to him and his heirs, without dependence on the good-will or pleasure of any number of men or women. That he is only a salaried man, is to him a great worldly sacrifice; put that salary at what figure you please.

As to the country minister, we need no words in which to explain his position. We all understand it too well. A gentleman by education and feeling, one who is expected to wear a reproachless black coat, and to have his hands free from the brown, stubby traces of hard work, he has yet to live upon less than the income of any thriving mechanic, or active counter-clerk. If he have a family, how on earth is he to provide them even with home-spun, and bread and butter? Let the author of "Sunny Side" answer this question in its length and breadth.

There is a sunny side to our hitherto sombre picture. The sacred profession is not with us a mere calling. It offers no temptations to worldly ambition. Our successors to the fishermen of Galilee, like them "know how to suffer and yet to abound, to be without all things and yet to be full." We are in no danger of that horror of horrors—a godless, pampered ministry.

But in our zeal for the purity of the church, we must not let the watchmen on our walls sink for want of food. Our soldiers must have their rations, or they, no more than others, can fight the good fight. A fair, ample support every congregation owes to its minister. But it is not of him we purpose specially to speak to-day.

Is it reputable, is it honorable for a church to half starve its minister living, and wholly starve his family when he is dead? The State has its pension for the widow whose husband has laid down his life for his country—an honorable provision, she feels it, a just tribute to the manly valor of the departed. Has the church militant no pension for the widows of her brave warriors, who oft "by the wayside fall and perish," worn out as much by the hardships of the march, as by the wounds of the stern conflict?

Those pale, earnest faces—they rise up before us to remind us of the band of young devoted soldiers of the cross, who have braved disease, danger, and death that they might win a harvest of souls. Theirs was not a wasted existence, though "few were their years and full of trouble!" Their crowns will be rich with stars, when the redeemed are counted in glory! But we turn to the young wives who mourn their loss. Has the church no hand of pity to stretch out to them? She has taken their best for her vanguard—has she nought for them but the dead bodies of their hero-husbands?

The hoary-headed saint has gone down to the tomb. More than half a century he has ministered at the altar; and now, full of years and good deeds, he is numbered with the dead. Must his aged partner toil with those trembling hands, and begin the struggle for daily bread? Is there for her no pension—no kind provision for this time of need? Must she leave the dear old parsonage, and go, she knows not where? Must she find refuge in some squalid boarding-house, and wipe the tears from her wrinkled face where cold, curious eyes may look upon her?

That eloquent, bold, effective preacher of the Gospel is smitten down in the midst of his noble career. Victory and death are sounded for him with one blast of the trumpet. His very dying words have power to startle the insensible from their dreams of folly or gain. Even as his life-blood ebbs away, his triumphant faith, with a clarion sound, proclaims the truth of the religion he has preached. The church mourns, the very world gives in its tribute of mingled sorrow and praise. This is well; but where is the provision for the fatherless children of the glorified saint? Who steps forward to pledge a support for the poor stricken widow? She will bear on bravely while she can, and feed her little ones by efforts that consume her own life. She will not linger long: toil and sorrow, with rough kindness, will hurry her to that land where her husband awaits her. Whose, then, we ask, are those fatherless children? Those orphans have a claim upon the church, which she cannot escape.

We do not ignore the fact that there are scattered societies whose object is to provide for the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen. Such societies exist; but how are they sustained? How many families could be kept from utter starvation by their scanty income?

Scrimp, pinch, and stint your minister, if you must, but remember, even in open warfare, women and children are exempt from persecution. Be satisfied with making sure that your minister is not too well fed and clothed, and has nought whereon to feed his pride, or foster a love of luxury. Train him according to your own mean notions, but spare his wife and children the horrors of genteel poverty! Where is the rich widow who will give largely to establish a fund for the families of deceased clergymen? Where is the large-hearted, liberal man who would fain wipe the blot of which we have spoken, from the church of which he is a member?

Let it no longer be said that the private soldier, who dies unknown on the battle-field, is cheered by the thought that his country will watch over his dear ones, while the soldier of the cross must have his last hours embittered by the knowledge that certain poverty and possible starvation are in store for that widow and those fatherless children, whom the church should take to her bosom, and foster with tender, unwearying care.

A SIGH FOR THE ABSENT SPRING.

BY W. S. GAFFNEY.

A sigh for the absent Spring!

Ere wreeked by time's wayward hours!

A sigh for the hopes and joys which germed

In its bright, auspicious hours!

A sigh for the moments spent

In the vernal, perfumed bowers;

A sigh for the sweets which nature gave

To this beautiful world of ours!

A sigh for the heart-urned bliss

Ere wreeked by time's wayward hours;

A sigh for the dear ones borne away—

Life's sweetly breathing flowers!

Nay! sigh not for time gone by,

For the present day is ours;

Let's bask in the light of Hope's bright ray,

And feast in Love's sweet bowers!

And hope for a lasting Spring,

Beyond this drear world of ours—

When Sharon's bright rose forever casts

Its hues on immortal flowers!

BROTHER RICHARD.

BY GRACE GARDNER.

MARGARET RIVERS looked thoughtfully, half fearfully at the little morocco pocket-book she held. She dreaded to open and count its contents, for she knew that the draft upon it for the removal of her mother and herself, with their scanty furniture from a distant city, and for the necessary expense attending their establishment even in that small, unpretending cottage, had been greater than she had anticipated. But it must be done. She must now look the future in the face, bravely if she could, fearfully if she must. The small, delicate hands nervously unclasped it. Five, three, two—ten dollars then was all she had in the world, all that stood between them and want. Ten dollars! It was a paltry sum. A month ago she would have spent thrice as much, without a thought, upon any knick-knack that caught her fancy. This month! it seemed a century to Margaret in the lesson, never till then set before her, never learned, but in that time forced abruptly upon her, of sorrow and trouble—the power, the use, the need of money! But the hour of trial brings out many an unsuspected energy and faculty, and Margaret had not been found wanting, young, untried though she was. What had she not endured, not done, in that short period? Her father's sudden death; the inextricable embarrassment of his affairs; her mother's violent illness, resulting from the sudden shock of these sorrows; decisions and plans for the present and future—all these trials and responsibilities fell upon her inexperienced head and heart.

Poor Margaret! She had felt braver, more hopeful in the sunlight. While busy with the arrangement of their few rooms, a dozen vague schemes had floated through her brain, each of which promised maintenance for herself and invalid mother; but now, with the twilight deepening around her, weary almost to pain with the unaccustomed physical exertion, taking them one by one and analyzing them, bringing to bear upon them probability and common sense, they seemed idle indeed, and the many became narrowed down to very few. For the first time she began to question if they had done wisely to leave the city, where at least they were known, although their influence had gone with their wealth, and where a variety of labor was needed; but how could she disregard that one earnest pleading of her invalid mother, the only living thing left to her in the wide world. "Take me away from here, my daughter; let us go far away, anywhere, only let us go!"

Poor gentle invalid! Far indeed must it be to get away from that sorrowing heart from which she was trying to flee?

And Margaret, too, longed to get away from false friends, the scenes of her prosperity and adversity, and so they came quite by chance to this far-off village, unknowing and unknown. Was it wise?

Margaret gazed drearily round the small room, which was at once parlor, sitting-room, and dining-room; at its bare walls, save two or three pictures which would have brought nothing at the sale, and had therefore been retained; at the smaller room beyond, which served for kitchen; at the few plain, necessary articles of furniture within them, then sighed deeply, and with a feeling of utter despair she hid her face in her hands. With the movement the pocket-book fell upon the floor. It was far from weighty, but the fall sounded loud upon the uncarpeted floor. Accustomed all her life to carpets, in whose velvety richness and softness a footfall was never heard, she had not at first thought it possible to do without them; but necessity taught her better, and the last but one had been sold to furnish the means to come hither.

These two rooms were a contrast to the one adjoining, of which the door was partly closed, and which was set apart for her mother, where she could be free from all the labor and bustle which might surround the daughter. Not very costly, but very tasteful were the arrangements of that room, larger than either of the others. The affectionate daughter had retained all that was possible of her mother's favorite furniture and ornaments at the sacrifice of every personal bijou of her own.

Poverty might come near Margaret, might weaken, crush her, but never must it come near her darling, idolized mother, whose shattered mind and frame must ever throw all responsibility upon herself. Her regular, quiet breathing came to her through the half-open door, and she breathed a sigh of thankfulness that she at least was free from all anxiety. She listened a moment as if the sound was music, though sad, then was again lost in thought. Her smooth brow was corrugated with its intensity.

She had already summed up what she could attempt to do with any probability of success. She could teach a school if one could be obtained; but friends and influence, which she had not, might be needed for success. She could teach classes, or single pupils in drawing, painting, and embroidery, but that was subject to the same contingencies as the former. Failing these she could do plain sewing, but she knew how laborious and precarious that must be. Failing all these—Margaret stopped there with a shudder! A gentle voice now called her, and soon, worn out with grief, fatigue, and anxiety, she fell asleep.

She rose early the next morning. All her life she had been waited upon by servants; now everything done in their little menagé must be done by her own inexperienced hands. It was a bright spring morning. The sun shone in the room warmly and brightly, the birds sang cheerily, and Margaret, with the elasticity of youth and health, wondered how she could have been so gloomy and despairing the night before. The cottage stood upon a rise of ground; she opened the door and looked abroad over the village. It nestled like some clinging, loving thing to the bosom of a beautiful spacious hill. Surely, when all seemed so wealthy, so flourishing, there could be found something to do! The cool spring breeze sported with the rich, wavy tresses of the young girl, and sent a deep healthy glow to the beautiful cheek, and swayed the mourning robes round the slender, graceful figure; but still she stood there looking, hoping, till the water in the tea-kettle boiling over upon the stove top called her suddenly within.

After their simple breakfast of toast and chocolate Margaret set out on her errand. She learned there was to be an examination that very afternoon of candidates for the situation of teacher of the village school. At the time appointed she presented herself. Her style and manners were not those of a village maiden, and she attracted notice and curiosity. She passed her examination creditably, and was subjected to some scrutinizing looks and questions; but the situation was bestowed upon a buxom-looking damsel of some thirty years, who without doubt would make the somewhat refractory pupils of aforesaid school "stand round," as the committee man expressed it.

Successively Margaret tried to obtain pupils in either painting, drawing, or embroidery, but was unsuccessful in all, for unfortunately she had forgotten to obtain credentials as to her qualifications from her former teachers, and she knew not now where to address them.

Economical as she tried to be, it did not take long for her small sum of money to dwindle away. She succeeded finally in obtaining plain sewing, but was scantily supplied and poorly paid. She managed to obtain the bare necessities of life—that was all.

It was a summer of trial and distress to Margaret; with terror she saw the winter approaching. They had made no friends, no acquaintances. Poverty made Margaret haughty, unapproachable, while the manners of those to whom she had first applied for employment had not disposed her to regard the people of the village favorably.

While she was known to be proud and reserved, she was also known to be very poor, and people seldom forgive the two combined. There were noble people in the village who, if they had known Margaret, would have loved, respected, and befriended her, and whom she also would have regarded and esteemed; but it was no less true, and to their shame be it said, there were others who took advantage of her need to pay her but a tithe of the real value of her work, and Margaret, who, in her days of wealth, had always paid generously for labor of any kind, despised the meanness which took advantage of her poverty, while compelled to submit to it. The air of haughty superiority with which she received their niggard compensation galled her employers, and as the winter approached they grew less in number.

Margaret had casually noticed for some time that a portion of a spacious and elegant mansion, the grounds of which on the south adjoined that of the cottage, was being remodelled. Sitting at the window sewing from early morning till late at night, with only short interruptions, during which she prepared their meals, which now were forced to be very simple, she had carelessly observed it from time to time till its completion. For the last few days, boxes containing the most elegant and expensive furniture had been arriving, which she saw with a feeling of envy and covetousness which alarmed herself. Margaret loved the tasteful and beautiful; her eye for beauty and grace had been cultivated from infancy.

The next morning a plain but elegant travelling carriage drove up the carriage way to the mansion. An elderly, fine looking gentleman and a young girl alighted. The latter did not immediately enter the house, but stood on the piazza, evidently surprised and gratified with the situation and prospect. Margaret saw her face distinctly. She was pretty, but not what one would call beautiful. She looked happy, merry, but her principal charm lay in the good, kind expression of her youthful face.

Margaret learned in time that the house was the recent purchase of Mr. Leigh, a man of wealth and social position, a widow with two children, a son and daughter, the youngest of which was Anne Leigh, the young girl whom Margaret had observed. In less than a month everybody "in society" in the village, unless incapacitated by illness, had called upon the new residents.

Meantime Margaret sat alone, unvisited and uncared for, sewing constantly, and growing paler and thinner. The day now often came that she, not her mother, had only two meals a day; sometimes—she tried to forget it—only one.

Annie Leigh had noticed the fair, pale girl in deep mourning who sat so constantly at the window; her graceful head, with its wealth of black hair put plainly back from the low broad forehead, bent perseveringly over her work and the ceaseless plying of the needle, and seeing that she was a lady in the true sense of the word, and knowing as little of poverty as Margaret once did, wondered how anybody could bear to sew so steadily. Sometimes she saw the gentle, delicate mother—for such Annie decided she was—leaning upon her daughter's arm, walking slowly round their small garden; once she saw the younger stoop and gather a cluster of snowberries, and fasten them on her mother's bosom, and the elder laughed gleefully. The daughter also smiled; but Annie thought it, even at that distance; such a wan, forced smile.

Annie Leigh's interest deepened; and one afternoon she inquired of two young ladies who had called concerning this beautiful girl and her mother. They looked at each other significantly, and then Rose Huntley answered:—

"Nobodies, of course, though we know nothing of them except that their name is Rivers, and they came here in the spring, and moved into that cottage. Where they are from nobody knows. She is a seamstress; but such airs as she gives herself! My! Miss Leigh, you ought to see! I took pity upon their destitute condition, and gave Miss Rivers some work; but she will have no more from me. If she were a born princess, she could not be more condescending! You would think I was the one receiving a favor instead of her! They never receive any letters through the office, I understand; never go to church; altogether there seems something wrong about them."

"Perhaps," suggested Annie, "Miss Rivers cannot leave her mother, who is an invalid, I should judge."

"Crazy, rather!" replied Rose Huntley, in an unfeeling laugh. "At all events, I have done with them. Mamma is not willing that I should employ her longer; and if I withdraw my patronage, others will also, and I am sure I don't know what will become of them. Mamma says her pride ought to have a fall; that she never heard of such cool insolence to superiors as Miss Rivers is guilty of. And, as she has never seemed the least grateful, I cannot be expected to patronize her in preference to those whom I formerly employed."

"But, Rose, I thought you employed her because her terms were so reasonable," said her friend.

"Of course she could not expect to receive as much as those we have employed for years; but if she would work for nothing, I should not feel it right to encourage so much pride and impudence."

Annie Leigh gave a pitying look towards the brown cottage, and determined that she would take a piece of cloth to be made into sheets, shirts, or something that very day—no, it was Saturday; but the next Monday.

And Margaret on that night was to drink the very dregs of poverty. It was the middle of the evening. She had sewed from sunrise with scarcely any interruption, for she knew on the completion of that article depended their food and fuel for the morrow; but now she stopped. It was impossible to finish and return it at a seasonable hour. What should she do? She was out of food, money, credit, for she already owed the grocer, and he had rudely refused to credit her further. She had had but one meal that day, and felt faint and sick. Great heaven! Must they starve in a Christian land! Yes, she would starve willingly; this world was not so bright that she wished to stay in it. Better that this struggle, bitter as death itself, to sustain life were over! But her mother! Exhausted as she was with hunger and weariness, the remembrance nerved her. It was little at the best she had been able to do of late towards that idolized mother's needs, less still for her comfort; but the thin pale lips never complained. But that mother must not perish of starvation! Something for her life she must do! What? Should she ask for an advance upon her work? She knew this would be worse than useless; she would receive insult with denial, for that work was Rose Huntley's. Had she nothing she could sell? She thought over their small stock of dress and furniture. In a city, she could have pawned many things; but that was not to be expected in the two or three stores of the village; but it was their only hope, and she must try.

There were her mother's furs—the last gift of her deceased husband. She had shrunk from parting with them for that reason, and because she had thought her mother would need them in the winter; but there was no choice now. They were costly, and almost unworn. Perhaps the grocer would take them in exchange for groceries, and in payment of what they already owed him. She put on her bonnet and shawl, and taking the box containing them, hastened to the grocer's.

A gay group of girls, in the centre of whom was Annie Leigh, a short distance before her, were going to the same place.

"Just let me tell you"—Annie had said, as she met two or three young friends—"what a splendid housekeeper I am. I thought it would be so nice, and begged papa to let me take the care all upon myself. Papa laughed, and said I might try it this week, and just think! here it is Saturday night; papa expected every moment, and we are minus butter, coffee, chocolate, soda, and a host of other things. I have got the list in my pocket. The worst of it is, Susan told me this morning that they were needed; but I forgot. I was so ashamed I determined not to send any one, but to come myself. Come with me, will you, girls?"

They entered the store together, and Annie had already given her orders to the obsequious shopkeeper when Margaret entered.

Annie Leigh heard the low request to Mr. White, to speak with him alone, and the gruff refusal.

"Can't—busy; say what you've got to say here."

Margaret hesitated, then made the request that he would take some furs, at the same time taking off the cover of the box, in payment for what she already owed, and the remainder for groceries.

He did not look at them, but pushed the box towards her. "Didn't want them. What could he do with furs? He couldn't wear them, and his wife and daughter were not so poor as to wear second-hand clothing!"

Margaret, with the calmness of despair, explained that they were costly furs, as he could easily see by looking at them, and had been worn but a few times, and she mentioned the price paid for them.

He laughed incredulously and said, coarsely: "It looks suspicious, then, to say the least, for one in your circumstances who cannot pay an honest debt to have such expensive furs; but I want nothing of them whether they be yours fairly or foully."

The indignant blood surged to Margaret's cheeks, and the dark eyes flashed, while she drew herself up haughtily; but in time to check the impulsive, stinging words came the thought—her mother—their need!

She waited a moment, and though her cheek still burned, and her proud heart throbbed indignantly, she said, quietly: "They were my deceased father's last gift to my mother. If you will not take them, Mr. White, will you trust me for some groceries till I can sell them elsewhere? I shall be able to pay you soon."

He answered, roughly: "No, ma'am, I will not. I can't afford to support strangers, especially those who seem to take it as a favor to me. And, look here, the rest of that bill must be paid soon, or I shall take measures to obtain it."

The tone and words were such as admitted of no appeal. Margaret's hands were clasped for a moment, and a despairing agonized expression passed over her face, then she turned slowly, and with feeble, doubtful steps went out of the store.

Annie Leigh's bosom swelled with pity, sympathy, and indignation. She only had heard what passed. Her companions stood at a distance laughing and chatting merrily. Annie had longed to speak but dared not, and the tears started to her eyes as she marked the expression of Margaret's face at Mr. White's denial, and the slow, uncertain step.

"Mr. White, come here!" Annie Leigh spoke authoritatively.

The obsequious grocer came bowing to her word of command; the frown darkening his face for his poor debtor quickly changing to a smile for his rich but not more beautiful customer, but a trifle discomposed at the sharp, ringing tone that the sweet voice of Annie Leigh seldom took.

"Mr. White, send immediately to the house of the lady who just went out—Miss Rivers—a barrel of flour, keg of butter, some eggs, sugar, tea, coffee, chocolate (I know they must love chocolate, she said to herself), in fact, all sorts of groceries; then I wish you to make out your bill for those and what is already due you. I will pay it; and say nothing about it to her or anybody," she said, imperiously, the deep flush of anger and excitement on her fair round cheek.

The grocer comprehended that he had in some way displeased Miss Leigh, but he knew better than to stop to try to mend matters. He with his clerk went busily to work, they suggesting, Annie deciding. Mr. White, however, after the groceries were gone, as he handed Annie the receipted bill of her own goods said, deprecatingly: "If I had only known Miss Rivers was a friend of yours, Miss Leigh, I"—

Annie interrupted him by handing him the money, and saying, coldly, "I believe that is right, sir."

Miss Leigh was not good company for her friends during their walk home. She was thinking of a fact that she had noticed and wondered at—that she had seen no smoke coming from the chimney of the brown cottage that day. Now she comprehended it all; they had no coal, no wood, and the weather so cold! They must have it, but in this she would need her father's aid.

Margaret, after leaving the store, dragged herself wearily home. Apathy came over her, the apathy of despair! Nothing now was before them but starvation or beggary; the first by all means. She was weary of life; it would not be suicide. She had taken all means looked upon by the world as justifiable and proper, to live. Had she not toiled and struggled till the flesh indeed was weary and the heart faint? She had failed! She had come to that state, poor, weary, way-worn Margaret, that even the thought of her mother sleeping in the next room failed to rouse her. Benumbed with the cold, but unconscious of anything save her misery and despair, she still remained in the same posture she had taken when first she came in, her arms folded upon the table, her poor weary head bent upon them, the rich, dishevelled hair sweeping the table. Was the proud and beautiful Margaret Rivers indeed fallen to this? And thus time passed.

There was a noise of wheels before the door! What matter? No good could come to them save death, and thank Heaven! no worse. There was a noise of something and somebody on the door-step, a knock at the door, then another and another. Margaret neither moved nor answered; but the door was not locked, and was opened, and a man appeared with a barrel of flour.

"Where will you have this put, ma'am?" But receiving no answer he concluded she was asleep, and considerably placed it where he thought it ought to be, with as little noise as possible, then kegs, boxes, and packages followed. Before he went out, finally, he placed a folded paper softly on the table before Margaret. Life had been coming back to her during these minutes, though she had not moved, had hardly strength to do so. Hope sprang up afresh. The grocer had then relented—had perhaps concluded to take her furs! She dragged herself with difficulty to the dim light and opened the paper; she read a receipt from the grocer for the whole amount! She stared, and then the proud blood surged through her veins. Pride then was not dead, if life, and strength, and hope were almost extinct. Margaret Rivers an object of charity! It was only a momentary flash. Alas, Margaret's hunger conquered her pride.

She was searching—oh, vain labor!—if perchance a few stray coals could have escaped her eye, with which to make these things useful, when there was another knock, and a gruff voice asked "where she would have her coal put?" The receipted bill of that was also placed before her. On questioning the man, he only answered: "It was too dark to see; an' sure wasn't it yourself, ma'am?"

Later, when a cheerful fire diffused its grateful warmth over the chilly room, and her mother and herself sat down once more to a well-supplied table and partook of their favorite chocolate, she pondered over the matter, and tried to conjecture who their unknown benefactor could be. Who could thus have known all their need, and able and willing to relieve? Not a friend could she count in the village, much less one so generous and unselfish. Hardly able yet to believe it was not a dream, she glanced at their treasures. Yes, there were all sorts of groceries in large quantities, besides meat and poultry.

Margaret would not allow to herself that she felt humiliated at receiving what might be called charity. She said to herself that she did not, would not; that she felt relieved and grateful, and so she did; but, nevertheless, there was a little inward chafing, and a quickly formed determination that this unknown benefactor or benefactress must be discovered and in time repaid.

Monday came. Margaret had sat down at her favorite window to finish Miss Huntley's work, when there was a gentle tap at the door. She opened it, and recognized the pretty, pleasant girl who stood there as Miss Leigh, who, blushing, inquired for Miss Rivers. Having entered, she introduced herself, then said, with pretty hesitation, looking eagerly, yet a little timidly, up at Margaret:—

"Can I get you to make some shirts for my father and brother, Miss Rivers? I shall be very much obliged if you will. There is no hurry about them." She had sat down quietly while speaking, and there was so much gentleness and goodness in her face and manners that Margaret unbent from her usual staidness, as she replied that she would be very glad to do them.

With a laudable determination to make it seem really a business matter, Annie Leigh inquired her price.

Margaret hesitated. "Miss Huntley pays me twenty-five cents."

Annie Leigh looked incredulous. "I must have misunderstood you. Did you say twenty-five cents?"

"You did not. It was twenty-five."

The indignant blood mounted to Annie's temples.

"I expected you to say a dollar, Miss Rivers. That is what we have been accustomed to pay for more common ones, and is the usual price; but I was going to say that I should not be willing to pay more than a dollar and a quarter for these, although they are to be quite nice ones. Father and brother Richard are so particular always about their shirts; so"—she added, laughingly—"be sure, Miss Rivers, not to put in more than a dollar and a quarter's worth of stitches."

Generous, delicate Annie Leigh! willing to seem to drive a bargain to hide her own generosity.

"Nay, Miss Leigh; while I have made them for Miss Huntley at the price I mentioned, I cannot receive so much from you."

"I will leave it to my father," said Annie. "He knows the standard prices, and wishes me always to be guided by them. We are very near neighbors, did you know it, Miss Rivers? I hope we shall be more neighborly than we have been thus far. You have not called, and I am the last comer in town. I should be most happy to see you."

Rose Huntley, had she been present, would have expected to see Miss Rivers painfully embarrassed by such condescension from Miss Leigh. She would have been offended and surprised at Margaret's courteous, calm manner, as if speaking to an equal, while she thanked her, but replied that "her mother's health and her own want of time precluded the making calls."

"Do you love flowers?" Annie questioned of Mrs. Rivers, noticing a few withered flowers in a vase on the table near her.

Mrs. Rivers answered in the affirmative.

"We have a great many in the conservatory, more than we know what to do with," Annie remarked; but she did not say she would send her any. Perhaps she feared they would be declined by Margaret. She had been gone scarcely half an hour, when a servant came with an elegant bouquet for Miss Rivers.

Annie made the shirts a pretext for coming in every day, besides she liked to be neighborly, she said, and she stayed longer each time she came, and was so merry, so artless, and kind, that Margaret's heart went out towards this good young girl, who on her side regarded Margaret with the most enthusiastic love and admiration.

Annie's friendship was of the active kind also. Her father's wealth and her own popularity gave her great influence. A word here, another there of the right sort and in the right place, and Margaret soon had plenty of work at a fair price. Rose Huntley had occasion to blush more than once with shame and mortification at her meanness with regard to Margaret, and it was well that she had. The lesson might prove profitable.

Margaret had locked both lips and heart upon the past, and Annie only knew from appearances that they had seen better days. This fact she never doubted. People with such manners and habits of refinement could not belong to their present position.

One morning when Annie was present, Mrs. Rivers, in going to a drawer to look for some article, took out a portfolio, and in doing so, its contents fell upon the floor. With characteristic politeness, Annie sprang to pick them up for her. Without intending to notice, she unconsciously did so, and exclaimed, impulsively: "Paintings! Oh, how pretty! May I look at them?" she exclaimed, with delight. Mrs. Rivers smiled assent. She looked at them eagerly, one after the other. They were pencil sketches, landscapes, and heads, both in oil and water colors. "How beautiful! Oh if I could only paint half as well! Who did them? I do so want to learn to draw and paint! I have been teasing papa; but there is no suitable teacher here; and we are so far from the city that he says no artist would be likely to have either time or inclination to come so far to give lessons. The teacher of drawing and painting at the Academy also has left, and they have not yet provided one to fill her place.

If they would only get one who could paint like this! Do you know who did these?" she asked, coaxingly.

Mrs. Rivers smiled as she answered in her low, sweet voice, "that her daughter, Margaret, did them long ago when they lived in the world, and he was there. Margaret was greatly admired then, and never did any sewing. Jane did all that for her. She wondered where Jane was now." And she called in a louder voice: "Margaret, will you send Jane to me? Where can she be so long? I want her to bathe my head," and the tone was a little querulous.

And Margaret, in the other room, instantly laid down her sewing, came to her, and said, soothingly: "Let me play Jane this time, mamma. I will do it very carefully." And she tenderly bathed the head, whose tresses, but a short time since a purple black, were now almost snowy white.

Annie, her face all astonishment, asked: "Did you do these, Miss Rivers?"

Margaret looked up at the question, saw the sketches. "Yes, soon after I left school."

Annie was silent some minutes; at last, she asked: "Do you like to sew? I should think it would be much easier to teach painting. I should much rather, if I knew how."

Margaret smiled a little sadly. "It would be easier and more desirable, certainly; but I was not successful in my efforts to obtain pupils when I first came."

"Oh, but they couldn't have known how beautifully you do it. There is—." But Annie interrupted herself. She had a plan in her pretty head, and after a few moments, took leave. That afternoon she was feverishly impatient for her father's return. But when he came, he was accompanied by her brother Richard, whom she was so delighted to see, after his long absence, that for some time she entirely forgot the aforesaid plan.

They were seated at the tea-table, and she had poured out the tea, and seen that they were helped to everything before she broached the subject which had so engrossed her since morning.

"I have made such a discovery, papa!" she began. "You remember how much I have wanted to take lessons in painting, and that you said there was no competent teacher here? And what do you think, papa? I was at the brown cottage this morning, and Mrs. Rivers happened to upset a portfolio, and I ran to pick up the contents for her, and so saw them—the most beautiful sketches, both in pencil and oil! And, papa, she—I mean Miss, not Mrs. Rivers—did them all every one herself. Oh, so exquisite! and, papa"—she ran on, almost out of breath—"I want her for a teacher; and I want you to speak to the preceptor, or committee, or somebody, to get her the situation in the academy to teach drawing and painting. The teacher left last week. Mr. Caldwell told me so. May I—and will you? please, papa."

Mr. Leigh and his son laughed heartily at her enthusiasm and volubility for answer. The young girl looked ready to cry at this conduct, instead of the hearty response she had anticipated. Mr. Leigh, seeing it, said, kindly:—

"I have no doubt, my dear, but that your pet seamstress is a good little woman, and understands her business well, and is altogether very well for her position; but as for her skill in painting, remember, love, that your eye and taste are, as yet, uncultivated. It takes a great deal of time and money, as well as a natural talent, to make even a tolerable artist. Does it seem reasonable to expect that this favorite of yours could have commanded all these advantages?"

"I don't know about that, papa; I only know that I think them beautiful, and I am sure you will say so, too, when you see them. I borrowed them of Mrs. Rivers, without letting her daughter know it, on purpose for you to show to the committee. I know you will like them. Will you look at them, papa?"

Mr. Leigh smiled, indulgently. "Very well, daughter; after tea I will look at them; but I am afraid I can only call them daubs."

Annie, however, still looked confident. Her brother had listened to the conversation with much amusement. He was very fond of his little sister, and very indulgent, who on her part thought there was nobody quite so splendid as "brother Richard!"—And, in truth, Richard Leigh was a noble specimen of manhood, bodily, mentally, morally. He was tall, dark, erect, with a quiet consciousness of power in eye and bearing. He measured himself by a high standard, and, though he knew he had not attained to the desired height, he had willed that the distance should be gradually and surely lessening.

Annie ate scarcely any supper; she began to be a little impatient of the length of time her father and brother sat at table; who, in fact, had forgotten all about the matter directly after she had spoken, and the latter was describing some incidents of his journey, when, chancing to glance at Annie, he observed her uneasiness and impatience. He stopped laughing. "But little puss, here, does not seem in a mood to appreciate my descriptions! What is the matter? Oh, I remember! We will waive this subject. The seamstress first, by all means," he said, good-humoredly.

Mr. Leigh echoed his son's laugh. "Excuse me, daughter, I forgot," moving back his chair. "Go and bring them. Come, Richard, you must share the treat."

Annie, looking a little ashamed of her impatience, went to get the portfolio; and, returning, placed it before them both. One could see at a glance that both the gentlemen felt that they were going to be bored, but wished to oblige the young girl. At the first, they both glanced carelessly as if desirous not to see defects for her sake; but the glance changed to a look of surprise, and, as they continued, to one of deep interest. Both were soon engrossed, passing encomiums here and there, with an occasional notice of some slight defect in design or coloring. Annie sat before them, silent with delight, and mischief sparkling in her eyes. She couldn't wait till they had quite finished. "Daubs! eh, papa?"

Mr. Leigh smiled. "Something more than daubs, my daughter; but this seamstress could not have done these. There must be some mistake, or she has deceived you."

"Papa, you ought not to say that, when you do not know her! I do." There was indignation and a good deal of dignity in the tone and words, which accorded ill with her childish face and lip, and her father's eye twinkled.

"Good, my daughter! Stand up for your friends—that's right. Well, if—mind, I say if—this seamstress really painted these pictures, I will endeavor to get for her the situation in the Academy. Whoever painted these is equal to that, if equal to anything."

"Thank you, papa, for all but the doubt. But I wish you would see about it this very night. You are not very tired—eh, papa? You see they may engage some one, and it would be such a nice place for Miss Rivers—so much easier than sewing; she gets so tired sewing all day. She never says so; but I know she does. Why, I should die, papa! Will you see about it this very night—that's a good papa!" And she put her arms round his neck, coaxingly, and kissed him.

"What would you do with this persistent girl, Richard? Would you indulge her? But you did not have the kiss; so perhaps you cannot judge fairly."

"If he says 'yes, that I ought to be indulged,' I shall perhaps introduce him some time to the lady artist—mind, papa, not seamstress any longer; but he will be certain to lose his heart."

Why did Richard Leigh's lip curl? Was it at the idea of losing his heart to a poor seamstress, or of losing his heart at all?

PRACTICAL LESSONS IN DRAWING.

SIXTH LESSON.

WE have now to consider the subject of "Outline," a most important one to a draughtsman.

A simple perfect outline is more valuable than an imperfect one, worked up with all the skill of a Vandyke, Wilkie, or Landseer.

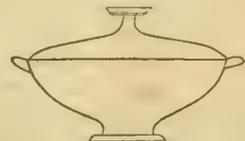

Many persons assert that the shading and filling up will hide some of the defects in a bad outline; but be assured that such advice is not only wrong, but highly injurious to tyros in the art of drawing; for opinions such as this are apt to undermine its right principles, and make beginners careless.

Outline signifies the contour, or the line by which any figure is defined, being, in fact, the extreme or boundary line of an object. It is the line that determines form. For example: the outline of an apple would not, if correct, convey an impression to your mind that it was intended for an orange or a pear; and if you look at Figs. 22, 24, and 25, you could not imagine that they were like the ordinary jugs in use.

Fig. 25.

Outline may be said to be the skeleton or anatomy of objects; at least, it bears the same relations to them.

Outline cannot be formed without the aid of curved and straight lines (see Lesson III.).

Of course, as you are now able to form lines of all kinds in any direction, and of reasonable length, you are already in possession of the alphabet of outline, and the rest depends upon yourself; for without constant application and attention you can never succeed.

Never be absurd enough to delude yourself, while you think you are deceiving your relations or friends, by tracing outlines against a window. The practice cannot be too highly condemned, because it is contrary to art, honor, and good sense; and so long as you continue the system, it will be impossible for you to depend upon yourself.

All marks of lines that assist in expressing the character of the design may be considered as belonging to outline.

There are many methods of producing effects by means of outline, besides adhering to variations of form in the figures. For example, the lines used to express drapery should be flowing, continuous, and generally of variable breadth; those used for the flesh or for some kind of fruit should partake of the same character; hard substances, such as armor, statuary, etc., should be expressed by uniform lines of a fine character; and the foliage should be drawn boldly, with occasional dark touches, and with a tremulous lateral motion of the hand. The figure of Psyche will assist the pupil in comprehending our remarks upon drapery and flesh.

Fig. 26.

Never jag your lines by making them by fits and starts; let the motion of your hand be free and uninterrupted, so as to form a continuous line; for, if the pencil is removed from the paper, a line like a saw will be the result.

We need not remind our pupils that there are extremes of outline as in other things; the one is too great a uniformity of line, the other too great a variation of breadth of line. If the subject is intended to be finished in outline, the pupil should strengthen one side more than the other; and we recommend that the outline etchings issued by the "Art Union of London," which are excellent compositions, should be carefully studied and copied.

If the subject is to be shaded, the outline should be lightly, and not too firmly drawn.

We must remind the student in drawing that, to give a correct delineation of the human figure, it is indispensable to have some knowledge of muscular action. It is necessary that all the muscles, their purposes and functions, should be well understood; nor must osteology, or the bones of the skeleton, be neglected.

THE FADED FLOWER.

BY FLORA.

It is gone! and the dewdrop which oft loved to find 'Neath its half-folded petals a sweet resting place,
And was proud on its bowed head thus humbly to shine,
And laugh at the stars through the regions of space,
Falls now on what once was that flow'ret so fair,
Its dried leaves fast mingling with the dust that is there.

It is gone! and the zephyr which lingered to play
With the soft velvet leaflets that decked the frail flower,
And as it passed by steal its fragrance away,
And bear it far onward from bower to bower,
Sighs mournfully now o'er the lovely one's grave,
And lingers in vain for the fragrance it gave.

It is gone! and the sunbeam which sped on its way,
With warmth for its life and light for its hue,
And loved still to remain at the close of the day,
Lest the flow'ret be chilled by the dampness of dew,
Comes now but to lighten the spot where it lies,
And to mourn that, on earth, all that's beautiful dies.

It is gone! and the rainbow-winged humming-birds moan
That the nectar they loved has forsaken its cup,
That the fountain within with the flow'ret has gone,
And the sweet honey drop is forever dried up—
Alas, disappointment comes ever to blight
The fondest of hopes and the purest delight!

It is gone! and the painter had chosen that flower,
That his canvas might glow while its image he traced;
It is gone, and its loveliness cometh no more
His quick eye to please and his canvas to grace—
He saw it had withered, that death had been there,
And turned from the spot with a sigh of despair.

It is gone! and the poet thus bitterly spoke,
For he loved oft to gaze on the flow'ret's fair face,
While deep in his heart fondest mem'ries awoke,
And his thoughts wandered back into sunnier days,
Where warm, true hearts echoed the tones of his own,
But the flower has faded—the memories have flown.

It is gone! and we turn from the wreck of the flower,
As we turn from our hopes when they wither and die,
When dark, heavy clouds seem above us to lower,
And the bright bow of promise has passed from the sky—

To our aching heart's murmur this answer is given:
"Treasures fade not which are laid up in heaven."

THE firefly only shines when on the wing.
So it is with the mind; when once we rest we darken.

A TRUE GHOST STORY.

FOR THE YOUNG FOLKS.

BY K. L.

On last Christmas Eve I put on a large apron and went down to the kitchen to prepare a plum pudding for next day's dinner. The children, instead of being "Nestled all snug in their beds,

While visions of sugar-plums danced through their heads," crowded eagerly about me, begging that they might be allowed to sit up an hour longer "just this once," and help me pit the raisins.

"We'll be so good!" pleaded Johnny, the youngest son of our house.

"And I can do them so nicely with my new knife!" said Tom.

"I'm not sleepy one bit, mother!" urged Kitty, looking up at me with distended eyes.

"Nor I, either! Oh, do let us sit up, mamma!" put in little Minnie, adding, in an earnest, injured tone: "I've never seen a plum pudding made in all my whole life!"

This settled the matter; for Miss Minnie was nearly six years old, and her pitiable case required attending to at once. Permission being granted, the children gave vent to shouts of joy that brought Aunt Mary into the kitchen.

"Hurrah! Hurrah for the pudding! Hurrah for mother! Hurrah for Aunt Ma—"

Aunt Mary laughed her pleasant little laugh and held up her finger. "Hush! you'll frighten Santa Claus's reindeers so they'll run away with him, and we won't get any toys tonight."

"Humph!" exclaimed Tom, drawing himself up with dignity; "we don't believe a word about Santa Claus. We know better than that."

"Yes," chimed in Kitty; "we believe in the Christ-Child; there isn't any such man as Santa Claus. Grandpa says he has left the country in disgust, because the children have taken such a fancy to Christmas-trees."

"Shure thin," said Biddy, who was preparing the bowls and dishes for the pudding ceremonials, "an' what'll be the good uv hangin' yer stockin's on the three, if Santa Claus is after quittin' yez all?"

"Hal ha!" laughed all the little ones. "Stockings on the Christmas-tree! Oh, Biddy!"

Order being finally restored, the "pitting" and "stemming" commenced in good earnest; and, as a consequence, in the course of three minutes Tom had cut his finger; Minnie had spilled her cup of raisins on the floor, and all had their hands well besmeared, and their mouths full.

"Och, mum!" said Biddy, "where's the use? The children's fairly stuck together with the muss, and the flure's intirely spilled on me after all me scrubbin'." And Biddy despairingly threw herself into a chair by the range.

Anxious to make friends with her, so that they might not be sent to bed at once, the children crowded around her, and Tom, acting as spokesman, begged her to be good and tell them about Mrs. Maloney's pig, or something funny.

"Oh yes! do, do!" echoed all the rest, half smothering her with embraces.

"Och! Is it tell a funny story on Christmas Eve, now? Go 'long wid yez! Who ever heard of such a thing? It's the horrible kind, all about the ghosts and goblends, that belongs to Christmas, and they'd skeer the wits out of yez."

"Pooh!" said Tom. "I'd like to hear the story that could frighten me!"

"Would ye, now?" asked Biddy, with a wicked twinkle in her eye. "Pigs, indade! I could tell yez something about Mrs. Maloney, now, that 'ud stand ivery one uv yer hairs on end."

"Well, tell us!" cried the children, crowding more closely about her, all but Tom, who stood at the other end of the hearth, feeling very brave, indeed.

"Pshaw!" he muttered, "you might scare the girls, Biddy, but you couldn't scare me, never mind what you told us."

"Well," began Biddy, lowering her voice mysteriously, "yez must know that before Mrs. Maloney came to this country, she had a mighty hard quarrel, indade, with one of her payple. Did yez ever mind, now, a quare scar on the furhead of her?"

"Yes," whispered the children, all but Minnie, who was becoming rather sleepy.

"Well," resumed Biddy, "I'll tell yez more about that same in a minute. She had a mighty quarrel, I say, in the old country concerning the ownin' of the farm she was livin' on. Ye see Mистер Maloney—as fine a boy as ever lived, pace to his soul!—well, he left it all to his wife, and he hadn't been dead a month before his Cousin Mike came flusterin' around wid a law paper called a morragage, or something like that, and claimed the property hisself—the baste! And she—poor creature!—after payin' most everything she kud lay her hands on to the lawyers, was glad to get shet of the whole business, and come over to this counthry, with nothin' but the clothes on her back, and one chist; Mike, he livin' on the farm like a gintleman, an' she a-washin' and scrubbin' here in Ameriky by the day. Yez mind, now, how hard she used to work here last spring, while the house was a-clanin', and how lovely she did the ironin' wake afther wake? At last, in the fall, jest about a month back, what should come from Ireland to her but a letter from Mike, telling how he had jest died, in great trouble of mind an' body—"

"What! from Mike?" interrupted Tom.

"Och, how ye bother me! from one of Mike's payple, then—where 's the differ?—and tellin' how he had confessed he had sold the farm, and that the paper he had got it by was all a lie indade, and he frettin' to the last becase he must die widdout Mrs. Maloney's forgiveness; and in the same letter they send her fifty dollars that Mike left her on his dyin' bed."

"That was good in him," suggested Johnny.

"Och, good!" exclaimed Biddy, wrathfully. "An' what good was it, an' he afther almost breakin' the poor crayture's heart afore that? Well, she was plazed enough to get the money for all, as she told me herself, indade, here in this blessed kitchen, for she said it would get her many a little convaynience that, barrin it, she'd a had to do widdout; and that same evenin' she came to ask would the mistress let me go stop wid her that night, for she felt kind ov skeered-like to be alone afther hearin' uv Mike dyin,' an' he worryin' afther her. Well, your mother was willin', and thin Mrs. Maloney asked would I go home with her at oncet, and mind the place for her, while she went to just a store or two to get some things she was afther wantin' over Sunday. The payple of the house where Mrs. Maloney was stoppin', ye see, was strange to her, as she hadn't had a room there more 'n about ten days. Well," continued Biddy, dropping her voice to a whisper again, "I went back wid her, and thin she lit a candle on the table standin' in the middle of her room, and told me if I would sate myself for a moment or two she would just take a run in the street for the things she wanted. But I tell you she wasn't gone ten minutes before I wished meself out of it again. There was the quarest creaking noises goin' on yez ever heard, and the candle began to flare back'ards and forrards—so," said Biddy, as suitin' the action to the word, she accidentally extinguished the candle on the table beside her, leaving the large kitchen quite din, except in the corner where Aunt Mary and I were silently working.

"Wait!" said Johnny, who was becoming rather nervous; "let me light the candle before you go on."

"Och, what 's the matter wid ye?" chided Biddy. "Be aisy, will ye, and kape yer sate till I tell yez. Well," she resumed, "the quare noises got worse and worse, and the candle kep' flarin' wilder and wilder, until at last it went out on me intirely, and there I stud in the dark. All in a flusther, I made me way to the door, and, belave me, if Mrs. Maloney—bad luck ter her!—hadn't locked it by mistake and taken the key wid her! So afther gropin' my way about the room, and knockin' over the things tryin' to find a match, I bethought me to knock on the wall and find if there wasn't anybody in the next room that would push me in a match or two under the door, when—the saints protect us!—if I didn't hear the awfullestest groanin' a-comin' out of the wall that iver a mortal heard! So I just whipt the shoes and frock off uv me, and was under the bedclothes in the wink of yer eye."

"Oh dear! I don't wonder you were frightened, Biddy," said Kitty, as the children huddled more closely about her, and even Master Tom drew a few steps nearer to her, and sat down.

"Do yez, now?" whispered Biddy, confidentially. "But the worst hasn't come yet. Well, there I lay all gathered up in the bed, tryin' to kape the groanin' out uv me ears, when I felt somethin' pullin'—pullin' softly at the bed covers, and thin if somethin' warm didn't kind uv brathe over me face. Just as I was goin' to skrame out, Mrs. Maloney came bustlin' in, all uv a flusther for kapin' me alone so long; and I felt quite comforted-like when I saw the candle lit again. After she was in the bed, she told me how she had bin persuaded into buyin' iver so many things more 'n she meant to, spendin' tin dollars in all. 'And do ye know, Biddy,' sez she, 'it puts me all in a shiver-like when I think how I've bin spendin' Mike's money, and he moulderin' in the grave, widdout me ever forgivin' him at all, at all?' 'Och, don't be silly, Mrs. Maloney!' sez I, tryin' to comfort her, though I couldn't help shiverin' meself when I bethought me of the dreadful groanin' I had heard; 'don't be botherin' yerself wid such notions; Mike's got other things to trouble him now, I warrant, besides the likes of ye!' And so we got to talkin' about one thing an' another, until at last we both fell aslape."

"And didn't anything more happen, after all?" asked Tom, quite disappointed.

"Wait till yez hear, and don't be spilin' me story," said Bidy, mysteriously, adding, as she looked nervously around her, causing all the children instinctively to do the same: "Well, as I was sayin', we both fell aslape, and I didn't wake up till the middle uv the night. The moonlight by that time was a-pourin' in the room, showin' all the furniture and everything distinctly, and there, in the corner, I saw the black thing a-standin' that must ha' bin pullin' me bed-covers, an' it a-lookin' at me with glarin' eyes; and the next minute if I didn't see a sight that made me almost lape out of the bed wid astonishment. There, on a chair close by Mrs. Maloney's side of the bed, was—yez may belave me now, for I saw it with my own eyes—a skeleton! A skeleton, stark an' stiff on the chair, a kind uv leanin' over forninst Mrs. Maloney; an' she sleepin', only fur the snorin', like a young baby."

"Oh, Bidy!" exclaimed all the children, in a breathless whisper, "what did you do?"

"Well, I hardly know how it happened, but I somehow fell aslape, and me lookin' at it. But after a while, the wind a-moanin', or the groanin' in the wall woke me up again, and—"

"Was it there yet?" gasped Tom.

"Indade it was—just the same as before," returned Bidy.

"Did it come to reproach her, Bidy?"

"Is it spake, ye mane? Shure, Master Tom, how could it spake widdout a tongue; and did ye ever hear uv a skeleton wid a tongue? But wait a bit till I tell yez. Well, there I was lyin' lookin' at it, for I couldn't take my eyes off uv it for amazement; anyway, when the room gettin' lighter with the comin' mornin', Mrs. Maloney giv a start, and riz straight up in the bed—"

"And hadn't it disappeared by that time?" asked Tom, trembling all over.

"Never a bit!" answered Bidy. "But Mrs. Maloney didn't seem to persave it at first; so she jumped out of bed, and asked me wouldn't I hurry and get dressed to go with her to early Mass? The words were no sooner out of her than she turned suddenly and looked full at it. The next minute her hand was upon the skeleton, a-raisin' it from the chair, and it a-tremblin' all over."

The children clung closer to Bidy, and Tom managed to gasp out: "Well, what happened then? Tell us, quick!"

"Happened!" exclaimed Bidy. "Why, nothing—only Mrs. Maloney gave it a shake or two and put it on; and a very fine skeleton it was! It had thirty springs to it, and made Mrs. Maloney look mighty grand, I tell yez. But who'd a-ever thought of Kitty Maloney wearin' such toggery as that! But the fifty dollars had overcome her sinse intirely."

The children began to laugh, and Tom looked rather sheepish as he said: "Humph! I knew it would turn out to be something of that kind!"

"But the black goblin, Bidy, with the glaring eyes?" asked Johnny, not quite satisfied.

"The goblin!" cried Bidy, in mock amazement; "and did I say now it was a goblin? It was the black cat, ye silly crayture, that Mrs. Maloney kapes with her, in spite uv the torment that it is."

"And the creaking, Bidy, and the groans in the wall?"

"Och! sure I clane forget to tell yez what that was; that was a poor old soul in the next room a-rockin' in an old chair, an' a-groanin' wid the toothache."

"And Mrs. Maloney's scar," asked Kitty; "how did she get that?"

"Didn't I tell yez?" said Bidy, innocently.

"Well, that came from her tumblin' on the hot coals when she was a baby. But sakes alive! if it ain't strikin' nine! Go to bed wid yez, now; and you, Master Tom, don't be so aisy skeered with skeletons and such trash after this."

Tom was "missing" in an instant, and he confessed to me privately the next morning that he dreamed that night of a Christmas-tree full of skeletons, and Santa Claus dancing a jig around it, with a pipe in his mouth, and a funny hoop skirt hung about his body.

Bidy had her way for that once; but her "ghost stories" have been interdicted for the future.

CHEERFUL MUSIC.—The poet Carpani once asked his friend Haydn how it happened that his Church Music was always of an animating, cheerful, and gay description. Haydn's answer was: "I cannot make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts which I feel. When I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be easily forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

NEVER suffer your children to require service from others which they can perform themselves. A strict observance of the rule will be of incalculable advantage to them in every period of life.

BORDER PATTERN.

WHEN worked, this pattern will be found to be at once tasteful and showy. It is suitable for any piece of crochet or netting for which bordering may be required. For crochet night-caps it is very appropriate.

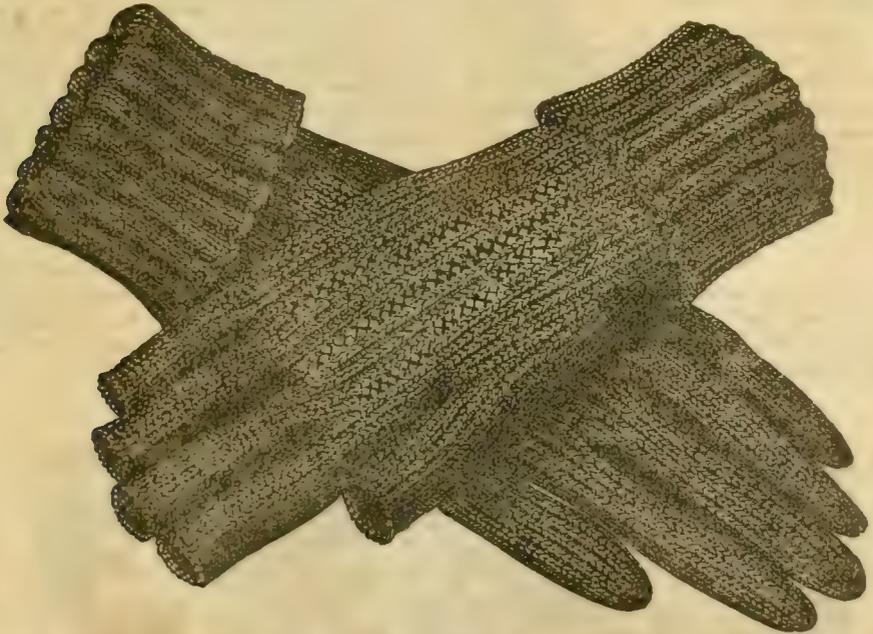

BRAIDING PATTERN.

HUNTING GLOVES.

They are to be knit with steel needles, and, as the plate shows, the right-hand glove has no tips to the fingers.

Set up 76 stitches. Knit 2 stitches right, and two wrong all the way round; continue to do so until you have 60 rows. Half of this knitting is to be turned over to form the double cuff. After the 60 rows, knit 2 rows right and 2 rows wrong, 2 rows right, 2 rows wrong, 2 rows right; then begin the glove. It is like the fingers: knit 1 right, 1 wrong; but the stitches must be twisted as you take them up to knit. Work now 3 rows of 1 stitch right, and 1 wrong.

4th row.—Widen 1 stitch, knit 3 stitches, widen 1, knit the rest of the row without widening. Knit 2 rows, widen again at the same places; but this time you have 5 stitches to knit between the widenings.

Widen at the same places 8 times. Knit 2 rows between each of the first 4 widenings; then knit three rows between each of the rest. This widening forms the beginning of the thumb. Now knit the thumb itself. Take up the 25 stitches which are between the widening stitches. Divide on two needles, and cast 8 stitches on a third needle. Knit 3 rows, narrow 1, stitch on beginning and end of the 8 stitches you have set up. Knit 3 rows, narrow the same way. Knit 2 rows, narrow 1 stitch on the end of the 8. Knit 17 rows, without narrowing, bind off.

Now work on again where you left the mitten, pick up the 8 stitches you set up on the thumb, and knit 4 rows, narrow 1 stitch on beginning and end of the 8 stitches; then knit 22 rows, without either widening or narrowing. Now divide the stitches for the four fingers, and begin to put all the stitches on two needles. Take another needle, knit off 10 stitches; take another needle, set up 12 stitches. Knit 10 stitches off from the second needle of the mitten, which you have not taken off yet. Knit these 32 stitches in a rounding. 1st row.—Narrow on beginning and end of the 12 stitches. 2d.—Narrow 1 stitch only on the end of the 12 stitches. 3d.—Narrow on beginning and end of the 12 stitches. Knit 25 stitches. You have now 25 rows; then bind off. On the middle finger take the 12 stitches up first which you set up on the first finger. Knit 10 stitches off the first needle, the same as on the other fingers. Take another needle, set up 12 stitches; take another, knit off 10 stitches on the opposite side from it, and knit in a rounding (there are 44 stitches), narrow the first 4 rows on each side of the 12 stitches on beginning and end. Narrow 4 in each row; in 4 rows 16 stitches. This leaves you 28 stitches on the finger. Knit 30 rows without narrowing, and bind off the third finger.

Take up the 12 stitches you set up for middle finger. Knit 10 off, set up 10, knit 10 off from the other needle. You have 42 stitches in this rounding; 4 first rows narrow on beginning and end of the 10th and 12th stitches. You will have 26 stitches left. Knit 23 rows, bind off.

For the little finger, pick up the 10 stitches you set up on third finger. Knit off the rest of the stitches you have on the other two needles, and narrow the first 3 rows on beginning and end of the ten stitches. Knit 19 rows, and bind off.

The left glove is knit in the same way, only the fingers must be longer, and have tips. On thumb of right hand you have 17 rows knit after the rounding.

On left hand knit 30 rows, then narrow off 6 times in 1 row. Knit 2 rows over, and end off the same as in a stocking. First finger, knit 36 rows, narrow off. Middle finger, knit 40 rows, narrow off. On third finger, knit 34 rows, narrow off. Little finger, knit 26 rows, narrow off. On the back of the hand work 3 rows of cross stitch in fancy colored zephyr.

RUSTIC ORNAMENTS.

HANGING VASE.

PROCURE an earthen flower-pot five or six inches deep, that is not glazed on the outside. Just below the brim (with a shoemaker's awl, or something similar) make two holes exactly opposite each other, that it may hang level. Find the length of cord requisite for its suspension, and fasten the ends into the holes by passing them through from the outside, and making a firm knot at the ends. It should be a strong scarlet worsted cord.

Spread upon the pot a thick layer of putty, and fasten the cones to it by pressing them into it. If there is a hole in the centre of the bottom, stop it up with the putty. Put a large pitch pine cone in the centre of the bottom and a row of acorns, or small cones around it. Put a row of large acorns around the top of the pot, with the points up; then a row of cups below them: another row in the same way at the bottom of the pot, but with the points downward. Now between these, half-way down the side, put round a row of large acorns, laying the point of each on the cup of the last acorn, and each side of these put a row of pine scales, laying the outside of them on the putty. These will form quite a wreath around the vase. Cover the remainder of the flower-pot with small acorns, cones, and scales. Give it two coats, or one very thick coat of furniture varnish.

When suspended in a window, with a myrtle or some other trailing plant growing in it, this vase makes quite a pleasing ornament, attracting the notice of passers-by as well as of those within doors.

CROCHET TRIMMING.

A NEW STYLE OF GIRDLE.

This girdle forms a pointed basque both back and front, with long ends flowing from the left side. It is composed of black lace, trimmed with chenille, narrow velvet, and a quilling of black ribbon.

CORNER FOR A HANDKER-CHIEF.

To be traced on the cambric, and worked with embroidery cotton, Nos. 50 and 60.

The outer wreath of this design must be worked in satin-stitch; the edges of the ribbon have the black lines entirely cut away, after the bars of overcast stitch and the English spots are worked. The small flowers are also in satin-stitch, as is one of the initials. The other is done in graduated eyelet-holes.

This design may be enlarged considerably, if desired.

We may notice, en passant, that collars, sleeves, handkerchiefs, and every other article of lingerie, are now worked in Paris in scarlet, or other colored cotton; whether anything can ever be so pretty as white we may be permitted to doubt.

THE WATCH PINCUSHION.

THIS pretty little article has much the appearance of a gold watch set with turquoise. It is made in the following way :—

Two rounds are to be cut out in cardboard, the size of our illustration. This is best done with the help of a pair of compasses, as it is necessary that they should be very exact. Then take two small pieces of maize-tinted ribbon, or gold-colored silk, and cut them round a little larger, so that they may well wrap over the edges of the cardboard; then fasten them on with stitches at the back all round, from one side to the other, so that they may be not only quite secure, but flat on the face, and smooth on the edges. Then draw in with Indian ink, the face of the watch, and sew on one small black bead in the centre. The figures ought to be very neatly put in.

When the two rounds of cardboard have been thus covered, and the face of the watch drawn in, the turquoise beads are next to be arranged round the edges of both, as well as in the central ornament at the back. Then a gold thread is to be taken and carried neatly in and out, according to the pattern, round these clusters of turquoise. The best way of securing the ends is to make a hole with a needle just under one of the sets of beads, and putting the ends through to fasten them down on the wrong side. Let it be understood that it is only the centre of the back that is now to be finished off with the gold thread, and not the edges of the watch.

Then take a few thicknesses of flannel, and stitch them through and through, so as to make them into a compact form; and, having done this, cut them round very accurately to the shape and size of the round of your watch. Be careful not to make this too thick, as it would spoil your work to have it clumsy, and flat watches are fashionable. Then take a very narrow ribbon exactly of the same color you have been using before, and sew it round the front of your watch; after which, put in your flannel, already prepared, and sew in the back exactly in the same way. The stitches should be very small, and a very fine silk ought to be used. It may, perhaps, be rather difficult to procure a good ribbon sufficiently narrow for the edge, as it ought to be rather less than a quarter of an inch in width; but it does quite as well to fold one in two, which makes it stronger.

When the watch pincushion is thus formed, it only remains to finish it off with what appears to be the gold setting of the turquoise. For this purpose, the gold thread must be taken and carefully carried all round the little clusters of beads, and on from one cluster to another, covering the stitches round the edge. The beads in our pattern are very small, and of a bright turquoise color; but if there should be any difficulty in procuring them of the same size, and some a little larger are taken instead, then it will be better to use only five, for fear of spoiling the delicacy of the effect.

It now only remains to take a wire button the size of the ring of the watch given in our illustration, and having cut out the thread centre, wind the wire ring round and round with the gold thread as regularly as possible, fastening the ends, when they meet, with a needle and the maize-colored silk, and without breaking off, sewing the ring on to the top of the watch, having before taken care that the joint of the ribbon which forms the edge shall come in the same place.

POINT LACE.

16. Spanish Point. Fasten as many threads of soft cotton on your work as may be required for the design, to give the work a massive or raised effect; afterwards work from side to side with button-hole stitches, which must be worked close together and quite smooth. The edge may be finished as occasion requires, with No. 8 or 9.

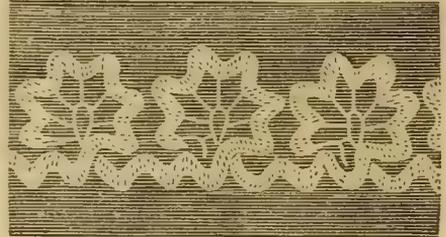

17. English Lace is made by filling a given space with threads crossing each other at right angles, at about the eighth of an inch distance; when all are done, commence making the spots by fastening your thread to the braid, and twisting your needle round the thread until you come to where the first threads cross each other, then pass your needle under and over the crossed threads until you have a spot sufficiently large; afterwards pass to the next one in the same way, until all are done. In filling a large space, they would look very well if the centre dot was large, and gradually getting smaller to the outer edge, or the reverse way.

18. Open English Lace is made in the same way as the last, with the exception that four threads cross each other, and the spots are only placed where the four actually cross; this has a very beautiful effect if the horizontal and upright threads are considerably coarser than the other two.

EDGING IN WAVY BRAID.

This simple little edging is formed by working seven stitches of point de Bruxelles on seven points of the braid, returning the thread through the loops of the stitches, drawing it up close in the centre, crossing the braid, and securing it with two or three stitches. Miss three points of the braid, work seven more points in the same way, repeating to the end; after which unite the points of the braid between each loop. The proper cotton for the point de Bruxelles is No. 20. The same pattern looks very pretty formed of a loop of nine points of the braid with the rosette lace-stitch worked in the centre.

Receipts, &c.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

VEAL BROTH.—Stew a knuckle of veal of four or five pounds in three quarts of water, with two blades of mace, an onion, a head of celery, and a little parsley, pepper, and salt; let the whole simmer very gently until the liquor is reduced to two quarts; then take out the meat, when the mucilaginous parts are done, and serve it up with parsley and butter. Add to the broth either two ounces of rice separately boiled, or of vermicelli, put in only long enough to be stewed tender.

FRICASSEE OF COLD ROAST BEEF.—Cut very thin slices of underdone beef; chop a handful of parsley very small, put it with an onion into a stewpan, with a piece of butter and a spoonful of flour; let it fry; then add some strong broth; season with salt and pepper, and simmer very gently a quarter of an hour; then mix into it the yolks of two eggs, a glass of port wine, and a spoonful of vinegar; stir it quickly over the fire a minute or two; put in the beef, make it hot, but do not let it boil; rub the dish with shalot, and turn the fricassee into it.

WINTER SOUP.—Take carrots, turnips, and the heart of a head of celery, cut into dice, with a dozen button onions; half boil them in salt and water, with a little sugar in it; then throw them into the broth; and, when tender, serve up the soup: or use rice, dried peas, and lentils, and pulp them into the soup to thicken it.

With many of these soups, small suet dumplings, very lightly made, and not larger than an egg, are boiled either in broth or water and put into the tureen just before serving, and are by most persons thought an improvement, but are more usually put in plain gravy-soup than any other, and should be made light enough to swim in it.

SHOULDER OF MUTTON.—May be dressed in various ways, but the most usual is to roast it nicely, and send it up with onion sauce. It is an unsightly joint; but the appearance may be improved by cutting off the knuckle, when it may be called a shield; it has more different sorts of meat in the various cuts than the leg. The bone may also be taken out, and the mutton stuffed; it is very good baked, and is frequently served upon a pudding.

TURNIPS should always be boiled whole, and put in much after either carrots or parsnips, as they require less boiling. When used in stews, they are cut into small pieces the size of dice, or made into shapes with a little instrument to be found at all cutlery shops.

They may be mashed in the same manner as parsnips; but some persons add the yolk of a raw egg or two. They are also frequently made into a purée to thicken mutton broth.

LEG OF MUTTON BOILED.—To prepare a leg of mutton for boiling, trim it as for roasting; soak it for a couple of hours in cold water; then put only water enough to cover it, and let it boil gently for three hours, or according to its weight. Some cooks boil it in a cloth; but if the water be afterwards wanted for soup, that should not be done; some salt and an onion put into the water are far better. When nearly ready, take it from the fire, and, keeping the pot well covered, let it remain in the water for ten or fifteen minutes.

BREAST OF VEAL.—Cover it with the caul, and, if you retain the sweet-bread, skewer it to the back, but take off the caul when the meat is nearly done; it will take two and a half to three hours' roasting; serve with melted butter and gravy.

SAUCE FOR ROAST BEEF OR MUTTON.—Grate horse-radish on a bread-grater into a basin; then add two table-spoonfuls of cream, with a little mustard and salt; mix them well together; then add four table-spoonfuls of the best vinegar, and mix the whole thoroughly. The vinegar and cream are both to be cold; add a little powdered white sugar. This is a very fine sauce; it may be served in a small tureen.

TO STEW ONIONS.—Peel, flour, and fry them gently of a fine brown, but do not blacken them; then put them into a small stewpan, with a little gravy, pepper, and salt; cover and stew gently for two hours.

BEEF COLLOPS.—Cut the inside of a sirloin, or any other convenient piece, into small circular shapes, flour and fry them; sprinkle with pepper, salt, chopped parsley, and shalot; make a little gravy in the pan; send to table with gherkin or tomato sauce.

Or: Cut thin slices of beef from the rump, or any other tender part, and divide them into pieces three inches long; beat them with the blade of a knife, and flour them. Fry the collops in butter two minutes; then lay them into a small stewpan, and cover them with a pint of gravy; add a bit of butter rubbed in flour.

BEEFSTEAK PIE.—Take rump-steaks that have been well hung, cut in small scallops; beat them gently with a rolling-pin; season with pepper, salt, and a little shalot minced very fine; put in a layer of sliced potatoes, place the slices in layers with a good piece of fat and a sliced mutton kidney; fill the dish; put some crust on the edge, and about an inch below it, and a cup of water or broth in the dish. Cover with rather a thick crust, and set in a moderate oven.

VEAL AND OYSTER PIE.—Make a seasoning of pepper, salt, and a small quantity of grated lemon-peel. Cut some veal cutlets, and beat them until they are tender; spread over them a layer of pounded ham, and roll them round; then cover them with oysters, and put another layer of the veal fillets, and oysters on the top. Make a gravy of the bones and trimmings, or with a lump of butter, onion, a little flour, and water; stew the oyster liquor, and put to it, and fill up the dish, reserving a portion to put into the pie when it comes from the oven.

BUTTERED EGGS.—Take three eggs, beat them up well, then add to them a gill of sweet milk. Place some butter (about the size of a large walnut) at the bottom of a pan, pour the mixture into it, and boil until quite thick. Pour it upon buttered toast, and grate some ham or beef over it.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

ALMOND CHEESECAKES.—Blanch and pound four ounces of almonds, and a few bitter, with a spoonful of water; then add four ounces of sugar pounded, a spoonful of cream, and the whites of two eggs well beaten; mix all as quick as possible; put into very small patty-pans, and bake in a rather warm oven under twenty minutes.

SPONGE PUDDING.—Butter a mould thickly, and fill it three parts full with small sponge-cakes, soaked through with wine; fill up the mould with a rich cold custard.

Butter a paper, and put over the mould; then tie a floured cloth over it quite close, and boil it an hour. Turn out the pudding carefully, and pour some cold custard over it.

Or: Bake it; and serve with wine-sauce instead of custard.

SOCFELES PUDDING.—Take two ounces of sugar, four ounces of flour, two ounces of fresh butter melted, the yolks of three eggs well beaten, the whites also, but beaten separately, a tablespoonful of orange juice. Beat the whole together, strain it into a pie-dish, which must be filled only half full, and bake for half an hour in a very quick, sharp oven.

SPANISH BUNNS.—Take one pound of fine flour, rub into it half a pound of butter; add half a pound of sugar, the same of currants, a little nutmeg, mace, and cinnamon; mix it with five eggs well beaten; make this up into small buns, and bake them on tins twenty minutes; when half done, brush them over with a little hot milk.

LEMON CREAM.—Two ounces of loaf-sugar, in lumps; with these rub off the yellow portion of a large lemon, and dissolve the sugar in two tablespoonfuls of boiling water; stir it till it is cool; then squeeze the juice of the lemon and strain it to the sugar; stir these well together. Beat the whites only of six large eggs till to a froth, then strain these beaten whites to the mixture of lemon-juice, sugar, and water; beat it well together, and simmer over a very slow fire for three minutes; then beat up a glass of sherry with it, simmer again till it is slightly firm, then put it into jelly-glasses.

ORANGE MARMALADE PUDDING.—A quarter of a pound of marmalade, chopped fine; two ounces of butter, melted or creamed; two ounces of white sugar, sifted; two eggs (the yolks and whites), well beaten and strained; one pint of milk. Beat all these ingredients together with the milk, then crumble three spongecakes into it; line a dish at the edge only with puff paste, and bake an hour.

KRINGSLES.—Beat well the yolks of eight and the whites of two eggs, and mix with four ounces of butter just warmed, and with this knead one pound of flour and four ounces of sugar to a paste. Roll into thick biscuits; prick them, and bake on tin plates.

BROWN CHARLOTTE PUDDING.—Butter a pudding mould well, and line it with thin slices of bread and butter. These slices must be cut neatly, and the crust at the edges removed. Take some good baking apples, and cut them as for dumplings, fill the mould with them, putting in between the quarters some slices of candied lemon-peel, a little grated nutmeg, and some sugar. Cover it with bread on which there is plenty of butter, put a small plate on the top of the mould, and bake it for three hours.

A CHEAP SEED-CAKE.—Mix a quarter-peck of flour with half a pound of sugar, a quarter of an ounce of allspice, and a little ginger; melt three-quarters of a pound of butter with half a pint of milk; when just warm, put to it a quarter of a pint of yeast, and work up to a good dough. Let it stand before the fire a few minutes before it goes to the oven; add seeds or currants; bake an hour and a half.

ARROWROOT PUDDING.—Take two tablespoonfuls of arrowroot, and two quarts of fresh milk, mix the arrowroot with a small portion of the milk, and when the remaining part of the milk has boiled, add it to the former; when nearly cold, add the yolks of three eggs well beaten, three ounces of sugar, two ounces of butter, and a little grated nutmeg; stir the ingredients well together, turn them into a buttered dish, and bake for a quarter of an hour.

A WELSH PUDDING.—Let half a pound of fine butter melt gently; beat with it the yolks of eight and whites of four eggs; mix in six ounces of loaf-sugar, and the rind of a lemon grated. Put a paste into a dish for turning out, and pour the above in, and nicely bake it.

THE TOILET.

HUNGARY WATER.—To one pint of highly rectified spirits of wine put one ounce of oil of rosemary and two drachms of essence of ambergris; shake the bottle well several times, then let the cork remain out twenty-four hours. After a month, during which time shake it daily, put the water into small bottles.

BANDOLINE FOR THE HAIR.—Crush the pips of the ripe quince between two pieces of paper; then put them into a tumbler of cold water to stand all night, when the water will have become glutinous and fit for use; drop into it a small quantity of spirits of wine, and a few drops of essence of rose, jasmine, or any other perfume.

Or: Take half an ounce dried quince pips, pour on them one pint of boiling water, and strain when cold. Should it not be sufficiently glutinous, boil it again, and pour over the pips a second time. Scent with rose, bergamot, or any other scent.

OIL OF ROSES FOR THE HAIR.—Olive oil, one quart; otto of roses, one drachm; oil of rosemary, one drachm. Mix. It may be colored by steeping a little alkanet root in the oil (with heat) before scenting it. It strengthens and beautifies the hair.

POT POURRI.—To make "a perfume of sweet-scented leaves, etc., for fancy jars." Mix half a pound of common salt with a quarter of a pound of saltpetre, a quarter of an ounce of storax, half a dozen cloves, a handful of dried bay leaves, and another handful of dried lavender flowers. This basis of the Pot Pourri will last for years, and you may add to it annually petals of roses and of other fragrant flowers gathered on dry days, as fancy may dictate. By the same rule you may add, if approved of, powdered benzoin, chips of sandal wood, cinnamon, orris root, and musk. A very excellent Pot Pourri may be made in winter with a pound of dried rose petals, bought at a chemist's, mixed with four ounces of salt and two of saltpetre, on which were put eight drops of essence of ambergris, six drops of essence of lemon, four drops of oil of cloves, four drops of oil of lavender, and two drops of essence of bergamot.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GOOD WRITING INK.—Gall-nuts, pulverized, twelve ounces; logwood, four ounces; sulphate of iron, four ounces; gum arabic, four ounces; vinegar, two quarts; water, three quarts. Mix well for a week, and then strain. Five drops of creosote added to a pint of ordinary ink will effectually prevent its becoming mouldy.

MAKING LARD.—Cut the fat up into pieces about two fuches square; fill a vessel holding about three gallons with the pieces; put in a pint of boiled lye, made from oak and hickory ashes, and strained before using; boil gently over a slow fire, until the cracklings have turned brown; strain and set aside to cool. By the above process you will get more lard, a better article, and whiter than by any other process.

TO PICKLE RED CABBAGE.—Choose a fine close cabbage for the purpose of pickling, cut it as thin as possible, and throw some salt upon it. Let it remain for three days, when it will have turned a rich purple; drain from it the salt, and put it into a pan with some strong vinegar, a few blades of mace, and some white peppercorns. Give it a scald, and, when cold, put it into the jars and tie it up close.

CANDLES.—Take of alum five pounds, dissolve entirely in ten gallons of water, bring the solution to the boiling point, and add twenty pounds tallow, boiling the whole for an hour, skimming constantly. Upon cooling a little, strain through thick muslin or flannel; set aside for a day or two for the tallow to harden; take it from the vessel, lay aside for an hour or so for the water to drip from it, then heat in a clean vessel sufficiently to mould; when moulded, if you desire to bleach them lay upon a plank by the window, turning every two or three days. Candles made strictly by the above receipt will burn with a brilliancy equal to the best adamantine, and fully as long.

TREATMENT OF HICCUP.—This may often be removed by holding the breath, by swallowing a piece of bread, by a sudden fright, or a draught of weak liquid. When it arises from heat and acidity in the stomachs of children, a little rhubarb and chalk will remove it. Should it proceed from irritability of the nerves, take a few drops of sal volatile, with a teaspoonful of purgative elixir. If it still continue, rub on soap liniment, mixed with tincture of opium, or a blister may be placed on the pit of the stomach, or sipping a glass of cold water with a little carbonate of soda dissolved in it.

CREAM PASTE.—Break two eggs in a stewpan, with a little salt, and as much flour as they will take. Mix in a pint of milk, and put it on the fire, stir it so as not to let it stick, till you no longer smell the flour; then put in a piece of butter the size of a walnut.

GOLD FISH.—These beautiful creatures, being originally from a warm climate, require to be kept in apartments of a genial temperature. The water in which they live should be changed daily, and should not be given in a cold state, but allowed to stand in a warm room for an hour before being put into the globe; this precaution may not be necessary in summer. The food given may consist of small crumbs of bread and small flies.

TO CLEAN KNIVES.—One of the best substances for cleaning knives and forks is charcoal, reduced to a fine powder, and applied in the same manner as brick-dust is used. This is a recent and valuable discovery.

PAPERING ROOMS.—Light-colored papers are best for bedrooms; they look clean and cheerful. Nothing that is dark and dingy should be chosen where light and cleanliness are so essential; and dark papers sometimes give the idea of dirt, when it is far from being the case. Closets, especially where dresses hang, should be papered; the lighter the color of the paper, the more easily are dust and cobwebs detected. In unpapered closets, chinks harbor spiders, and bits of mortar break away; but when papered, they are neat and clean.

MAKING SOAP WITHOUT GREASE.—One bar of common resin soap, one pound sal soda, one ounce borax. Dissolve the soda and borax in eight pints of rain or soft water; then add the soap, and boil until dissolved, when you will have, upon cooling, ten pounds of good soap, worth from eight to ten cents a pound, and costing only one cent per pound.

CEMENT FOR THE MOUTHS OF CORKED BOTTLES.—Melt together a quarter of a pound of sealing-wax, the same quantity of resin, a couple of ounces of beeswax. When it froths, stir it with a tallow candle. As soon as it melts, dip the mouths of the corked bottles into it. This is an excellent thing to exclude the air from such things as are injured by being exposed to it.

TO PRESERVE CELERY THROUGH THE WINTER.—Get up the celery on a fine dry day before it is injured by frost, cut off the leaves and roots, and lay it in a dry airy place for a few days; then remove it to a cool cellar, where it will be quite secure from frost, and pack it up with sand, putting layers of celery and of sand alternately.

ACCIDENTS TO THE EAR.—In case of very little insects getting into the ear, they will be immediately killed by a few drops of olive oil poured into the ear. If a child put a seed, a little pebble, or any small body of that nature into the ear, it may often be extracted by syringing the passage strongly with warm water for some time.

TO PICKLE GREEN TOMATOES.—To one peck of tomatoes add a handful of salt and enough water to cover them. Let them remain in this twenty-four hours. Put them in a kettle (porcelain lined is the best), fill up with vinegar, and set upon the stove until the vinegar begins to boil, and then set away to cool. When cold, set the kettle again upon the stove, and bring it to the boiling point. Then skim the tomatoes, and put them into a jar, fill up with some new, cold vinegar, and flavor with mustard seed, allspice, cloves, &c.

The same vinegar first used will do to scald more tomatoes in.

VELVET.—To restore the pile of velvet, stretch the velvet out tightly, and remove all dust from the surface with a clean brush; afterwards well clean it with a piece of black flannel, slightly moistened with Florence oil. Then lay a wet cloth over a hot iron, and place it under the velvet, allowing the steam to pass through it; at the same time brushing the pile of the velvet till restored as required. Should any fluff remain on the surface of the velvet, remove it by brushing with a handful of crape.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

A NICE apple-pudding, and one very convenient to serve, is made by making small round puffs of pastry, and baking them on a fat tin; then fill with stewed apples, nicely strained through a sieve, sweetened and flavored. For about a dozen of these, take the whites of two eggs, beat them to a froth, sweeten with four ounces of sugar; flavor it with white wine. Have a dish filled with boiling water on the top of the stove, and pour on this, froth, and let remain a minute or two until it hardens a little; then take it off the water carefully, and spread it over the apple puffs to answer as sauce.

TO WASH WHITE THREAD GLOVES AND STOCKINGS.—These articles are so delicate as to require great care in washing, and they must not on any account be rubbed. Make a lather of white soap and cold water, and put it into a saucepan. Soap the gloves or stockings well, put them in, and set the saucepan over the fire. When they have come to a hard boil, take them off, and when cool enough for your hand, squeeze them in the water. Having prepared a fresh cold lather, boil them again in that. Then take the pan off the fire, and squeeze them well again, after which they can be stretched, dried, and then ironed on the wrong side.

Editors' Table.

MRS. ALICE B. HAVEN.

DEATH! What is it to the loving, trusting Christian woman but a glorious life of bliss begun in Heaven, never to be shadowed, never interrupted, never ended!

"Of all the thoughts of God that are Borne inward unto souls afar,
Along the Psalmist's music deep,
Now tell me if that any is,
For gift or grace, surpassing this—
'He giveth His beloved sleep!'"

Thus came to our thought the beautiful poem of the late Mrs. Browning, when the intelligence reached us that a sister spirit had departed from our sphere; and we felt that Alice B. Haven's pure soul had joined the innumerable company of the redeemed.

We have known and loved "Cousin Alice" since she came a child-bride to Philadelphia, known her in private life, and intimately in her writings; she has been an invaluable contributor to the Lady's Book, and her loss will be mourned in thousands of homes in our land where her name was a household word of joy; therefore, it is fitting that we give her memory an honored place in our Table this month; in the next number her biography will appear.

Mrs. Haven was a pattern of such perfect excellence in all her duties that goodness seemed her natural element of life on earth; to follow her Saviour's precepts and "do His will" was so evidently her delight, that even her genius seemed plety at play with childhood, rejoicing always in the happiness it conferred, not in the fame it gained. Among the many American ladies who have made literature a profession, or, at least, a recreation, there is no one whose usefulness and excellence can be more thoroughly admitted. Whether she wrote for the young or for the mature, Mrs. Haven always proposed to herself some principle to illustrate, or some lesson to teach; and this lesson or this principle was set forth with such clearness and kindness that no reader could mistake the meaning or resist the impression she intended to convey. At the same time her bright fancy gave an irresistible charm to the wisdom of her lessons, making goodness appear, as it always should be portrayed, beautiful and attractive in its influences on human life and happiness.

Mrs. Haven had that rare qualification—or rather special gift—of seeing and appreciating the beauty of simplicity. Her style was always free from imitations, exaggerations, and tinsel epithets. It was easy to understand her meaning, and yet her penetration of motives was wonderfully acute, and her delineations of character true to nature. She also knew how "to point a moral," without poisoning the arrow of truth; and her playful wit was never spoiled by any caustic bitterness of sarcasm in the humor. It was evident that she aimed to correct errors of opinion or faults of conduct, and yet not wound, personally, those who might feel the reproof. In all her writings the tenderness and hopefulness of the loving woman seem to have governed her feelings, while her steadfast faith in Christ exalted her genius, and the study of God's Word so enlightened her understanding that her productions have been eminently successful in their good influence on the popular mind.

Does it not seem an inexplicable Providence that Mrs. Haven should have been called away from this field of her great usefulness at the early age of thirty-five—a period when many distinguished writers have only entered on their career? But she began her work so early in youth that her laborious years seem like a long life.

In the varied changes in her lot, married, widowed, remarried, and the mother of five children, with all the joys, sorrows, struggles, disappointments, and successes which marked the brief period of her sojourn on earth, three qualities of character were developed that are only found united in the purest heroic natures: a well-balanced mind that can discern the right way, a conscientious soul that resolutely seeks to perform its duties; and a self-sacrificing heart that can find its own happiness in making the happiness of others. These qualities, or virtues, and their results are the sum of all that Mrs. Haven has done and won. She was discreet, faithful, humble; she had won a good eminence in this life, and, as we hope and believe, she has "received a crown of glory," laid up for those who love the Lord Jesus Christ and do His will.

Here, then, the worth and beauty of the life and writings of this excellent and lovely woman are made clear. All our young aspirants for literary fame would do well to study the example of a literary lady so gifted, yet so childlike in her unpretending simplicity, and so angel like in her ministry to those who needed her services of love.

The power of Genius is undeniable. The glory it confers on its possessor is a mighty incentive to the highest human efforts for good or for evil in this world. How important, then, that the conditions of this wonderful gift should be rightly understood! Is the highest glory of Genius won by its greater mental power, or by its better moral influence on character and humanity?

"Bring me the Book," said Sir Walter Scott, as he lay on his sick-bed, adding, "there is but one Book!" He had ransacked the literature of the world. "Be good!" was his dying summary of the duties of life, and the worth of all human endeavor. Walter Scott began his literary career at the age of thirty-five; he made it the aim of his great genius to exalt hereditary power while seeking to ingraft his own name and lineage on the favored class. All his hopes and efforts have proved as vain and deceptive as are mirages of refreshing beauty to the traveller of the desert. That he felt the vanity of his aims when he called for the BIBLE as the only Book, and exhorted his son-in-law to "be good," as the true way of life, can scarcely be doubted.

May we not, therefore, claim that right moral influence on character and humanity is of more worth to this world, even, and deserving of greater praise, than the highest glory of mental power when not exerted for moral good? And among American writers of genius may we not give a deservedly high place to the name of ALICE B. HAVEN?

ANGLO-SAXON WEDDINGS OF THE OLDEN TIMES.

In Thurb's "Anglo-Saxon House" we find some curious information respecting the customs and manners of the people in those old times very significantly styled "the Dark Ages." Not till the ninth or tenth century did women have the privilege of choosing or refusing their husbands. Girls were often betrothed in childhood, the bridegroom's pledge of marriage being accompanied by a "security," or "wed," whence comes the word from which is derived wedding. Part of the wed always consisted of a ring, placed upon the maiden's right hand, and there sacredly kept until transferred to the other hand at the later nuptials. From this custom came, no doubt, the fashion of wearing the engagement ring on the right hand, which even now prevails. At the final ceremony, the bridegroom put the ring upon each of the bride's left-hand finger's in turn, saying, at the first: "In the name of the Father"—at the second—"in the name of the Son"—at the third—"in the name of the Holy Ghost"—and at the fourth "Amen."

Then, also, the father gave to his new son one of his daughter's shoes, in token of the transfer of authority which he effected, and the bride was at once made to feel the change by a tap or a blow on her head given with the shoe. The husband, on his part, took an oath to use his wife well. If he failed to do so, she might leave him; but by the law he was allowed considerable license. He was bound in honor "to bestow on his wife and apprentices moderate chastigation." We have nothing to show the exact amount of chastigation held moderate by the Anglo-Saxons; but one old Welsh law decides that three blows with a broomstick on any "part of the person except the head" is a fair allowance, and another provides that the stick be no longer than the husband's arm, nor thicker than his middle finger.

Such was the rule of the Christian husband over his wife; the laws of men setting aside or ignoring the law of God as promulgated by the apostle: "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church, and gave himself for it.—So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself."—Eph. v. 25 and 28.

THE SIN OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

We have before us a letter, from a sensible and patriotic young lady, beseeching us to advocate "an elegant simplicity" of attire, instead of the prevailing expensive fashions of dress. Our course has always been in favor of the former, as the young lady would find if she had read the "Lady's Book;" the patterns and descriptions given, and the modes of industry and economy suggested are intended as aids to household economy, enjoyment, and improvement. Still we know that the love of dress and display is too much indulged; that "it makes our women vain, artificial, and ambitious" (as the writer of the letter asserts), "and has made many honest fathers and brothers turn rogues and heartless speculators," we have no doubt. Therefore we give the paper selected by the young lady as

EXAMPLES WORTH IMITATING.

"English character and habits have an inherent dignity and solidity, which might be copied to an advantage in this country. They seem to have an aversion to anything like display on ordinary occasions, and find in simplicity a peculiar charm. American ladies are sadly deficient in good taste in dress. Many of them are never satisfied unless burdened with costly silks and jewelry for an outdoor costume, and foreigners are uniformly amazed at the promenade dress of our great cities. A recent visitor in England alludes to the habits in respect to dress and furniture which obtain to the first families there, and we know many husbands and parents who would rejoice if such habits provoked imitation.

"In the families of many of the nobility and gentry of England, possessing an annual income, which of itself would be an ample fortune, there is greater economy of dress and more simplicity in the furnishing of the dwelling than there is in the house of most our citizens, who are barely able to supply the daily wants of their families by the closest attention to business. A friend of ours, who sojourned not long since seven months in the vicinity of some of the lauded aristocracy of England, whose ample rent rolls would have warranted a high style of fashion, was surprised at the simplicity of manner practised. Servants were much more numerous than with us; but the ladies made more account of one silk dress than would be thought of a dozen here. They were generally clothed in good substantial stuffs, and a display of fine jewelry was reserved for great occasions.

"The furniture of the mansions, instead of being turned out of doors every few years for new and more fashionable styles, was the same which the ancestors of the family for several generations had possessed—substantial, and in excellent preservation, but plain, without any pretence to elegance. Even the carpets in many suits of parlors, had been on the floors for fifty years, and were expected to do service for another century. With us how different is the state of things! We are wasting an amount of wealth in this country on show and fashion, which, rigidly applied, would renovate the condition of the world, and humanize, civilize, and educate all mankind."

ENGLISH NOVEL-WRITERS.—This is the way British critics are commenting on their living novelists:—

"The same art which once glorified Fanny Burney into a celebrity all but historical, is now contemptuously treated by witty critics as a branch of female industry not much more important than Berlin wool; and it would almost be safe to say that, for every untiring pair of hands able to produce a Rachel at the Well, with pink lips and black eyes, worked in floss silk, you could find another equal to the achievement of a story in three volumes. This is what fiction has come to. Yet though we laugh at it, sneer at it, patronize it, we continue to read, or somebody continues to read, else even the omniscient Mudie would fail to crop the perpetual efforescence. Out of the mild feminine undergrowth, variety demands the frequent production of a sensational monster to stimulate the languid life; and half a dozen inoffensive stories go down in the same gulp with which we swallow the more startling effort. But even in its novels the English character vindicates itself. What is piquant on the other side of the channel is out of the question within 'the forty seas.' We turn, with a national instinct, rather to the brutalities than to the subtleties of crime. The horrors of our novels are crimes against life and property. The policeman is the fate who stalks relentlessly, or flies with lightning steps after our favorite villain. The villain himself is a banker who defrauds his customers; he is a lawyer, and cheats his clients—if he is not a ruffian who kills his man. Or even, when a bolder hand than usual essays to lift the veil from the dark world of female crime, we give the sin itself a certain haze of decorum, and make that only bigamy which might bear a plainer title. Ours are not the dainty wickednesses which are nameless before tribunals of common law. Even in his fiction the Englishman loves to deal with something which he can satisfy himself is an indictable offence. This peculiarity reappears in many a phase in the novels of the day."

GERMAN DRAMATISTS.—A German writer of celebrity (the author of "Debit and Credit") has written a treatise bewailing the want of a national drama, and showing the causes of this failure, which he seeks to remedy. He says:—

"There are not less than a hundred plays, probably, of a serious cast, produced every year in Germany, of which at least ninety perish in manuscript, without having ever been tried on the stage or printed at all. Of the remaining ten which do achieve a representation, there are not perhaps three that are capable of affording the spectator any real enjoyment. And yet among the numerous works that perish without having seen the light, if some are undoubtedly the feeble efforts of incompetent authors, many of them are the productions of able and highly-gifted men. This is a grave question. Has the absence of talent become endemic in Germany, and is dramatic life every dead among us, sixty years after Shakespeare. A more genuine representation of the kind of work which has been done in these times of considerable power, but poorer culture, and more excited, material with a strange awkwardness of plot and action which is fatal to the drama.

Thus we find that play writing has sadly degenerated in Germany, while novel writing is sinking in Great Britain. It seems that "universal education" does not awaken original genius; the more people there are to read the poorer is the mental aliment offered for their growth and improvement in knowledge.

FAITH, NOT SIGHT.

I press my winding pathway home
By faith, and not by sight,
Through long and tangled mazes roam,
From darkness up to light!
But in a maze, in darkness still,
The headlands of my hope
Lift high for me no sun-capped hill,
Nor shining southern slope;
To beckon on my weary feet,
And charm my waiting eyes,
Earth shows no certain way-mark meet
To guide me to the skies!
But while I try the shadow-lands
By ancient pilgrims trod,
Faith comes to place my trembling hands
Within the hands of God!
And like a timid, trusting child,
Led at his father's side,
I brave the night so dark and wild,
The world so cold and wide!
And feel I shall not go astray,
But singing holy psalms,
Shall safely mount the shining way
Into my Father's arms!

LILLIAN.

TROY FEMALE SEMINARY.—We have examined the last Report with much pleasure. One photograph of the Institution is all we have room for, but this is a deserved tribute to the Founder, which we must give.

"It is now fifty years since this institution first opened its doors to those young ladies who were desirous of receiving a generous culture, ere they entered on the duties of maturer life. In its inception it was under the charge of Mrs. Emma Willard, whose name is identified with it; and for one half the period of its existence it has been indebted to her watchful care and faithful efforts. For the remaining portion of its history, though not under her charge, it has still been an object of earnest and loving regard. It must have been with a pleasure, deep indeed, that she has watched its progress under her successors, who have conducted it since she resigned it into their hands. We trust she may long be spared to witness its continued success."

NEW YORK MEDICAL COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.—We have received a copy of the "Charter" of this new College, and find the names of many estimable ladies of New York City and State in the "Act of Incorporation." That it may be greatly successful is our earnest desire, nor will we doubt that those who have so generously begun the work will sustain it.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—These articles are accepted, and will appear as soon as we can find room: "Maud" (the other poem not needed)—"Bird Songs"—(The article entitled "Short Stories" is declined)—"Grieving"—"Our Mother"—and "Sonnet."

The following articles are not needed: "Autumn"—"Lost Hopes"—"The Bride's Ruin"—"Song"—"Carolyn Lee" (too long)—"Weary"—"The Dead"—"All is not gold that glitters" (we should like to oblige the trio of our young friends, if the article was really worthy of their names; when they have finished their best story they will thank us for declining this)—"The Magic of a Name"—"Shells of the Ocean"—"The Dying Girl to her Mother (the writer can do better)—"Alice Lande" (too long; the author can have it returned by sending five red stamps: six cents due on the package)—"Looking Back"—"Thanksgiving Day"—"Retrospection"—"My first Interview with an Authoress"—"Over the River"—"First and Second"—"Two"—"At Rest"—"July Fourth"—"Angel Whispers"—and "Our Lily."

"Morning, Noon, and Night," by Zadie. No letter with MS., and therefore do not know the author's intentions.

Other articles are on hand and will be noticed next month.

Correspondents wishing replies to their communications must be careful to inclose stamped envelopes; also send stamps, if a return of rejected manuscripts is required.

Health Department.

We take the following useful information, respecting a new and terrible disease, from that excellent work—Hall's Journal of Health.

DIPHTHERIAL DISEASE.

"Diphtheria is now a familiar household word; within a very few years, indeed, it had never been heard of by one in a million of the masses. Its fearfully sudden and fatal character, especially among children, makes it of the highest importance that those, at least, who have families should know something of its nature, its causes, its symptoms, and its cure. By examining a great many who have died of it, some general facts have been ascertained, which are of considerable practical interest. Neither chemistry nor the microscope has yet been able to determine that any particular structure of the body is uniformly invaded; nor have any characteristic lesions or destruction of parts been found. One thing, however, is certain: the whole mass of blood is corrupted, is diseased, is destitute of those elements which are necessary to health; it is of a dark, grumous, ugly appearance, filling up every vein and artery, stagnating everywhere, clogging up the whole machinery of life, oppressing the brain, and arresting the flow of nervous energy in every part of the system. No wonder, then, that it crushes out the life, in a very few hours, of feeble childhood, and of older persons who have but little constitutional force.

"The three most universally present symptoms of diphtheria in the child are: 1st, general prostration of the whole system; 2d, an instinctive carrying of the hand to the throat; 3d, an offensive breath.

"Children are almost exclusively attacked with diphtheria because it is a disease of debility—a disease which depresses every power of life—hence the weaker the subject is, the more liable to an attack. An adult has only to maintain himself, the child has to do that and to grow also; hence it has a double call for a constant supply of strength; and a very little deficit in that quality of the air which gives vitality to the blood, is sufficient to make it a fit subject for a diphtheritic attack. The few grown persons who have diphtheria have invariably some scrofulous or other weakening element. Neither a man nor a child in really vigorous health is ever attacked with it; they only suffer who are at the time deficient in stamina—have not the proper resisting power against the inroads of disease.

"There is no evidence whatever that diphtheria is 'catching.' The matter and breath of it have been introduced in the eyes, lips, mouth, arm, etc., of physicians who have generously hazarded these experiments upon themselves, without the slightest ill effects whatever. When several members of a family are attacked, it is not because it is derived one from another, but because of similarity of constitution, habits of life, eating, drinking, air, and other surroundings. It has not as yet been established that a stranger, going into a family where there is diphtheria, takes the disease.

"The treatment is a well-ventilated room, sustaining nourishment, and strengthening remedies.

"Diphtheria is not inoculable; prevails in every climate, in all seasons, and is equally at home in the princely mansions which line the spacious and well-cleaned street, and in the houses of stenchy courts and contracted alleys. It has no fixed course, may recur any number of times, but only fastens on the scrofulous or those whose constitutions are impaired, or have poor blood; the immediate cause of attack being the breathing of a faulty or defective atmosphere."

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

FROM PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

SHOULDER-STRAPS. A Novel of New York and the Army. By Henry Morford. The author of this novel has already attained considerable reputation as a pleasing and attractive writer of sketches. His present sustained effort will not, probably, detract from that reputation, though it can scarcely be said to have added much to it. The story is finely written in parts; but, as a whole, lacks in intensity of interest, notwithstanding it exhibits in its plot a strong tendency towards the sensational school. It is in this effort at sensationalism that Mr. Morford, in our opinion, has failed. His observations are shrewd and sprightly, if not always sagacious; his satire is keen and caustic; his sentiments frequently noble and well expressed; while his delineations of character are marked by skilful touches which give evidence of their having been drawn from nature.

SQUIRE TREVLYN'S HEIR. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "Verner's Pride," "East Lynne," etc. The fertile brain and ready pen of Mrs. Wood have added another romance to the number which already bear her name. This book is in no wise inferior to those which have preceded it, to which it, in truth, bears a strong family likeness. Though possessing no extraordinary merit, it is yet worthy of the attention of all who delight in light literature; and when once begun, its interest will carry the reader to the end.

FROM SMITH, ENGLISH, & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE YOUNG PARSON. The writer of this book has perhaps done well to remain anonymous. It is evidently a first effort, and there is a certain flippancy in its style which will not redound to the literary reputation of its author. The book pretends to no plot, and is simply a series of sketches of the first four years of a pastor's life in a country parish. Though there are many flaws in its excellence, it will not be found an entirely unprofitable book by such as choose to read it.

FROM GEO. W. CHILDS, Philadelphia:—

THE LIGHT AND DARK OF THE REBELLION.

One of the many books to which the present war is giving rise, and which never lack for readers. It is a collection of miscellaneous sketches, essays, etc., all relating in a greater or less degree to our national struggle. The author has evidently had an unusual opportunity for observation.

FROM J. E. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

O TEMPORA! What amount of truth this pamphlet may contain one brief examination does not enable us to judge; we can answer for there being very little poetry in it.

CHAMBERS' ENCYCLOPÆDIA. A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People. Parts 64 and 65. Only 20 cents a part for this most valuable work. The only Encyclopædia published with illustrations.

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

ROMOLA. A Novel. By George Eliot, author of "Adam Bede," etc. This lady author with a masculine nom de plume, has just completed her crowning effort. From depicting quiet scenes in English modern life, she has turned her attention to the past and produced a historical romance, in which figure some of the noted personages of the fifteenth century. Florence is the scene of action, and prominent among the actors is Savonarola, the monk and church reformer. Tito Melema, the hero, is an imaginary person, in whom, and in whose fate, is worked out the principle of that apparently harmless selfishness which attempts a life of ease, and avoids as far as possible all giving or receiving pain. Romola, the heroine, we scarcely expect to find greatly admired among common readers. There is a grandeur in her character which can only be appreciated by those who themselves approximate it, and which will, we fear, repel others.

THE BIVOUC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By George F. Noyes, Capt. U. S. Volunteers. This is a clear and concise narrative of its author's personal experience as a staff-officer in the Army of the Potomac, during the periods of its various operations, commencing with McDowell's occupation of Fredericksburg, in May, 1862, and closing with the celebrated "mud campaign" in December of the same year. As the writer confines its narrative to the relation of such incidents and events as fell under his own immediate observation, the reader need not look for grand battle pictures embracing complete views of those great contests which have rendered this portion of the story of the Army of the Potomac so memorable. Capt. Noyes, to use his own words, has sought "only to portray interior views of tent-life, common homely experiences, and the everyday personal incidents of camp and battle-field." In this he has exhibited a skilfulness that renders his volume one of the most interesting war books we have yet read.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia.—

VICTOR HUGO. By a Witness of his Life (Madame Hugo). Translated from the original French by Charles Edwin Wilbour, translator of "Los Miserables." The readers of "Los Miserables" will find this book a key to that remarkable work. Here are Marius and Cosetti identified with the youthful Victor and Adele, now M. and Madame Hugo. We are furnished with a faithful narration of incidents and events which we recognize as yielding material for Hugo's great romance; and other characters besides the two we have mentioned find their counterparts in real life. It is a book whose title will attract, and whose contents please.

HUSBAND AND WIFE; or, The Science of Human Development through Inherited Tendencies. By the author of "The Parents' Guide," etc. The subjects, arguments, and aims of this volume are such as cannot be justly considered in a brief notice. Their examination opens an extended field of thought and reflection, involving matters of the highest and deepest importance to the human race, morally, physically, and socially. We can, therefore, at this time, and in this place, only commend it to the careful and conscientious perusal of the fathers and mothers of our country, for whose enlightenment, warning, and instruction it is especially designed.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York:—

THE POOR GIRL; or, The Marchioness and her Servant. By Pierce Egan, Esq., author of "The Scarlet Flower," etc. We have not read this novel, yet we are sufficiently acquainted with the author and his style to justify us in saying that those who admire romances of the highest sensational order, but of third rate literary merit, will find something here exactly to their taste.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE AMBER GODS, and other Sketches. By Harriet Elizabeth Prescott. The stories embraced in this collection, and which originally appeared in a contemporary periodical, have already attained considerable popularity with a large class of cultivated minds. That they will ever become as "household words" with the great mass of readers is scarcely to be expected. With two exceptions, they are emphatically "art stories," deeply suggestive, rich in imagery, and gorgeous in coloring, but seldom attracting the healthier sympathies of our common humanity. The two exceptions to which we allude show very plainly that Miss Prescott can, when she will, give quiet-toned pictures of life and its incidents, which, though they may not enchain the fancies of erratic poets and painters, will nevertheless attain a wider and more permanent popularity with the great majority of those readers who, fortunately, or unfortunately, are not geniuses.

PHILIP VAN ARTEVELDE. A Dramatic Romance in two parts. By Henry Taylor. The thanks of those who love true poetry are eminently due to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields for this fine edition, in blue and gold, of Taylor's exquisite masterpiece. It is from the sixth London edition, published in 1852, and contains its author's latest corrections.

From J. C. PLUMER, M. D., Boston, Mass.:—

WHY THE SHOE PINCHES: A Contribution to Applied Anatomy. By Hermann Meyer, M. D., Professor of Anatomy in the University of Zurich. Translated from the German by John Sterling Craig, L. R. C. P. E., L. R. C. S. E.

THE MECHANICS, MECHANICAL ANATOMY, AND MECHANICAL DISTORTIONS OF THE BONY STRUCTURE OF THE HUMAN FOOT. By J. C. Plumer, M. D. We recommend this and the preceding book to the special attention of shoemakers, as the vast majority of people will probably, to all time, wear shoes of such shape as the makers provide.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR NOVEMBER.—We may term this quite a sensation number, for we give what the ladies very much desire. Fancy balls have been all the rage again this winter, and patterns of fancy dresses will be much in demand. To meet this, we give in this number nine colored dresses and five uncolored ones; but with descriptions so elaborate that any one can make a dress from the illustrations, fourteen fancy dresses in all. In a French magazine you may find one or two; but Godey has selected from all the French magazines, and our subscribers have the result. Besides the fancy dresses we give our usual variety of articles for winter wear.

"Friendship Endangered" is a steel plate of great beauty of design, and admirably engraved.

Our humorous engraving—"A Quiet Place wanted for a young Gentleman." Does he not seem to have got into the very antipodes of quiet?

We have devoted a great portion of our illustrated pages in this number to articles for fall and winter wear, both for ladies and children. The greatest variety of dresses we have ever given in a single number.

OLD TERMS.—It will be seen by our advertisement that we have gone back again to our old terms. We were forced to make a slight advance during a portion of this year, on account of the great rise in paper, and of every article connected with our business; and although but little change has been made in the cost of the same articles still we return to our old terms, which have always been so well understood by the public.

CLUB RATES WITH OTHER MAGAZINES.—Godey's Lady's Book and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Magazine, one year, $3 50. Godey's Lady's Book, Harper's Magazine, and Arthur's Magazine, one year, $6. No cheaper club than this can be offered. Godey's Lady's Book and Holloway's Medical Monthly, one year, $5. For Canada terms, see cover.

OUR CARD PHOTOGRAPHS FOR ALBUMS.—We are distributing these elegant pictures all over the country, from Maine to California and Oregon, and everywhere they are giving satisfaction. Why? Because they are of the finest quality: equal to anything produced. All orders are promptly mailed, and the cards selected with particular care. Liberal terms to those who buy in quantities to sell again.

SENDING SPECIMEN NUMBERS.—This business, to use a very expressive and common phrase, is about "played out." A party combines, and they get a whole year's numbers by sending for specimens. We have traced this matter up very clearly, and in future we send no specimens unless under peculiar circumstances.

MAKE UP YOUR CLUBS.—Remember that the Lady's Book is the best work for ladies published in this country. We have more than one thousand private letters testifying to this fact, and the press throughout the country is unanimous in saying that the Lady's Book is the best magazine of its kind in this or any other country. The difference in the club price of the Lady's Book and that of other magazines is only a few cents, and for these few cents you get nearly one-third more reading and engravings, besides other more expensive embellishments that a low-priced magazine cannot afford to give. Clubs must be for the Lady's Book alone, with one exception, and that is "Arthur's Home Magazine." One or more of that work can be introduced in a club in place of the Lady's Book, if desired.

Any person, with a very little trouble, can get up a club for the Book; we have frequently been so informed by ladies—the work is so popular. It is but to call and get a subscription. Clubs are always in time, as we are able to supply numbers from the beginning of the year; yet we like them sent in soon, to know how many we shall print. Remember, that a work with 150,000 subscribers can give five times as much as a work with only half that number, and the embellishments can also be made of a very superior character.

Our terms are made plain and explicit, so that they may be easily understood. We are often asked to throw in an extra copy. In no instance can this be done, as our terms are so low to clubs that it cannot be afforded. A shop-keeper would look amazed, if a purchaser should ask him to throw in an extra yard because she had purchased twelve. And yet we are asked to add an extra copy because twelve have been ordered. It cannot be done.

POSTAGE ON MANUSCRIPTS.—Please take notice! Our announcement that manuscripts sent for publication at newspaper postage it seems was somewhat premature. The Post-Office department, with that charitable disposition that sometimes governs them, especially if the decision is in their own favor (and by the way we never knew a disputed point decided in favor of the public), have decided that it applies only to manuscript sent for books, not periodicals. Is not that a nice distinction? So let it be understood that all manuscript sent for publication must have letter postage paid on it, and stamps for the same amount sent for its return. This is the decision of the first assistant Postmaster-General, in answer to a postmaster's inquiry on the subject:—

SIR—In answer to your letter of the 21st inst., I have to state that, in the opinion of the department, Section 24 of the new law refers only to "Book manuscripts and corrected proofs passing between authors and publishers," and was not intended to cover manuscripts from contributors to monthly magazines, newspapers, etc.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.—This very excellent and best of the $2 magazines is the only magazine that can be introduced in a club in place of a copy of the Lady's Book.

TAKE YOUR OWN PAPER.—Let us still try to impress this upon our subscribers. Take your own paper before subscribing to any other; it is a duty you owe, and one you ought not to neglect. If you want the Lady's Book also, take that in a club with your own paper. You will save one dollar by the operation.

ANONYMOUS INQUIRERS.—It is useless to write, we do not answer.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

The Musical Monthly.—The tenth and eleventh numbers, for October and November, are now ready; and the twelfth number, completing the volume, will be published next month. The tenth number contains one of Theo. Oesten's new and charming melodies; a beautiful new song; and a new and sparkling polka. The popular song of Beautiful Valley, of which we hold the copyright, is given in the eleventh number, as also another of Brinley Richards' favorite compositions, worthy the author of Warblings at Eve, and Floating on the Wind. In the twelfth number we shall publish, among other music, the popular ballad of Poor Ben the Piper, as sung by Ossian E. Dodge, and other vocalists at their concerts. The high standard of the Monthly, it will be seen, is faithfully kept up, and on no account will there be any diminution of effort or expense to maintain the character it has already won. We shall begin the new volume with a grand double holiday number, of which we shall have more to say next month. The price of the three numbers issued as above is 50 cents each, or the three for $1 00. Terms of the Monthly, $3 00 per annum in advance, and all subscriptions must be addressed to the publisher, J. Starr Holloway, Box Post Office, Philadelphia. Subscriptions may begin with any number.

New Sheet Music.—O. Ditson & Co., Boston, have just published a beautiful cavatina, with recitatives and choruses, Madre Pietosa Vergine (Mother, Merciful Mother), from Verdi's new opera, La Forza del Destino, price 40 cents. Also Letty Lorne, new song and chorus by Geo. Perren, 25. Keep this Bible near Your Heart, by the author of Annie Lisle, 25. We'll Fight for Uncle Abe, plantation song and chorus, by F. Buckley, 25. Wanted, A Substitute, a bagatelle that will no doubt hit the popular taste, 25. Within the Convent Garden (Die Nonne Von Umland) a song, the music by the great composer, Thalberg, 25. Also, The Lark, beautiful transcription of Heisser's melody, by Brunner, 25; and Merry Wives of Windsor Galop, by Alberti, 25.

Sawyer & Thompson, Brooklyn, New York, a list of whose popular publications we gave in the August number, has just issued another song, Mother Would Comfort Me, the words and music by Charles Carroll Sawyer, author of When this Cruel War is Over, etc., 25 cents. This also will, no doubt, become popular.

Brinley Richards' compositions are always favorites among piano-players. We have new editions of Floating on the Wind, Warblings at Dawn, and Warblings at Eve, by this popular composer. Each 35 cents, in colored covers, or the three for $1 00. Also, Variations of When this Cruel War is Over, by Grobe, 50. Magdalen, brilliant new fantasia, by the author of the Maiden's Prayer, colored covers, 40. Les Cloches du Monastere, favorite nocturne, 35. Maryland, my Maryland, transcription, 25. La Priere Exaucee, answer to the Maiden's Prayer, 30. Marche Militaire, by Glover, 30. Musings at Twilight, nocturne, by Spindler, 30. Moss Basket Waltz, 25. Down by the Tide, song without words, 15. Masked Ball Mazourkas, 25. The celebrated Shadow Air, from Dinorah, 30. An Alpine Farewell, one of the most beautiful little nocturnes ever published, 25. Volunteer's Quickstep, 25. Starry Night Galop, 10. Ingle-side Mazourka, 10. Camp Polka, 10. Silver Lake Waltz, 10. Lily Leaf Polka Schottische, 10. Gilt Edge Polka, 10.

Any music named in this column, or in previous numbers, will be sent on receipt of price. Address, as above, J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

We give the following extract from the letter of a lady in Illinois.—

"I can never repay you for the weary hours beguiled while perusing your dear Book. It comes like an old friend, and a true one—the same in adversity, in sickness, and sorrow that it does in sunshine and prosperity. Bless you for making it 'the true friend to the ladies.'"

"When living in a city, I considered it a perfect gem; but living in a country, far from any amusements or advantages, you know not how highly I prize it. Some imagine that the Lady's Book is made for the wealthy alone; but I cannot agree to that at all, for I am not rich, yet I own that I love to be neatly and becomingly dressed. God made this world full of bright sunshine and flowers. He made all things beautiful, and I think it our duty to look as pretty as we can. I think, with the help of Godey, any one with a fair amount of taste can dress nicely without any great expense. I make my dresses, trim my hats, make headresses, and many fancy articles from Godey. I do not see how any lady in moderate circumstances, who does her own work, can do without it. I have read it a good portion of my life, and hope to take it myself the rest of my days. I have never borrowed a number yet, and do not wish to lend. Yet many more eloquent than my poor words have sung your praise—still none can be more earnest or sincere."

A YANKEE poet thus describes the excess of his devotion to his true love:—

I sing her praise in poetry;
For her at morn and eve
I cries whole puns of bitter tears,
And soaps them with my sleeve.

S. P. BORDEN'S EXCELSIOR EMBROIDERY AND BRAIDING STAMPS.—We have often called the attention of our readers to these beautiful stamps. They have become so popular and so well known through the country that it is hardly necessary for us to make comments on their merits. There should be a set in every town. Dress-makers and dealers generally will find stamping for braiding and embroidery a very profitable part of their business, and in fact every dressmaker and milliner should have a set. Send and get a few dozen. Price $5 per dozen. Mr. B. furnishes (free of charge) all necessary articles of instructions, including inking cushion and pattern book.

All orders addressed to S. P. Borden, Massillon, Ohio, or his agents, J. M. Pickering, No. 96 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; Sylvia Harrington, Potsdam, N. Y.; J. M. Newitt, Chochope, Mass.; Grace Law, Dixon, Ill.; S. A. Childs, Titusville, Pa.; S. Adams, Battle Creek, Mich.; Mrs. C. Shattuck, Aurora, Ind.; Mrs. Julia Bosnell, Alleghany city, Pa.; Mr. G. W. Pickering, Columbus, Ohio; Mrs. N. H. Wellington, Kingston, Wisconsin; Mrs. W. Kohrke, New Orleans, La. Mrs. E. C. Borden is travelling agent.

INQUIRIES have been made of us who are the authors of the following articles: "John Broad," "Aunt Esther's Warming-pan," also the Charade in our September number. In most instances we do not know the authors, and if known we do not give the names without the author's consent.

HOW TO COLOR THE PHOTOGRAPH.—Messrs. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have just published a little manual on the art of painting the photograph, which is for sale at the bookstores, or will be sent by them, post-paid, for 10 cents.

We ask attention to our advertisement for 1864, published in this number. It is but a faint outline of what we will do, but will give some general idea of what the Lady's Book will be. In fact, it is hardly necessary for us to publish any advertisement. Our subscribers and the public know that we will publish the best lady's book in the world, and they have known us so long that they are willing to trust us, even without any promises on our part. We are thankful, very thankful for the patronage we have received for the last thirty-three years; and we can only add that, having found that fulfilling every promise made has been the best policy, that plan we shall still continue to pursue.

We do not publish medical recipes, but the following we clip from an exchange. We are willing to publish anything that may be considered a remedy for that most horrid disease—hydrophobia. But do not let any published remedy prevent you from sending for a physician.

HYDROPHOBIA PREVENTED.—The Progres, of Lyons, mentions a new remedy for the bite of a mad dog, discovered by a German veterinary surgeon of Magdeburg, named Hildebrand, by which the painful application of a red hot iron is avoided. This remedy consists in bathing the place bitten with hot water. M. Hildebrand has ascertained by experience that hot water has the effect of decomposing the virus, and, if applied in time, renders cauterization unnecessary. In that case, all that is to be done, after well bathing the part, as stated, is to apply a solution of caustic potash to the wound with a brush, and afterwards anoint it with antimony ointment.

S. OTT, 726 Broadway, New York, has opened what he terms "New York City Purchasing and Information Agency." We can recommend Mr. Ott to our friends for making purchases and giving information. He is the agent for the celebrated Boardman & Gray's pianos, Abbott's Piano Stools, Fasold's Patent Chronometer Watches, Boatman's Piano Tuning Scales, and of a hundred other articles too numerous for us to mention. Send for one of his circulars.

AN EXCELLENT BARGAIN.—It is reported that the Princess Alexandra when asked by the Prince of Wales for her hand in marriage, proposed to grant it for twenty-five shillings, which, said she, archly, is equal, you know, to one sovereign and one crown in England.

NOT A BRIBE.—We thank the Swampport News for the following:—

"When it is considered that in no instance has a bribe in the shape of a premium been offered, it shows that the Lady's Book stands first in the heart of American ladies, who subscribe for the sake of the work itself, and not for the premium. The illustrations this month are magnificent, especially the double fashion-plates, which are continued regardless of expense. No wonder Godey is the ladies' favorite."

LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS.—We now commence in time to warn our subscribers against sending their money to any association purporting to furnish the Lady's Book as part of the inducement to subscribe, and promising them great prizes in some future drawing of a lottery. We will not be responsible in any way. We will also add that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible. We only send the Lady's Book when the money is sent direct to us.

A LETTER FROM PARIS.

An unusual degree of animation marks this year the close of the gay season in Paris. At the Tuileries, the Monday family dinners of the Court have been resumed, followed by the Empress's soirées dansantes, at which social evening reunions the fair mistress of the mansion has latterly set an example of great simplicity of toilet, which the ladies invited have not been slow to adopt and emulate. On Monday evening last, the Empress appeared in a simple dress of white muslin of the finest texture, without other trimming than the long floating ends of a wide pale blue sash; her sole ornament consisted of eight rows of magnificent orient pearls round her neck, while branches of white lilac were tastefully arranged in her hair. Almost all the ladies present were likewise dressed in white tulle, muslin, or thulle; velvets, moire antiques, and heavier materials being wholly discarded, as well as such jewelry as savored too strongly of the heated atmosphere of the late winter's eute tainments. Instead of the gorgeous parures there displayed in such profusion as almost to fatigue the eye, flowers most suited to the season are now the sole ornaments admitted; and if a few sparkling diamonds do venture to show themselves, they must do so merely as adjuncts to the more simple imitations of nature, which it is the good taste of our fashionable ladies to patronize.

The last great display of diamonds and precious gems may be said to have taken place at the soirées given at Mme. de Megeendorff's hotel, where a series of tableaux vivants, representing some of the most celebrated chefs-d'œuvres of modern and ancient artists, had been organized for the benefit of the distressed weavers of the suffering cotton districts of France. As most of the well-known beauties of the season were to take a part in these artistic soirées, and as, moreover, great secrecy was observed as to who was, and who was not, to appear in such and such characters, not a little curiosity was excited, and demands for tickets came pouring in long after more than the admissible number the rooms could contain, had been completed. The result, as far as charitable purposes are concerned, was highly satisfactory; and so, no doubt, was the process of getting up for the tableaux, to the parties more immediately concerned. But in an artistic point of view, it must be confessed that something was wanting to satisfy the eyes; and one was reminded in a strangely ludicrous and almost painful manner, of a certain exhibition at Barnum's, the wax figures of which must be impressed so indelibly in all our infantine memories, and which the glare of the rich gems and the profusion of ornaments and draperies employed, somehow only served the more strongly to bring before one's eyes. A magnificent-looking "Judith," coming out from the tent, from Horace Vernet's famous picture, which ought to have elicited our feelings of admiration, from the complete embodiment of the painter's ideal by the lady who represented it, was, perhaps, one of the very pictures which most lent itself to this species of criticism. The face, attitude, gorgeous draperies—all was perfect, all, save that certain atmosphere which separates the gazer's eye from the picture he looks upon, and which serves to soften its crudities. A few gauzy transparencies might have done much to tame down this effect, and so an artist at my elbow whispered, had been suggested but indignantly rejected by the fair living models on the evening in question, who, having had to prepare long and arduously to be gazed at a few minutes, were evidently not inclined to be only half seen, or have any of their charms, real or artificial, obscured. One of the prettiest pictures of the evening was Ary Scheffer's "Marguerite," whose pose and features were wonderfully rendered by the lovely Mme. Dollfus, the Prefect of the Seine's daughter. Mme. de Castiglione had, it was said, been invited, and consented to take a part; and as this lady is equally remarkable for her originality of costumes, and her beautiful form and face, much was expected from her appearance; but the spectators were destined to disappointment of more than one kind, for the picture in which she was to appear was withdrawn for that night, and it is said even for the succeeding one, without any apparent reason.

The second day of the races of Long-Champs was, if possible, more fully and brilliantly attended than even the preceding one; the tribunes, as on the previous occasion, being filled with well-dressed women, composed of the élite of Parisian society. The brilliant sunshine, the green coloring of the trees, and the charming scenery which surrounds the race-course, forming, as it were, a setting to it, of which the heights of Meudon, St. Cloud, and the picturesque Mont St. Valerien, are the most striking features, impart to the whole scene, thronged with gayly-dressed and beautiful women, magnificent equipages, and prancing and excited steeds, an animation and a magic effect, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in any other race-course in the world. The Empress was there; one of the most important prizes of the day being that called the Empress's prize. Her Majesty was dressed in a very pale gray taffetas dress, shot with blue, the casaque being similar to the robe, and the sleeves in front of the latter trimmed with narrow bands of the same material, edged with white, placed like brandenburghs, and terminated at the point of each narrow band with a white silk button, the whole costume having somewhat of a sporting air. The bonnet worn by the Empress was of the same shade of pale gray as the dress, in crêpe, very simply ornamented by a tuft of black berries or currants. Among the most remarkable equipages were those of the Marquis d'Agudo, and of the Duke de Morny, the latter of whom came up to the race course in a d'Aumont with four horses and postilions; the latter, as well as the piqueurs who preceded the carriages, wore bright scarlet liveries, slashed with gold, with white and gold embroidered caps, the whole effect being very gay and dashing.

Several toilets were remarkable for their originality, and all for the extreme elegance and good taste they displayed, giving the tribunes the aspect of an elegantly filled drawing-room, rather than of a public resort out of doors.

Mme. Rimsky Korsekow, the Russian lionne, wore an English alpaca, of the shade called  cuir de Russie, or leather-color, with belt and trimming of leather, studded with steel nails, with shining beads; a straw hat, with a feather matching the shade of the dress, completed a very rakish and altogether sporting-looking costume. Steel ornaments, and steel mingled with leather, both in the form of plain bands, of horse-shoe trimmings and other designs, is gradually creeping into favor, though as yet only ventured upon by way of being original. Some loose casques are to be seen in the shop windows, with a small leather pouch, studded with steel, hanging by a leather and steel chain at the side, the whole garment being edged with a narrow leather band, dotted over with steel, and on these is affixed, in large characters, the word English.

In the biography of Victor Hugo, just published, appears the following.—

A WOMAN BRANDED.—At Paris, in 1818 or 1819, on a summer's day, towards twelve o'clock at noon, I was passing by the square of the Palais de Justice. A crowd was assembled there around a post. I drew near. To this post was tied a young female, with a collar round her neck and a writing over her head. A chafing-dish, full of burning coals, was on the ground in front of her; an iron instrument, with a wooden handle, was placed in the live embers, and was being heated there. The crowd looked perfectly satisfied. This woman was guilty of what the law calls domestic theft. As the clock struck noon, behind that woman, and without being seen by her, a man stepped up to the post. I had noticed that the jacket worn by this woman had an opening behind, kept together by strings; the man quickly untied these, drew aside the jacket, exposed the woman's back as far as the waist, seized the iron which was in the chafing-dish, and applied it, leaning heavily on the bare shoulder. Both the iron and the wrist of the executioner disappeared in a thick white smoke. This is now more than forty years ago, but there still rings in my ears the horrible shriek of this wretched creature. To me, she had been a thief, but was now a martyr. I was then sixteen years of age, and I left the place determined to combat to the last days of my life these cruel deeds of the law.

ST. PAUL.

A SUBSCRIBER inquires in the September number how to clean black lace veils. I recently cleaned some in the following manner: Put the lace in a dish, and pour over it a mixture of two parts alcohol, and one part water, taking care to keep the lace entirely covered; then light the liquid, let it burn five minutes, extinguish it, and turn the lace; relight it, and after it has burned five minutes, take out the lace, and press it while damp. Can I obtain from you the February number for 1857, and for March, 1861? Please answer in the next number, and oblige

A FRIEND TO THE BOOK.

We can furnish the above numbers.

A SKEPTIC ANSWERED.—"Ah," said a skeptical collegian to an old Quaker, "I suppose you are one of those fanatics who believe the Bible?" Said the old man, "I do believe the Bible. Do you believe it?" "No; I can have no proof of its truth." "Then," inquired the old man, "Does thee believe in France?" "Yes; for although I have not seen it, I have seen others who have. Besides, here is plenty of corroborative proof that such a country does exist." "Then thee will not believe anything thee nor others has not seen?" "No." "Did thee ever see thy own brains?" "No." "Ever see a man who did see them?" "No." "Does thee believe thee has any?" This last question put an end to the discussion.

THINK OF IT, GIRLS!—Nothing can prevent an increase of bachelorism save an amendment in the code of educating women. When they learn common sense instead of broken French; when they learn some useful employment instead of beating the piano; when they learn to prefer honest industry to silly coxcombry; and when men find woman is a helpmate, instead of a burden; then, and not till then, may we expect to find fewer bachelors.

A LADY wishes a receipt for cleaning white kid gloves.

It chanced one evening, at one of the great hotels, that a gentleman, seeking in vain for a candle with which to light himself to his room at a late hour, passed a young lady who had two candles, of which she politely offered him one. He took it and thanked her, and the next morning acknowledged the courtesy in the following epigram. Luckily for the poet (for his epigram would otherwise have been quite pointless), the young lady was as handsome as she was polite:—

You gave me a candle; I give you my thanks.

And add—as a compliment justly your due—

There isn't a girl in these feminine ranks

Who could—if she tried—hold a candle to you!

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY PREMIUMS.—We believe that the Lady's Book is the only magazine offered as a premium by the various societies in the different States.

THE following we consider a little humbugous:—

HOW MRS. BONAPARTE PUTS ON HER CLOTHES.—A Paris correspondent thus gossips about the dresses of the Empress Eugène. He says it is universally conceded that she is the best dressed lady in Europe. She sets the female fashions for the world; and employs not only modistes but artistes to invent them. Her "department of ready-made clothing" is something immense. To say that she has a new dress for every day in the year would not begin to convey an idea of the extent and variety of her wardrobe. In the front centre of the ceiling of Her Majesty's private dressing room, there is a trap-door opening into a spacious hall above filled with "presses," each containing a dress, exhibited on a frame—looking like an effigy of the Empress herself. In a part of these "presses" there is a little railway leading to the aforesaid trap-door, through which the dress is "descended" into the presence of the Empress. If it pleased her Majesty, the dress is lifted from the frame, and placed upon the imperial person; if not, it is whipped up, and another comes down in its place; and not infrequently another, and another, and another, so fastidious is the taste which gives the law to the world of fashion. In public the Empress never looks overdressed. A severe simplicity always characterizes her toilet, while everything, in material, fit, and color, is as complete in harmony as a sonata of Beethoven.

MUSIC RECEIVED.—"Out in this Terrible War." Words by Mary W. Jauvriu; music by H. T. Merrill. Published by H. T. Merrill & Co., Chicago.

PARISIAN LADY IMPROVERS.—A French correspondent notices a new academy in Paris: They have lately come to the decision that all elegant dames ought to wear the hair in the form of a cortogan descending to the waist, bound in the middle with pink, green, and blue ribbons, and curled at the extremity in five of those long curls which we call "cork-screws" in France. It may look pretty enough; but how can those ladies who are not blessed with an abundant hirsute crop manage the matter? Let me also whisper, as in duty bound, that hoops are worn in two ways; some are round, others oblong. Some dancing belles present to the admiring gaze a perfect circle—a geometrical figure, which the ancients regarded as the ideal of beauty. Others seem to walk beside their dress, and suggest the impertinent question which Beau Brummel once put to a duke, "Do you call this thing a coat?"

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

We present our young friends with another of those choice illustrated hymns we promised them for their own department.

THE SABBATH DAY.

It is Sunday evening now,
Soon its hours will be no more;
Have I sought this day to grow
More like Jesus than before?

Have I loved the Lord's own day,
As His pardoned children do,
When I knelt with them to pray,
Was my heart among them too?

What so sweet as prayer and praise,
When from children's hearts they come?
What so pleasant as the way
Leading to my Father's home?

Happy Sunday—if we love
Him whose holy day it is;
Peace descending from above,
Fills the heart that would be His.

AN AFFECTING INCIDENT:—

WAYNESBORO', PA.

L. A. GODEY, Esq., PHILADELPHIA:

DEAR SIR: A little incident, additional to the many affecting stories of the late sanguinary conflict at Gettysburg, came to my knowledge a few days after the battle as I was crossing the mountains from that town on my way to "the front" as a surgeon and delegate of the United States Christian Commission.

An accident to our vehicle forced us—my three fellow travelers and myself—to halt for an hour at a handsome dwelling on the road; the very courteous and obliging proprietor of which my companions entertained by exhibiting to him such interesting relics of the battle as they were carrying away. When they had done, the gentleman remarked that he possessed something that would rival all he had yet beheld; and he produced a miniature found upon the battle-field by a member of his family, which we all examined with mingled feelings of tenderness and admiration. It was a beautiful picture of three lovely children. Our awakened sympathy was deepened as the gentleman proceeded to tell us that the relic was found in the hands of a dead soldier. The fatal bullet had not killed instantly, but the soldier had expired slowly, in a sheltered spot, with consciousness vivid—how vivid!—to the last moment. He was discovered lying on his back. His hands were folded and resting on his breast, with the open palms, and the open miniature within them facing his glazed eyes. The soldier died gazing on the loved faces of his little girl and two little boys, far off in their southern home, whom he was to see on earth no more.

MEANING OF NAMES.—The ancient mythologists indicated their love of nature by their transformations and appellations. Thus many of the names of the women and men were derived from various plants and flowers. Thus Barbara is derived from barberis, the barberry tree; Rosa, from the rose;

Laura, from the laurel; Lucy, from lucus, a grove; Rosamond, from rosa mundi, the flower of the world; Agnes, from agnus, a lamb; Melissa, from a Greek word, signifying a bee; Dorcas, a rose; Phillis, a leaf; Rachel, a sheep; Jacintha, a hyacinth; Galatea is milk; Cyuthia, the moon; Jesse, an engraft of a tree; Aurelia means a cotton wood; Margaret, a pearl and a daisy; Cecil, a heartwort; and Chloe, a green herb.

FOR OUR FRENCH SCHOLARS.—During the French Revolution a ci-devant applied for a passport under the name of "Nis." "Nis?" said the authorities at the passport office.—"Comment nis? Have you no other name?" "Not now," said the satirical applicant. "I used to be called St. Denis; but since you have abolished the saints, and forbidden the use of the prefix De, there is nothing left for me but nis."

The Laporte Democrat says:—

"We are in receipt of Godey's Lady's Book, and must speak for it a good word; indeed, we could not, had we the desire, do otherwise than speak well of it. One thing very remarkable about Godey is, that we never hear it mentioned but with respect."

YOUNG LADIES' SEMINARY FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS—Mrs Gertrude J. Cary, Principal, South-east corner Sixteenth and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, Pa. The nineteenth session of this school commenced September 14th, 1863.

The course of study pursued embraces the fundamental and higher branches of a thorough English education. Particular attention is given to the acquisition of the French language, and a resident French Teacher furnishes every facility for making it the medium of daily intercourse. Mrs. Cary gives personal attention to the instruction of her pupils, aided by experienced lady teachers, and the best professional talent in the city. It is her constant endeavor to secure an equal development of body, mind, and heart, and the formation of habits of neatness and industry.

Mrs. S. J. Hale, Rev. H. A. Boardman, D. D., Rev. J. Jenkins, D. D., Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, D. D., Louis A. Godey, Esq., Philadelphia; Rev. J. N. Candee, D. D., Galesburg, Ill.; Louis H. Jenkins, Jacksonville, Ill.; Rev. George Duffield, Jr., Adrian, Mich.

Circulars sent on application.

THAT IS TRUE.—"We can always tell whether a lady is a reader of Godey by the way she dresses," says the Lady's Net. And he says still further: "The female portion of the inhabitants of our land of liberty have for the last thirty years been noted for their beauty and taste in the adornment of their bodies, and strange to say, they are still advancing. We know of but one reason for this, and that is they have been furnished the patterns and, indeed, all the information necessary for the accomplishment of this grand object by L. A. Godey."

CURIOS EPITAPH.—The following epitaph is to be seen on a tombstone in an Essex churchyard:—

Here lies the man Richard,
And Mary his wife;
Their surname was Pritchard,
They lived without strife;
And the reason was plain—
They abounded in riches,
They had no care nor pain,
And the wife wore the breeches.

Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will furnish, post paid, the book for $2.00. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

An Indiana paper contains the following:—

"As an evidence that this Ladies' Magazine which we have so often spoken of, is somewhat thought of abroad, we quote the following from the London Times:—

"A friend has shown us a magazine published in the United States by Louis A. Godey. We have examined it attentively, and are much pleased with the engravings and literary matter, and such fashion-plates we have never seen in any publication this side of the Atlantic. How Mr. Godey can afford to give so much matter for about an English shilling we cannot comprehend."

If a young lady faints when you "propose to her," you can restore her to consciousness by just whispering in her ear you were only joking.

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to indorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Hale is not the Fashion Editress. Address "Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia."

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

Let the names of the subscribers and your own signature be written so that they can be easily made out.

AN EDITOR thus described in rhyme the patience of a husband with whom he is acquainted:—

"He never says a word,
But with a look of deepest melancholy,
He sat, like Patience on an ottoman,
Waiting for his wife to put her bonnet on."

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

"Can you inform me the best way to renovate black crape, and oblige yours, truly, A SUBSCRIBER."

We have published several receipts upon the subject, but have not time to look them up. See Receipt department in former volumes.

To many Inquirers.—If we were to give full and particular description how everything is made, we would not be able to give more than three or four engravings. We give the pattern and the design. Every good workwoman can work from them, and bad ones would be no better off, no matter how long and particular the description.

To Correspondents.—We earnestly request that all our correspondents will kindly comply with the following rules, which are absolutely necessary to prevent confusion in the ownership of MSS., and the purposes for which they are sent: Firstly, to write their name and address either on the first or last page; and, secondly, to state whether their contributions are intended as free offerings.

What we consider almost impertinent is to send a MS. to an editor stating that it is "the first attempt at writing," and asking pay; requesting its return, if not accepted, and sending no stamps to pay return postage.

Lizzie H. will find the waterfall style of headdress in this number.

Sallie K., Baltimore, Md.—Your letter cost us six cents postage. You put an old stamp on the envelope, and an old stamp inside, both of which are worthless.

Miss W.—The ordinary way of wearing a locket round the throat is to attach it to a small gold chain or to some narrow black ribbon velvet. If the latter is used, the velvet is tied at the back of the neck, and the ends are left long. Narrow silk neck-ties, with embroidered ends, are worn; but the small white muslin scarfs are more fashionable.

Margaret.—It would be quite proper if he were about to escort her to any place of amusement, when a certain hour was fixed for the performance to commence, and it would not be improper in any case.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godoy, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR NOVEMBER.

Fig. 1, in the background, is of the style of Charles 10th. A dress of mauve silk, made with deep train, trimmed with point lace and quillings of white satin ribbon. The corsage is cut square, and trimmed to match. The coiffure is composed of white plumes and mauve velvet.

Fig. 2. Peasant of Alsace.—This costume is composed of an orange merino skirt, with white cashmere waist, ornamented with blue and orange color. Round the neck is a muslin frill, with a band of black velvet. A white muslin apron is tied at the right side with a blue ribbon. The coiffure is a plain white muslin cap, with a band of muslin concealing the hair. The stockings are of a deep blue, and the shoes have high heels and large steel buckles.

Fig. 3. Highland Dress.—The kilt is of a bright wool plaid, laid in box-plaits at the waist. The jacket is of green cloth or velvet, and over this is a brilliant silk scarf thrown over the left shoulder and tied at the back. The pouch is of white and black fur. The bonnet is of black velvet, trimmed with a band of plaid and two plumes with a fancy ornament in front. Plaid stockings complete the costume.

Fig. 4. Lady of the Court of Elizabeth.—Dress of plain-colored changeable silk, made with a very long train. The corsage is half high, and has a very full and deep box-plaited basque. On each plait is a band of gold gimp, which is also the trimming of the corsage. A frill of plum-colored silk, striped with gold braid, forms a cap or epaulette to the sleeves, which are of green satin puffed and trimmed with gold braid. The cuffs are of rich lace, the same as the high ruff on the corsage. The hair is rolled and puffed, and dressed with a large gilt ornament with bead pendants.

Fig. 5. A Peasant Girl of Lorraine.—A brown stuff dress, bordered on the edge of the skirt with a band of brilliant Magenta ribbon. The apron, which is very long and full, is of striped muslin, pointed on the edge, and bound with Magenta ribbon. The pockets are also bound with red, and round the waist is a long red sash. The corsage is of blue cashmere, with half short sleeves turned up with white cashmere, embroidered with black braid and beads. The brown stuff sleeve, bound with red, extends just below the blue sleeve, and the arms are covered with long white mittens. The corsage is cut out heart-shaped in front, and trimmed with black.

A white cashmere body reaches to the throat. A band of black velvet, to which is attached a jet cross, is tied round the neck. The corsage is a white muslin cap with fluted border.

Fig. 6. A Fashion Lady of the 15th Century.—The dress is of a rich golden moiré, with flowing skirt faced with ruby velvet. The corsage and sleeves are trimmed with the same. A small plastron of white satin barred with black velvet is on the front of the corsage. An embroidered muslin bow is at the throat, and the sleeves are trimmed with a very deep row of Venetian point lace. Two rows of pearl beads encircle the waist. The japon is of emerald green satin trimmed with three rows of golden moiré. The coiffure is a fine muslin cap, covering only the back of the head, and finishing low on the neck with a large bow and ends, richly embroidered and trimmed with lace. The border of the cap is of lace, sewed on very stiff net, and plated to stand upright, as represented in our plate.

Fig. 7. Court Jester.—The skirt is of yellow silk or merino, trimmed with two bands of the same color, or black velvet. The upper skirt and corsage are of blue merino or silk. The skirt is cut in deep points, bound with white silk, and on each point is a gilt bell. A pointed bertha is laid over the blue corsage, and each point should be trimmed with a bell. The cap is of blue velvet bound with yellow, and the boots are of blue velvet turned over with white plush. Both the cap and boots would be improved by bells.

Fig. 8. Andalusian Lady.—The skirt of the dress is of black satin, trimmed with two rows of very deep chenille fringe, with a velvet and chenille heading. The corsage is of a brilliant gold-colored satin, crossed in front with narrow black velvet. Over this is a Figaro jacket of scarlet velvet, with small slashed sleeves, trimmed on the shoulders with large rosettes of gold-colored satin and drop buttons. The cash is of scarlet silk, trimmed with gold. The coiffure consists of a long and rich black lace veil laid in plaits on top of the head, and falling over a high shell comb. A spray of flowers is placed at the left side of the head.

Fig. 9. Louis 16th Dress.—A petticoat of white satin, trimmed with three rows of point lace. The rows are graduated in width, and headed by wreaths of roses with foliage. The dress is of sky blue corded silk, made with a Pompadour waist trimmed with a quilting of white satin ribbon and point lace. The sleeves are tight to the elbow, and trimmed with a quilting of the silk and a ruffle, also two deep rows of point lace. The skirt is made with a very long train looped up at intervals, so that it merely reaches to the top of the lower flounce. The hair is powdered, rolled, and dressed with a small wreath of roses on the left side of the head.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

It has been said of the English Empire that its morning drum-beat resounds around the world. But we have lately seen a little newspaper paragraph which has reminded us that there is an empire far more universal than the English—the empire of fashion.

The paragraph to which we allude describes the labors of a benevolent English lady named Rye, who has gone to New Zealand to promote the emigration thither of females. They are selected from the humblest classes, and sent out at the expense of Miss Rye and her friends. They readily find employment at high wages, and thereupon become forthwith willing subjects of fashion. Miss Rye writes that the latest fashion magazines of Europe and the United States come out by each vessel, and on the streets of the principal towns, whose sites scarce a score of years ago were the abodes of savages, are now found the latest style of Parisian bonnets, and the finest flowers and laces.

We think we cannot render a more acceptable service to our New Zealand subscribers, as well as to those nearer home, than by telling them of the charming novelties in dress goods now to be found at Stewart's.

Few robe-dresses have as yet appeared. The principal ones are of a material called Crotonne, of French make, and resembling alpaca. These are to be had of all colors, and the engravings of several very beautiful ones will be in the December number.

Never has there been a more elegant assortment of cashmere robes de chambre than at this present season. The grounds are of the most approved colors, with gorgeous Persian borders formed for the robe; some having large bordered capes, and others jackets.

Toile de Valence—a poplin-like material, laine soie, and poplin soie are all new and pretty materials. Some are plain; while others have a silk ribbon-like stripe, which renders them very effective. Poplins seem to prevail; some are all wool, others cotton and wool, and others again silk and wool. There are, however, so many different makes of poplin, that, though the goods may be composed of the same materials, they have not a shadow of resemblance.

A very pretty style is what is termed Pekin, a rather low-priced material, and very suitable for travelling or school dresses. The grounds are of all the shades of smoke, cuir, wood, chevenx, gizelle, and other colors. They are striped in all sizes and styles, and the stripes generally black.

Epingline rayé is one of the most charming tissues of the season. It is plain, but of astonishing richness, and has somewhat the appearance of uncut velvet. Another article, called Nouveautés, is a poplin with detached figures, generally in silk, and though very pretty, yet without the richness of a plain material. Another style is an all wool poplin, with stripes in self colors, the stripe being formed merely of a thick cord at short distances. This is a novel and pretty style.

The most elegant, and probably the most expensive poplins of the season are the Irish. They are of all shades and colors, and particularly rich in quality.

Plaids are brought out in all the makes of poplins and other goods. They are from the simple half-inch size—suitable for children—to the large plaid a quarter of a yard in width. They are very brilliant, and comprise all the clan plaids, as well as any quantity of fancy ones. The blue and green combination, so fashionable a few years since, is again taken into favor, and is generally preferred to the gay plaids, except for children. Printed delaines and cashmere d'Ecosse, or printed merinos, striped, plaided, or powdered with small figures, are very pretty and suitable for children.

In silks there is nothing particularly new. Heavy solid colored silks, rich moirés, and plaids are the most elegant. Small figures, stripes, and such styles, which we have had for so long, have again appeared among the new goods of this season.

For evening dresses we saw a number of light ground châliées, small figures on amber, melon, mauve, sea-green, pearl, and cuir grounds; nothing different from what we have had in preceding seasons.

It is, however, early, and we hope yet to be startled with a succession of novelties. The tints this season are in great variety, and very rich; but having in our eyes attained perfection last year, all we can say is that we think them quite as good as then.

In the Lingerie department of Stewart's we noticed that the collars were a size larger than last year's, and many had pointed ends in front. Sleeves are close at the wrist, but not tight (much in the style of the Religious which we described last year), and buttoned up at the side with five or six buttons. There are a number of different styles, many of them sufficiently large at the wrist to pass the hand through. Deep linen cuffs will be worn throughout the winter.

The fashionable style of glove, except for evening wear, is the gant de Sw. de, stitched with colors, and made to cover the wrist.

For fashionable bridal trousseaux we find the most elegant assortment of laces. We cannot enter into detail, but will merely state what may be had in this line at Stewart's. There are points intended to be worn either as shawls, or bridal veils, in point de Gaze, appliqué point de Venice, and other styles. Sets of bouances, tuniques, jackets, capes, also new and peculiar coiffures in both black and white laces of all the different styles; also the most superb assortment of handkerchiefs in point d'Alençon, appliqué, point de Venice, Valenciennes, and others. All exquisitely delicate fabrics, costly, it is true, but always valuable; indeed much more esteemed by age, and particularly appropriate for a bridal parure.

In search of novelties, we next visited Brodie's, where we had a rich treat. Such elegant cloaks we have never before seen. The trimmings this year are particularly elegant, and made in sets to suit the cloaks. They are formed of silk cable cord and mohair braid, arranged in the gimp style to form epaulettes, cuffs, and various other ornaments. The cloaks are of the paletôt shape, resembling a gentleman's overcoat. One—a rich black velvet—had a very elegant and elaborate ornament of this gimp work, consisting of epaulettes, cuffs, and oblong pieces for the back of the waist. The seams were covered by a caché point of narrow black gimp and beads, seemingly a trifling affair, but costing from fifty to seventy-five cents a yard. Others were trimmed with heavy chenille braces, fastened at the waist behind by large chenille ornaments, caught on the shoulders by epaulettes, trimmed with rich chenille fringe, and extending to the waist in front. Many were trimmed with chenille fringes and buttons. Graduated bands, richly finished and made in sets, was another pretty style for the fronts of cloaks. Many cloaks are slashed at the sides and back, and laced with heavy cords.

Heavy velvet cloths of all colors will be worn, particularly the rich blue, with new style of Zouave hood, kept in place by whalebones.

A fawn-colored cloak particularly pleased us. It was trimmed with brown and fawn chenilles, braided and laid on the cloak. We noticed that all the cloaks were fastened with hooks, and the buttons merely ornaments; the favorite style being a pointed button, with long pendants from the points. Scarlet is much used for the trimming of cloaks; and for children and misses nothing is more fashionable than a blue or scarlet cloak trimmed with black or white. Scarlet is also the favorite color for opera cloaks. Plain cloth cloaks of all colors are also to be had to suit the taste of all; but space will not permit us to enumerate all the different styles, as their name is legion.

From Mme. Tilman of Ninth Street, New York, who has just returned from the celebrated Maison Tilman of the Rue Richelieu of Paris, we have the latest notes of fashion.

Bonnets and headdresses are what Madame particularly revels in; but she has given us information on fashions in general. Bonnets have changed but little in shape. In Paris the Marie Stuart is at present the adopted style, though it is not the universal one, as we see by our fashion-plates. The shapes are exceedingly long from the crown to the front; they droop, but are not bent down, and are very shallow at the sides. Jet is very much used in the ornamentation of them; also leather. The ornithological and the entomological fovers, which broke out last spring, will continue with increased violence throughout the winter.

A striking peculiarity for velvet and silk bonnets is rich velvet flowers, with green foliage and grasses. The taste for natural flowers in Paris, both for bonnets and coiffures, has caused the French artistes to almost rival nature, so that while walking through the show-rooms of Mme. Tilman, you can very readily imagine you are having a rare horticultural treat. Roses, lilies, mignonette, heliotrope, chrysanthemums, tulips, air and water plants, with mosses and ferns, are thrown together in rich profusion.

Parisian ladies are wearing round hats of velvet and other materials. We think, however, that this style will not be adopted in this country, as our climate is too severe, and the style too conspicuous to suit the American taste.

Coiffures are this season richer than ever; but it is quite impossible to convey an adequate idea of their gracefulness and piquant originality.

Some special commissions were shown us in the shape of dresses. One, a moiré of the new shade called Tourterelle, or turtle-dove color, had simply a quilted black ribbon on the edge of the skirt; the material being of itself so rich that trimming on the skirt would have been like attempting to "paint the lily, or add another hue unto the rainbow." The body was made with a Zouave, and vest of the same. The Zouave was cut away very much in front, rather deep at the back, and cut in three points, or rather rounded ends, at the back. The whole was trimmed with a narrow caché point of black gimp and beads. The vest was of the moiré, made quite long in front, with pockets and a rolling collar.

Another very elegant dress was of an entirely new cut. The back of the corage was cut in a jockey, and the ends in front were prolonged into two long sash ends extending half-way down the skirt, and trimmed with narrow fluted ruffles. The skirt was trimmed with three fluted ruffles set on in bunches, and separated at the distance of every quarter of a yard by three bands of ribbon laid on plain.

Another dress for demi-toilet, also made with basque and vest, was trimmed very prettily. On each breadth were bias bands of silk, with pointed ends, put on in the pyramidal style. The bands were about an inch and a half wide, and five or six in number. Zouave and sleeves were trimmed to match. In our next we will give more minute descriptions of bonnets, which, however, must be seen to be properly appreciated.

We hope fond mammas will pardon us if we wait until next month to describe some charming little hats at Genin's for children. We would willingly describe them now; but the cruel publi-her insists upon it that his readers require something besides our Chat.

SAFETY SKATING FRAME.

FOR BEGINNERS.

Our readers can see the proportions in the cut. The bottom of the runners being slightly curved, the frame is easily turned in any direction. The ends of the runners being turned up, enables the frame to pass over any reasonable impediment, thus saving it from stopping, and being thrown over forwards. The long tails would not allow it to be pulled over backwards. The skater's hands being placed on the hand rail, between its supports, prevents her from upsetting the frame sideways.

DRESS FOR A MISS.

Made of Waterloo blue poplin, and trimmed, en tablier, with bands of black velvet, with a narrow braiding pattern between.

EMBROIDERY.

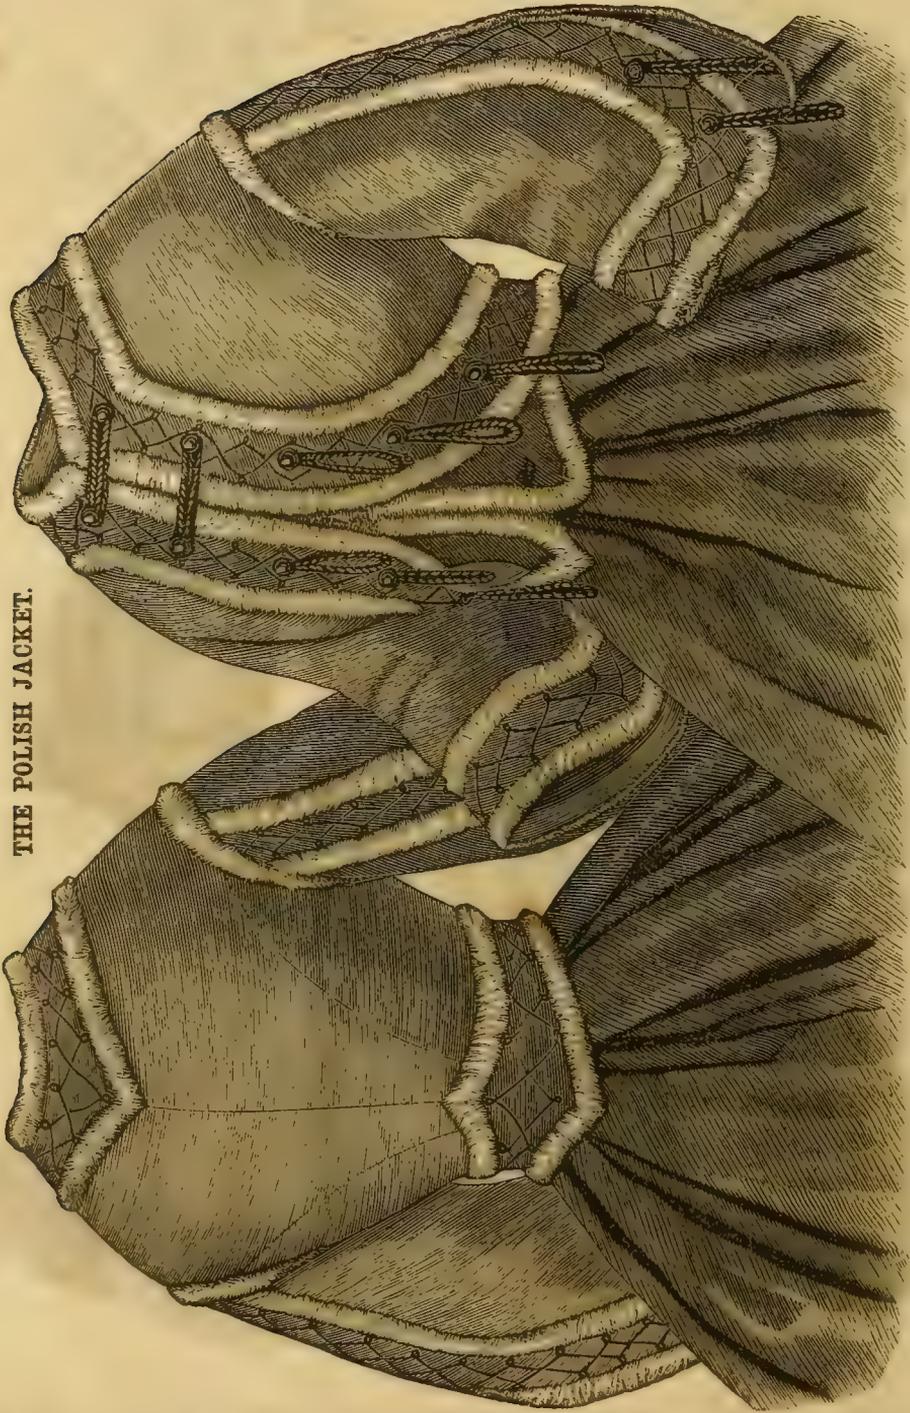

DRESS FOR A LITTLE GIRL OF TEN YEARS.

The material is steel-colored merino, with a bordering quarter of a yard deep, of a brilliant Solferino merino. The joining is concealed by a wide black braid, and a narrow braiding pattern is on each side of both. The yoke, cuffs, and sash are all of Solferino merino braided with black.

THE POLISH JACKET.

This stylish costume may be made of any material. We would, however, suggest black silk as a pretty contrast to the swans'-down with which it is trimmed. It is merely a pointed waist, trimmed with down. A braided band trimmed with swans'-down is then laid on to form the jacket and girdle, giving the lower part of the waist the appearance of a vest.

THE CALPE.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

This truly serviceable garment is one that for winter weather will prove a ne plus ultra style, while the beauty of the materials commend it to the eye of taste. The cloth from which our drawing is taken is called chinchilla. This cannot be represented in an engraving. It presents a fur-like appearance, and is well adapted to the fur trimming, which is of the chinchilla itself, although other furs may be employed with equal effect. For sleighing, or skating, this pardessus will probably become a great favorite.

ESTAPPA MARCH.

COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK,

BY J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

OP. 123.

8 va.....

The first system of musical notation consists of two staves. The upper staff is in treble clef and the lower staff is in bass clef. The key signature has one flat (B-flat) and the time signature is 4/4. The music begins with a forte (f) dynamic. The upper staff features a melody of eighth notes, while the lower staff provides a harmonic accompaniment with chords and single notes.

The second system of musical notation continues the piece. It includes a first ending bracket in the upper staff. The dynamic markings pp (pianissimo) and mf (mezzo-forte) are present. The notation includes triplets and various rhythmic patterns.

The third system of musical notation features prominent triplet markings in the upper staff. The melody continues with eighth notes and rests, supported by the bass staff accompaniment.

The fourth system of musical notation concludes the piece. It features a final melodic phrase in the upper staff and a corresponding accompaniment in the lower staff.

ESTAPHA MARCH.

The first system of musical notation consists of a grand staff with a treble clef on the upper staff and a bass clef on the lower staff. The music is in 2/4 time and features a melody in the treble with eighth and sixteenth notes, and a bass accompaniment of chords and eighth notes.

See.....

The second system continues the musical notation from the first system, maintaining the same melodic and harmonic structure.

See.....

The third system concludes with the word "FINE." written above the treble staff. The music ends with a double bar line and repeat dots. A dynamic marking of p (piano) is placed below the bass staff.

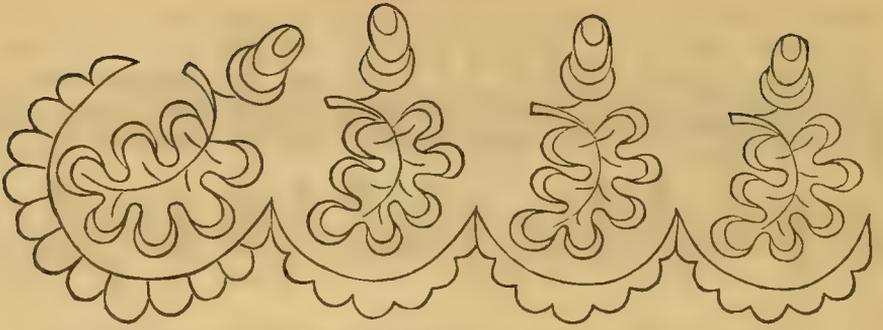

See.....

The fourth system continues the musical notation, featuring a melody with some longer note values and a steady bass accompaniment.

See.....

The fifth system concludes the piece with a final melodic flourish in the treble and a corresponding bass accompaniment. The instruction "D.C. al. seg. S:" is written above the treble staff.

WHAT A JEALOUS MAN SAW ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY MARION HARLAND.

CHAPTER I.

PLEASANT parlors, comfortably and handsomely furnished, cheerily bright with the radiance of lamps on mantle and table, and a heaping grate of coals all a-glow, as was meet on a December night—an illumination that seemed to prefigure something of the hilarity of the approaching Christmas. Scattered through the apartments, standing, sitting, or strolling at will from etagère to picture, from music-stand to cabinets of minerals and curious varieties, collected to instruct and entertain, groups of young people of both sexes in couples, trios, and quartettes, chatted and laughed and listened with the ease and familiarity of a family party.

There was a marked preponderance of the masculine element in the little gathering, a disparity which would have appeared singular to the spectator, had he chanced to be a stranger to the town of Kingsville, and this his debut in the social assemblies that convened in its classic precincts; one, who did not know that as the seat of two old and eminently respectable institutions of learning—institutions which had furnished statesmen and divines for the country at large during three-quarters of a century—its society could boast not only of the large number, but the superior quality of the gentlemen who helped compose it. Mrs. Fay, the mistress of the hospitable mansion whose state-rooms we have thrown open for the reader's accommodation, was the widow of a deceased professor, who had held a distinguished rank in the college while living, and dying, had bequeathed to his family an honorable name, no mean position in the community where he had labored and ruled, and, withal, an ample estate. It was no matter of marvel, then, that the well-appointed residence aforesaid should be the chosen resort of ambitious seniors, unmarried professors, and the better class of citizen beaux, and when the still comely and winning hostess and her two fair daughters were taken into consideration, this sequence became a palpable necessity—as clear a case of facts and laws given, and conclusions deduced therefrom, as could have been proposed and argued by the good-looking Professor of Natural, Moral, and Mental Philosophy, who was, at the moment we have selected as the starting-point of our story, busily and happily engaged in looking over a folio of loose music, mostly sentimental ballads, with "sweet pretty" vignettes, with Miss Kate Fay, the elder of the sisters, and his eyes said to others, as perhaps also his lips did to her, the more beautiful.

Twice had the Professor and his companion examined each sheet of the collection very deliberately, and, it is to be supposed, with a corresponding degree of care, talking all the while in a low, skilfully modulated tone, doubtless with regard to the object sought, when Ellie Victor, a tricky mischief-lover, paused in her wanderings through the rooms and her innocent flirtation with a smitten senior, to ask—"Can I help you, Katie? What have you lost? or don't you know what you are looking for, Mr. Martyn?"

"A piece of manuscript music," returned Kate, a slight flush rising to her cheek, but evincing no other token of having heard the significant last clause of this speech. "Mary!" she called to her sister, "you had it this morning. What have you done with it?"

"What do you want?"

Mary glanced up smilingly from her low seat

by the fire. She was about twenty years of age, with a sunshiny face, sweet, womanly, brown eyes, soft and lustrous, and a profusion of dark hair slightly curling away from a finely-shaped forehead. If Kate was handsome, her sister was as bewitching in her way. Just now, her lap was full of bon-bons, pink, white, and gilt, with all manner of fanciful devices upon the envelopes and embodied in the crystallized sweets. These were a present bestowed by the latest comer, a merry rattle of a fellow, an artist from the nearest city. He had, as he chose to phrase it, "run over with the evening train, for a draught of domestic delight, to be imbibed in haste and thankfulness;" had flashed into the room, like a meteor or a rocket, about ten minutes before, shaken hands all around with an air of boyish and gleeful abandon; asked twenty questions and paid twenty compliments in a score of breaths, and settled himself satisfiedly, it seemed triumphantly, to the enjoyment of the proposed refreshment, by drawing up a brioche close to Mary Fay's ottoman; throwing himself down upon it and pouring into her lap the contents of a little French basket, or box, which he had brought in his hand.

"How pretty!" exclaimed Mary, taking up the bonbonnière, a gay, graceful trifle of ribbon and straw. "Where did you get it, Bertie?"

"A fair friend of mine, late from Paris, was the donor. Do you see the inscription on the card attached to the handle—'Sweets to the sweet?' She sent it to me!" intensely complacent. "What are you all laughing at? She did! There was nothing ridiculous in her doing so that I can see, nor anything absurd in my transferring the gift—without her knowledge, of course—to Miss Molly, here."

"No one intimates that there is anything absurd or strained in the latter application of the motto," answered a gentleman near. "As to the original address of the card—" he finished the sentence by a shrug and a laugh.

"Never mind him!" said Mary, in reply to the pretended discomfiture and speechless indignation of her admirer. "You and I know better than—what did you say, Kate?" interrupting herself as her sister's appeal reached her.

"The song you were copying this morning for Cornelia Blythe—Signor Rossi's new composition. Did you finish it?"

"Nearly—so nearly that you can play it without difficulty. You will find it upon my desk, in the library."

Professor Martyn accompanied Miss Fay from the room to assist in the search, which did not occupy more time than might have been expected, probably less than it would have done, had it taken place prior to Ellie Victor's attack. He, it was, who retained possession of the manuscript when the two returned to the company. As he arranged it upon the piano-rack with something of a flourish, another paper slipped from within the opened sheet and fluttered to the floor. Ellie Victor swooped down upon it like a swallow upon a fly.

"Here is a coincidence!" she cried, in her high, merry tones that pealed through the parlors like silvery bells. "This is the identical document I was telling you about, Mr. Beekman. I'll read it aloud. Silence—good people! please! The attention of this intelligent and discriminating audience is solicited to the following original, graphic, and slightly satirical stanzas. They are, we may be permitted to remark, the joint production of a pair of damsels at present unknown to fame, but who do not intend to pine in unmerited obscurity much longer. The poem is entitled, 'A Christmas Invitation,' and was designed as a bait to allure into our charmed and charming circle, a fair city belle—"

"Ellie!" ejaculated Mary Fay, darting forward with a suddenness that sent sugar-plums, comfits, and candied kisses flying in all directions, a carnival shower of confectionery, "are you crazy? Give that to me! Who gave you permission to exhibit it?"

Ellie whirled away lightly as a feather dances on a summer breeze, holding the paper tightly behind her back.

"Keep quiet, can't you, Molly? Nobody would have suspected your share in the authorship if you had not betrayed it yourself. Isn't the gem mine as well as yours, and do you think that I will consent to have it hidden from sight and knowledge forever? Stop her, there, some of you, or you will miss the rarest treat you ever had in your lives!"

And the flushed and eager pursuer found herself encompassed by a barrier of outstretched arms and locked hands, hastily formed about her; in the centre of which magic ring she stood, foiled and pouting, yet laughing still.

"The poem! the poem!" was the general acclamation.

There was one exception in the person of Walter Blythe, a young lawyer of Kingsville, tall and rather stately in figure, with a grave, intellectual countenance that had scarcely relaxed with amusement amidst all the uproar going on about him. Quietly undoing two of the links in the living chain, he approached the prisoner, and said in a suppressed voice: "If you have any reason for disliking to have that read, I think I can prevent it."

"Oh, it is not worth a scene!" said Mary, in the same subdued key. "It is ridiculous farrago—a pack of nonsense, that is all! I meant to send it to Cornelia—your cousin. There is no great harm in it, silly doggerel though it is."

"Silence!" reiterated the self-elected reader, stepping upon the ottoman Mary had quitted. "I must preface the delivery of the 'poem,' as you are pleased to style it, by the remark that it is an impromptu—"

"Written for the occasion! Good! Go on!" cried the auditor, and she desisted from further preamble.

"Your Christmas will be dull, of course,
I hear you say in gentle pity—
I promise you that night could force
Me, at that season, from the city,
Spare your regrets—by us, I fear,
Your kindly sighs will be unheeded,
Though to our hearts your love is dear,
And sympathy is sweet—when needed!
But oh! what charming times we'll have!
Old friends, new friends, and dear ones meeting,
With merry hearts, and raiment brave,
And frank, unfeigned, and joyous greeting.
We are a merry group of girls;
And first I place upon the list, her
Of placid mien and glossy curls—
Katie—our darling elder sister."

There was a pleasant, affectionate murmur of applause, and every eye turned to where stood gentle Kate—a sweet lily that was fast being transformed into a rose, as she bowed with involuntary grace at the unexpected allusion to herself. Professor Martyn looked radiant—a beam of satisfaction that was well nigh quenched in sheepishness, or what would have been sheepishness in a less handsome and more bashful man—when his turn came.

"And Laura next—over whose brow
No cloud of grief or care is glooming;
'T would glad your heart to see her now,
Her step so light, her cheek so blooming."

Laura Elbertson—an amiable, sensible girl, to whom Nature's only gift of beauty was her frank, agreeable expression—smiled, not dissatisfiedly, at the adroitly truthful compliment.

"My blush comes in next!" the reader interrupted herself to say. "The audience will please give me due credit for strict adherence to the text, and a lofty disregard of personal feelings—mock modesty, and the like."

"Ellie—our bright and sparkling one—
Whose sunny face so beams with gladness,
That e'en the pearly drops that run
O'er it, can leave no trace of sadness."

"The English prose of which is!"—explained Mary Fay—"that when she cries, it does not make her eyes and face red."

"Thank you!" rejoined Ellie. "And now comes the cream of the epistle!"

"You know I hate the so-called bean,
A being born but to provoke us,
Who thinks, to escape the apes below,
We'll gladly here to monkeys yoke us!
Our beaux are of a different sort:
There's Martyn, rich in manly graces;
Who by his whiskers is not caught,
Won't fall in love with handsome faces.
And 'Bertie,' with his ready wit,
From a fount of spirits overflowing,
Railing at those who sullen sit,
Nor enjoy the world while it is going."

The artist executed a profound salaam, laying his hand upon his heart with an overstrained affectation of conceit and deprecation that was irresistibly mirth-provoking.

"And Morris, too, always the same
True nobleman that Nature made him;
Your coz, who honor does the name,
The highest praise that could be paid him!"

Mr. Morris bowed, in response to the bright glance dealt him by the reader, a courteous and grateful obeisance. Mr. Blythe had retained his position by Mary's side, still dignified, still unsmiling; his whole appearance indicative of a species of contempt, if not of displeasure, at the frolic which the others relished.

"I ought to feel flattered, I suppose," he said aside to his neighbor, as the reading was resumed—four or five stanzas yet remaining before the conclusion of the "poem." "I should render very thankful acknowledgments for the notice bestowed upon so humble an individual as myself, although I am only designated as your correspondent's cousin, and the highest praise given me is that I am not unworthy to bear the same name as herself. Some people are born to shine by reflected light alone."

The girl looked up quickly into his clouded face. "You surely will not take offence at such a trifle! I can assure you that a compliment was intended, however awkwardly it may have been expressed."

"Undoubtedly! The writer is explicit in the declaration that all is said in my favor that could be adduced. I do not complain, nor do I claim for myself the possession of any one characteristic virtue or attraction, such as ready wit or exuberance of spirits, for example."

"I understand. That sarcasm, at any rate, is unworthy of you!" And Mary walked with raised head and kindling eye to the other side of the room.

The doggerel rhymes were all delivered during this little by-play, and Miss Victor descended from her rostrum, attended by the applause of her companions.

"But it was truly a joint composition!" Blythe heard her say in reply to an inquiry from some one. "That is, Molly wrote it, I, meanwhile, suggesting and criticizing. It does us credit, does it not?"

"Aha!" said Bertie Gwynne, meaningly. "That accounts for the otherwise unpardonable omission of Miss Mary Fay's name in the 'merry group of girls!'" He scribbled something upon the back of a letter. "In default of a more worthy mention of one who deserves the best that can be said of her, how will this do to supply the deficiency?"

Ellie read it with an exclamation of delight. "Here, dear friends, is a genuine, bona fide impromptu!"

"In turn, her of the glancing eye,
Neither of smiles nor blushes chary;
With trusting heart and fancies high—
Our well-beloved, poetic Mary."

"Confound the fellow's impertinence!" muttered Walter Blythe between his teeth, turning away in ill-concealed disgust from the chattering throng, who greeted the reading of the interpolated stanza with the liveliest satisfaction, evidencing either extreme willingness to be pleased, or that the subject treated of by the "impromptu" was popular with all. "A forward, presuming puppy! What can she see to admire in him? To me, he is simply unbearable!"

In this opinion he stood alone, if one was to judge from the smiles and gay sayings that followed Gwynne's progress through the rooms.

"You know he is a privileged character," said Kate Fay, in mild defence of the saucy favorite, when Walter "wondered" to her, more pettishly than was consistent with politeness or amiability, "that she could listen patiently, much less admiringly, to the flippant nonsense that passed current as witticisms!"

"Privileges how earned, or by whom bestowed?" he asked, curily, and Kate only returned:—

"Oh, nobody minds what Bertie says! he is such a madcap, and, as we all know, has one of the best hearts in the world."

Clearly Mr. Walter Blythe was in an ill humor, and, like the malcontent prophet of old, he considered that he had a right to be angry. He was not naturally or habitually an unreasonable man, and, in extenuation of his present ungenial mood, it may as well be stated, at once, that he was very much in love, and had begun of late to conceive that he had grounds for jealousy. He had been betrothed to Mary Fay for six or seven months, and while he may have failed to do justice to some of her finest traits, he certainly esteemed himself, and was esteemed by many others, a most happy and fortunate man in having won her for his own. General observers declared them to be a well-matched couple, and those who knew them more intimately did not demur at this verdict, although some hinted sagely at his stubborn prejudices, easily awakened and difficult to overcome; at his somewhat hasty temper and ultra-fastidiousness upon divers subjects, and others shook doubting heads over the flow of native gaiety that rendered Mary thoughtless at times, and the touch of pride which gave strength and impulse to a character otherwise facile to docility—child-like in its trustfulness and simplicity. As for the betrothed maiden, she had often said to herself that she loved Walter the better for the trifling differences in their temperaments and tastes. She was essentially social in feeling and practice, and loved fun as dearly as did the vivacious Ellie Victor, who was her own best-beloved comrade and confidante. Nevertheless, she confessed to a thrill of pleasure in the consciousness that she, and she alone, could beguile the grave scholar from his books and briefs, to become a pleased spectator, if not an active participant, in the innocent amusements and hilarious converse of "the set," in which she was a leader and prime favorite. She was secretly very proud of her conquest; exultation she had the womanly wisdom to conceal from him.

For four months the course of their love was ominously smooth and clear, and neither had a doubt as to the continued tranquillity of its flow. Then came the troubler in the person of Mr. Herbert Gwynne, an early playfellow of Mary's, and, as she laughingly owned, one of her girlhood's lovers; artist, poet, and musician, who, returning from a three years' residence abroad, pitched his moving tent for a few weeks, or months, or years, as his fickle fancy might dictate, in the neighboring city of P——, and straightway fell, or, as it seemed to Mr. Blythe's startled perceptions, rushed into the very reprehensible habit of running over to Mrs. Fay's two, three, and four times per week. From his first call, he was adopted into the family circle, for the sake of former days—said Mrs. Fay and her daughters—by virtue of consummate assurance, as Mr. Blythe decided inwardly. For a while Walter was able to disguise, with very tolerable success, his irritation at the frequent and often most unwelcome intrusions of the "travelled monkey," as he pettishly dubbed him, upon the seasons hitherto consecrated to tête-à-tête interviews between the affianced pair. It was comparatively easy to endure these vexations, while he believed that they were as obnoxious to Mary as to himself. At length, he grew impatient of her smiling reception of the unceremonious guest, when a polite show of indifference, or the faintest tinge of annoyance in her demeanor would have sufficed to discourage a repetition of the offence. There was a point at which civility ceased to be expedient, and the beaming smile, the outstretched hand, and cordial word of greeting, which the young lady had ever in readiness for her old playmate, verged upon insincerity as viewed from her lover's standpoint.

One evening, after an unusually aggravating trial of this kind, Walter felt himself called upon to expostulate with his betrothed upon the unnecessary exhibition of gratification that had, beyond doubt, deluded the young painter into the persuasion that his coming was most opportune, and his society the most congenial that she could have enjoyed.

"Your kind heart leads you a little too far at times, my dearest," he said, tenderly. "It is very beautiful and amiable in you to exercise such self-denial, but, surely, in this case extreme warmth of hospitality is uncalled for, and attended with inconvenient results."

"But, Walter"—was the ingenious response, uttered in evident surprise and perplexity—"I was not hypocritical! I was really as glad to see Bertie as I seemed to be. His visits always bring me pleasure."

"Indeed! Then I beg your pardon for my mistaken officiousness," retorted the lover, in a hurt, icy tone.

"How have I displeased you? Is there any harm in my liking to see and talk with an old friend?" urged Mary, yet more puzzled.

"None, whatever. I do not presume to regulate your conduct, still less your feelings, in regard to this or any other matter. Only"—softening into the pathetic—"I was so vain as to imagine that there were times when my companionship was preferable to that of transient visitors, however entertaining they might chance to be."

"Such a supposition argues a moderate degree of penetration on your part, but no vanity," replied Mary, and her smile of arch affection banished the cloud from Walter's brow, and hushed his complainings for the time.

The calm was of short duration. The next evening, upon presenting himself in Mrs. Fay's parlor at the early hour that generally insured him a brief period for uninterrupted chat with his lady-love before the entrance of other visitors, he was disagreeably surprised at finding the ground preoccupied. The room was lighted only by the fire—the ruddy, uncertain illumination which they, as is the taste of most other courting couples, preferred to more powerful and steadier gleams, and in the centre of the dusky glow cast by the blazing coals, sat Mary and Bertie Gwynne! Blythe knew him at a glance; the well-formed head and sweeping beard were seen in profile, bent towards his companion, in an attitude strongly and unpleasantly suggestive of confidential interchange of thoughts and feeling; or, as Walter's jealous fancy would have it, of love-making. Gwynne was talking in a low, earnest tone, and two words reached Walter's ear as the door opened: "Mr. Blythe—." The entrance of the person named prevented further speech.

He could not be mistaken, for they were uttered distinctly; nor could he fail to detect the momentary consternation betrayed by both at his appearance. Mary's voice shook perceptibly in wishing him "good-evening," and Mr. Gwynne's observation upon the chilly night was infelicitous, and rather too glibly enunciated, even for his rapid tongue.

"She will tell me all about it by and by, unless the fellow has been talking downright love to her." Walter tried to ease the pain at his heart by saying, "and I don't believe she would let him go so far as that."

Nevertheless he watched, with uneasy curiosity, her shaking fingers and crimson cheeks as she lighted the lamp, a task slowly and clumsily performed. He was doomed to wait in vain for the elucidation of the little mystery. Mary never afterwards referred to the matter, nor did he.

This was the inconsiderable nucleus of the gathering mass of doubt and fearing that gradually overshadowed the heaven of his trust in her; made his spirits variable; his language oftentimes abrupt and petulant; his perceptions untrue, and his conclusions unjust. Without guessing at the real cause of this altered behavior, Mary could not but notice and be grieved by it. She surmised correctly, from many unmistakable signs, that her lover had conceived a prejudice against her old friend, but that he was, in point of fact, jealous of the position occupied by Bertie in her regard, and daily grew more uncertain as to his own standing in her affections, never occurred to her. Nor did she consider herself bound to avoid an innocent acquaintance, because, forsooth, Mr. Blythe happened not to admire him. She said to herself, that if Walter's dislike were not overcome by the time of their marriage, her pleasant intercourse with Bertie must, as a matter of duty, cease, or at least be greatly restricted and different in its character; until that date, she assumed to herself the right to select her own associates, and to mingle freely with her mother's guests. At heart, she was a little sore, and not a little annoyed sometimes, at Walter's coldness and brusquerie to her favorite. "He might be civil to him, if only because he knows I like him!" she argued, in her simple-hearted ignorance.

To-night she had let a sign of this feeling escape her; had spoken for the first time in anger to her betrothed husband; for the first time admitted and cherished an unkind thought of him. "Will he make me despise him in the end?" she said bitterly to herself, when she left him after her retort upon his sneer at Bertie.

Walter, on his part, was amazed, wounded, and indignant at the unlooked-for rejoinder; less displeased with her, however, than with the cause of this, their initiatory quarrel. The more he pondered upon his grievances, the more savage was his mood towards the unlucky rhymester. "Trusting heart and fancies high," indeed! What right had the jackanapes to know anything about her feelings and fancies? Was not the fact of his undertaking the delineation of her character an arrogation of his ability and the privilege to represent her properly before the less fortunate many who had not had his opportunities of studying her, this rare missal which he, Walter Blythe, would have had clasped closely from all touch and sight except his own! "Our well-beloved, poetic Mary!" Blythe's wrath waxed to its height as he rehearsed and dwelt upon this line. No other man should, with impunity, call his affianced wife, "well-beloved!"

"Have you any message for Cornelia?" he asked, coldly, when he prepared to leave with the rest at the close of the evening. "I shall be in the city to-morrow, I think."

Mary looked troubled. Never before since their betrothal had he neglected to avail himself of his prerogative to linger a few minutes, oftener a few hours, after the departure of other company, to say over the "good-nights" so sweet to lovers' lips and lovers' ears.

"No, thank you," she said, trying to speak cheerfully—"or nothing but my love, if you see her, and mention that we cannot give up the hope of having her with us on Christmas-day."

"Mary! Mary Fay!" called out Ellie Victor's ringing tones. "Is your letter to Cornelia ready? Mr. Gwynne is waiting for it. He wants to catch the twelve o'clock train, so you must hurry!"

With the memory of a stern, reproachful face burning in upon brain and heart, Mary hastened to inclose the luckless doggerel in an envelope, and direct it to "Miss Cornelia Blythe, No. 70—Place, P—By Mr. Gwynne."

"I could have told him that Bertie had asked me to allow him to be the bearer, and I promised that he should, before I knew that he was going to the city," she thought, resentfully, as she put the packet with a smile no one could guess was forced, into her postman's hand. "But, if he chooses thus wilfully to misinterpret my motives and to sit in judgment upon every action, I will not stoop to set him right!"

Walter's hat and overcoat were so overheard by others that he was obliged to wait some minutes in the hall after making his adieux in the parlor, before the missing articles could be found and identified. He was still stooping over the commingled mass of wraps, and tugging at a sleeve, the lining of which seemed familiar, when he overheard a colloquy in the door-way behind him.

"On Wednesday, then, at the usual place!" said young Gwynne, softly, imploringly. "Do not fail me! You do not know how much my heart—"

Walter lost the rest of the sentence, but the answer was audible.

"Never fear! have not I as much at stake as yourself?"

He recognized the agitated murmur with wildly throbbing pulses. Careless as to whether they saw him or not, he seized his cloak and strode out, without waiting to put it on; his soul a seething chaos of suspicion, incredulity, and grieved love. What was the clue to this thickening mystery? What was he to believe? what to fear? His noble nature made one mighty effort to assert its supremacy in his last waking thought, as the dawn penetrated his chamber after a sleepless night. "Whatever else I may question, I must not doubt her goodness and purity, or her constancy to me!"

CHAPTER II.

ANOTHER evening found Walter early at Mrs. Fay's. He was expected, as he perceived at a glance, upon entering the parlor. The lamp was turned down to a dim spark, like a drowsy eye indulgently winking at all tender scenes; the fire was merry and busy, a hundred tongues of variously-tinted flames leaping and quivering over the red-hot bed of anthracite; his favorite chair was drawn into its corner, and beside it was the cushion, whereon it was always Mary's choice to sit during their heart-talks. Mary herself met him midway in the room; gave him both hands, and lifted to his offered caress a face so expressive of deep, true affection and joyous welcome, that the legion of doubts that had beset him all the day—fight and reason with them as he would—fled away like mists before the glad light of morning.

"You do care for me, then, darling!"

"Have you ever dared to believe the contrary?" was the retort, saucily loving; then, more seriously, she added: "If you are not secure in the possession of my love now, dear Walter, I am afraid that you will always remain an incorrigible infidel."

Then, if ever, was the time for him to speak; to avow, without reserve, what had been his temptations, his misgivings, and tortures, but his courage deserted him. He could not mar the pure happiness of this hour by these details.

For a wonder, they were left to themselves all the early part of the evening. A drizzling rain was falling, that froze by the time it touched the earth, and other visitors kept away. Mrs. Fay was slightly indisposed, and had already retired to her chamber, and Kate's sympathetic heart warned her not to appear down stairs. They talked long, freely, and earnestly—the two who hoped, at no distant day, to share one united and indivisible life; talked with a fulness of confidence, an outgushing of feeling in word, look, and action, that neither had ever displayed before. Bertie Gwynne's name was not once mentioned. This might have been an accidental omission on Mary's part; with Walter it was, in the outset, a studied avoidance of an offensive topic, a dread of touching the sore spot; afterwards, he forgot the very existence of his audacious rival.

Eleven o'clock struck as Blythe arose to depart.

"I had almost forgotten that I have papers to prepare which must go to the city to-morrow," he said. "Work, for which I shall not have time in the morning."

Was it imagination, or did she start slightly as he said this? He could not determine, although his arm enclasped her.

"Did you not go to-day, as you intended?"

"No, I was unavoidably detained in my office."

Then ensued a silence of some length, and an awkward constraint that was not many removes from coldness. Whatever was its cause, neither appeared disposed to recognize its existence, but Walter remarked the assumed carelessness with which Mary ended it by asking—

"What train will you probably take?"

"The 8.20, I think; but my mind is not quite made up as to that. I must be early in town."

Another pause, and he put a question in his turn.

"Why do you inquire? Have you any thought of going yourself?"

"I! Why, you know I went over twice last week, and I am too busy to run about much more before Christmas. To-morrow is Wednesday, remember, and Friday will be the 25th."

Instinctively, Walter's arm fell away from her waist. He did not need to be reminded that the morrow was Wednesday. He had striven for twenty-four hours to forget that she had an appointment with Bertie Gwynne on that day. He believed now—and the thought gave him exquisite pain—that she was going to the city to keep this engagement, and that she was chagrined at finding that he would also be there. If Mary remarked his change of position, she did not attribute it to any altered feeling, for her next words were full of hope.

"I never before anticipated so delightful a Christmas. I was not happy last year. Do you recollect that we disagreed seriously about some trifling matter on Christmas eve?"

"Yes." He was looking moodily into the fire, and spoke abstractedly.

"And how we met at Mrs. Victor's, Christmas night, and behaved like a couple of foolish children, affecting not to be aware of one another's presence, except when we met face to face? You were all devotion to Laura Elbertson—only devoted swains do not usually look so savage and gloomy as you did, while trying to be agreeable; and I pretended, I dare say, with like success, to be interested and charmed by Will Beekman's syllabub chat. But my heart was aching all the while for one kind look or word from you. Oh dear, what hard work gayety was that night! And I had no right to ask or offer an explanation, for you had not then told me the pretty story you rehearsed in my willing ears some months later. I wonder if we shall ever behave so ridiculously again!" She laughed lightly in saying this, and clasping her hands over his arm, as she leaned upon it, gazed up in his face with a certain wistful tenderness.

"I hope we shall never again have cause to do so," was the quiet reply.

"There was no cause then, except in our disordered fancies. After all, clouds and storms have their mission, no less than sunshine. I never knew, until we had that apparently unfortunate misunderstanding, how much I prized your society—what I then chose to call your friendship."

None but an obstinate, or thoroughly soured nature could have resisted this strain of artless reminiscence. Blythe was not proof against the sweet fascination of language and look. With a sudden, passionate impulse, he drew her to his bosom, and pressed his lips again and again to hers.

"My precious one! I wish you could never forget the lesson thus learned! It is the only thing in which I excel you, dearest—in the strength and fervor of my love!"

"You have no right to say that, Walter! You should trust me!"—

Here the door-bell rang with a startling peal, and they had barely time to withdraw to a respectful and decorous distance apart from each other, when Ellie Victor flashed into the room in all the glory of a full toilette.

"I stopped the carriage, as we were driving home, Molly dear, seeing the light in here. We have had a stupid evening at Mrs. Hoyt's; you may thank your stars that you stayed at home! and I thought it wise to leave early, that I might be fresh for our expedition. Oh, Mr. Blythe! I declare I did not see that it was you until this instant—coming, as I did, from the darkness into a lighted room! I called, as I was about to say, Mary, to ask if you had any orders for town. I am going over in the morning, at a barbarously early hour. Think of it, Mr. Blythe, in the 8.20 train! Why, I am seldom up at that time on other days!"

"Mr. Blythe will be a fellow-passenger," said Mary. "You see that others can be as industrious as yourself."

"You don't say so!"

Why should the lively sprite look suddenly non-plussed, and cast a quick, questioning glance at her friend? Was this fancy, also?

"I make no rash promises as to my movements, should this dull weather continue," she said, recovering herself. "Ten to one I shall oversleep myself, after all. I must not keep the horses and my gallant escort out there in the cold. Mary, my love, take pencil and paper and write down for me the address—name and all—of that French woman who does up laces and muslins in such heavenly style. I can't trust my memory with such things."

The address was a long one, and taxed the memory of the writer, for she paused twice or thrice, reflectively, before it was completed. Walter, by the purest accident, caught sight of the slip of paper as it was transferred to Ellie. There were four closely-written lines upon it.

"All right! I shall not lose it!" Ellie tucked it into her belt. "Good-night, dearie! Good-night, Mr. Blythe! If you don't see me in the morning, you may conclude that the soporific draughts of small talk with which I have been plied this evening have proved too much for my resolution of early rising!" And she skipped out.

Mr. Blythe made it his business to walk twice through the train on the following morning, which, by the by, was clear and frosty, and ascertained, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that Miss Victor was not one of his travelling companions. He could hardly have told why he was dissatisfied at the result of his search, or why he associated her non-appearance with Mary's secret errand to P——. Acute lawyer as he was, he had an uncomfortable impression that he was being outwitted by some one—he was not exactly certain whom; did not credit the theory of the effect of the drowsy draughts upon Miss Ellie's senses. He felt half assured, indeed, that she was quite too wide awake for him.

Business claimed his exclusive attention after he reached the city; banished from his mind all thought of personal vexations or wrongs. It was past two o'clock when he parted from his client, and took his way down the fashionable thoroughfare of the place in quest of a luncheon that might atone, in some measure, for his hurried breakfast. He was in a sunny mood, and regaled himself, as he strolled along, by the pleasing reflection that he had performed an arduous and delicate piece of business in a masterly manner, and gained, besides the praise of his employer, a handsome fee by the transaction. Supplied with this flavorful sauce for a dinner, he reached a restaurant, and walked in. The plate-glass windows of the establishment were crowded with Christmas emblems and every imaginable dainty befitting that season. The central ornament was a pyramid of hot-house fruit, and Blythe stopped just inside the entrance to inspect it. Standing thus, his attention was diverted to a carriage stopping before the next building—an eminent jeweller's. A gentleman sprang from it to the pavement, shut the door behind him, looked intently up, down, and across the street, into the store itself, then unclosed the vehicle, and assisted two veiled ladies to descend.

The cavalier was Bertie Gwynne; his companions, in spite of the concealment of their features and their unremarkable attire, were as easily recognizable by the looker-on. Mary Fay and Ellie Victor!

A muttered exclamation burst from Walter's lips. Yet, why should he be surprised? Had he not heard the appointment for Wednesday? Was it not plain as daylight that Ellie's unseasonable visit of the preceding evening referred to this very scheme, whatever it was, and that Mary's pencilled note designated the later train by which they were to leave Kingsville, in order to avoid an inopportune meeting with himself?

"Tricked! duped! why not betrayed and forsaken as well?" was his comment, as he threw himself into a seat beside a table, a position commanding a view of the carriage. "It is high time that I examined into the meaning of this wretched plotting! Why am I selected as its victim?"

He was in no condition to consider the matter dispassionately; to arrive at any rational solution of the enigma; yet a less prejudiced, or less hasty man would, even if moved to an equal degree of anger, have suspended judgment until a further investigation of the case had proved the existence of evil in the mystery. There was nothing ignoble in Walter Blythe's character; still, he was hardly capable of exercising a lofty candor of opinion, or a generous charity, where his personal dignity was wounded, his private feelings outraged. He had grown to dislike young Gwynne; therefore, his complicity in these underhand dealings was peculiarly distasteful. He was almost convinced that Mary regarded the artist with undue favor; ergo, their partnership in a plan for circumventing himself, and securing each other's company, must mean mischief, and mischief only. One thing was sure—and to this he reverted again and yet again, in his angry musings—whatever design was in process of incubation, his betrothed had trifled with him unwarrantably: deceived him grossly and deliberately; equivocated unpardonably! Moreover, was she not running directly counter to his known wishes in keeping up this clandestine intercourse with a man whom he could not abide? Did not this persistency of communication and association with him, carried on in partial secrecy, through fear, doubtless, of her lover's strictures, argue an infatuated fondness for the conceited puppy, an unconquerable relish for his society? And Ellie Victor—the pert minx! He ground his teeth at thought of her malicious enjoyment in the manœuvres for thwarting and outgeneralling him. She was just the girl to delight in the office of confidante in any intrigue, the more complicated the better.

There were few more discontented and unhappy men in the length and breadth of that goodly city on that twenty-third of December, than was the promising young lawyer, who sat gnawing his lip and pulling savagely at his whiskers while with knit brows he affected to read the bill of fare presented by an obsequious waiter. Choosing sundry comestibles at random, to rid himself of the man's presence, he dismissed him with the order and resumed his watch of the carriage in front of the jeweller's. He had to wait a long time—so long that his oysters were stone cold when he finally recollected that he ought to make a feint of swallowing them. At last, when impatience was almost desperation, and his indignant broodings were hardening into resolves as indignant, he saw Gwynne emerge from the store, and after going through the same ceremony of inspecting the streets, as had attended his arrival, he beckoned to his fair charges, and they joined him. He assisted them into the carriage, and as he did so, Mary's veil was blown or brushed aside, revealing a countenance, animated and happy, smiling upon her escort. Bertie placed himself upon the front seat, opposite her, looking supremely contented—the picture of delight, in fact, and the coachman drove on.

Well?

He had seen all that was to be gathered for the present; an "all" that may seem trivial and unimportant to the sensible, impartial reader, but which meant much, and weighed heavily with a proud, suffering, implacable man. Blythe looked and felt more like a judge prepared to try and, if need there was, to sentence a criminal, than a grieved lover, as he paid for the dinner he had not eaten and turned his back upon the restaurant.

He did not return until late that night, and it was eight o'clock on Christmas eve when he presented himself at Mrs. Fay's door. In the parlors all was light, and mirth, and bustle. A tall tree stood in the arch between the rooms, and a bevy of girls were fluttering about it, like humming-birds, busy with streamers, gilt balls, and colored candles. He caught but a glimpse of the lively tableau, through the half open door, as he passed on to the library where visitors were to be received on this evening. Here he was left in solitude for several minutes, a circumstance he would not have cared for at another time, but which now aggravated the sense of injury under which he labored. Mary came in, by and by, smiling and rosy with exercise and pleasure.

"Excuse my tardiness!" she began, too excited to note her suitor's lowering brow, "but we are all busy with the Christmas tree. We had to get it ready to-night, in order to judge of the effect by lamp-light, and so much of the design was mine that the girls would not let me leave them until I had instructed them how to carry on the work. I wish I could give you a peep at it, but gentlemen visitors are rigorously excluded for the present."

At this juncture the door unclosed, and Mr. Gwynne appeared, his hands full of streamers.

"I beg pardon!" He halted in undissembled embarrassment. "I did not know that you were here, Mr. Blythe. I came to ask you, Mary, if you knew where the red candles were put. We cannot find them, high or low."

Mary colored brightly, as was natural, at his entrance, inasmuch as she was standing by Walter's chair, her hand upon his shoulder, and Bertie must see that he had interrupted a love-scene. Walter was not blind to their mutual confusion, nor backward in drawing his own inference from it. Having obtained the desired information, the intruder retired, without loss of time, inwardly execrating his luck for having forced upon him this awkward encounter. Mary drew a footstool to Walter's side and sat down, leaning lightly against his knee.

"I thought gentlemen visitors were rigorously excluded," he said, with a sardonic smile.

"I was about to add that Bertie was an exception," said Mary, innocently. "He met Ellie in the city, and volunteered his services for this evening. Having passed a winter in Germany, to which climate Christmas trees are indigenous, he is supposed to be more au fait to them than are we, to whom they are only known as exotics."

"Met Ellie in the city!" Further equivocation! Why not own that she had herself been one of the party?

"Mr. Gwynne is a fortunate individual," he remarked, sneeringly. "It seems only necessary for him to volunteer to act in any capacity, and he is accepted."

"He is popular, and is always willing to serve those whom he loves," rejoined Mary, firm in her friend's defence.

"Willingness which those who are so unhappy as not to belong to that class are apt to construe into meddling—disagreeable officiousness!" Walter pursued, losing control of his temper with each instant.

"The best of us are liable to be misunderstood," was Mary's answer, the rising glow upon her cheek contradicted by the calm dignity of her manner. "We had better not talk of Bertie, Walter, until you know and like him better. I am persuaded that you will, some day."

"You are over-sanguine as to an event which I am far from considering desirable; but let that pass for the present. It would be folly for me to attempt to disguise from you, Mary, the truth that my faith in you is no longer so firm as it once was; that the occurrences of the last few weeks have done much towards changing my opinion of your character." He plunged into the midst of the subject with savage abruptness, exasperated by the conversation that preceded it. "I believed you ingenuous, upright in thought and action, and faithful in your professed attachment for myself. I have been irresistibly driven to doubt all these things."

"By what circumstances, may I ask?"

Mary had turned very pale, and her clear tone was less steady than she would have had it, but there was a dangerous spark in her eye.

To his astonishment, Blythe's proofs were not directly producible. He thought he had them at his fingers' ends; but, "irresistibly driven" though he was, when he turned to summon the impelling forces, he found but trifles light as air. Mary's simple directness had put them all to flight. He could not, without a sacrifice, and an ignominious one, of his manliness, retail to her the petty occurrences that had been seized upon by his jealous imagination as evidence against her. A word here; a look there; now a whisper, accidentally overheard; then the unseen pencillings, which he chose to guess were treasonable to him; the recital would debase him in his own eyes and in hers. Yet the impression made by the aggregate of these was not removed; indeed, it appeared to grow more powerful under the irritation he experienced at this unforeseen balk in his proceedings. But one thing remained to him of sufficient importance to be handled with effect, and he hastily dragged this forward, leaving the rest to follow as they would.

"Why could you not tell me that you meant to go to the city, yesterday?" he demanded, more roughly than he was aware of. "Why, when I inquired if this were your intention, did you virtually deny that you had any such step in view? Why change your hour for starting, upon learning that I designed taking the same train? Why signify this alteration in your plans to your accomplice, Miss Victor, under the pretence of writing the address of a laundress? What was the meaning of your secret appointment with your favored swain, Mr. Gwynne—an engagement which I heard him entreat you not to forget, and which you acknowledged was as momentous to yourself as to him? Why did you dread to walk the streets unveiled, yesterday, as is your custom, unless because of the consciousness that your conduct was blamable, and that your companions would be objectionable to some person? Was that one, myself—your betrothed husband?"

And having reached this climax in his examination of the prisoner at the bar, he paused for a reply with magisterial sternness.

"I am willing to believe that you do not insult me wantonly," said Mary, rising and speaking proudly. "But, if you desire an answer to any or all of your questions, your requisition must be made in a different tone and spirit. I deny the right of any one—much less a gentleman—to interrogate me in the strain you have seen fit to employ. It is unkind and rude. I could not respect myself, if I submitted to it. Tell me what you wish to know, what you believe to have been my sin, and I will reply."

If Walter's self-command were in peril before, it was wrecked now.

"An ingenious subterfuge!" he said, scornfully. "For Heaven's sake, let us make an end of clever evasions and double-dealing! They are foreign to my taste, congenial as they may be to yours. I have asked plain questions, and none that I did not conceive I had a perfect right to put to you—none that you need hesitate to answer, if your conscience is clear of the knowledge that you have practised deception upon me, if you are guiltless of premeditated perfidy."

"Premeditated perfidy!" repeated Mary, meeting his accusing eye with a lofty disdain. "Dare you suspect me of that, Walter Blythe? Do you really mean that you doubt my fidelity to you? Do you accuse me of perjury?"

"How can I do otherwise?"—and, his evil genius urging him on, he added, insanely—"she who can be false in one respect, will be in another. The woman who can connive with others to deceive her lover, deliberately and utterly, even in so trivial a matter as the least of the instances I have enumerated, will not shrink from sacrificing her plighted troth, if the temptation offers."

"There! you have said enough! If such is your judgment of my character and conduct; such the suspicions you have let outweigh my solemn vows of affection and constancy, we are better apart. Our union would only insure the lifelong misery of both. I thought you knew me better, that you would believe me incapable of such sins as those you charge me with. I see now that you would never have understood me. We have made a great mistake—both of us—one that is best remedied by forgetfulness."

Before he could reply—before he fully divined her meaning, so misled was he by her seeming calmness, her unimpassioned tone and tearless eye, she had dropped her betrothal ring in his hand and was gone.

She went straight back to the parlor; replied with a smile and pleasant word to Katie's whispered exclamation of surprise at her speedy return, and Ellie's scoldings for having absented herself so long; picked up an unfinished wreath from the carpet, and, too sick and tremulous to stand, sank upon the ottoman in the corner while she went on with her task. Bertie Gwynne came over to her, directly, with evergreen branches and cord; knelt before her, and took up the other end of the garland. He worked silently and gravely, a novelty for him, but his quick sight detected her changing color, and the hard, bright look in her eye; he heard her irregular breathing; felt the shudder that shook the wreath as the front door clanged to after the retiring visitor, and, as her fingers moved among the stiff twigs, he saw that the pledge ring was missing.

Walter, in shutting the door behind him, glanced unconsciously in at the lighted parlor windows. The shutters were fast, but the movable slats of one were turned at such an angle that he could see plainly the interior, the little crowd of busy workers, and, withdrawn some distance from them, Mary, apparently as happy as the merriest there, with Bertie Gwynne, as co-laborer, on his knees beside her!

CHAPTER III.

LITTLE by little the truth with regard to the present relation of the two who were lately betrothed, leaked out, as the lapse of weeks found Mr. Blythe still an absentee from the house where he had formerly enjoyed such distinguished privileges. As to the causes of the estrangement, tongues were busy and opinions were various. Mary's mother and sister only knew that there had been a quarrel; that Walter had made demands which Mary deemed unreasonable, and that upon this issue they had parted. No one else was informed of even that much. Bertie Gwynne may have had his conjectures; Ellie Victor assuredly had hers, but neither dared approach the subject with Mary. If she suffered, she made no moan in mortal hearing, asked no help from human sympathy. The world saw in her the same cheerful readiness to contribute her share towards the general entertainment of her acquaintances; missed no gleeful cadence in her laugh or speech. Her friends recognized the purifying effect of sorrow only in her increased thoughtfulness for others' woe, her deeper pity and tenderness for others' sorrows.

Walter Blythe had never been eminent for his social qualities, but since the dissolution of his engagement, they were in danger of falling into total disuse. Too proud to betray his hurt by immediate seclusion from the scenes that had become irksome to him, he yet gradually allowed the claims of business to encroach upon the time he had once given to society. He worked diligently and successfully in his profession, and with added cares and honors came graver looks and more rigid lines in features and brow. All respected, some feared, few loved the lonely ascetic, who never complained of isolation, and had not an intimate friend upon the broad earth.

Some such bitter confession as this, he was making to himself upon what was now a dreary anniversary with him—Christmas Eve—two years after his parting with Mary Fay. The early tea of his bachelor boarding-house was over, and he had returned to his office; shut out the view of the illuminated street; the happy, important-looking faces that thronged it, with the sounds of merriment and congratulation that arose, in an inspiring hum, upon the night, and set himself down to work upon a dry and tedious law-case. What was Christmas to him, more than any other winter night? Anniversaries and holidays were humbugs, frivolities fit for babies only!

"I have never before anticipated so delightful a Christmas!"

How well he recollected her cheery accent! her look of lively pleasure! how vividly came back to him the picture of that girlish figure, her attitude of confiding fondness as her head drooped against his arm; the very touch of her hand upon his—even the fragrance of the tea-rose in her hair! What spell was there in this season to invoke this apparition—to force him to face it while he struggled vainly against the tide of memories flowing in upon his soul?

"I wonder if we shall ever behave so ridiculously again!"

He had not forgotten a word that she said on the last happy evening he had ever known. How happily she laughed in saying it! how frankly and fearlessly she gazed into his eyes! Had he behaved ridiculously? Was he not rather doing this now in questioning the wisdom of a step so often reviewed—so often pronounced wise and necessary!

"Pooh! it is late in the day to talk of that!" His lip curled and his hand moved toward his pen.

"After all, clouds and showers have their mission no less than sunshine!"

Still that phantom on the hearthstone—still that voice of remembered music, plaintive now, borne as it was from the never-to-return Long Ago!

"Perhaps so!" he said, this time aloud and desperately, "and so has the tornado, but its mission is death, not mercy!"

His head dropped upon his breast; deeper gloom overspread his features. He was looking back upon the ruins of his heart's temple, the darkening, and storm, and destruction that had overtaken him in life's fresh morning.

"You have no right to say that, Walter! You should trust me!"—

The sweet, persuasive accents seemed actually ringing in his ears. How different would have been their relative positions, how altered his present surroundings on this evening, if he had continued firm in that trust—if she had proved worthy of its continuance!

He absolutely groaned aloud. The sound aroused him to a sense of his own weakness.

"Fool!" he muttered, angrily. "Dreaming, droning idiot! no more of this! What folly to regret the loss of one whose unworthiness was so plainly proved—of whose infidelity there remained not the shadow of a doubt!"

His hand sought the pen again—now, with a resolute grasp. It encountered the smooth, satiny surface of an envelope across which the pen had fallen—a sealed packet, which had been left there during his absence at tea-time.

"How heavy it is! an invitation to some Christmas fooleries, I suppose!" he said, opening it.

There dropped out two cards, tied together with white ribbon, and a third, single and larger. "Mrs. Victor. At Home, Monday, January 2d, 8 o'clock P. M." One of the be-ribboned bits of pasteboard bore the name of "Eleanor Victor;" the other, "Herbert A. Gwynne."

Walter leaped from his chair in the excess of his astonishment.

"Impossible!" then he sat gazing at the two names in blank incredulity.

Into this stupor presently crept a faint, but delicious sense of relief. Mary could never be his, but she was not to marry Bertie Gwynne! He had not known until now how he lived in perpetual dread of this event, how useless had been his attempts to school himself to the contemplation of it as a not remote certainty. After turning the cards over and over, and re-reading the title upon each, for perhaps five minutes, he espied a folded paper upon his knee, which he had drawn with them from their envelope.

Mr. Blythe will oblige me by calling here for half an hour this evening. I have something of interest to communicate to him.

ELEANOR VICTOR.

Saturday, Dec. 24th.

At almost any other time he might have hesitated to obey this peremptory summons; would assuredly have sneered at its tone of quiet authority, wondering "if that rattlepate flirt imagined that he had nothing better to do than to dance attendance upon her whims!" Now he looked at his watch, saw that it was already eight o'clock, huddled his papers into a heap, extinguished the lamp and went forth into the brilliant outer scene. Miss Victor was at home and alone in a private parlor. She received him with a grave cordiality, such as he had never observed in her before.

"It has been a long time since we last met, Mr. Blythe," she said, inviting him to a seat.

He murmured something, not very audibly, about "the pressure of business."

"A long time," pursued Ellie, reflectively, "and to both of us have come some changes in that period."

Walter regained his self-possession.

"Permit me to offer my congratulations upon the very happy change to which you are now looking forward; I was ignorant that such an event was in prospect until to-night."

"Thank you!" responded the belle, composedly. "I fancied that you knew nothing of it. It is an attachment of long standing—an engagement formed more than two years ago, although not publicly acknowledged until within a few months."

"Is that really so?" Walter faced her quickly. "I thought—I believed—I was led to imagine!"—

"That Bertie was attached to Mary Fay?" finished Ellie, coolly. "This misapprehension was the cause of your separation. Am I right?"

"Your informant was, without doubt, acquainted with the facts of that unhappy affair," returned he, haughtily. "You need no confirmation from me, Miss Victor."

"I beg your pardon! If you allude to Mary Fay, I can only declare that she has never uttered a syllable to me with regard to the matter. I have been led to the conclusion I have stated to you by a variety of circumstances—chiefly by my woman's wit." She smiled here—the old gleam of irrepressible playfulness.

"But if you will give me your attention for a few minutes, I have a little Christmas tale to relate which may interest you. Two years ago—early in December, my friend, Mary Fay, made application through me to Mr. Gwynne to paint her miniature, he having acquired some celebrity in that branch of his profession. This picture was designed as a surprise-gift to you on Christmas-day."

"Miss Victor!"

"Listen until you hear all! No one knew of the plan excepting ourselves, her mother and sister, and we were all bound to secrecy. In order to give Mr. Gwynne frequent sittings at his studio, we were continually contriving visits to the city. I always accompanied Mary. Our final excursion was upon the twenty-third, when we went together to the jeweller's to select the gold frame for the miniature and to get a chain woven of her hair which she had ordered to accompany it. We knew that you were going to the city that day, and were in mortal terror of meeting you at this the eleventh hour. I never saw Mary so intent upon any other project as upon this. She was so joyous—so elate, when we were coming back that night—poor child!"

Walter's face was turned away, but she saw his hand steal up to his forehead, as if he would have smote it.

"It so chanced that I learned, a week later, that you dined that day in the restaurant next door to our jeweller's. A friend of mine saw you there at the very hour we had chosen for our errand. I should never have thought of this circumstance again, but for a remark made to me yesterday by Kate Martyn. She called here on her way home from her mother's, where she had passed the day. She said that Mary was not well, and quite out of spirits; that she had said to her sister, more unguardedly than she is apt to speak now-a-days, that it was a painful anniversary with her; that she had once, on this day of the month, made herself very unhappy while prosecuting what she thought was a harmless scheme for another's pleasure. And then Kate further opened my eyes by asking me if I had never noticed how jealous you used to be of Bertie—Mr. Gwynne. So, Mr. Blythe, I collected these hints into a theory, which was, that Mr. Gwynne and I had been innocently the instruments of bringing sorrow to the heart of our dearest friend. It may seem like a betrayal of confidence on my part to tell you all this, but I could not feel content to enter upon a new, and—and—what I hope will be a happy life, without making an effort to repair the mischief. If I have erred in judgment, I hope you will appreciate my motive."

Before she had finished this sentence, Walter was upon his feet.

"Mrs. Gwynne—Miss Victor, I would say—you are an angel, and I am a fool—a besotted, miserable wretch! Heaven bless you! Good-night!"

While she was still rubbing the little hand, upon which his parting grip had left four red streaks, he stood at Mrs. Fay's door. It was opened by a servant, to whom he was a stranger.

"Yes—Miss Fay was at home. Would the gentleman step into the library, where she was sitting?"

Mary arose with gentle ladylike grace to receive the visitor. Every vestige of color forsook her face at seeing who it was. Walter advanced, with bowed head and averted eyes.

"Mary! I am not worthy of your love, but can you forgive me?" The prodigal's prayer was not uttered with more profound self-abasement, more lowly reverence.

Twelve o'clock rang out in solemn sweetness from a neighboring belfry before they parted. They ceased speaking to count the strokes, then Mary's uplifted eyes glittered with happy tears, and Walter's were full of moved tenderness in looking down into them.

"Peace and good-will, once more, darling! May it be forever!"

"Amen!" she echoed fervently. An instant later, smiles chased away the tears. "Wait here a moment!" and she flitted away.

Soon returning, she brought a small velvet case and laid it in his hand. "It has never been opened since that terrible night. Will you prize it the less because it caused us grief?"

Within was the long delayed Christmas-gift, the frame of chased gold surmounting and protecting a just and beautiful picture of herself, and attached to it was the chain of dark, silky hair.

"I do not deserve it!" Walter tried to say, but there came instead only a great sob, as he caught both portrait and original to his heart.

THE SEASONS OF THE HEART.

BY FURBUSH FLINT.

Ah, how the changeful seasons of our lives
Mock at the beautiful contrasts of the year!
Chilling with frost the Summer's joyful prime,
Or wreathing Winter's snowy head with flowers.

I saw a maiden, fair, and lithe, and young,
With braided hair of dark and silken gloss,
Pressing her rosy face against the pane;
The snow was falling on the leafless earth
And whitening all the landscape—and her eyes,
Beneath the shadow of their half-dropt lids,
Followed the floating mazes of the storm;
And from her lips, with warm and fragrant breath
There came a carol, merry as a bird's,
Born in the summer of her careless heart.

I saw a man with silver-threaded hair
Sit down upon a flowery bank of Spring,
When nature all was musical and sigh—
"Ah, woe is me! I may not live again
The days misspent and blighted; had I died
While yet the dew was on my morning path,
It would have been a terrible thing to feel
That Spring would plant fresh violets on my grave,
And Summer shadow them with dancing boughs,
And Autumn scatter there his dying leaves,
And Winter cover all with pearly frost,
And I be mouldering motionless and low;
But I have loved, and learned that love can die—
Have toiled for wealth, and found it brought not peace—
Have sought for fame, and known that fame is air;
And now, the flowery Spring, the Summer's glow,
And Autumn, with his many-colored guise,
Are but one solemn season of decay,
Merged in the dreary winter of my soul!"

THERE is no condition so low but may have hopes; nor any so high that it is out of the reach of fears.

BROTHER RICHARD.

BY GRACE GARDNER.

A FEW days passed. Meantime Annie exerted herself zealously, and one morning she broke into the cottage rather earlier and more abruptly than usual. They were at breakfast. She could not help noticing the table. The fare was frugal, but there was something in the arrangement, the snowy cloth, the antique china, the old-fashioned silver given to Margaret by her grandmother, that gave Annie a strange desire to accept their cordial invitation to join them, although she had already breakfasted. She thought she had never tasted chocolate so good as that in the small, ancient cup. Perhaps it was because she had so much happiness to impart that made her think so. She could not long withhold this good news.

"I hope I shall be able to take lessons in painting, after all, dear Miss Rivers. The Academy Committee have a lady in view to whom they will offer the vacant situation this afternoon, and besides, there is a class of eight girls besides myself who wish to take lessons. Do you believe she will be willing to accept? Dear Miss Rivers, it is yourself!"

A beautiful color stole into Margaret's cheek, pale from too great confinement and want of exercise. She leaned over and kissed Annie's fair, round cheek, which glowed with pleasure, for it was Margaret's first kiss. Margaret with wealth and position, had not lost a certain charm of manner which both impressed and flattered, and when she condescended to exert herself it was not possible to help being pleased.

"It is to you, then, my dear Miss Leigh, we are indebted for this good fortune. I need hardly tell you that I will accept the situation and the class gladly." Margaret's words of thanks were few, but they were given in a manner that made Annie's heart throb with pleasure.

Mrs. Rivers did not comprehend at first. "Yes, Margaret always liked painting. Is Signor Manzinni to give her more lessons? And your easel, where is it? I have not seen it of late."

The committee came in during the day, and an offer was formally made and accepted. It was a generous one, and was owing to Mr. Leigh, who was known to be a judge of the art, and who had spoken of her pictures in high terms.

And Margaret felt no fear of having undertaken what she could not perform; for she knew if she possessed any one talent, it was that for painting, and that talent had been assiduously cultivated.

No more sewing now for Margaret Rivers, after that in hand was finished—no more debts, no more suffering for food; her care and anxiety in a great measure were over, their heavy pressure on heart and brain removed, and she gradually became her old self—more genial, less haughty and reserved.

In the Academy, she gave great satisfaction to her employers, and her pupils loved her dearly. Annie, she was pleased to find, evinced great natural taste, and she took infinite pains with her, as the only way she could as yet show her gratitude.

There was to be a large party in the village. Annie was invited. It was the first large party to which she had received an invitation, and she was full of pleasant excitement in the anticipation. She was describing to Margaret her dress for the occasion—

"Oh, it is so lovely, Margaret (she had some time since dropped the formal Miss Rivers)! and it is becoming, too. It was made in the city, and came last night. There is only one thing I want to make my toilet complete, and that, it is impossible to procure here. If I only had some lace like that of Cousin Nell's; it is almost priceless, and is the one object of my ambition; and yet you would think it needed washing, sadly, Margaret."

Margaret smiled. She had seen more of such lace than Annie thought. She felt glad that she could now in some slight measure return Annie's kindness and generosity. She went to a trunk and from an inner tray took out some rare old lace.

"Dear Annie, you will give me pleasure by accepting this. I wore it once only—at the Queen's drawing-room—and shall have no further use for it."

"The Queen's drawing-room!" Annie looked up bewildered, then down at the elegant lace, but all other thoughts were absorbed in the pleasure of contemplating it. She started up, with eyes sparkling with delight.

"Oh, dear Margaret! can you mean it? But I must not take it. Papa would not be willing, it would be such a costly present. It is far richer and more beautiful than Cousin Nell's."

"Annie, dear, I am glad to have had it, since you like it. You must take it. I did not refuse your generous present, that which came to us in our moment of greatest need," she said, with meaning.

Annie colored, but was too delicate to take further notice of her words.

"I want to take it so much; it is so beautiful. I will ask papa if I may. What will Nell say when she sees it? She is coming soon." As gay and pleasure loving as she was unselfish, Annie danced round the room. "I shall tease papa so hard to let me keep it. Thank you, thank you, dear, dearest Margaret. Good-by." And the gay, good girl ran home with her treasure, having first won a promise from Margaret to come in before she went to the party. "To come right into the library without ringing—she would be there."

Annie could not be quite so sure of being alone in the library. Her brother Richard had come home during the day, and that room was his favorite place. So that when she came down full dressed to await Margaret's coming, he was there, and though she did not want him, but to have Margaret all to herself, it was not the easiest thing to tell a dark, stately six-footer that he had better run away!

Annie was in the midst of an earnest dissertation to him on the merits of her laces—a costly present from Miss Rivers, but which papa had finally consented she might keep. Did he know that it had been worn at the Queen's drawing-room? Miss Rivers wore it herself! She meant to ask her all about it; she forgot to in her delight at receiving the lace." And he sat there amused, and looking much as he might look if she were speaking in an unknown tongue. A shadow darkened the bay-window that led into the room, and then appeared a slender, dark-robed figure. Labor and anxiety had taken away much of the life and coloring from the beautiful face, though now gradually returning; the heavy, wavy hair was put plainly back, and altogether she was a strong contrast to the bright, saucy-looking fairy, dressed in airy, fleecy robes, and decked with flowers.

"Oh, Margaret, I am so glad you have come! Come into the parlor!"—putting her arm round her and drawing her towards the door. "Oh, I forgot! My brother Richard—Miss Rivers."

Margaret had heard the name often from Annie, and as that of a stranger, but with that glance of the deep gray eyes, a vision and a memory of the past came to her.

It was of herself—a gay, giddy, laughter-loving, somewhat coquettish girl, who, one summer, while visiting an aunt in the country, was one morning carrying a bowl of broth across the pasture to a poor old sick woman, an object of village charity. She was startled by the abrupt appearance of a youth who was boarding in the village during his college vacation, and who had shown unmistakable symptoms of an affection of the heart with regard to her. His appearance this morning was not prepossessing. He held fishing tackle in one hand, a basket of fish in the other; his collar and neck-tie were awry; his trowsers tucked into cowhide boots. Notwithstanding, in despair of finding another opportunity, he dropped fishing tackle and fish, sprang towards her, coloring up to the roots of his hair as he did so, grasped her hand, much to the peril of Goody Hill's soup, and dropping on his knees poured out some unintelligible rhapsodies.

For a moment she stood silent and confounded. But a second glance at the tucked-up pants, the upset basket of fish which were squirming in the dirt, the flushed face with great drops of perspiration on the sun-browned forehead; the small stream of Goody Hill's broth slowly trickling down her clean summer dress, and the ludicrousness of the scene was too much.

"Could you wait a moment till I set down this broth?" she asked, struggling still with her laughter. She set down the dish carefully, then came back. "Now, can I do anything for you, Mr. Leigh!"

The poor fellow, still in the position she had left him, with less enthusiasm, murmured some extravagant expressions of affection, and concluded by asking her to give him her hand and heart.

"No," she answered; "but she would give him some of Goody Hill's broth—maybe that would make him feel better." And then the silvery laughter, no longer in her power to repress, pealed forth.

He started, looked up one instant into the dark eyes, sparkling with mirth and mischief, with an expression which Margaret remembered to this day, and which was the only proof of identity with this Richard Leigh, and then rising abruptly, carefully lifted the dish of broth and politely handed it to her, saying, courteously and coolly—

"Pray excuse my mistake, and also my detaining you." And then he turned away coolly, picked up the fish and fishing gear, and walked off.

She remembered that she had felt intensely piqued, and wondered what he meant by "his mistake." And she had looked for him after that both in her walks and at church, but had never seen him since till now.

Margaret remembered all this while Annie was leading her to the parlor, and busily talking; but her thoughts were absent during her stay.

Richard Leigh and Margaret Rivers often met. It was impossible to be otherwise. Mr. Leigh was only courteous at first, but as time passed on he became as kind as a brother. If Margaret could have forgotten that first glance she would have supposed that he recollected neither her nor the past.

Mr. Leigh was genial, rich, handsome, distingué, and was of course a great favorite in society. No company was thought complete without him. He was so good, so kind, so merry and sensible, every one felt the influence of his presence. He was in time almost as much at home at the cottage as Annie herself, and was always warmly welcomed by Mrs. Rivers, who now, with restored health, had recovered all her energies, weakened by sorrow and illness. Margaret, less demonstrative, was not uncordial.

"Annie looks upon you as a sister. You must let me be as a brother to you," he had said one day, when she had attempted to decline his offer of assistance in some matter which would take her to the city.

Margaret, who seldom blushed, did so now, then slowly paled. The word "brother" somehow struck her unpleasantly. She did not ask herself why.

He often saw her engaged in domestic duties. "Miss Rivers, I am quite positive that you have not rolled that upper crust large enough to cover the plate; follow my advice, make it larger; it will save your taking it off," he remarked, when Margaret had supposed him absorbed with some specimens of minerals which he was showing her mother.

She met his laughing eyes, and with mock seriousness turned to Mrs. Rivers:—

"Mamma, will you please require that gentleman's attention?"

Nellie Leslie and her step-sister, Florence Bell, had arrived on a visit to the Leighs. The former was lovely and artless; the latter, with much style, wit, and beauty, could hardly be called agreeable. She had taken a prejudice to Margaret from the first, perhaps because of her beauty, and the estimation in which she was evidently held by the whole family; perhaps Richard Leigh had something to do with the matter, for Florence Bell had long since appropriated him for herself, and she was not one likely to look with favor upon a beautiful girl, associated so intimately with his family; and when she learned that she was only a teacher, she treated her with a reserve and haughtiness that made Annie very indignant. But Margaret had reigned queen too long in the world of fashion to be at all discomposed or rebuffed by one like Florence Bell, and her indifference and self-possession but irritated Miss Bell the more.

"How queer that you should treat as an equal a teacher of painting, and your some time seamstress!" she said, one evening, at a party at Mr. Leigh's, to Annie. "Is it the fashion in this village? Mamma's seamstress, I imagine, would open her eyes wider than ever yet if even invited into the drawing-room. Do you think it just the thing to make so much of a person in so inferior a position, Mr. Leigh?"

She looked up at him smilingly, and as if expecting an assent to her question, for one so courteous and gallant would not of course disagree with her.

The indignant blood surged in waves to Annie's cheeks, but before she could speak Richard Leigh, with his most courteous manner, answered with a smile; but nevertheless there was something in his tone that jarred a little on Miss Bell's ear.

"Miss Rivers is a lady by birth and education. I feel glad that my sister is able to claim her for a friend, for she has had advantages of position and society that but few American ladies can boast of, both at home and abroad, and her conversational tact and manners I should be glad that Annie should imitate."

"Was sewing or painting Miss Rivers' profession while abroad?" Miss Bell asked, with an innocent look, but with irony in her tones.

Mr. Leigh answered with a smile. "I am sadly afraid nothing so useful. I am not positive what she professed, but she was esteemed by others a belle and an heiress, and was admired and courted accordingly. Shall we dance this quadrille, Miss Bell?"

And the young lady was led off, feeling that she both feared and hated this ex-belle and heiress, and present teacher.

Margaret, during this conversation, had, in the changes of the cotillion, passed near enough to learn the drift of their remarks.

Yes, Mr. Leigh had defended her as a matter of duty; but he had plainly felt no indignation at the young lady's unkind remarks, else would he have so promptly and eagerly engaged her for the dance, and appear so devoted? And with a feeling of jealousy for which she did not account, she watched them laughing and talking gayly.

In the next quadrille, Florence Bell was her vis-à-vis, Mr. Leigh being her own partner. Miss Bell dared not be impertinent to Mr. Leigh's partner, but, had she ventured, she would have found it impossible. Margaret, so cool, so stately, and beautiful, with an air which told that she was familiar with scenes like these, would have been impervious to any insults of Miss Bell's; and so the latter began to realize, and though she disliked her none the less, it impressed her. After this, though she would gladly have kept aloof, and had others to do so, it chanced that Margaret was often the centre of some group she particularly wished to join; for since Margaret had laid aside her reserve she had become quite popular, and of late had become as much noticed as she had formerly been neglected; and so Miss Bell chose to come in contact with her rather than stay out of the charmed circle. It was about this time that Miss Bell's and Richard Leigh's names began to be associated, and people confidently predicted a match.

The second day after the party Richard Leigh came to the cottage to invite Margaret to a picnic in the afternoon. She was at work in the garden.

"We have roses at home, quantities of them, but none of them seem to me so beautiful as those of yours. How do you account for it?"

Margaret laughed. "Because there are none prettier to compare them with, or to distract your attention from their particular merits, I presume."

"I am fond of roses, Miss Rivers. I suppose that hint is sufficient!"

"So was the rich man in the Scriptures of the poor man's one ewe lamb."

"Theoretically and practically a niggard, Mrs. Rivers," as the gentle mother, attracted by their voices, appeared at the window. "This young lady, who, I am sorry to say, is your daughter, refuses me just one of these roses, which at the longest will wither by to-morrow. Please command her, as a punishment for her niggardliness, not only to gather the very prettiest, but also to place it with her own fingers in my button-hole, which command, if she keeps the fifth commandment, she will do immediately," and he turned his laughing eyes on Margaret.

Mrs. Rivers smiled. "I am sure Margaret will only be too happy to do so trifling a thing as give you pleasure."

"You hear, Miss Rivers?"

"But, mamma, we have only these, and Mr. Leigh has so many at home. He is only laughing at our meagre roses."

"Why, my daughter, I am astonished!"

"And so am I, Miss Rivers; never was more astonished in my life—to have such a modest request refused."

"And so am I, also, perfectly astonished at your covetousness! But since mamma wishes it, you may have just one. Which will you have?"

"Let me see—that one nearest the window. There, now place it in my button-hole; that will do nicely. Mrs. Rivers, I thank you with all my heart. Miss Rivers, always obey your mother. Good morning."

Thus it was given and accepted, but a pretty war of words followed, till Mr. Leigh reached the gate; then pointing triumphantly to the rose he had succeeded in getting, he bowed low and walked off.

The day was warm and pleasant, and the picnic took place in some grand old woods about a mile from Mr. Leigh's. About twenty young people were present. First, they had music and dancing; then they rested and had refreshments. Afterwards the youthful party separated into couples and strolled through the numerous shady and romantic paths. When at the time fixed upon for their return, they reassembled, it was found that two were missing—Florence Bell and Richard Leigh. They waited fifteen minutes, half an hour, three-quarters, and still they had not come.

"Time must be passing more quickly with our friends than with us here waiting," said one young gentleman, and he proposed to go in search of them. But just then they appeared—Richard, gay, laughing, careless as usual—Florence, looking flushed, triumphant, happy. Significant glances were exchanged among the young people, and low whispers. Two or three openly rallied them upon their long delay, to which Richard answered lightly and gayly.

"Oh, Margaret, do you believe what they say? that Richard and Florence are engaged? I don't see how he can like her; I never shall, I know. Isn't it too bad?"

Margaret made some answer, she hardly knew what, but meanwhile she grew paler and paler.

She said to herself that it was the heat—fatigue, but in her innermost soul she knew better. She had always said to herself frankly that she liked Richard Leigh, that no one could know his kind heart and noble qualities, and not regard him with the highest esteem; but then and there she first realized how far liking had gone, into what deeper feeling it had merged; and with this came the knowledge that the heart she had once scorned was now irrevocably another's, and that her own had been given unsought. How had it happened that she had been so foolish, so weak? He had been kind and brotherly to her, as to others, that was all. She could not remember a word or action that even savored of sentiment. How had it happened? Poor Margaret! poor, though the centre of the laughing group, talking gayly as the gayest, and though the proud heart throbbed rebelliously, defiantly.

Richard Leigh came to her. "You look pale and tired. Have you enjoyed the afternoon?" and he looked kindly down into her face, and drew her arm into his.

Margaret's eye flashed up at him. How dared he say she looked pale and tired! Was there anybody there who felt so little pale or tired, or who had enjoyed the afternoon so much? And so she told him, adding—naughty Margaret—that it was the most delightful picnic she ever attended or ever expected to attend. Ah, be careful Margaret! do not overdo, for Richard Leigh half smiles at your half-indignant earnestness!

Unconsciously there was a change in Margaret's manner to Mr. Leigh after this, although she heard nothing more of an engagement between Miss Bell and himself. He was as kind as ever—kinder if possible. He perceived this change, and wondered at it; but as it continued in spite of his efforts, he came to the cottage less frequently, and Margaret rejoiced, for oh, it was very hard, this constant guard over look and voice!

Annie Leigh every day expected either Florence or her brother to disclose their engagement, but not doing so, she took her brother to task one evening after all had retired.

"Brother Richard," she began, leaning over him, "I think it is real unkind of you to keep such a secret from your little sister."

He stared. "Secret, puss! What secret?"

"Oh! you need not seem so ignorant! my eyes were opened at the picnic, and so were Margaret's too; and though I don't want Florence Bell for a sister, still, if it is to be, I will try and make the best of it."

He looked both enlightened and amused. "And so you and Miss Rivers have got it into your pretty heads that Miss Bell and your humble servant are to be yoked for life? Much obliged, little sister."

"Well, brother Richard, to do Margaret justice, I believe I was the first to speak of it; but I know she thought so too, as well as all the others at the picnic."

"And so you wouldn't like Miss Bell for a sister," he said, slowly and meditatively.

"Well, my little sister, I should not like to give you a sister you did not like, for her sake, so perhaps I had better not think of marrying Miss Bell, beautiful as she undoubtedly is. Is there anybody you would like? I shall be glad to please you in this matter, if possible."

"Oh, there's only one person I want you to have—Margaret."

"Margaret," I suppose you mean Miss Rivers. Well, I have no objection; but perhaps she has. However, I can ask her, to please you," he answered, with a gay laugh.

Annie sprang up. "Oh, Richard, will you? I will love you better than ever I did in my life, if you will, and if Margaret will have you, I shall be so glad I shall eat her up."

"No, little sister, let me suggest that you had better not eat my wife up—I should have decided objections. Well, to please you, I'll think over the matter next winter when I have leisure, and let you know."

"There, Richard, I knew all the time you were laughing at me! I can't bear you! No! I don't want you to kiss me and make up! I do believe, after all, Florence is to be my sister."

Margaret Rivers sat at a window in the cottage, thinking over that scene far in the past, and half unconsciously, her fingers working out her thoughts, rapidly traced it on the paper. Presently she became absorbed with her work. A few more rapid strokes and the scene was vividly before her. She gazed fixedly at the sketch.

"Yes, it is like—very like," she murmured. "Can he be the same person? After all, he ought to forgive me. It was not in human nature to help laughing! But he never has forgiven—he never will!"

"And who is thus hard-hearted?" interrupted a voice, and the handsome head of Richard Leigh bent over her shoulder, his laughing eyes fixed upon the paper.

Margaret started up with an exclamation of dismay, and hastily endeavored to cover the sketch with her hand.

"Nay, nay, Miss Rivers—it is very correct. I recognized it immediately. Allow me to see it nearer."

Poor Margaret was the picture of distress. "Oh, Mr. Leigh, what will you think? How can I explain?"

"My dear Miss Rivers, why this distress? It is kind of you to remember the past; I thought you had forgotten. How very like I was something of a spooney in those days, eh, Miss Rivers? Help laughing! of course you couldn't and shouldn't! So I tried the tragic, did I?—like this!" dropping on his knees and seizing her hand in imitation of the picture. "Now what did I say? Something like this? 'Transcendent angel of my heart and dreams! Oh rapturous hour when first I beheld thy seraphic form, and heard thy sylph-like voice! take, oh take me—heart, soul, tucked-up trowsers, cowhide boots and all, unto your heart of hearts; and in return, give me your peerless, your enchanting, your bewildering self, and all your deepest, truest soul's affections! Oh, say yes, my angel, and then I'll pick up my fish and go home.'"

Margaret looked displeased, and drew herself up haughtily. His manner changed. His half-mocking tone ceased, and he said in a deep voice, agitated in spite of his efforts:—

"It should have been like this. Margaret, stay, we will have no rhapsodies now, but plain truth. I love you, Margaret, and have always, since I, a rough informed boy first met you, with all the capacity God gave me for loving. Nay, Margaret, lay aside that dignity. I am not trifling now. It is a serious matter to me; serious, for it affects the happiness of my future life. I love you, Margaret—do I need to say it again? Can you not feel that I speak the truth—do you love me, and will you marry me? Margaret, give me something better than Goody Hill's broth this time," he whispered.

Margaret, blushing and deeply agitated, for she felt this was no trifling now, turned towards him, but at his last words a half smile played round her beautiful mouth, and she said a little saucily as she drew a little nearer to him and put her hand within his: "But you know, Richard, you love broth, Annie says—"

"All a fabrication, Margaret dearest," he interrupted, drawing her tenderly to him. "I have never tasted any since that time. Now, Margaret, don't tease a poor fellow—tell me that you love me—no words, only silence—well, I shall take it all for granted, then, Margaret, my queen, my wife."

THE FUTURE.

Who is there but fancies they would like to take a look into the future? And we think most people look forward to it as a happier time than the present. The man just starting in business sees it as the time when he should reap the reward of present labor; the school-boy, when he shall throw away his troublesome books, and go out into the world, and be his own master. And all through life the future is like the ignis futurus, continually before us, spurring us on, and helping us through present difficulties by the reward which it promises by-and-by. The gambler who has lost thousands still goes on playing and losing, but looks forward to the future when fortune will favor him, and he will regain all he has lost, and then leave off playing; but the future finds him where the past left him; and although, perhaps as he anticipated, he has gained more than he ever had before, still he must play a little longer. The speculator who has thrown all his money into some great but hazardous affair, expects in the future to be the possessor of immense wealth, which he finds to his cost was real only in his imagination. The young man just studying for a profession thinks, when he has mastered what appear to him now to be insurmountable difficulties, in the future he will benefit mankind, and be courted by the great; that then Fame will bring laurels and place on his brow, and fickle Fortune will come and cast riches into his lap. But the future to us all is clouded in dark obscurity; and very wisely so, for troubles in perspective are often much worse than troubles in reality; and those are the happiest who make such a use of the present that they will have nothing to regret in the future.

"Trust no future, how'er pleasant!
Let the dead past bury its dead!
Act—act in the living present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!"

THE BROKEN LYRE.

BY SARA.

ALL shattered, low beneath her feet,
The cherished lyre's thrown;
The grief-wind o'er her soul hath swept,
And all the music's flown.
She's learned, alas, the bitter truth
That all that's fair must fade!
Although the morn is beauty bright,
Still evening brings the shade;
No path through life whose press our feet
Amid the roses fair,
But, all concealed within the green,
Some briars, too, are there.

META.—A CHRISTMAS STORY.

BY S. ANNIE PROST.

It was Christmas Eve. The air was full of chill winter winds, and snow threatened, though it did not actually fall. I had come in from my day's business, and was dreaming before my bright open grate fire. Dreaming of my youth, long past, of my scheme long abandoned, of my lonely life, which I had hoped to fill with loving hearts and ties. Dreaming as only a bachelor can, on an idle Christmas eve.

With my eyes fixed upon the vividly glowing grate, I saw far away in the past vista of years, two lads, cousins, who were brothers in love, sympathy, and pursuits; entering upon life's race, hand-in-hand, spurring rapidly through college, and leaving the Alma Mater, boys still in heart and hope, to spring into man's life and suffering by one agony of hope and terror. I saw them stand face to face, white with the discovery, each of the other's love. I saw her, Ellen Lee, with her fair, pure face, her soft, holy eyes, her gentle, womanly manner—saw her as plainly as when with one bitter wrench I tore my love from its sweet resting-place upon her heart, and turned my face away from my hope and rivalry to enter upon a new path alone. I knew of their marriage, I heard of their happiness, and sometimes even yet wrote and received answers from my cousin; but the loving brotherhood, the dream of a higher tie of love, these were sundered and shattered long, long before the Christmas eve when I sat dreaming before my coal fire. I had amassed wealth by untiring industry and perseverance, I had taken into my home, and under my care, the orphan son of my only sister; but I was, at forty-nine, a bachelor still, with no blithe voices to open my purse or heart, no warm kisses to touch my faded cheek, no loving caress to win me from memory's dream to the present reality of Christmas eve.

"A little girl, who wants to see yourself."

Margaret's harsh voice to recall my thought, her broad Irish face in the parlor doorway; these were my reminders of the present after an hour of regretful musing.

"Let her come in."

She came to my side with an earnest purpose in her full, dark eyes that annihilated all timidity and bashfulness. It took her but a moment to cross the broad parlor, but I see her now as she came toward me, her eyes fixed on my face, her whole manner full of her errand. She was small, very small, thin and pale, with a face Nature had meant to be beautiful and childlike, trouble had altered to premature thoughtfulness and womanly purpose. With thin, pinched features, pale cheeks, even pale lips, her broad, white forehead, and large, dark eyes bore earnestness and resolve beyond her years, printed there by some pitiless hand of poverty or care. On that bitter night she wore a thin calico dress, a small faded shawl, a sun-bonnet of gingham, and old shoes bursting out where the upper leather joined the soles. She came up close to my chair, and put her hand on the arm—such a wee hand, so scarred with scratches and bruises, so red and chapped with exposure, that my heart ached strangely as I looked at it.

"Well, my child," I said, kindly, I hope, "you wanted to see me."

"Yes, sir; we live, mother, baby and I, at 27 Ruggles Avenue."

Ruggles Avenue, be it known, is a small court filled with the poorest kind of tenement houses, and by a recent failure I had assigned to me as part payment of a large debt the ownership of Ruggles Avenue. I had appointed an agent to look after the property while I owned it, and to sell it as speedily as possible, and so shifting the responsibility, I had actually forgotten the existence of such a spot as Ruggles Avenue.

"Well?" I said, looking down on that earnest little face raised to mine.

"We can't pay the rent, sir," and the face then was hidden, as the whole frame drooped under the weight of this confession. Long, black eyelashes swept down on the pale cheek, as the white lids veiled the earnest eyes.

"But, my child, Mr. Jones settles all this."

"He can't wait any longer."

"Oh, he can't!"

"No, sir, but Mrs. Davis, who lives next door, said somebody told her he didn't own the place since old Mr. Paul sold out, and she advised me to come to you and see if you can wait—it won't be very long, sir, only till mother gets about again, and baby gets to walking."

Some magnetism there was in those soft, earnest eyes, in the thrill of that sweet, musical voice, that was moving my torpid old heart into a new and pleasant warmth and interest. So I drew up a large softly cushioned chair, and lifted the little girl into it before I spoke again, my eyes moistening as I saw how the pale cheeks burned, and the little frozen feet and fingers curled and stretched in the genial blaze.

"So, mother is sick?"

"Yes, sir. She has been in bed for four months, but she can sew a little, and she thinks she is getting stronger now. Then I can help more again when baby can walk."

"Baby is your brother?"

"No, sir, baby's a girl, sister Alice's little girl. Sister Alice died last summer, and that's why we can't pay the rent."

"How? Tell me all about it!"

"Mother used to be a teacher in the public school, and after father died, when I was a baby, she went to teach again until Alice was old enough to go. Then mother stopped because talking made her cough, and gave her a pain in her side. Alice got married, two years ago, in the summer holidays, and went away to Buffalo to live because brother Will was on a railroad there. Last summer she came back (mother was teaching again then) and wanted to go into the school again. Brother Will was killed last spring on the railroad, and Alice only stayed a few weeks at home before she died of a fever. Mother said she fretted herself into it. So we took the baby, Allie, until mother was sick too, and then everything went wrong. We sold our clothes and other little things, Alice's breast-pin, and mother's, but—" and here the brave, steady eyes fell again, and the lips quivered—"it took it all for medicine, and bread, and baby's milk, and we owe you four months' rent, sixteen dollars."

If it had been sixteen thousand, she could not have named the sum with more reverence and terror.

"And how will you pay me if I wait?"

"Mother is getting able to sew now, and as soon as Allie can walk I can go to work again."

"What work can you do?"

"Mrs. Davis works in a button factory, and she says she can get me the little girls' work, sewing the buttons on cards. I can earn a dollar and a half a week at that. Indeed we will pay you, sir."

She left her seat as she spoke to come again and rest the little hand on the arm of my chair.

"Suppose I go talk it over with mother. You and I will have a cup of tea, and then go and see about the matter."

She read faces quickly, this grave little child, for after one long, earnest gaze into mine, she bent her face to press her lips on my hand. I drew the frail form into my arms, and with the caressing touch, all her forced calmness, her overtaken quiet gave way. Large tears rolled down her poor, thin cheeks, and she sobbed till the little figure shook from head to foot with the hysterical throes. I did not check her. My smattering of medical knowledge, my instinct told me it was better to let the passionate burst have its way. But I bowed in spirit before the wonderful self-control that could keep such a disposition in grave subjection so long during such a trying interview. Had she come whining and crying, I might have released her from her debt and forgotten her by the next day. Now, I was inwardly vowing to shield her from some of the early trials that had matured her, and braced her young heart so early to meet life's rude storms.

By the time my tea-bell rang she had sobbed herself into quiet again, and was standing penitent and abashed before me. Edgar, my nephew, had not come in, so I put her in his chair, and ordered Margaret to pack a basket of dainty food, wine and jellies, in her hearing.

"For mother," I said, answering the questioning eyes, and stimulating her appetite.

"How did you know?" she asked.

"I knew your own supper would taste nicer if she was to have something too."

"But—" she hesitated with the instinctive delicacy of a sensitive nature, dreading to wound.

"But what?"

"Is it not begging? Mother would not like me to beg."

"No, it is a Christmas gift. I have no little folks to give Christmas presents, so you must let me give you one. You may eat it all yourself, if you wish."

What a gleeful laugh greeted this preposterous speech. She was a child after all, with all her grave ways covering the child nature.

"Come, tea is cooling, and mother waiting, so put off your bonnet and shawl and sit here."

Mrs. Rose, my housekeeper, rustled her black silk with an indignant gesture as she shook herself into her seat opposite to mine, but she did not say one word. I was master in my own house, and she knew it, so she swallowed her wrath at the insult of being forced to sit down with a beggar, and revenged herself by offering the child the weakest possible tea. I gravely emptied it into the slop basin and handed the cup back, thereby crushing out the hinted rebellion and asserting my authority. I was jubilant as a school-boy over my little protégée, and determined to have her comfortably provided at the well-spread table. Quiet now, and grave again, she was neither shy nor awkward. She had evidently been accustomed to sit well, eat with due attention to table proprieties, and bear herself like a lady. And as I watched her, I could trace this refinement in her small hands, her delicately cut features, the shining gloss of her short, curling hair, and the graceful attitudes of her frail little figure.

"Do you know," I said to her, "that in all our long talk you have not told me your name?"

"Meta Burgiss, sir. It is mother's name too. Alice's name is Smith."

"What was your father's business?"

"He was an engraver, sir, and stooping killed him, mother said; he died in consumption nearly fifteen years ago."

"Fifteen years!" I cried, for I had set down twelve as the very outside limit of my visitor's age.

"Yes, sir, when I was six months old."

"Whew! Oh, here you are! Why, where did this manikin come from!"

And enter Edgar Hart, my nephew, aged eighteen. Margaret had a cup, saucer, and plate on the table before he could sit down, for my brave, beautiful boy, with his cheerful voice and sunny smile, is the darling of the house from the kitchen up. Even Mrs. Rose's frowns relaxed into smiles as she poured out his tea.

"Aint it cold? I've been treating six tambourine and singing girls to oysters and coffee for Christmas eve, uncle. You should have seen them eat, poor little tots not bigger than this little one, any of the lot."

"This is Meta Burgiss, Edgar, the daughter of one of my tenants."

She stood up to drop a grave courtesy; but Edgar reached his hand over the table.

"Shake hands, little one. We are good friends now," he added, letting his strong hand close over her little one.

She studied him for a moment with her wonderful eyes, then said, gravely: "Yes, sir."

And I, in my unprophetic blindness, did not even shudder at question or answer.

After tea, I took her home, her little hand clasped in mine, while the big, well-filled basket hung on my arm. I had proposed to put her into it, hoping to call out the merry laugh again; but she evidently considered the basket a serious affair, and only assured me, gravely, that she could walk, as serious as if being carried in a market-basket was her usual method of locomotion.

My introduction to Ruggles Avenue did not prepossess me in its favor. At every door was collected a group of overdressed women and half-drunken men, enjoying (?) the holiday evening. Children were visible through the open doors, sucking oranges, or fighting over papers of cheap confectionery, while their elders laughed, flirted, or swore, as the case might be, at the doorway. In contrast to all this light and merriment, was the closed door and shutters of No. 27, the last house in the row. In the upper room, a light burned; but the curtains, of some thick green stuff, hid all inside.

Opening the door softly, my little guide asked me to wait, and went quickly up stairs. A moment later, she stood at the head of the staircase, holding a candle, to light me.

"Please come up here, sir. Mother is not able to come down."

So I passed through the little entry, and mounted the narrow staircase, and stood in the upper room of this little house. Two rooms above, two below, were all it boasted, but it was large enough for this family, had it been transplanted into purer air and broader space. Cramped up, as it was, in the heart of a great city, hemmed in by houses on all sides that overlooked and overshadowed it, shut out from all but the tiniest patch of blue sky above, Ruggles Avenue was a fair type of the narrow, foul streets where a city crowds her poor.

In the tidy but poor room, where my little friend led me, I found the mother and the baby, Allie. The first, pallid and weak, with the crimson spot that stamps consumption on her cheek, with hollow eyes and shrunken lips, looked already fit for the grave to which she seemed hastening; the other, sleeping calmly, was puny, too, and feeble. Altogether a scene to make the heart weep.

"I have ventured to intrude," I said, courteously, for my hostess was lady-like in attitude and appearance, "to escort my little friend here home, and—" here I hesitated. Sitting there, in her arm-chair, her grandchild in her arms, she looked, in spite of her poor dress and illness, so little an object of charity that I scarcely knew how to proceed.

"You are very kind," she said, holding out one thin hand. "Meta, set a chair for the gentleman, and then take Allie, dear."

The child obeyed, lifting the sleeping babe with a womanly care and gentleness that would have made one smile, only it was touchingly sad, too.

"I have sent her away," said the mother, as the door between the rooms closed after the children, "because I want to ask your kindness for her, and for the baby. Only," she added, hastily, as I was about to speak, "that you will try to find them some asylum more tender than the almshouse." She paused for a moment, then spoke again: "I have not a relative to whom I can apply, and their father was an Englishman; all his relations are on the other side of the ocean. We stand alone! Meta has been my scholar from a child, and I have been a teacher almost all my life; as soon as she is old enough, she is competent to teach; if, in the meantime—" Here a violent fit of coughing broke the sentence. The inner door opened, and Meta came in.

"Who is your mother's doctor?" I asked.

She gave me name and address.

"I will call to-morrow, when you are stronger," I said to the invalid, when she was quiet again, "and tell you what I can do. In the meantime do not think of the rent, or let your thoughts dwell too despondently on the future. Good-night."

She tried to speak, but I hurried away. At the door, I dropped a kiss on Meta's forehead, a piece of gold on her candlestick, and started for the doctor.

His judgment only confirmed my own. For the mother there was no hope save in pure air, good food, gentle stimulus, and freedom from care; for the baby, the same; and my heart responded with a similar decree for Meta.

Christmas day was surely the day for deeds of gentle charity; so I drove out to the farm attached to my country house, and laid my plans for the trio. The little furnished house, where my gardener lived in summer, stood temptingly vacant, and I think no pleasure of my life lingers so pleasantly on my memory as the Christmas days when I arranged the home for my new tenants. Mollie Barry, the farmer's buxom daughter, was all interest and excitement, and readily promised to keep house for the invalid, and nurse the baby. Three days later, cleaned, warmed, and habitable, the wee house opened its doors for the new inmates. I gave Mrs. Burgiss a pile of muslin to cut and make for me, handkerchiefs to embroider with initial letters, linen for shirts, and silk for cravats; and so, having eased her delicate sense of unwilling dependence, I left her to Mollie and Meta.

We scarcely dared hope for her to live through the spring; but she did, and as the summer months brought roses to Meta's and Allie's cheeks, they came, too, laden with health-giving breezes for the mother. The thin cheek filled, and the hollow eyes took a more healthy brightness, the stooping figure grew erect, and the trembling fingers steady, while my conscience fairly groaned over the work the busy hands turned out. It was all in vain I urged that there was no hurry; the dainty stitches would turn the muslin and linen into shape, and fill the handkerchief corners with pretty devices.

Meantime Meta was roving, free as a bird, over the bright country. I moved out in May, Edgar being at school, and found my little pale friend growing fast into a rosy cheeked country girl, while wee Allie tumbled and tottered on the grass, plump as a partridge.

I could linger for hours over the memory of that summer; the memory of the mother's gratitude, the child's respectful love, the memory of long hours spent listening to Meta's clear sweet voice, as she poured out her child-like confidences to me, of her gentle, womanly care of Allie, of her mature old-fashioned household ways, her neat and careful arrangement of parlor and bedroom, her pretty interest in the sewing she did for me, the memory of Mollie's stories of her care for mother and baby, of her handy ways, her grave air over some household mystery, or ringing laugh when Allie called for her attention. Such memories are left me now to fill a void—well, well, it is an old man's story, let me tell it to the end.

Five long years passed away, and the little cottage still held its inmates, but in the place of a child's voice was heard a woman's tone; in the stead of a frail, child-like figure was seen a graceful woman's form, fully developed by health, freedom, and careful education. In the place of a man's protecting interest in the child, had grown in my heart the man's strong, tender love for the woman.

Ah, how I loved her! All the pent-up tenderness of my youth and manhood was poured at her feet; all the lonely longing of my mature years was filled by her presence, her voice, her touch. Her child-like freedom, her tender gratitude—all seemed to me the forerunners of the love I coveted, and hoped to win. I had sent Edgar abroad, under careful guardianship, the summer after the Burgiss family came to Oakdale, and having but little to call me to the city, had spent most of my time at the country house. I had provided no masters for my darling, watching the mother's careful teaching, her refinement and care; but as my bud of promise blossomed, I saw the perfect womanliness and thoughtful love of the teacher duplicated and refined on the scholar.

It was on a hazy September afternoon, when I was dreaming over all these things and thinking I must soon let my child learn that the guardian had become the lover, when, without even the ceremony of a knock, Mollie dashed into my library.

"Oh, sir, if you please—Mrs. Burgiss—Miss Meta—oh, come quick—," and out she dashed again, sobbing and running, before I could ask a question. I followed quickly, found the cottage door open, and went up stairs.

Mrs. Burgiss had ruptured a bloodvessel, and lay on the bed, dying. Meta, pale as her mother, but quiet and calm, even in that trying hour, was washing the blood stains from the pale lips, and trying to quiet Allie's screams.

"Take the child," I said to Mollie, "and send John for the doctor. Quick!"

She snatched up the shrieking child, and ran off to obey me. Too late, I felt; but any action was relief. Even before she had left the door, the pale lips closed quickly, the eyes took one long loving look at the fair face above them, and then closed in death. She knew, she saw, felt the truth, but she neither screamed nor fainted. Gently, with tender reverence, she folded the dead hands, and bent to kiss the dead face. Then, reeling and shivering, she turned to me. I opened my arms, and like a child to a father, she came to me. No sob, no cry, only the shivering, shaking form, the cold hands and convulsive shudder, told of the agony pent up in her poor heart. In the bitter days that followed, I was her comforter, her protector, her stay—next the God to whom she had from childhood carried her whole soul. Sustained by her religion, comforted by my love, consoled by Allie's dependence, she bore her great trial with resignation and hope. And over the coffin where her mother lay, she stood beside me, her hand in mine, her head on my bosom—my promised wife. Knowing in that solemn hour my love for her, my desire to protect her from all life's ills, my ambition to stand in parent's as well as husband's place to her, she put her untried heart into my keeping, gave me her true, pure gratitude, thinking it love. I never blamed her: I do not now, my Meta, my own precious child.

All winter she lived with Allie in the little cottage, sewing, and teaching the child, and daily I drew her close to my heart to renew my vow—to love, cherish, and protect her for all life.

In the spring I was to make her my bride. She had made her simple preparations, and we were to travel for months before she entered my house as its mistress.

Early in January, Edgar came home. He had grown from a merry-hearted boy into a genial, whole-souled man. A man full of noble impulses, warm, true purposes, and generous resolves. A man to fill with a glad pride the heart that loved him, as mine did. How his hearty voice and merry laugh made the lonely house echo, and my heart glad, can only be told by the contrast it made to the quiet of the years of his absence. I did not tell him of my engagement fearing it might prejudice him against Meta; but I made my will, leaving him half my property—as I had ever intended to do—and I trusted to time and Meta's charms to reconcile him to an aunt, and a half heirship. I watched his speaking face telling its admiration when I took him to the cottage. The graceful figure in its deep mourning dress, with the fair noble face crowned by its coronet of dark hair, was worthy of the low courteous bow, the gentlemanly greeting he gave, and my heart thrilled proudly over the homage my darling received.

Three months I passed, blind to the fate that was before me; then, with a shock, I awakened from my dream of love and hope. I never blamed her—never. The spring that was to have brought me such joy was just opening; the tender green buds just breaking the brown covering that had sheltered them from the winter's frosts, the sun-giving rays promised future warmth—all Nature opening and expanding in the coming of sunshine, when the sun of my life sank. I had started to take Meta to walk—it was early evening and moonlight—and as I went up the steps to the cottage door, I pictured myself forcing from willing lips a time for our wedding. As my hand touched the knob, I paused. Sheltered by the porch, I could, unseen myself, look into the little parlor, hear, through the open window, every spoken word. And the words that paralyzed my hand on the door were, in Edgar's voice: "Meta, my life, my love, hear me!"

What wonder I stood rooted to the spot? what wonder I could not move, as he poured forth, in the hot, hasty words of youth, the story of his passion, pleading for a word of hope, praying for a look of love?

Quiet, calm, pale as death, she stood erect before him, till, exhausted with the force of his own eloquence, he waited her answer in silence. Her dry lips moved twice before she spoke; then, in an icy, constrained tone, she said:—

“Did your uncle never tell you I have promised to be his wife?”

He reeled back as if she had struck him. “My uncle’s wife! You, so young, so beautiful, wedded to him—”

“The noblest, truest heart on earth!” she said, warmly; “think what I owe him! My mother’s prolonged life, her comfort for years, my own happy home, Allie’s health and joyous childhood—all, all that I am I owe your uncle. God helping me, I will be to him a true, faithful wife!”

“But not a loving one. You did not know your own heart when you promised. Does your heart throb for him as it does for me? does your cheek flush at his step as at mine? does your eye light for him as for me? I am a coxcomb—a fool, if you will, to urge this, but you love me, Meta. As my heart tells me its own tale, it tells yours—you dare not be false to it. You love me, Meta?”

Oh, the yearning agony of the question, even my heart thrilled to it. What wonder, then, that she faltered and trembled—she, whose pure heart was an unconscious traitor to its vows. Yet strong and true, faithful even in that hour, she put back the temptation, and spoke, clearly: “You forget yourself strangely; go, I would be alone.”

Yet once again he urged his suit, kneeling to her, pressing his burning lips to her hands, pleading—praying out of his great love; but she stood firm through all, still and white, with those steady dark eyes looking reproof into his, defying her own heart to rebel, till maddened by her cold firmness, he suddenly dashed from the room, past me, into the air, rushing forward, blindly, recklessly. She stood for a moment where he left her; then, with a wailing cry of “Edgar! Edgar!” she threw herself on the floor, sobbing out the whole weight of that hour’s agony.

And I? Slowly, heavily, with laggard footsteps and a sick heart, I went my lonely way homeward. All night I lay heavily, wearing out the hours in bitterest agony of heart, with no ray of comfort, no gleam of hope. Morning found me again looking forward. This was but a boy’s love of Edgar’s, that could be conquered by time, mine was the hoarded passion of a long life—his was a transient love of three months’ growth, mine the well-founded attachment of years. I would send him away again to forget, while she, she would return again to me were he absent. A fool’s dream, but I was a loving fool.

So when, pale and haggard, my handsome boy presented himself to ask for permission to return to Europe, I gave it gladly and promptly, and dropped no comment on his plans or altered looks. He took a sadly affectionate leave of me, left with a sick smile his farewell for his “Aunt Meta,” and left me.

I said no word to Meta of our nuptials. I saw by her pale face and added tenderness of manner how she suffered and how she blamed her own heart, but I only sought, by renewed kindness and love, to win her back to the old peaceful happiness, and link her heart with her hand to mine. All the long summer months, I saw her grow paler, but marked too how she battled her love. I knew she would be, as she had said, my true, faithful wife, but never my loving one. Such love as a child gives its parent, as a ward her guardian, she gave me freely; such love as a woman owes her husband, as I gave her, she could never return to me.

Slowly, reluctantly, I admitted this truth to my heart, striving against it every inch of the way. Was it not enough that once before, in the heyday of my youth, I had crushed my own heart to make way for another, exiled myself from the sunshine of my life that another might find life in its beams, but now, when my old age was creeping on me, I must go down to the grave lonely and uncheered, that a young heart might add my one hope to its overflowing cup of life’s treasures! The struggle was a bitter one. Early winter found me still undecided, but after one night of fierce temptation I wrote to Edgar.

Again Christmas was coming with its memories, and I asked my child if she would be wedded on Christmas eve.

She neither shuddered nor turned pale, only lifted her large truthful eyes to mine, and said, softly: “I will be your wife whenever you will.”

My heart felt ashamed for its selfish struggles, as it read the triumph this young girl had achieved over its temptation, but I only kissed the broad forehead and softly thanked her.

In the parlor of the little cottage, the pastor waited for the bridal party. It was Christmas eve, and Molly and Allie were the guests bidden to the wedding. I waited below for my bride. As she came to my side in her pure white raiment, the starry orange blossoms crowning her fair face, the long shadowy veil falling round her graceful figure, I put back my passionate yearning to clasp her close forever, and drew her from the parlor door into the little room across the entry.

There, in some words I cannot recall, I told her of my unseen vigil on that April evening, of Edgar's constancy, of my own renunciation. I called him from his watch outside to clasp their hands together, to hear her sob of new, strange joy, and crush out the last hope of my heart. I heard the service that united them as a man hears voices in his dream, and when Edgar's voice thanked me for the Christmas gift that made them independent of my bounty in future, I could calmly and quietly wish them joy, while my tones sounded to me as if they came from miles away. I think she read something of this with her true woman's instinct, for her kiss on my lips was given with a reverence and awe that she had once as a little child accorded me.

And now the Christmas eve brings uncle with full hands to decorate a tree for Allie, and a wee namesake of his own, while his life is gilded by the love of two true, strong hearts, that keep his name in their prayers from Christmas to Christmas.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PAROR.

Pearl the Twelfth.—December.

DECEMBER'S mantle, fringed with icicles,
On mother Earth has fallen; on her breast
The white flakes in such close compactness lie,
That in the embrace all nature lies as still
As though the hand of the destroyer had Falls' fat laid upon it; and the sky
Hangs dark and threatening upon the hills
In dreary mison with food and food;
The forests in their drapery of snow—
The streams insensate in the arms of ice—
Reveal the pulses of the Winter king
Beating through all the arteries of life
Sluggish, in token of the dying year,
Whose footsteps, lingering on the shores of Time,
Shall seek oftsoon the indelible shades
Where dwell departed years, within whose realm
The Past is King and Memory Queen crowned,
Where all the years, from Adam's time to ours,
In solemn conclave gathered, wait to greet
Another brother from the mortal land
Now made immortal as themselves, who wear
The unfading laurels of eternity.

O Year!

Thou, in thy going, takest in thy arms
Lips that with living, dying lips have met
In close embrace; bosoms whereon life reigned
In passionate pulsations; hearts whose tide
Of love, forever surging down the shore
Of true affection, casts its shining pearls

Upon the beach, for gentle hands to shrine
In chambers where, enownd and enthroned,
The soul eat all victorious!

O Year!

How many idols thou hast lifted up!
Idols of Fame, Ambition, and of Gold;
Idols of Love, of Friendship, and of Faith,
Each on its pedestal by votaries crowned.
And of them all, how many now lift up
Their laurelled brows? The Parthenon of fame
In ruin lies; the colossus of gold
Lies prone in straits of fickle, fatal chance;
Ambition's coliseum shattered stands;
Love's orange-blossoms 'neath thy frosty touch
Have dropped away, and Friendship's laurels drop Above the faded ivy vines of Faith.
O Year! O desolate Year of Grace!
Thy battle-fields have darkened myriad homes,
And on our country's hallowed altar lain
The best blood of her gallant sons; the land
Is full of mourning; Rachel's weeping sons
To manhood's stature grown, upon whose arms
They hoped to lean in life's declining stage.
O Year! thy shadow and thy sunshine kept
Such close companionship, we scarce can name
The victor in the contest. Life and Death,
Hope and Despair! and Joy and Grief, each day
Their votaries, and aye! their victims had.
So in thy going, old, decrepit, weak,
Burdened with memories, O dying Year,
Take with thee this poor solace: thou wast sent Thy mission to fulfil, and thou didst but Work out the dealing the Master's hand Shaped out.

L'ENVOI.

So finish we the casket of the year;
Its pearls are strung, each with its history,
And each a brief memento of the months.
There are, whose eyes upon the earlier pearls
Fell lovingly, that now, all quiet rest;
The casket idle and the pearls unstrung;
Gone hence to where the seasons never change,
Storms never come, or shadows ever fall.
God keep them in the fields where roses bloom
And never fade, and where the lilies grow
By streams within whose waters they who drink
Eternal life shall find and never ending joy.
There are, whose eyes have watched from first to last
These twinings; near and far, known and unknown,
We thus companionship have held, I trust,
All pleasantly. Take, ere we part, the wish,
All in my power to give: may coming months
Bring more of sunshine than of shade to thee,
Dwell in homes afar or near; upon
The Atlantic slope, or where the Pacific's wave
Washes the confines of the Western land;
In quiet farm-house, by the sounding sea,
Within the city or upon the plains,
Or anywhere, in this sad world of ours;
And so, and so, farewell, farewell, farewell!

MARGARET DARLING.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"I'm afraid you've gone a little too far, Maude," said Mrs. Woolcott, in a tone of very mild objurgation. "You may have broken the young man's heart."

I knew better. Of too healthy recuperative powers, too strong and muscular was the nature of Ralph Hoadley to be crushed, wrecked, because a woman had jilted him. Yet the blow would be a heavy one for all that. Of an intense, exclusive nature, fine and generous withal, this man had brought the treasures of his youth, its frankincense and myrrh, to the altar on which he had placed this girl, Maude Woolcott, and worshipped her.

I turned and looked at her as she sat by the window, about which the early June roses seemed kindled into live coals of fire, and thought she might exult, if she had the heart, in the power she had gained, in the pain, sharp and deep, she had wrought—a pain that must cost many a weary day and many a fierce struggle before it was healed.

Just then, the face of Maude Woolcott showed her consciousness of all this, and her triumph in the knowledge too, and it did not look fair to me then, though it held the red bloom in its cheeks, the lustre in its dark, brilliant eyes, the shade and glow in its hair, and, perhaps, most attractive of all, the half smile on the dainty, crimson lips. And with that glance the real moral lineaments of Maude Woolcott seemed to disclose themselves to me as they had never done before. I beheld that underneath all the brightness, and wit, and piquancy for which men and women praised and admired her, she was coarse, hard, selfish.

I have had hints and intimations of this before, but I resolutely shut my eyes to them. Now I would not ignore the truth or put it out of the way any longer, and my thoughts said to me: "After all, Ralph Hoadley, her 'No' has done you far greater grace than her 'Yes' would. You don't suspect it now, but sooner or later the truth must have cleared itself up to you, that this woman's soul was barren, meagre, superficial. There are in it no goodly chambers of gold and purple, as you have dreamed. Self-sacrifice, tenderness, endurance, all that makes the crown and glory of womanhood, are not there. She would never exalt your life with the sweet, persuasive influences of a true and noble woman; she would never enter into your best and highest self, never sympathize with your truest purposes and movements; she would never have strengthened, ennobled, redeemed you in any wise, and there must have come a day and hour when the woman you had taken to wife would have disclosed herself to you, and you must have had forced on you, oh, Ralph Hoadley, her vanity, her self-indulgence, her ingrained selfishness, and all her weak, petty aims of living and doing; the very narrow orbit in which her being revolves. You wouldn't believe this now, and your heart will go courting the treasure it vainly believes it has lost, for you brought to your love all the heroism, all the loyalty that is in you; all the rare and beautiful dreams and faiths which went to make up your ideal of womanhood. In your heart are princely lodgings; and though you gave the key to this woman, it is well she dropped it from her fingers, else some time the shadow of her presence would have made their goodliest chambers desolate." So I stood demurely by the piano, guiding Clara, the younger sister of Maude Woolcott, through her morning exercise, while these thoughts arose in me. Their thread was broken by Maude's voice, saying, in a slightly injured tone, in which my intuitions, keener perhaps than usual, detected a little throb of triumph:

"I'm sure I'm not to blame if Ralph Hoadley's heart is broken. A woman cannot help it if a man falls in love with her, as I see, can she, Margaret?"

"I suppose not, if she consciously does nothing to win an admiration or affection to which she can never respond."

Maude turned and looked at me a little curiously, a little contemptuously, and yet not, on the whole, unkindly. I think she liked me as strongly as it was in her nature to, one of her own sex—a liking that always puzzled me, and that she probably never analyzed. Perhaps the total contrasts betwixt us refreshed her, and there was no room for rivalry or jealousy in my case; perhaps old child memories and associations still held her with a loose sort of bond, for Maude and I had been schoolmates and playfellows in our girlhood, before her father went to the city and built his fine house, and added so many thousands to his already comfortable fortune.

"Do you really mean to say, Margaret, that any woman who has charms to win admiration won't be pleased with it?"

"Oh no, Maude; only that a woman of sterling principles will not debase those charms to draw a man into proposals which she has no thought of accepting."

This time the roses did deepen a little in her cheeks, and I was almost startled to find how closely my words had driven home. Had I thought twice, lack of moral courage might have prevented so straightforward an answer to her question, but Maude's laugh broke out the next moment; a bright, pleasant laugh it was, but somehow it grated on me this time.

"What a nice sentiment for a copy-book or a story, Margaret, but women—

'Not to bright and good
For human nature's daily food' can't exactly practise such sort of precepts; at least, very few of them do."

"The best women don't always get married," interposed her mother, in a tone which plainly showed she regarded a degree of goodness which lessened one's chances for matrimony as, at least, very unfortunate.

And again Maude's clear, bright laugh, with the little heartlessness that grated, preceded her words. "Well, I don't aspire to any of those superfluous virtues; indeed, I have such strong doubts whether I am good enough for anything better than matrimony that, if the right man came along, I should be very likely to accept him."

"But, Maude," interposed her sister, a bright outspoken girl of thirteen, "I heard Aunt Jane tell mamma that she thought it was shameful for you to carry on a flirtation with Mr. Hoadley, when you were engaged to Mr. Loring."

"Aunt Jane is an old maid," responded Maude, in a tone which showed she thought that fact settled the worth of her aunt's opinions.

"Girls are girls," said Mrs. Woolcott, evidently a little annoyed by her younger daughter's remarks, "and apt to be a little thoughtless. I do not suppose you intended to do anything wrong, my dear, but this will be a warning to you in future, and I hope no harm will result from it to the young man."

I looked at Mrs. Woolcott in a mixture of amazement and indignation. I knew that she was worldly, conventional. I knew her worship for what she termed "respectability," which included wealth, acknowledged social position, and all the gods of this world. I knew, too, that she had tacitly encouraged the attentions of Ralph Hoadley to her daughter; that day after day he had received flattering welcomes to her house, that for months Maude had exerted every art of which she was mistress to win the admiration of this young man; that she had been absolutely certain of the state of his feelings for months, and had, in a thousand graceful and delicate attentions, led him to suppose that she reciprocated them, and this at last enticed him to disclose them.

And all this time she was the betrothed wife of another man. And Mrs. Woolcott, who always talked such proper sentiment, who prided herself on her immaculate deportment in all respects, had looked with smiling complacency at the sin and shame of her daughter's conduct! So, not willing yet to believe such weakness and wrong of those I had esteemed, I caught at a last hope.

"Maude," I said, almost appealingly, "it isn't true what Clara says—you haven't been engaged all this time?"

She played daintily a moment with the roses in her hands, that seemed to run like a red flame along the broken branch. "Well," she answered, complacently, "I don't know but I am, with certain provisos, you see, which allow me a door of escape if I choose to avail myself of it."

"Don't know but you are!" said my bright, spoiled pupil. "You know that you expect to be married next Christmas, just as much as I do not."

Mrs. Woolcott came to the rescue. "Clara, Clara, don't you know that family secrets are not to be alluded to in that open fashion?"

I put on my bonnet with a kind of sickness of heart, that morning, and I bade the elder and the younger lady "Good-by," with a feeling that I would not have their sin on my soul for all the wealth and pleasure that surrounded them—not even for that which seemed much greater in comparison, the love of Ralph Hoadley. Not that I was enamored of this young man; nothing like it, but I knew him for a generous, manly soul, a little enervated, it might be, by over-prosperity—a nature that probably needed a little of the reasoning and toughening which a hard battle with the world and some of its rugged realities would have given him, but a brave, tender, true nature for all that, loyal to his highest convictions of truth and goodness, always. I cannot go into the particulars of all that made me cognizant of Ralph Hoadley's character. Suffice it, I had been daily at the house since the Woolcotts came, early in the summer, to their country seat, for I had given up my school that term, and Mrs. Woolcott was desirous that Clara should make rapid proficiency in music. So I had been thrown much into the society of the young people, and while Ralph Hoadley was hardly conscious of my presence, so absorbed was he in the society of Maude, I had, as you see, reached certain conclusions respecting the essential character of the man.

I, Margaret Darling, was the daughter of a clergyman, who had been dead several years, and left his widow and only daughter the memory of a life fragrant with deeds of love and self-sacrifice, and about as much worldly goods as clergymen, whose lives, even, are not insured, are in the habit of leaving their families.

My mother was an invalid. My father's parishioners were kind, but dependence is galling to some natures. I happened to be of this sort. So, as I could not leave my mother, for any pecuniary considerations, I obtained a situation in the village academy, where the salary was small, and the work arduous, but we managed to live on it, and the parish generously allowed us to retain the little parsonage, under whose roof so many sweet and tender associations concentrated.

Several weeks after the conversation transpired, which I have recorded, I met Mr. Loring, the gentleman whom Maude was to marry the coming Christmas. I did not like him, although he was a polished, courteous gentleman. He was a good many years her senior, a man who had made a large fortune, and evidently considered this his chief claim to consideration; a shrewd business man, not lacking in intelligence, and with a sharp eye always on the main chance; but faith, heroism, self-sacrifice for truth, or principle's sake, this man had nothing to do with these things—would have counted them all as vagaries.

I think Maude sometimes felt the contrasts betwixt these two men, and the woman in her experienced some want, or loss, that the rejected lover's devotion had supplied. I overheard her say once to her mother, in a slightly ennuied, dissatisfied tone, "Mr. Loring is very proud of me, and all that, and when I am his wife, I shall be indulged in every luxury to my heart's content, but he isn't half as handsome as Ralph Hoadley, nor his society half as inspiring. I sometimes think I should have done better if I had married him."

"But you know, my dear, that you have a certainty to depend upon now, while Ralph Hoadley had only expectations from a crabbed, capricious uncle, who was liable to take offence at his nephew for any whim, and cut him off without a dollar."

"I know that, mamma, and I've acted the wiser part in not letting my tastes subvert my judgment; and yet, if Ralph Hoadley's fortune had rested on half as secure a foundation as Benjamin Loring's, I should not have hesitated betwixt the two men."

It was not my fault that I once heard this passage of the conversation betwixt mother and daughter. I tried in various ways to assure them of my presence in the ante-room.

It was spring once more, and I was out in our front yard, among the crocuses, plucking a few of the purple, and yellow, and white flags, and thinking how the sad eyes of my mother would kindle at the sight of them. The earth was drenched in the sunshine of a New England May. The wind came over the hills in vagrant currents spiced with sprouting fern, and sassafras, and all sweet forest scents, and the robins sang for joy as they built their nests among the branches, where the young leaves made a line of green flame. It was a day sent of God, at once a witness and a prophecy. I, Margaret Darling, rejoiced in it, and was glad. I had few deeper outward sources of happiness than days like this. My life certainly had very little of the warmth and color which are the right of youth, and I was young yet, just beyond my twenty-fourth birthday.

It was hard sometimes to feel the years slipping away from me, with so little color or fragrance in them. It was hard, and grating, and bitter sometimes to go through the same dull routine of school duties, and little home cares, to be just able to keep the wolf from the door, and no more than that. It was hardest of all to look in my mother's sad, tender face, and comprehend the pity, and regret, and yearning that I knew for my sake lay always at the core of her heart. But, with God's help, I tried to carry my soul patiently, faithfully through much of craving, of restlessness, and baffled aspiration.

That morning, though, I was glad, as glad as the birds on the leaves through which the spiced vines shivered, because the linens of snow were all rolled up; no fringe of them was left in the darkest hollow: and I was singing some fragment of an old household tune, when a voice reached me from the gate, a soft, tremulous voice, with some fear or pain behind it.

"Miss Darling?"

I looked up. At the wicket stood a young, pretty face, with roses in it, somewhat blanched now; and the eyes, which had the purplish blue of harebells, held tears in them.

Susan Crofts, a former pupil of mine, in the middle of her teens, was a pretty girl, remarkably intelligent too, considering her advantages. She lived with her grandmother and young brother in the little red house just beyond the tow path and the old mill. I saw at once that the girl was in trouble, so I hurried toward her, showering along the path, in my eagerness, the purple and yellow crocuses.

"Susan, my child, what is the matter?"

Her voice struggled for the words and lost them. They were choked, drowned in a sob.

So I drew her into the house, and across the hall to the pleasant little sitting-room, where mamma sat in her easy chair by the window, cicatrizing a very small rent in my best lace collar.

I made what brief explanation the case demanded. "Mamma, this is Susan Crofts. She is in some trouble, and I have brought her in here to share it with you and me."

Mamma's sympathies were in her face, as she took the brown plump hand in her thin, soft fingers. "Let us know what this trouble is, and if we cannot help you out of it," said the soft, persuasive voice of Mrs. Darling.

But the tears had first to clear a way for the words. Then they came with a vividness and pathos that gave to the sad little story a power and meaning that my pen never saw.

Susan Crofts had neither father nor mother. Her grandmother was bowed with the infirmities of age and rheumatism, and the small family was mostly dependent for its subsistence upon the services of Susan's brother, Lucius, a bright, active youth, a year his sister's senior. The boy cultivated the acre or two of land about the house, and has always had plenty of work at harvest time: but the year before he had met with a serious fall while clambering up a precipice, and had been totally incapacitated for exertion.

The doctors feared for awhile internal injuries, but the recuperative forces of his healthy youth triumphed at last, and the boy was now on the road to recovery. But in the meantime the family resources had entirely failed, and the long illness of Lucius had superadded many expenses. But their creditors had been very considerate, and the heart of the little household had not failed, until Squire Hoadley, who owned the little homestead, had sent them a message stating absolutely that he must have the rent, or they leave the premises within two weeks.

They had no other home in the wide world. Lucius was not able to leave his chamber, and it would certainly be the death of the old woman to go out from the roof under which she had dwelt for so many years. And the girl concluded her story with another storm of tears. Surely they were in bad case.

Mamma and I looked at each other. One thought was in the heart of both, and that was, "Somehow we must help her."

But we could not discuss the ways and means in her presence. She had come to us as her only friends, and we did not send her away without comfort. We told her to keep heart for a day or two, and we would see what could be done in this matter. She was in the right to trust us; we would not fail her in this thing. And the blushes that were so natural to them came back to the girl's cheeks, and there was hope in her heart and face when she went out of the door.

"Now, mamma, the question is, What is to be done?" I said, so soon as we were alone, pacing up and down the sitting-room.

"Your question stares me in the face, Margary, and I don't know how to answer it."

"But we must not let this old woman, and that sick boy, and helpless girl, be turned out into the cold of the world, without a roof to shelter them. I could not rest a night in peace, thinking of it. And yet fifty dollars is a great deal of money for people like us to raise. How are we to do it?"

"There's my watch," faintly ventured mamma.

It was my father's. I knew what it would cost her to part with this. She should be spared that pang at all events. My decision was a rapid one.

"No," with a little deprecatory gesture, for the very thought cost me pain also. "You must never speak of parting with that. I must save this money out of my next half year's salary. It may require some new lessons in the practice of domestic economy, but it can be done."

"But, my child, you will have to see this cold, hard man, Squire Hoadley, yourself, and pledge your word to secure him his rent, or he will not consent to the arrangement."

This was a most disagreeable part of my duty, which I had not counted on, but there was no getting aside of it. I must go up to the silent gray stone house on the hill, and have an interview with its owner, that stern, inflexible old man, of whom very few in the world spoke well.

But it is not in my nature to put off any disagreeable work when I have made up my mind to it, so I said: "I will go this very evening, and have it all over with before I sleep."

It was a little after sunset when I started for Squire Hoadley's, a pleasant evening, into whose arms the golden day was dropping softly. Its pulse thrilled with the strong life of the awakening spring, the springing grass perfumed the air, but somehow the sounds and pictures of earth and sky failed to win my thoughts. They went back nearly two years before, and anchored among those days when I gave Clara Woolcott music lessons. The family had not made a visit to their country-seat since that time.

Maude became Mr. Loring's wife at Christmas, and I have a long letter from my favorite pupil describing the bridal festivities, with cards and a dainty box of cake.

As for Mrs. Loring, she was now, doubtless, leading a life of fashionable gayety in New York.

Then my thoughts recurred to the nephew of the man I was seeking. He had sailed for Europe soon after his rejection, and had not returned since. I wondered if the young man had found the Lethe he sought in that foreign tour, and if time and reflection had not revealed some infirmities in the lady of his worship.

I remembered, too, that I contrasted the uncle and the nephew in my thoughts, the one rigid, pompous, exacting, with but one spring of tenderness in his heart, and that was for his nephew; and the other—what I have described him, and I wondered at the difference betwixt these two, so closely allied.

And so wondering, I reached in the twilight that gray stone house that stood in the midst of its dark shrubberies about a mile from my own. I had not come on a pleasant errand, and it cost me a little struggle before I could go up to the front door and pull the bell.

In a moment I was ushered into a large sitting-room, whose dark, massive furniture seemed in some fine sense to harmonize with the face and figure thereof. There he sat, a large, heavily framed man, with the frosts of seventy years in his hair, and under that a hard, resolute face, whose expression concentrated into an iron rigidity about the lips. The deep-set eyes were dark and shrewd, and gleamed with a stern kind of brightness far under the iron gray eyebrows.

The one aim and purpose of this old man's life had been to make money, and he had succeeded; and yet something in his face bore witness that the success had cost too great a price—that for gold this man had defrauded his better nature, its sympathies, its tenderesses, all its sweetest and noblest impulses, and anchored him at last in a hard, bitter, loveless old age. I introduced myself as the old man rose up, with his eyes seeming to pierce my face: "Miss Darling, sir, the daughter of the late clergyman with whom you were somewhat acquainted, I believe."

Squire Hoadley bowed, and offered me a chair with a somewhat stately courtesy, and something in his manner showed him a little surprised or puzzled at my visit.

I was not long in explaining its object. "I come in behalf of some humble friends of mine, who are your debtors—the Crofts family." The iron face darkened, and settled into absolute denial or defiance. I saw at once that this man suspected I had come to make some appeal to his sympathies. As soon should I have thought of calling on a rock to hear and have pity. I hastened to assure him here. "I do not come to seek any charity on your part for these people; I come simply on a business matter, and to give you my word that you shall have the rent in a couple of months, if you will wait so long."

"But who is to raise the money, and how am I to be certain of it?" asked the hard, dry voice of Squire Hoadley.

"I am to raise it, as soon as my salary is due. If you have any further hesitancy, the trustees of our academy will hold themselves responsible for this sum, I am certain."

There was a little pause. This rich old man, whose god was his gold, looked at me from under his iron gray eyebrows. "I will take your word," he said, at the last; "I will wait a couple of months for my rent."

My errand was done then. I rose up. "Thank you, Squire Hoadley," I said; "you do me, as well as your tenants, a very great favor."

I have never known what prompted the old man's next remark. It may have been a slight curiosity, for I suppose that rich men and misers are not always without this feeling. "I cannot understand, Miss Darling, how my decision is to be of service to you?"

I turned with an impulse to reach, if it were possible, that old man's conscience—to find some words that should strike down through that hard arid nature to some regret or conviction of his soul.

"You will do me a service, Squire Hoadley, because the thought of that old woman and her helpless grandchildren, turned out in the world without a roof to shelter them, will haunt me no longer; and because the knowledge that I failed at any personal sacrifice to save them would, it seems to me, follow me through life, and bear witness against me one day before God."

My words had struck home. I saw the old, stern face falter, and then the gray eyes seemed to grow lurid with anger, but I did not wait longer; I bowed, and passed from the room, and so my first interview, and my last, with Squire Hoadley was over.

I had some little difficulty in unclosing the front door, and while I stood there a voice spoke suddenly at my side—"Allow me to open it for you, Miss Darling," and looking up I confronted Ralph Hoadley.

These two years of travel had changed him somewhat. They had bronzed his cheeks, and added new strength to the lithe slender figure; but I could not mistake the rare smile in which the eyes now seemed to do keener service than the lips.

"Thank you," I said; "I was not aware you had returned."

"I got back in the last steamer, and have only been here twenty-four hours," giving me his hand and regarding me with more earnestness than he had ever done before.

I wondered, as I went down the tow-path to the little red house by the mill, whether Ralph Hoadley had heard the conversation which had transpired betwixt his uncle and myself. He came out of an adjoining room, so it was not impossible; and if so, how keenly he must have felt that terrible greed of gold in his nearest relative on earth, and in one, too, who, though cold and hard to all the world beside, still loved him. One thing was certain, however, he had quite recovered from the blow which Maude Woolcott's refusal had cost him. One could see that, looking in his face, and Mrs. Woolcott's fears need never have existed.

But all speculations regarding Ralph Hoadley were abruptly terminated, when I reached the dwelling of the Crofts, and revealed to the little family the result of my interview with the Squire. How boundless was their joy and gratitude! and how abundant, "pressed down and overflowing," was the measure of reward which that hour meted out to me!

Into the last of May there came suddenly a cold, dreary rain, as though the year had forgotten itself, and wandered back from all its warmth, and joy, and thrilling life into March.

My walk from the Academy home was a long one, and fierce gusts of wind threw the cold rain in my face, and whirled and beat the small umbrella which I carried, and which proved so ineffectual against the double storm.

"My umbrella is large enough for two. Won't you come under its roof, Miss Darling?"

I knew the voice, which overtook me in the lane, before I looked at the owner. I could not choose but accept the invitation, and it was a great comfort to receive the new protection and support which Ralph Hoadley's arm and umbrella afforded; for I never would have fought my way unaided through the storm; and if I could not find words at the moment to thank the young man for his courtesy, I am certain mamma did, when she came to the door, and he resigned me to her care.

After this, vastly to the surprise of both of us, Ralph Hoadley called occasionally at the parsonage. I think his visits always left some light behind them, and then he used to fill my long-starved spirit with stories of the world he had seen. He had a marvellous gift of word painting. On that canvass of speech would arise and glow in all their stateliness, and warmth, and splendor the cities he had seen, the fair lands he had visited. I would seem to see landscapes among the tropics, throbbing out from his words with all their wonders of sky, and mountains, and foliage. Birds of marvellous beauty would flame along the air; the cries of wild beasts would shiver like a living terror through the stillness of the lonely jungle; then the desert, vast, and gray, and awful, would stretch away to the hot, dead sky. And so picture followed picture of grace, grandeur, or savage splendor; but this was not all.

Ralph Hoadley had grown, what every traveller should, a wiser and a better man. He had learned lessons not only from nature, but from humanity. His faith, his charity, his love for God and man had deepened and broadened. I felt this. He had needed the sorrow, the struggle, the change, to strengthen and ripen his character. Would any influence of his be able to reach the hard old man who dwelt in the gray stone house on the hill, and who, of all the world, loved only him?

I heard from the Crofts occasionally. Ralph Hoadley had been there, too, with his stimulating presence and kindly words, that always gladdened the hearts of the poor, and he had sent the sick boy presents of early peaches and grapes from the hot-houses, but he never alluded to the debt they owed his uncle, and they fancied he did not know it. I had my doubts, but I did not reveal them. I never paid it, however.

Somewhere in the early June, Squire Hoadley had tidings that a rich house in the East Indies, with wide commercial relations in every part of the globe, had suddenly failed. In this house the Squire had embarked full half of his large fortune. The knowledge of its ruin proved too much for him. Anxiety and agitation at last brought on convulsions, and these ended in an attack of apoplexy, from which he never recovered. Have I not said that gold was his god?

So one morning, when the earth came out of the night in a fresh anointing of June sunshine, the air thrilled with the song of birds, the bell tolled, and the stone house on the hill was hung with black, and old Squire Hoadley was dead!

Ralph Hoadley left Stoneham, immediately after the funeral, and I did not see him for nearly five months.

One afternoon in November he suddenly appeared at our house. The Indian summer had come at last, trailing its golden skirts along the very borders of winter; the soft air was seasoned with the breath of perishing leaves; sky and earth together wore that smile of tender pathos which is the year's last, which goes out in the cold, and darkness, and storm of December.

I stood by the open window dividing my attention betwixt the day outside and an antique china vase, which I had just filled with late golden pears, bordering the margin with sprays of dark green leaves and crimson berries, that flashed among them like gems, concentrating in their burning hearts the lost summer's warmth and heat. Mamma loved bright colors and vivid contrasts, and the antique vase had been her mother's. I was preparing a little surprise for her; suddenly a voice called my name near the window. I looked out. There was Ralph Hoadley, with those deep, gray eyes that were like his uncle's for brilliancy, but not like them in the kindly smile they borrowed from his heart, looking at me.

"Is it your fate, or your fault, that you always come with a surprise?" I asked, as he lifted his hat; and then I went to the door to meet him.

He came in, and sitting down by the open window, our talk touched a variety of commonplace themes, such as the weather, the lost summer, my vase of fruit. At last he made it a little more personal.

"I did not intend to be absent so long when I left Stoneham, but I found my uncle's affairs in a great deal of confusion. Contrary to my expectations, however, nearly half of the fortune which he spent his life in amassing will be saved. Poor Uncle Stephen! He was a good friend to me from the time that I was left fatherless and motherless in my boyhood." And I knew what the sigh and the "Poor Uncle Stephen" meant.

In the pause which followed I said, knowing that my embarrassment betrayed itself in face and voice:—

"Your uncle's estate has a small claim against me, of about fifty dollars. I should have settled it before, if the Squire's death and your leaving had not deprived me of an opportunity."

Ralph Hoadley looked at me, after I had thus spoken, with a look that I could not analyze. His lips smiled faintly, but the smile seemed only a flickering light which floated on an ocean of deeper feeling, an ocean which was stirred and troubled now. At last he spoke. "I understand you," he said. "I was in the next room, and overheard your interview with my uncle."

My suspicion was confirmed now. I tried to speak, but instead of words came blushes burning into my cheeks.

And then Ralph Hoadley took my hand. "Margaret, little Margaret," he said, "you have no reason to blush for that time."

He had never called me by this name before. The words were strange enough, but stranger still was the tone in which they were set. What did that unutterable, appealing tenderness mean! I could not look up in Ralph Hoadley's face to answer me.

"And Margaret," said the voice once more, "from that evening I began to know and to love you. The vision of the sweet, pale face, that I used to meet so often, with only a passing glance because of that blind folly, that mad worship of my youth, wholly outlived, sorely repented of—that face came back to help, to gladden, to inspire me. Ah, Margaret, it may be that I needed that lesson, bitter though it was, to learn what a true woman must be in tenderness, and self-sacrifice, in faith in God, and help for man, help for all times and circumstances, for all weal and woe, sweet, tender, enduring to the end, about his life. Lo! such a woman have I found—Margaret, little Margaret Darling, must I go away from her?"

What my answer was, dear reader, or whether I made any, I surely cannot tell. But, an hour later, I carried out to mamma a present, not the antique vase of china piled with golden fruit, around which the red berries flamed like jewels, but another, her future son-in-law, Ralph Houdley!

LEGEND UPON THE INVENTION OF LACE.

BY MRS. H. C. COVANT.

I MET, the other day, with so pretty a legend of the modern invention of lace, that, in the absence of all other specific information on the subject, I have adopted it as the true one. It gives a kind of consecration to the favorite ornament of women, baptizing its infancy in the gracious font of womanly kindness. In the middle of the sixteenth century there lived in the Saxon Erzgebirge a noble lady, Barbara Uttman by name, the wife of a rich mine-owner, of the district. By birth she belonged to the distinguished Elterlein family of Nuremberg. The heart of this good woman was devoted to the interests of the poor of the rough, barren, mountain region where lay her husband's property, who were reduced at this time to great straits by the decline of the mining business, which had furnished their chief support. The culture of their sterile soil was wasted labor; and utter, hopeless poverty was creeping over the once comparatively thriving community. In this state of things the kind soul of Barbara Uttman was incessantly revolving plans for the relief of these wretched people. One day, accidentally entering an old shaft which had been recently re-opened, her eye was caught by a long stretch of ancient spider-webs, of fantastic and complex patterns, glimmering against the moist wall in the early sunlight which fell into the aperture. An inventive thought fell, at the same instant, like an inward ray, into the brain of this daughter of Nuremberg. With "the prophetic eye of taste," and with the woman's eye, we may add, she saw in the delicate product of the insect-weaver the suggestion of a charming addition to the cumbrous richness of a medieval attire, and already beheld in fancy the airy web relieving the gorgeous brocades and damasks in which the patrician families of her native city delighted to array their goodly persons. "Why cannot human hands," thought she, "do what the spider's hands have done?" She mused and mused. Day after day she returned to the old shaft to study the work of her little teacher, and then experimented at home. The result, in due time, was the pillow and bone, the simple but effective instruments, not yet supplanted by modern improvements, for the fabrication of lace by hand. She taught the art to the village maidens. Specimens of their work were carried to the fairs; the beautiful novelty at once caught the public taste, and the disheartened peasantry of the Erzgebirge found themselves in possession of a profitable and permanent branch of industry. From them it spread into other countries; and hand, or thread, or bone lace, as it is variously called, became thenceforth one of the chief birthrights of the industrious poor. It is pleasant to know that from the date of this invention it has not ceased to be a flourishing business in the place of its birth, and that at the present time it gives employment, in that little district alone, to not less than twenty thousand people. Some fifty years since, the grateful inhabitants erected in the churchyard of Annaberg, where Barbara Uttman was buried, a monument to her memory. It represents her as sitting, the cushion in her lap, while an angel crowns her with a garland, and bears the inscription: "In the year 1561 she became, through the invention of thread lace, the benefactress of the Erzgebirge."

"ALL ALONE."

BY LILY LEA.

LIFE-LEAVES dead, and brown, and sere,
Round the threshold, lone and drear,
Rustle in the autumn breeze;
Rain-drops slowly fall and freeze!
Soft lips hushed,
Young loves crushed,
Bright hopes scattered,
Harp-strings shattered!
Withered flowers, and vines, and tears,
Cover graves of earlier years!
Threads of song no loved one sings,
Faded garlands, broken rings,
Treasured locks of waving hair,
Snatches of some yearning prayer;
Many a token
Of deep vows broken:
Ling'ring gleams
Of olden dreams;
Grief in every wind-harp sighing—
Living on, yet ever dying!
Gloomy days and weary nights—
No blessed ray the spirit lights;
Haunting phantoms come and go—
Shades of bitter wrong and wo!
Torn heart bleeding,
Ever pleading,
Sad, deprest,
For peace and rest!
